Or it may well be (as Cafter faith, comparing in concordance the Roman fashions with the rites of the Pythagoreans) for that the Dæmon or good Angel within us, hath need of the gods help without, and maketh supplication with covering the head, giving thus much covertly to understand thereby, that the foul is likewise covered and hidden by the body.

XI. Why facrifice they unto Saturn bare-headed.

IS it because Aneas first brought up this fashion of covering the head at sacrifices; and the sacrifice Ito Saturnus is much more ancient then his time?

Or, for that they used to be covered unto the coelestial gods: but as for Saturn he is reputed a Subterranean or terrestrial god?

Or, in this respect, that there is nothing hidden, covered, or shadowed in Truth? For among the Romans, Saturn washeld to be the father of Verity, XII. Why do they repute Saturn the Father of Truth.

1Sit for that (as some Philosophers deem) they are of opinion that * Saturn is * Time? and Time * Kerne. you know well findeth out and revealeth the Truth.

Or, because as the Poets Fable, men lived under Sauras teign in the golden age: and if the life of man was then most just and righteous, it followeth consequently that there was much truth in the Authories To be distribution and a world.

What u the reason that they sacrificed likewise unto the god whom they tearmed Honor, with bare head? now a man may interpret Honor to be as much as Glory and Reputation.

This haply because Honor and Glory's a thing evident, notorious, and exposed to the knowledge of the whole world; and by the lame reason that they vell Bonet before men of worship, dignity, and sonour, they adore also the Destythat beneath the name of Honory with the head bare.

Compy and weight of cradity when and g this may be the chaife, that Sons carry their Fathers and Mothers forth to be enterred with their liveds hooded and coppred; but daughters bare-beaded, with their hairs derrifted and hinging down toofe.

Bit for that Fathers ought to be honored as gods by their Male-Children, but lamented and beewailed as dead men by their daughters, and therefore the law having given and granted unto either Sex that which is proper, bath of both together made that which is beleening and convenient? Or, it is in this regard, that tinto forrow and heavineffe, that is best beseeming which is extraordinary and unusual now more ordinary it is with women to go abroad with their heads vailed and covered : and likewife with men, to be discovered and bare-headed. For even among the Greeks when there is befallen unto them any publick calamity, the manner and custome is, that the women should cut off the hairs of their head; and the men wear them long; for that otherwise it is usual that men frould poll their head, and women keepltheir hair long, And to prove that Sons were wont to be covered; in such a case, and for the said cante, a man may alledge that which Kerro hath write. ten; namely, that in the folemnity of funerals, and about the Tombs of their Fathers, they carry themielves with as much reverence and devotion as in the Temples of the gods : in fuch fort, as when they have burnt the corps in the funeral fire, fo foon as ever they meet with a bone, they pronounce that he who is dead, is now become a god On the contrary fide, women were inno wile permitted to vaile and cover their heads. And we find upon record, that the first man who put away. and divorced his Wife was Sparius Carbilius, because she bare him no children; the second, Sulpitime Gallus, for that he faw her to cast a robe over her head : and the third Publins Sempronius; for standing to behold the solemnity of the funeral games; }

How it cometh to paffe, that confidering the Romani effected Terminus a god, and therefore, in honor of him celebrated a feaft called chercupon Terminalia, jet they never killed any beaft in facrifice unto him?

Tis because Romulus did appoint no bonds and limits of his country, to the end that he might lawfully fet out and take in where pleased him, and repute all that land his own so far as (according to that faying of the Lacedæmonian) his spear or javelin would reach: But Numa Pompilius a just man and politick withal, one who knew well how to govern, and that by the rule of Philosophy, caused his Territory to be confined between him and his neighbour Nations, and called those frontier bonds by the name of Terminus, as the fur erintendent, overfeer and keeper of peace and amity between neighbours; and therefore he supposed, that this Terminia ought to be perserved pure and clean from all blood, and impollute with any murder:

What is the reason that it is not lawful for any maid servants to enter into the temple of the goddesse * Leu- * Or Me-cothea? and the Dames of Rome, bringing in thither one alone and no more with them, fall to cussing title. and boxing her about the ears and cheeks.

A Sfor the Wench that is thus buffered, it is a fufficient fign and argument, that fuch as the, are not permitted to comethither: now for all others they keep them out in regard of a certaine Poetical Fable reported in this wise: that Lady Ino being in times past jealous of her husband, and suspecting him with a maid servant of hers, sell mad, and was enraged against her own son: this servant the Greeks lay was an Ætolian born, and had to name Antiphera: and therefore it is that here among us in the City of Charonea, before the Temple or Chappel of Matuta, the Sexton taking a whip in his hand, crieth with a loud voice. No man fervant or maid fervant be so hardy as to come in here; No Ætolian he or she presume to enter into this place,

What is the cause that to this goddesse; falk pray mas for any blessings to their own children, but for their nephens only, to mit, their brothers or sisters children?

Ay it not be, for that Ino was a Lady that loved her Sifter wonderous well, in so much as the sucked at her own breast a Son of hers: but was infortunate in her own children? Or rather, because the said custome is otherwise very good and civil, inducing and moving folks hearts to carry love and affection to their kindreds.

For what cause, were many rich men wont to consecrate and give unto Hercules the Disme or tenth of all their goods ?

Wy may it not be upon this occasion, that Hereules himselfe being upon a time at * Rome, facrificed the tenth Cow of all the drove which he had taken from Geryon? Or for that he freed and delivered the Romans from the tax and tribute of the Diffnes which they By Pro-leggs, mea-ning the ning the were wont to pay out of their goods unto the Tuscans, Or in case this may not go current for an authentical history, and worthy of credit: what and if Rose flood, we fay that unto Herostes as to fome great belly god, and one who loved good cheer, they offered and facrificed plenteously and in great liberality

Or rather, for that by this means they would take down and diminish a little their excessive riches which ordinarily is an eye-fore and odious unto the Citizens of a popular state, as if they means to which ordinarily is an eye-to-a and otherwise and corpulency, of the body, which being abate and bring low (as it were) that plethorical plight and corpulency, of the body, which being about the height is dangerous: inppoling by such cutting off, and abridging of inperfluites, to do honour and fervice most pleasing unto Hargeles, as who joyed highly in frigality: for that in his life time he flood contented with a little, and regarded no delicary or excelle what lower and

Por in old time the month of March was reckehed first, as a man may collect by many other competences, and by this especially, that the fifth month in order after March was called Quintility and the first month Sextilia, and all the rest confequently one after another until you come to the laft, which they named December, because it was the tenth in number after March: which giveth occasion unto some for to think and say, that the Romans (in those days) determined and accomplished their compleat year, not in twelve Months but inten; namely, by adding unto every one of those tenmonths certain days over and above thirty. Others write, that December indeed was the tenth month after March; but January was the eleventh, and February the twelfth: in which month they used certain expiatory and purgatory sacrifices, yea, and offered oblations unto the dead (as it were) to make an end of the year. How beit, afterwards they transposed this order, and ranged January in the first place, for that upon the first day thereof, which they call the Calends of Tanuary ; the first Consulsthat ever bare rule in Rome were enstalled, immediately upon the deposition and expulsion of the Kings out of the City. But there feemeth to be more probability and like-lihood of truth in their speech, who say, that Romalus being a martial Prince, and one that loved war and feats of arms, as being reputed the son of Mars, set before all other months, that which carried the name of his father: howbeit Nums who succeeded next after him, being a man of peace; and who endeavoured to withdraw the hearts and minds of his subjects and citizens from warto agriculture, gave the prerogative of the first place unto January, and honoured Janus most, as one who had been more given to politick government, and to the husbandry of ground, then to the ex-

Consider moreover, whether Numa chose not this month for to begin the year withal, as best sorting with nature in regard of us; for otherwise in general, there is no one thing of all those that by nature turn about circularly, that can be said first or last, but according to the several institutions and ordinances of men, some begin the time at this point, others at that. And verily they that make the Winter Solstice or hibernal Tropick the beginning of their year, do the best of all others: for that the Sun ceasing then to passe farther, beginneth to return and take his way again toward us for it feemeth, that both according to the course of nature, and also in regard of us, this season is most besitting to begin the year: for that it encreaseth unto us the time of the day light, and diminisheth the darknesse of night, and canseth that noble star or planet to approach neerer and come toward us, the Lord, Governor and Ruler of all substance transitory and fluxible matter whatsoever,

Why do women when they dresse up and adorn the Chappel or Shrine of their feminine goddesse whom they call Bona, never bring home for that purpose any branches of Myrtle tree: and yet otherwise have a delight to employ all sorts of leaves and sowers?

Ay it not be, for that, as some fabulous writers tell the tale, there was one * Flevius a sooth-layer had a wife, who used secretly to drink wine, and when she was surprized and taken in the manner by her husband, the was well beaten by him with myttle rods : and for that caute they bring thither no boughs of myrtle: mary they offer libations unto this goddefie of wine, but for looth they call it Milke.

Or is it not for this cause, that those who are to celebrate the ceremonies of this divine service. ought to be pure and cleane from all pollutions, but especially from that of Venus or leachery? For not only they put out of the roome where the service is performed unto the said goddesse Bona, all men, but also whatioever is besides of masculine sex; which is the reason that they so detest the myrtle tree, as being confectated unto Venus, infomuch as it should seeme they called in old time that Venus, Myrtea, which now goeth under the name of Murcia.

What is the reason that the Latines do so much honour and reverence the Woodpecker, and sorbeare altogether to do that bird any harme?

Sit for that Picus was reported in old time by the enchantments and forceries of his wife, to have changed his own nature, and to be metamorphozed into a Woodpecker; under which forme he gave out oracles, and delivered answers unto those who propounded unto him any demands?

Or rather, because this seemeth a meere fable, and incredible tale: there is another story reported which carrieth more probability with it, and foundeth nearer unto truth. That when Romulus and Remus were cast forth and exposed to death; not only a female woolfe gave them her teats to suck, but allo a certaine Woodpecker flew unto them, and brought them food in her bill, and so fed them: and therefore haply it is, that ordinarily in thele daies we may fee, as Nigidius hath well observed, what places foever at the foot of an hill covered and shadowed with oakes or other trees a Woodpecker haunteth, thither customably you shall have a woolfe to repaire,

Or peradventure, feeing their manner is to consecrate unto every god one kind of bird or other, they reputed this Woodpecker facred unto Mars, because it is a couragious and hardy bird, having a bill joftrong, that he is able to overthrow an oake therewith, after he hath jobbed and pecked into it as far as to the very marrow and heart thereof.

How is it that they imagine Janus to have had two faces, in which manner they use both to paint and also to cast him in mold?

Sit for that be being a Gracian borne, came from Perrhabia, as we find witten in histories; and passing forward into Italy, dwelt in that countrey among the Barbarous people, who there lived, whose language and manner of life he changed?

Or rather because he raught and pertwaded them to live together after a civill and honest sort, in husbandry and tilling the ground; whereas before time their manners were rude, and their fashions lavage without law or justice altogether.

What is the cause that they use to fell at Rome all things pertaining to the surniture of Funerals, with in the temple of the goddesse Libitina, supposing her to be Venus?

His may seeme to be one of the sage and philosophicall inventions of King Numa, to the end that men should learn not to abhor such things, nor to flie from them, as if they did pollute and

Or else this reason may be rendred, that it serveth for a good record and memoriall, to put us in mind, that what soever had a beginning by generation, shall likewise come to an end by death; as if one and the same goddesse were superintendent and governesse of nativity and death: for even in the City of Delphot there is a pretty image of Venus, surnamed Epitymbia; that is to say, sepulchrall: be-fore which they nie to raile and call forth the ghosts of such as are departed, for to receive the libaments and facred liquors powred forth unto them.

Why have the Romans in every month three beginnings as it were, to wit, certaine principall and prefixe ed or preordained * daies, and regard not the same intervall or space of daies between

Sit because as Juba writeth in his Chronicles, that the chiefe Magistrates were wont upon the first Gy, canad; Aday of the month to call and fummon the people; whereupon it took the name of Calends: and Mone and then to denounce unto them that the Nones should be the fifth day after; and as for the Ides they Ides, held it to be an holy and facred day?

Or for that they measuring and determining the time according to the differences of the moone, they observed in her everymonth three principall changes and diversities: the first, when she is altogether hinden namely, during her conjunction with the fun; the second when the is somewhat removed from the beames of the fun, and beginneth to shew her selse croissant in the evening toward the West whereas the sun setteth; the third, when she is at the full: now that occultation and hiding of hers in the first place they named Calends, for that in their tongue what soever is secret and hidden they say it is [Clam] and to hide or keep close, they expressed by this word [Calaw: s] and the first day of the moons illumination, which we here in Greece tearme Nomenia, that is to say, the new-moone, they called by a most just name Nome, for that which is new and young, they tearm Nowm, in manner as we do sale. As for the Idate, they took their name of this word sales, that see insistent beauty; for that the moon being then at the full is in the very perfection of her beauty; or haply they derived this denomination of Dias, as attributing it to Justice: but in this we are not to fearch out exactly the just number of diese, not upon a small default to slander and condemne this manner of reakoning, seeing that even at this day, when the science of Astrology is grown to so great an increment, the inequality of the motion, and course of the moone surpassethal experience of Mathematicians, and cannot be reduced to any certaine rule of reason.

XXV

What is the cause that they repute the morrows after Calends, Nones, and Ides, disasterous or dismall dates, either for to set forward upon any journey or voyage, or to march with an army into the field?

Is it because as many thinke, and as Titus Livius hath recorded in his story: the Tribunes milita-Ity, at what time as they had consular and soveraign authority, went into the field with the Romane army the morrow after the Ides of the month Quintilis, which was the same that July now is, and were discomfited in a battell by the Gaules, neare unto the river Assis: and consequently upon that overthrow lost the very City it selfe of Rome: by which occasion the morrow after the Ides, being held and reputed for a snifter and unlucky day, supersition entring into mens days proceeded farther, (as she loveth alwaies so todo) and brought in the custome for to hold the morrow after the Nones, yea, and the morrow after the Calendy, as unfortunate, and to be as religiously observed in semblable cases.

But against this there may be opposed many objections: for first and formost, they lost that battell upon another day, and calling it Alliensis by the name of the river Allis, where it was strucken, they have it in abomination for that cause. Againe, whereas there be many daies reputed dissall and unfortunate, they do not observe so precisely and with so religious seare, other daies of list denomination in every month, but each day apart only in that month wherein such and such a disaster hapned: and that the infortunity of one day should draw a superstitious seare simply upon all the morrows after Calends, Nones, and Ides, carrieth no congruity at all, nor apparence of reason.

Confider moreover and fee, whether, as of months they used to confectate the first to the gods codestiall; the second to the terrestriall, or infernall, wherein they perform certain explanory ceremonies and facrifices of purification, and present offerings and services to the dead: so of the daies in the month, those which are thirde and principall, as hath been said, they would not have to be kept as sacred and sestival holidaies; but such as follow after, as being dedicated unto the spirits, called Damons, and those that are departed; they also have esteemed consequently as unhappy, and altogether unmeet either for to execute or to take in hand any businesse: for the Greeks adoring and ferving the gods upon their new-moones and first daies of the month, have attributed the second daies unto the demi-gods and Damons: like as at their feasts also they drinke the second cup unto their demi-gods, and demi-goddesses. In sum, Time is a kind of number, and the beginning of number is (I wot not what;) frome divine thing, for it is Unity: and that which commeth next after it is Deuz or two, cleane opposite unto the said beginning, and is the first of all even numbers: as for the even number it is defective; unperfect, and indefinite, whereas contrariwise, the uneven or odde number it selie is finite, compleat, and absolute: and for this cause like as the Nones succeed the Calends five daies after; fo the Ides follow the Nones nine daies after them; for the uneven and odde numbers do determine those beginnings, or principall daies; but those which presently ensue after the said principall daies being even, are neither ranged in any order, nor have power and puissance: and therefore men do not enterprise any great work, nor set forth voyage or journey upon such daies: and hereto we may to good purpole annex that pretty speech of Thomistocles: For when the morrow (quoth he) upon a time quarrelled with the festivall day which went next before it, saying, that her se se was bussed and took a great deale of paines, preparing and providing with much travell those goods which the feast enjoyed at her ease, with all repose, rest, and leisure: the Festivall day made this answer: Thou saidst true indeed; but if I were not, where wouldst thou be? This tale Themistocles devised, and delivered unto the Athenian Captaines, who came after him; giving them thereby to understand, that neither they nor any acts of theirs would ever have been seen, unlessehe before them had laved the City of Athens, Forasmuch then, as every enterprise and voyage of importance hath need of provision, and some preparatives; and for that the Romans in old time upon their festivall daies, dispensed nothing, nor tooke carefor any provision; being wholly given and devoted at fuch times to the service and worship of God, doing that, and nothing else; like as even at thisday, when the Priests begin to sacrifice, they pronounce with a loud voice before all the company there assembled Hoc age, that is to say, Mind this, and do no other thing: very like it is, and standeth to great reason, that they used not to put themselves upon the way for any long voyage, nor tooke in hand any great affaire or businesse presently after a sestivall day, but kept within house all the morrow after, to thinke upon their occasions, and to provide all things necessary for journey or exploit: or we may conjecture, that as at this very day the Romans after they have adored the gods, and made their praiers unto them within their temples, are wont to say there a time; and sit them down; even so they thought it not reasonable to call their great affaires so, as that they should immediately follow upon any of their selfivall daies; but they allowed some respit and time between, as knowing full well that businesses arry with them alwaies many troubles and hinderances, beyond the opinion, expectation, and will of those who take them in hand.

XXVI.

What is the cause that women at Rome, when they mourne for the dead, put on white rober, and likewise weare white causes, cosses, and kerchieses upon their heads.

May innot be that for to oppose themselves against hell and the darknesse thereof, they conformed their raiment and attite to that colour which is cleare and bright? A most of the colour which is cleare and bright? A most of the colour which is cleare and bury the dead corps in white closures, they suppose, that those who are next of kin, and come nearest about them cought also to weare their livetie? Now the body they do in this wise deck, because they cannot adorne the Hoste 693 and it they are willing to accompany as light some pure and neat, as being now at the last delivered and set free, and which hath performed a great and variable combate.

Or rather, we may gueffe thus much thereby: that in fuch cases, that which is most simple and leaft costly, is best beleeming; whereas cloaths of any other colour died do, ommonly bewray either superfluity or curiostry: ior we may say even as well of black as of purple: These robes are deceirfull: these colours also are counterfeit. And astouching that which is of it selfe black, if it have not that tincture by diers art, surely it is so coloured by nature, as being mixed and compounded with obscurity: and therefore there is no colour else but white, which is pure, unmixis, and not stained and sullied with any tincture, and that which is inimitable: in which regard more meet and agreeable unto those who are interred, considering that the dead is now become simple, pure, exempt from all mixtion, and in very truth, nothing else but delivered from the body, as a staine and insection hardly scoured out and rid away. Semblably, in the City of Argos, whenseever they morned, the manner was to weare white garments, washed (as Soornees said) in faire and cleare water,

XXVII.

What is the reason that they esteeme all the walls of the City sacred and inviolable, but not the gates.

Is it (as Varro faith) because we ought to thinke the walls holy, to the end that we may fight valiantly, and die generoully in the desence of them? for it seemeth that this was the cause, why kandun killed his own brother Remush; or that he presumed to leap over an holy and invoiable place whereas contraitwise, it was not possible to consecrate and hallow the gates, thorow which there must needs be transported many things necessary, and namely, the bodies of the dead. And therefore, they who begin to found a City, environ and compasse first with a plough all that pourprise and precined wherein they meant to build, drawing the said plough with an one and a cow coupled together in one yoke: afterwards, when they have traced out all the said place where the walls should stand, they measure out as much ground as will serve for the gates, but take out the ploughshate, and so passe over that space with the bare plough, as if they meant thereby, that all the surrow which they cast up and earted should be facred and inviolable.

XXVIII.

What is the reason, that when their Children are to sweare by Hercules, they will not let them doit within doores, but cause them to go forth of the house, and take their oath abroad.

I Sit because (as some would have it) that they thinke Hercules is not delighted with keeping close within house and sitting idlely, but taketh pleasure to live abroad and lie without?

Or rather, for that of all the gods, Hercules is not (as one would fay) home-bred, but a stranger, come amongst them from a far? For even so they would not sweare by Bacchus, under the roote of the house, but went for tho do it; because he a slo is but a stranger among the gods.

the house, but went forth to do it; because he also is but a stranger among the gods.

Or haply, this is no more but a word in game and sport, given unto children: and besides (to say attush) it may be a meanes to withhold and restraine them from swearing so readily and rashly, as Phavorinus saith: for this device causeth a certaine premedicate preparation, and giveth them (whiles they go out of the house) leasure and time to consider better of the matter. And a man may consecute also with Phavorinus, and say with him. That this sashion was not common to other gods, but proper to Hercuster: for that we find it written, that he was in religious, so respective and precise in his oath, that in all his sife time he never sware but once, and that was only to Philum the son of Augius. And therefore the prophetesses a Delphos, named Pythia, answered thus upon a time to the Lacedemonians:

When all these oaths you once for fend, Your state (be sure) shall dayly mend;

XXIX.

What should be the reason, that they would not permit the new wedded bride to passe of her selfe over the doore-fill or threshold, when she is brought home to her husbands house, but they that accompany her, must life her up between them from the ground, and so convey her in?

Sit in remembrance of those first wives whom they ravished perforce from the Sabines, who entred not into their houses of themselves with their good will, but were carried in by them, in this

Or is it perhaps, because they would be thought to go against their wills into that place where they were to lose their maidenhead?

Or haply it may be, that a wedded wife ought not to go forth of her doores, & abandon her house. but perforce, like as she went first into it by force. For in our Country of Bastia, the manner is to burne before the doore where a new married wife is to dwell, the axell tree of that chariot or coach in which, the rode when the was brought to her husbands house. By which ceremony, thus much the is given to understand, that will she nill she, there she must now tarry, considering that it which brought her hither is now gone quite and confumed.

XXX

Wherefore do they at Rome, when they bring a new effoused bride home to the house of her husband, force her to fay these words unto her spouse: Where you are Cains, I will be Caia?

Sit to restifie by these words, that she entreth immediately to communicate with him in all goods, and to be a governesse and commander in the house as well as he? for it implies has much, as if the should say, where you are Lord and Master, I will be Lady and Mistris. Now these names they used as being common, and such as came first to hand, and for no other reason else : like as the Civill Lawyers use ordinarily these names, Cains, Seins, Lucius, and Titius: the Philosophers in their schooles, Dion and Theon

Or peradventure it is in regard of Caia Cacilia a beautifull and vertuous Lady, who in times past espoused one of the sons of King Tarquinius: of which damethere is yet to be seen even at this day one image of brasse within the temple of the god Santtus: and there likewise in old time her slippers, her distaffe and spindles laid up for to be seen: the one to signifie that she kept the house well, and went not ordinarily abroad; the other to shew how she busied her selfe at home.

XXXI.

How commethit, that they use to chant ordinarily at weddings, this word so much divulged, Ta-

[S is not of Talafia, the Greeke word, which fignifieth yarne: for the basket wherein women use to put in their rolls of carded wooll they name Talafos in Greek, and Calathus in Latine? Certes they that lead the bride home, cause her to sit upon a sleece of wooll, then bringeth she forth a distasse and a spindle, and with wooll all to hangeth and decketh the doore of her busbands house.

Or rather, if it be true which historians report: There was sometime a certaine young gentleman, very valiant and active in feats of armes, and otherwife of excellent parts and fingular well conditioned, whose name was Talasius: and when they ravished and carried away the daughters of the Sabines who were come to Rome, for to behold the folemnity of their festivall games and plaies: certaine meane persons, such yet as belonged to the traine and retinue of Talasius aforesaid, had cholen forth and were carrying away one damolell above the rest most beautiful of vitage, and for their safety and security as they passed along the streets, cried out aloud Talasio, Talasio, that is to say, for Talafius, for Talafius; to the end that no man should be so hardy as to approach neere unto them, nor attempt to have away the maiden from them, giving it out, that they carried her for to be the wife of Talassus; and others meeting them upon the way, joyned with them in company for the honour of Talassus, and as they followed after, highly praised their good choice which they had made, praying the gods to give both him and her joy of their marriage, and contentment to their hearts defire. Now for that this marriage proved happy and blefled, they were wont ever after in their wedding fongs to recant and refound this name, Talafins, like as the manner is among the Greeks to fing in such carrols, Hymenaus.

What is the reason that in the month of May, they use at Rome to cast over their woodden bridge into the river certaine images of men, which they call Argeos?

Sit in memoriall of the Barbarians who sometimes inhabited these parts, and did so by the Greeks, murdering them in that manner as many of them as they could take? But Hercules who was highly effeemed among them for his vertue, abolished this cruell fashion of killing of strangers, and taught them this cultome to counterleit their ancient superstitions, and to fling these images instead of them: now in old time our ancestors used to name all Greeks of what country soever they were. Argeos: unless haply a man would say that the Arcadians reputing the Argives to be their enemies, for that they were their neighbour borderers, such as fled with Evander out of Arcadia, and came to inhabit these quarters, retained still the old hatred and rancor, which time out of mind had taken root, and been fetled in their hearts against the said Argives.

XXXIII.

What is the cause that the Romans in old time never went forth out of their houses to supper, but they carried with them their young font, even when they were but in their very infancy and childhood.

As northisfor the very same reason that Lycurgus instituted and ordained, that young children should ordinarily be brought into their halls where they wied to eat in publick, called Philain, to the end that they might be inured and acquainted bettines, not, to use the planting of the end that they might be inured and acquainted bettines, not, to use the planting of the planting that they had their elders to overfee them, year, and to courfel their demeaner; and in this regard haply allo, that their fathers themselves should in their carriage be more lober, bonest, and in the prefence of their children. for look where old folk are, shareless, there is cannot chief, but (as Plato faith) children and youth will be most gracelesse and impudent,

What might the reason be, that whereas all other Romans made their offerings, ceremonies, and facrifices for the dead, in the month of February . Decimus Brutus as Ciceto faith, was wont to do the fame in the month of December : now this Brutus was he who first invaded the country of Portugal, and with an army passed over the river of Lethe, that is to say, Oblivion.

MAy it not be, that as the most part of men used not to perform any such services for the dead, but toward the end of the month, and a little before the shutting in of the evening; even so it seemen to carry good season, to honour the dead at the end of the year; and you wor well that December was the last month of althe year.
Or rather, it is because this was the honour exhibited to the Deities terrestrial and it seemeth that the proper feafon to reverence and worthip these earthly gods, is when the fruits of the earth be his-ly gathered and laid up.

or haply, for that the husbandmen began at this time to break up their grounds against their seed-or haply, for that the husbandmen began at this time to break up their grounds against their seed or melle it it was meet and requisite to have in remembrance those gods which are under the ground. Or haply, because this month is dedicate and consectated by the Romans to Sames to they counted Saturn one of the gods beneath, and none of them above; and withal, confidering the greatest and most folemn (saft, which they call Saturnalia, is holded in this month, at what time as they feem to have their most frequent meeting, and make best cheer, he thought is meet and reasonable that the dead also should enjoy some little portion thereof.

Or lt may be faid, that it is altogether untrue that Decimus Brutus alone facrificed for the dead in this month: for certain it is that there was a certain divine service performed to Acca Larentia; and folemin effusions and libaments of Wine and Milk were poured upon her fepulchre in the month of December.

Why honoured the Romans this Acca Latentia fo highly, confidering she was no better then a Strumpet, or

Or you must think, that the Histories make mention of another Acca Larentia, the Nurse of Ro-I'mulus, unto whom they do honour in the month of April; asforthis Courtesan Larentia, thee was (as men fay) furnamed Fabula, and came to be so samous and renowned by such an occasion as this A certain Sexton of Hercules his Temple, liaving little else to do, and living at ease (as commonly such fellows do) wied for the most parte spend all the day in playing at Dice and with Co-kal-bones: and one day above the rest; it fortuned, that meeting with none of his Maies and playfellows who were wont to bear him company at fuch games, and not knowing what to do not how to passe the time away, he thought with himselse to challenge the god whose servant he was, to play at Dice with him, upon these conditions: That is himselse won the game, Hercules should be a means for him of some good luck and happy fortune; but in case he lost the game, he should provide for Hercules a good iupper, and withal, a pretty Wench and a fair, to be his bed-fellow: these conditions being agreed upon and ser down, he cast the Dice, one chance for himselse, and another for the god; but his hap was to be the loser: whereupon minding to stand unto his challenge, and to accomplish that which he had promised, he prepared a rich supper for Hercules his god, and withall, sent for this Acca Larentia, a professed Courtesan and common Harlot, whom he feasted also with him, and after supper bestowed her in a bed within the very Temple, that the doors fast upon, and fo went his way. Now the tale goes, for footh, that in the night Hercules companied with her, not after the manner of men, but charged her, that the next morning betimes the thould going the market place, and look what man she first met withal, him she should entertain in all kindness. and make her friend especially. Then Larentia gat up betimes in the morning accordingly, and chanand make net interior especially man and a state Batchelor, who was now past his middle age, and his name was Tarumin's; with him the became to familian acquainted, that to long as he lived, the had the command of his whole house; and at his death, was by his last Will and Testament instituted inheritresse of all that he had. This Larentia likewise afterward departed this life, and lest all her riches unto the City of Rome; whereupon this honour abovefaid was done unto her.

What is the cause that they name one gate of the City Feneskra, which is as much to suy, as Window; neer unto which adjoineth the bed-chamber of Fortune?

Sit for that King Servius a most fortunate Prince, was thought and named to lie with Fortune. who was wont to come unto him by the window? or is this but a devited tale? But in truth, af-L WIO WAS WOLL TO COLL WAS deceased, his Wife Tanaquilli being a wife Lady, and enduded fer that King Tanquillu Prifesi was deceased, his Wife Tanaquilli being a wife Lady, and enduded with a royal mind, putting forth her head, and bending forward her body out of her chamber windows with a royal mind, putting forth her head, and bending forward her body out of her chamber windows. dow, made a speech unto the people, perswading them to elect Servius for their King. And this is the reason that afterwards the place retained this name, Fenistra.

XXXVII.

What is the reason, that of all those things which we dedicated and confecrated to the gods, the custome is at Rome, thin only the spoil of evenies considered in the wars, are neglected and suffered to runto discay in process of time insisteric there any receivence done and them, nor repaired be they at any time,

7 Hether is it, because they (supposing their glory to fade and passe away together with these Hether is it, became they carry farm from fresh marks and monuments of their yer-first spoils) seek evermore new means to win some fresh marks and monuments of their yer-aue, and to leave the same behind them.

Or rather, for that seeing time doth waste and consume iffese signs and tokens of the chinity which they had with their enemies, it were an odious thing for them, and very invidious, if they thould refresh and renew the remembrance thereof: for even those among the Greeks, who first erected their Trophees or Pillars of braffe and frone, were not commended for fo doing.

What is thereason, that Quintus Metellus the high Priest, and reputed besides a wise man and a politick, forbade to observe, suffices, or to take presages by flight of birds, after the month Sextilis, now called Au-

Sir for that, as we are wont to attend upon fuch observations about noon or in the beginning of the day, at the entrance also, and toward the middle of the month: but we take heed and bewate of the days declination, as inauspicate and unmeet for such purposes ; even so Metellus supposed, that the time after eight months was (as it were) the evening of the year, and the latter end of it, declining now and wearing toward an end.

Or haply, because we are to make use of these birds, and to observe their slight for presage, whiles they are entire, perfect and nothing defective, fuch as they are before Summer time, But about Autumn some of them moult. grow to be fickly and weak; others are over-young and too small; and fome again appear not at all, but like paffengers are gone at fuch a time into another country.

What is the cause, that it was not lawful for them who were not prest Souldiers by oath and enrolled, although upon some other occasions they conversed in the camp, to strike or wound an enemy? And verily Cato himselfe the elder of that name signified thus much in a letter missive which he wrote unto his son: nimical tree cases of state many that if he had accomplished the full time of his fervice, and that is wherein he strainty charged him, that if he had accomplished the full time of his fervice, and that captain had given him his conge & discharge, he should immediately returner in case he had rather stay still in the camp, that he should obtain of his captain permission and licence to hurt and kill his enemie.

S it because there is nothing else but necessity alone, doth warrantize the killing of a man : and he who unlawfully and without expresse commandment of a superior (unconstrained) doth it, is a meer homicide and manslayer. And therefore Cyrus commended Chrysintas, for that being upon the very point of killing his enemy, as having lifted up his Cymiter for to give him a deadly wound, presently upon the sound of the retreat by the Trumper, let the man go, and would not fmite him as if he had been forbidden fo to do.

Or may it not be, for that he who presenteth himselse to fight with his enemy, incase he shrink, and make not good his ground, ought not to go away clear withal, but to be held faulty and to fuffer punishment: for he doth nothing so good service that hath either killed or wounded an enemy, as harm and damage, who reculeth back or flieth away: now he who is discharged from warfare, and hath leave to depart, is no more obliged and bound to military laws: but he that hath demanded permission to do that service which sworn and enrolled souldiers perform, putteth himselfe again under the subjection of the law and his own Captain. XL,

How is it that the Priest of Jupiter, is not permitted to anoint himselfe abroad in the open air?

Sit for that in old time it was not held honest and lawful for children to do off their cloaths before their fathers; nor the fon in law in the presence of his wives father; neither used they the Houph or bath together: now is Jupiter reputed the Priests or Flamines father: and that which is done in the open air, seemeth especially to be in the very eye and fight of Jupiter?

Or rather, like as it was thought a great fin and exceeding irreverence, for a man to turn himfelf out of his apparel naked, in any church, chappel, or religious and facred place; even fo they carried agreat respect unto the air and open skie, as being full of gods, dami-gods, and faints. And this is the very cause, why we do many of our necessary businesses within doors, enclosed and covered with the roofe of our nonles, and foremoved from the eyes, as it were, of the Dety. Moreover, fome things there be that by law are commanded and enjoyned anto the Priest only; and others again unto all men, by the Priest: as for example there with us in Baneis; to be reowned with chap-lets of flowers upon the heads to let the hair grow long; to wear a fivord, and not to feel foot wiff-In the limits of Photos percain all to the office and duty of the captain general and thirte ruler this to taffe of no new fruits before the Autumnal Æquinox be past 1 nor to cur, and prime a vine bur before the Æquinox of the Spring, beautimated and declared unto all by the faid Ruler or Captain General: for those be the very leasons to do both the one and the other, Invike cares it should jeem in my judgement that among the Romans it properly belonged to the Priest not to mount on horleback, not to be above three nights out of the City; not to put off his cap, whereupon he was called in the Roman Language, Fl. men. But there be many other offices and duties, notified and declared unto all men by the Priest, among which this is one, not to be enhuiled or annointed abroad in the open air . For this manner of anointing dry without the bath, the Romans mightily suspe-Red and were afraid of : and even at this day they are of opinion, that there was no luch caple in the world that brought the Greeks under the yoak of fervitude and bondage, and made them to tenderand effeminate, as their halls and publick places where their young men wrestled and exercifed their bodies maked as being the means that brought into their Cities, much losse of time. engendered idlenesse, bred lazy stoath, and ministred occasion and opportunity of lewdnesse and villany; as namely, to make love unto fair boies, and to spoile and mar the bodies of young men with fleeping, with walking at a certain measure, with flirring according to motions, keeping artificial compafie, and with observing rules of exquitite dier. Through which fashions, they see nor, how (ere they be aware) they be fallen from esercities of arms, and have clean forgotten all military discipline: loving rather to beheld and eleemed good wrettlers, finb dancers, conceited pleasants, and fair minions; then hardy footmen, or valiant men of arms. And verily it is an hard matter to avoid and decline these inconveniences, for them that use to discover their bodies naked before all the world in the broad air: but those who anoint themselves closely within doors, and look to their bodies at home are neither faulty nor offenfive.

What is the reason that the ancient coin and money in old time, carried the flamp of one side of Janus with · - two faces: and on the other fide, the prop or the poop of a boat engraved therein.

V As it not as many mendo lay, for to honour the memory of Saurra, who paffed into hady by water in such a vessel? But a man may say thus much as well of many others: for Janus, Evander, and Aneas, came thirher likewise by sea; and therefore a man may peradventure guesse with better reason; that whereas somethings serve as goodly ornaments, for Cities, others as neceffary implements: among those which are decent and seemly ornaments, the principal is good go vernment and discipline, and among such as be necessary, is reckoned plenty and abundance of vactuals: now for that Janus inflitted good government, in ordaining whollome laws, and reducing their manner of life to civility, which before was rude and brutish, and for that the river being navigable, furnished them with store of all necessary commodities, whereby some were brought thither by Sea, others from the Land; the coin carried for the mark of a Law-giver, the head with two Faces, like as we have already faid, because of that change of life which he brought in; and of the river, a ferry boat or barge. and yet there was another kind of money currant among them, which had the figure portrayed upon it, of a Beefe, of a Sheep, and of a Swine; for that their riches they raised especially from such cattel, and all their wealth and substance consisted in them. And hereupon it cometh, that many of their ancient names, were Ovilii, Bubulci and Porcii, that is to fay, Sheep-reeves, and Neat-herds, and Swine-herds according as Fene stella doth report.

What is the cause that they make the Temple of Saturu, the chamber of the City, for to keep therein the publick treasure of gold and silver: as also their arohes, for the custody of all their writings, rolls, contracts and evidences what soever.

TS it by occasion of that opinion so commonly received, and the speech so universally currant in evetry mans mouth, that during the raign of Sature, there was no avarice nor injuffice in the world; but loyalty, truth, faith, and righteousness carried the whole sway among men.

Roman Questions.

Or for that he was the god who found out fruits, brought in agriculture; and taught husbandry first; for the hooke or sickle in his hand signifieth so much, and not as Antimachus wrote following therein and beleeving Hesiodus:

Rough Saturne with his hairy skin, against all law and right, Of Amons fon, fir Ouranus, or Colus sometime hight , Those privy members which him gat, with book a-flant off-cut. And then anon in fathers place of reign, himselfe did put.

Now the abundance of the fruits which the earth yeeldeth, and the vent or disposition of them, is the very mother that bringeth forth plenty of money: and therefore it is that the same god they make the author and maintainer of their felicity: in refimony whereof, those assembles which are holden every ninch day in the common place of the City, called Nunding, that is to say, Fairs or Markets, they efteem confectated to Saturn: for the store and foilon of sruits is that which openeth the trade and commerce of buying and felling, Or, because these reasons seem to be very antick; what and if we fay that the first man who made (of Saturns Temple at Rome) the treasury or chamber of the City, was Valerius Poplicola, after that the Kings were driven out of Rome, and it feemeth to stand to good reason that he made choice thereof, because he shought it a sase and secure place, eminent and conspicuous in all mens eyes, and by consequence hard to be surprized and forced.

What is the cause that those who come as Embassadors to Rome, from any parts what sever, go first into the Temple of Saturn, and there before the Questors or Treasurers of the City, enter their names intheir

T Sit for that Saturn himselfe was a stranger in Italy, and therefore all strangers are welcome units

Or may not this question be solved by the reading of Histories? for in old time these Questors of publick Treasurers, were wont to send unto Embassadors certain presents, which were called Last that and if it fortuned that such Embassadors were sick, they took the charge of them for their cures that and if it fortuned that such Embassadors were sick, they took the charge of them for their cures and if they chanced to die, they enterred them likewise at the Cities charges. But now in respect of the great refort of Embassadors from out of all countries, they have cut off this expense: howbeit the ancient custome yet remaineth, namely, to present themselves to the said Officers of the treafure, and to be registred in their book.

Why is it not lawful for Jupiters Priest to Swear?

TS it because an oath ministred unto free born men, is as it were the rack and torture tendered unto them? for certain it is, that the foul as well as the body of the Prieft, ought to continue free, and not be forced by any torture whatfoever.

Or, for that it is not meet to distrust or discredit him in small matters, who is beleeved in great and divine things? Or rather, because every oath endeth with the detestation and malediction of perjury: and considering that all maledictions be odious and abominable; therefore it is not thought good that any others Priests whatsoever, should curse or pronounce any malediction: and in this respect was the Priestelle of Minorva in Atheus highly commended, for that she would never curse Alcibiades, notwithstanding the people commanded her so to do: For I am (quoth she) ordained a Priestesse to pray for men, and not to curse them.

Or last of all, was it because the peril of perjury would reach in common to the whole Commonwealth, if a wicked, godlesse and forsworn person, should have the charge and superintendance of the prayers, vows, and facrifices made in the behalf of the City.

What is the reasonthat upon the fistical day in the honour of Venus, which selemnity they call Veneralia they use to pour forth a great quantity of Wine out of the Temple of Venus.

Sit as some say upon this occasion, that Mezentius sometime Captain general of the Tuscans, * ixines I fent certain Embassadors unto Eneas, with commission to offer peace unto him, upon this condition, that hemight receive all the Wine of that * years Vintage. But when Ancas rehifed fo to doe, or a certain Mezentins (for to encourage his fouldiers the Tuicans to fight manfully) promifed to bestow Wine quantity of upon them when he had won the field : but Aneas understanding of this promise of his, consecrated wine year and dedicated all the faid Wine unto the gods: and in truth, when he had obtained the victory, all ly, a flom. He willow of the war when it was outer and garhered together, he noured forth before the Tem-19, as tome the Wine of that year, when it was gotten and gathered together, he poured forth before the Temple of Venus.

Or, what if one should say, that this doth symbolize thus much: That men ought to be sober upon festivall daies, and not to celebrate such solemnities with drunkennesse; as if the gods take more pleasure to see them shed wine upon the ground, than to powre overmuch thereof down their

What is the cause that in ancient time they kept the temple of the goddesse Horta, open alwaies.

Hetherwasit (as Antifina Labeo hath left in writing) forthat, feeing Horrari in the Latine tongue lignifieth to exhort, they thought that the goddesse called Horta, which ftirreth and provoketh men unto the enterprise and execution of good exploits, ought to be evermore in action, not to make delaies, nor to be shut up and locked within doores, ne yet to sit still and do

Or rather, because as they name her now adaies Hora, with the former syllable long, who is a cerraine industrious, vigilant, and busie goddesse, carfull in many things: therefore being as she is so circumpect and so watchfull, they thought she should be never idle, nor retchlesse of mens affaires,

Or elle, this name Hora (as many others belides) is a meere Greeke word, and fignifieth a deity ordivine power, that hath an eye to overlooke, to view and controule all things; and therefore fince she never sleepeth, nor layeth her eyes together, but is alwaies broad awake, therefore her Church or Chappell was alwaies standing open.

But if it be so as Labeo faith, that this word Hora is rightly derived of the Greeke verbe squar or παρογμάν, which fignifieth to incite or provoke; confider better, whether this word Orator also, that isto say, one who stirreth up, exhorteth, encourageth, and adviseth the people as a prompt and ready countellor, be not derived likewise in the same fort, and not of are or earn, that is to say, prayer and supplication, as some would have it.

XLVII Wherefore founded Romulus the Temple of Vulcan without the City of Rome?

TS it for jealousie (which as fables do report) Vulcan had of Mars, because of his wife Venue; and I fo Romulus being reputed the fon of Mars, would not vouchfafe him to inhabit and dwell in the fame City with him? or is this a meere foolery and senselesse conceit?

But this Temple was built at the first to be a Chamber and Parlour of Privy Councill for him and Tating who reigned with him; to the end that meeting and fitting there in confultation together with the Senatours, in a place remote from all troubles and hinderances, they might deliberate as touching the affaires of State with ease and quietnesse.

Or rather, because Rome from the very first foundation was subject to fire by casualty, he thought good to honour this god of fire in some fort, but yet to place him without the walls of the City.

What is the reason, that upon their festivall day called Consualia, they adorned with garlands of flowers as well their asses as horses, and gave them rest and repose for the time?

Sit for that this folemnity was holden in the honour of Neptune furnamed Equeftris, that is to fay, Lifte horieman's and the affe hath his part of this joyfull, feath, for the horiestake?

Or, became that after navigation and transporting of commodities by sea was now found out and shewed to the world, there grew by that meanes, (in some fort) better rest and more ease to poore labouring beafts of draught and carriage.

XLIX. How commeth it to passe that those who stood for any office and magistracy, were wont by an old custome (as Cato hath written) to present themselves unto the people in a single robe or loose gown, without any coat at all under it?

7 As it for feare lest they should carry under their robes any money in their bosomes, for to corrupt, bribe, and buy (as it were) the voices and suffrages of the people?

Or was it because they deemed men worthy to beare publike office and to governe, not by their birth and parentage by their wealth and riches, ne yet by their shew and outward reputation, but by their wounds and scars to be seen upon their bodies. To the end therefore that such scars might be better exposed to their fight whom they met or talked withall, they went in this manner down to the place of election without inward coats in their plaine gowns.

Or haply, because they would seeme by this nudity and nakednesse of theirs, in humility to debase themselves, the sooner thereby to curry lavour, and win the good grace of the Commons, even as well as by taking them by the right hand, by suppliant craving, and by humble submission on their ve-

What is the cause that the Flamen or Priest of Jupiter, when his wife was once dead, used to give up his Priesthood or Sacerdotall dignity according as Aceius hath recorded in his history.

7 (7 As it for that he who once had wedded a wife, and afterwards buried her, was more infortunate, than he who never had any? for the house of him who had married a wife, is entire and perfect, but his house who once had one, and now hath none, is not only unperfect, but also

Or might it not be that the Priests wise was consecrated also to divine service together with her husband; for many rites and ceremonies there were, which he alone could not performe if his wife were not present: and to espouse a new wise immediately upon the decease of the other were not peradventure possible, nor otherwise would well stand with decent and civil honesty: whereupon neither in times past was it lawfull for him, nor at this day as it should seeme, is he permitted to put away his wife: and yet in our age Domitian at the request of one, gave licence so to do: at this distolution and breach of wedlock, other Priests were present and assistant, where therepassed among them many strange, hideous, horrible, and monstrous ceremonies.

But haply a man would leffe wonder at this, if ever he knew and understood before, that when one of the Centors died, the other of necessity must likewise quit and resigne up his office. Howbeit, when Living Drufus was departed this life, his companion in office Amylius Scaurus, would not give over and renounce his place, untill such time as certaine Tribunes of the people, for his contumacy commanded, that he should be had away to prison,

What was the reason that the idols Lares, which otherwise properly be called Prastites, had the images of a dog standing hard by them, and the Lates them selves were pourtraied clad in dogs skins?

S it because this word Prastites signifieth as much as represents, that is to say, Presidents, or standing before as keepers: and verily fuch Prefidents ought to be good house-keepers, and terrible unto all frangers, like as a dog is; but gentle and loving to those of the house.

Orrather, that which some of the Romans write is true, like as Chryfippus also the Philosopher is of opinion; namely, that there be certaine evill spirits which go about walking up and downin the world; and these be the butchers and tormentors that the gods imploy to punish unjust and wicked men: and even to these Large are held to be maligne spirits, and no better than devisis spiring into mens lives, and prying into their samilies: which is the cause that they now be arraied in such skins, and a dog they have sixting hard by them, whereby thus much in effect is given to understand, that quick sented they are, and of great power both to hunt out, and also to chastice leud persons,

What is the canse that the Romans sacrifice a dog unto the goddesse called Genita-Mana, and withall make one prayer unto ber that none borne in the house might ever come to good?

S it for that this Genita-Mana is counted à Damon or goddesse that hath the procuration and charge both of the generation and also of the birth of things corruptible? for furely the word implieth as much as a certaine fluxion and generation, or rather a generation fluent or fluxible: and like as the Greeks facrificed unto Preferpina, a dog, to do the Romans unto that Genita, for those who are borne in the house. Socrates also (aith) that the Argives sacrificed a dog unto Ilithya, for the more easie and safe deliverance of child-birth. Furthermore, as touching that Prayer, that nothing borne within the house might ever prove good, it is not haply meant of any persons, man or woman, but of dogs rather which were whelped there; which ought to be, not kind and gentle, but cutt

Or peradventure, for that they * that die (after an elegant manner of speech) be named good or quiet: under these words they covertly pray, that none borne in the house might die. And this need not to feeme a strange kind of speech ; for Aristotle writeth, that in a certaine treaty of peace between the Arcadians and Lacedamonians, this article was compriled in the capitulations: That they should make none of the Tegeats good, for the aide they fent, or favour that they bare unto the Lacedzmonians; by which was meant, that they should put none of them to death.

What is the reason, that in a solemne procession exhibited at the Capitoline plaies, they proclame (voes, at this day) by the voice of an berald, port-side, of the Sardians? and before all this solemn with a pompe, there is by was of mockety and to make a languing slock, an old man led in a spow, with a jewell or broach pendant about his nock, such as noblemens children are wont to wence, and which

Is it for that the Veientians, who in timespass being a puissant State in Tuscane, made war a long, time with Romalus: whose City being the last that he won by force, he made sale of many prison. ners and captives, together with their King, mocking him for his stupidity and grosse folly. Now for that the Tuscans in ancient time were descended from the Lydians, and the capitall City of Lydia is Sardis, therefore they proclaimed the fale of the Velentian prisoners under the name of the Sardians; and even to this day in scorne and mo kery, they retaine still the same custome.

Whence came it, that they call the Shambles or Butchery at Rome where fiesh is to be sold, Macelsiffor that this word Macellum, by corruption of language is derived of Maying, that in the Greek tongue fignifieth a cook? like as many other words by usage and custome are come to be received; for the letter C, hath great affinity with G, in the Roman tongue; and long it was ere they had the use of G, which letter S parise C arbitus first invented. Moreover, they that massle and stammer in their speech pronounce ordinarily L instead of R,

Or this question may be resolved better by the knowledge of the Roman history: for we read therein, that there was sometime a violent person and a notorious thiefe at Rome, named Macellus; who after he had committed many outrages and robberies, was with much ado in the end taken and punished : and of his goods which were forfeit to the State there was built a publike shambles or market place to fell flesh-meats in, which of his name was called Macellum.

Why upon the Ides of January the Monstress at Rome, who plaied upon the hautboies, were permitted to to go up and down the City difguifed in womens apparrell?

Rose this fashion upon that occasion which is reported? namely, that King Numa had grand A fole this fall non upon that occasion winton is reported in analysis. A following the great devotion them many immunities and honourable priviledges in his time, for the great devotion that he had in the fervice of the gods? and for that atterwards the Tribunes military who government. ned the City in Confular authority, tooke the fame from them, they went their way discontented, and departed quite from the City of Rome: but soone after, the people had a misse of them, and be fides, the Priests made it a matter of conscience, for that in all the sacrifices thorowout the Circ there was no found of flute or hantboies. Now when they would not returne agains (being fent for) bir made their abode in the City Tibur; there was a certaine affanchied bondilave who se cretly undergook unto the Magiltrates, to find some meanes for to fetch them home. So he caused a fumptuous feast to be made, as if he meant to celebrate some solemne facrifice, and invited to it the pipers and players of the hautboies aforesaid: and at this feast he took order there should be divers women allo; and all night long there was nothing but piping, playing, inging and dancing; but all of a fudden this Mafter of the feaft cauled a rumour to be failed, that his Lord and Mafter was come to take him in the manner; whereupon making semblant that he was much troubled and afrighted, he periwaded the Mindrelato mount with all ipeed into those coaches covered all over with skins; and To to be carried to Tibur. But this was a deceitfull practife of his for hacaused the coaches to be tuened about another way, and thawares, to them; who partly, for the darknesse of the night, and in part because they were drowne and the wine in their heads, took no head of the way, he brought all to Rome betimes in the morning by the breake of day, difguiled as they were, many of them in light coloured gowns like women, which (for that they had over-watched and over-drunke themselves) they had put on, and knew not thereof. Then being (by the Magustrates) overcome with faire words, and reconciled agains to the City, they held ever after this cultome every years upon such a day, To go up and down the City thus foolishly disguised,

What is the caufe that women who facrifice unto the goddesse Rumina, do powre and cast store of milke up-on their sacrifice, but no wine at all do they bring thirther for to be drunke?

TS it, for that the Latines in their tongue call a pap, Rama? And well it may so be, for that the wild fig tree neere unto which the she-woolse gave suck with her teats unto Romains, was in that respect called Ficus Ruminalis. Like as therefore we name in our Greeke Language those milch nurses that suckle young infants at their brests, Thelona, being a word derived of Thele, which significan a pap; even so this goddesse Rumina, which is as much to say, as Nurse, and one that taketh the care and charge of nourithing and rearing up of Infants, admitteth not in her fectifices any wine; for that it is hurtfull to the nurture of little babes and fucklings.

What is the reason that of the Roman Senatours, some are called simply, Patres; others with an addition, Patres conscripti?

TSit for that they first, who were instituted and ordained by Romulus werenamed Patres & Patri-Itii, that is to fay, Gentlemen or Nobly borne, such as we in Greece, terme Enpairides?

Or rather they were so called, because they could avouch and shew their fathers; but such as were adjoyned afterwards by way of supply, and enrolled out of the Commoners houses, were Pares confcripti thereupon?

Wherefore was there one Altar common to Hescules and the Muses?

May it not be, for that Hercules taught Evander the letters, according as Juba writteh? Cenes, in those daies it was accounted an honourable office for men to teach their kinsfolke and friends to feell letters, and to read. For a long time after it, and of late daies it was, that they began to teach for hire and for money: and the first that ever was known to keep a publike schoole for reading, was one named Spurim Carbilius, the freed servant of that Carbilius who first put away his

What is the reason, that there being two Altars dedicated unto Hetcules, women are not partakers of the greater, nor taste one mbit of that which is offered or sacrificed thereupon?

S it because, as the report goes, Carmenta came not some enough to be affishant unto the sacrifice I no more did the family of the Pinarii, whereupon they took that name? for in regard that they came tardy, admitted they were not to the feast with others who made good cheere; and therefore got the name Pinarii, as if one would say, pined and famished:

Or rather it may allude unto the tale that goeth of the shirt empoisoned with the bloud of Nessan

How commeth is to passe, that it is expressly forbidden at Rome, either to name or to demand ought at touching the Tutelar god, who hath in particular recommendation and patronage, the safety and prefervation of the City of Rome: nor so much atto enquire whether the said deity be male or semale? And verily this prohibition proceedeth from a supersistion seare that they have s for that they say that Velerius Soramus died an ill death, because he presumed to atter and publish so much:

Sit in regard of a certaine reason that some Latine historians do alledge; namely, that there be I certaine evocations and enchantings of the gods by spels and charmes, through the power whereof they are of opinion, that they might be able to call forth and draw away the Tutelar gods of their of they are of opinion, that they might be able to californ and thaw away the lutteral gous of the enemies, and to caule them to come and dwell with them: and therefore the Romans be afraid left they may do as much for them? for like as in times past the Tyrians, as we find upon record, when their City was befreged, enchained the images of their gods to their finites; for feare they would abandon their. City and be gone; and as others demanded pledges and fureries that they should come againe to their plate, whensoever they sent them to any bath to be washed, or let them go to any expanding to be cleanled; even for the Romans thought, that to be along other unknown and not once named, was the best means, and surest way to keep with them their Tutelar god.

Or rather, as Homer very well wrote: The earth to men all

Is common great and fmall:
That thereby men thould worthin all the gods, and honour the earth; feeing fhe is common to them all: even to the ancient Romans have concealed and suppresse the god or angell which had the particular guard of their City, to the end that their Citizens should adore, not him alone bur all others likewife.

What is the cause that among those Priests whom they name Faciales, sign fying as much as in Greek delwoποίοι, that is to say, Officers going between to make treaty of peace; or σπουθορόφοι, that is to say, Agents for truce and leagues, he whom they call Pater Patratus is esteemed the chiefest? Now Pater Patratus is he, whose father is yet living, who bath children of his own: and in truth this chiefe Facial or Herauld hath still at this day a certaine prerogative, and speciall credit above the rest. For the Emproners them foloes, and generall Captaines, if they have any persons about them who in regard of the prime of youth, or of their beautiful bodies had need of a fundfull, diligene; and trusty guard come mit them ordinarily into the hands of such as these for safe custody?

What is the reason that the Officer at Rome, called Rex Sacrorum, that is to Sy, the King of Sacrifices, is debarred both from exercifing any Magistracy, and also to make a speech unto the people in publike place?

s it for that in old time, the Kings themselves in person personned the most part of sacred rites, and those that were the greatest, yea, and together with the Priests offered facrifices; but byteafon that they grew infolent, proud, and arrogant, so as they became intollerable, most of the Greek nations, deprived them of this authority, and lest unto them the preheminence only to offer publike factifice unto the gods: but the Romans having cleane chaled and expelled their Kings, established in their flead another under Officer whom they called King, unto whom they granted the overfight and charge of facrifices only, but permitted him not to exercise or execute any office of State, nor to intermeddle inpublike affaires; to the end it should be known to the whole world, that they would not fuffer any person to reigne at Rome, but only over the ceremonies of sacrifices, nor endure the very name of Royalty, but in respect of the gods. And to this purpose upon the very common place neere unto Comittum; they ule to have a folemne facrifice for the good estate of the Gity; which to foone as ever this King hath performed, he taketh his legs and runs out of the place, as falt as ever he

Why is one of the races where horfes whe to run, called the Cirque of Flaminius?

I Sit for that in old time an ancient Roman, named Flaminius, gave unto the City a certain piece of ground, they employed the rent and revenues thereof in runnings of hories, and chariors: and for that there was a furpluffage remaining of the faid lands, they beflowed the fame in paving that high way or cauley, called Via Flaminia; that is to fay, Flaminia fireer?

Why are the Sergeants or Officers who carry the knitches of rods before the Magistrates of Rome, called Lictores?

I Sie because these were they who bound Malesacors, and who followed after Romulus, ashis guard, with cords and leather thongs about them in their bosomes? And verily the common people of Rome when they would say to bind or tiesast, safe the word Alligare, and such as speake more und proper Latine, Ligare.

Or is it, for that now the letter C is interjected within this word, which before time was Lique, as one would fay hardeyer, that is to fay, Officers of publike charge; for no man there is in a manner, ignorant, that even at this day in many Cities of Greece, the Common-wealth or publike flate is written in their laws by the name of Naros.

Wherefore do the Lupecci at Rome facrifice a Dog? Now these Lupecci are certaine persons who upon a festivall day calcul Lupeccalia, run through the City all naked, save that they have a preus only before their pricey parts, carrying leather whips in their hands, wherewith they stap and scourge whom sower they meet in the streets?

Is all this ceremoniall action of theirs a purification of the City? whereupon they call the month wherein this is done Februarius, yea, and the very day it felfe Februare, and Februaria, like as the manner of iquitching with a leather (courge Februare, which verbe fignifieth as much as to purge or parties?

And verily the Greeks, in manner all, were wont in times past, and so they continue even at this day, in all their expiations, to kill a dog for facrifice. Unto Hecate also they bring forth among other expiatory oblations certaine little dogs or whelps: such also as have need of cleaning and punifying, they wipe and scoure all over with whelps skins, which manner of purification they tearme Parifolds (International Courts).

Or rather is it for that Lupus lignifieth a woolfe, and Lupercalia, or Lucaa, is the feaft of wolves:
now a dog naturally being an enemy to wolves, therefore at such feafts they facrificed a dog.

Or peradventure, because dogs barke and bay at these Luperci, troubling and disquieting them as they run up and down the City in manner aforesaid.

Or else last of all, for that this seast and sacrifice is solemnized in the honour of god Pan; who as you wot well is pleased well enough with a dog, in regard of his slocks of goats.

What is the cause that in ancient time, at the feast called Septimontium, they observed precisely not touse any coaches drawn with steeds, no more than those do at this day, who are observant of old institutions and do not despit them. Now this Septimontium is a self-inal foliamity, celebrated in memorial of a seventh mountaine, that was adjoyned and taken into the powrprise of Rome City, which by this means came to have seven bills encosed awithin the precinct thereof?

VHether was it as some Romans do imagine, for that the City was not as yet conjunct and composed of all her parts? Or if this may seeme an impertinent conjecture, and nothing to the purpose: may it not be in this respect. that they thought they had archieved a great peece of worke when they had thus amplified and enlarged the compasse of the City, thinking that now it needed not to proceed any surther in greatnesse and cancel like wise their subouring beasts of draught and carriage to rest, whose help they had used in finishing of the said enclosure, willing that they also should enjoy in common with them the benefit of that solemne seast.

Or elfe we may suppose by this, how desirous they were that their Citizens should solemnize and honour with their personal presence all feasts of the City, but especially that which was ordained and instituted for the peopling and augmenting thereof; for which cause they were not permitted upon the day of the dedication, and festivall memorials of it, to put any hories in geeres or harness for to draw; for that they were not at such a time to ride forth of the City.

Why call they those who are deprehended or taken in these, pilsery, or such like service trespasses, Eucciseros, as one would say, Forke bearers?

I Snorthis also an evident argument of the great diligence and carefull regard that was in their ancients? For when the Mafter of the Family had surprised one of his servants or slaves, committing alewd and wicked pranke, he commanded him to take up and carry upon his neck between his shoulders a forked peace of wood, such as they use to pur under the spire of a chasic or waine, and to go withall in the open view of the world throughout the street, yea, and the patish where he dwelt, to the end that every mansion thenceforth should take heed of him. Wherefore ufothe Romans to tye a misse of hey unto the hornes of kims, and other beefes, that we want to book, and be curst with their heads, that by the meanes thereof folke might take bleed of them, and look better to themselves when they come in their way?

TSit norfor that beefes, horfes, affes, yea, and men become fierce, infolent, and dangerous, if they be I bighly kept and pampered to the full? according as Sophocles faid:

In case he find his provender to prick;
Even so dost thou for losthy paunch is full,
Thy cheeks be puft, likato some greedy gull.

And thereupon the Romans gave out, that Marcin Craft in cartied hey on his horne: for howfoever they would feeme to let flie and carpe at others who dealt in the affaires of State, and Government, yet beware they would how they commerced with him as being a dangerous man, and one

May it not be, that like as the old Pythagorean Philosophers by small matters signified and immediate Chanix; and to stir fire, or rake the hearth with a sword; even so the ancient Romans used many enigmes, that is to say, outward signes and signes betokening some hidden and secret mysteriess especially with their Priests in holy and sacred things, like as this is of the lampe or lanthorn, which symbolizeth in some fort the body that containeth our solle. For the solle within resemblech the light, and it behoveth that the intelligent and reasonable part thereof should be alwaies open, evermore intentive and seeing, and at no time enclosed and shut up, nor blown upon by wind. For look when the winds be alost sowles in their slight keep nocertainty, neither can they yeeld assured singles, by reason of their variable and wandering instability: and therefore by this ceremonial custome they teach those who do divine and toretell by the slight of birds, not to go forth for to take their anspices and observations when the wind is up, but when the aire is still, and so calme; that a man may carry a lanthorne open and uncovered.

LXXIII.

Why were these Southsayers or Augures forbudden to go abroad for to observe the slight of birds in case they had any fore or uteer upon their bodies?

VV As not this also a figuificant token to put them in mind, that they ought not to deale in the divine fervice of the gods, nor meddle with holy and facred things if these were any feccet matter that gnawed their minds, or so long as any private ulcer or passion setled in their hearts: but to be void of sadnesse and griese, to be sound and sincere, and not distracted by any trouble what overer?

Or, because it standeth to good reason; that if it be not lawfull nor allowable for them to offer unto the gods for an hoast or facrifice any beast that is scabbed, or hath a fore upon it, not to take prease by the slight of such birds as are mangy, they ought more strictly and precisely to look into their own persons in this behalfe, and not to presume for to observe occletiall prognostications and signes, from the gods, sincesse they be themselves pure and holy, undefiled, and not desective in their own selves: for surely an ulcer seemeth to be in manner of a mutilation and pollution of the body.

LXXIV

why did King Servius Tullus found and build a temple of listle Fortune which they called in Latine Brevis fortune, that is to fay, of Short fortune?

V As it not thinke you in respect of his own selfer, who being at the first of a small and base V conditions being borne of a captive woman, by the favour of Fortune grew to so great an estate that he was King of Rome?

Or for that this thange in him sheweth rather the might and greatnesse, than the debility and smallesse of Fortune. We are to say, that this King Servine desired Fortune, and attributed unit her thore divine power than any other, as shaving entituded and imposed her name almost uponevery action. For none only she excelled temples unto Fortune, by the name of Puissant, of diverting ill suek; of Sweet, Pavourable to the first borne and masculine; but a sit other is one Temple besides of private or proper Fortune; another of Fortune returned; a third of consident Fortune and happing well; and a fourth of Fortune the virgin. And what should a man reckon up other surnames of hers, seeing there is a Temple dedicated (forsorth) to glewing Fortune, whom they called Viscant; as if we were given thereby to understand, that we are caught by her afar off, and even sed (as it we're) with bird-lime to businesse and affaires.

But consider this moreover, that he having known by experience what great power she hath in humane things, how little soever sheleeme to be, and how often a small matter in happing or not happing hath given occasion to some either to misse of great exploits, or to atcheive as great enterprises, whether in this respect, he built not a Temple to little Fortune, teaching ment the topy of a lawaies studious, carefull, and diligent, and not to despite any occurrences how small soever they be

Or certainly this fathion and cultome received fo usually, she weth us that we ought not to maror spoile, either fire or water or any other thing necessary, after we our selves have done with it, and have had sufficient use thereof, but to instruct to serve other mens turnes who have need, after that we our selves have no imployment for it.

Or rather, because this was a marke or badge proper unto those who were reputed most ancient, as were the Arcadians descended from Evander, who upon this occasion were called Proseleni, as one would say, borne before the moone?

Or, because this cultome as many others admonisheth those who are litted up too high, and take so great pride in themselves, of the incertitude and instability of this life, and of humane affaires, even by the example of the moone,

Who at the first dath new and young appeare, Whereas before she made no shew at all that And so her light encreaseth faire and cleare, Until her face be round and full withalt. But then annoss heads the egin to fall, And backward wane from all this beauty gay, Until agains she wanish cleane away,

Or was not this a wholfome leffon and infruction of obedience to teach and advise mento obey their superiours, and not to think much for to be under others: but like as the moon is willing to give ease (as it were) and apply hericifeto her better, content to be ranged in a second place, and as Parmenide faith,

Ay it not be for that of Gods invisible and who are no otherwise seen but by the eyes of our and Moone? Now the Sun is the who castieth the yeare, and the Moon maketh the month. Neither are we to thinke, that these be only and simply the signers and images of them: but believe we must, that the materiall Sun which we behold is Jupiter, and this materiall Moone Juno. And the reason why they call her Juno, (which word is a smuch to say as young or new.) is in regard of the course of the Moone: and otherwhiles they surmamed her also Juno-Lucina, that is to say; light or shrings: being of opinion that she helpeth women in travell of child-birth, like as the Moone doth, according to these veries:

Others thinke that this presage and toretoken of good luck hapned unto Eneue: and verily at the battell of Leasties, the Thebans began to breake the rankes of their enemies, and to disconist them with the left wing of their battell, and thereby in the end archieved a brave victory; whereupon ever after in all their consilets they gave preserence and the shonour of leading and giving the first charge to the left wing.

Why is it that the Tribune of the Commons only weareth no embroydered purple robe, confidering that all other Magistrates besides do weare the same.

Sit not, for that they (to speak properly) are no Magistrates? for in truth they have no ushers or vergers to carry before them the knitches of rods, which are the enfignes of Magistracy; neither fit they in the chaire of estate called Sella curulis, to determine causes judicially, or give audience unto the people; nor enter into the administration of their office at the beginning of the yeare, as all other Magistrates do: neither are they put down and deposed after the election of a Dictatour: but whereas the full power and authority of all other Magistrates of State, he transferreth from them upon himselse: the Tribunes only of the people continue still, and succease notto execute their sun-Ction as having another place and degree by themselves in the Common-weale : and like assome Oratours and Lawyers do hold, that exception in Law is no action, confidering it doth cleane contrary to action; for that action intendeth, commenceth, and beginneth a procede of fute; but exception or inhibition dissolveth, undoeth, and abolisheth the same: semblably, they thinke also, that the Tribunate was an impeachment, inhibition, and restraint of a Magistracy, rather than a Magistracy it felfe: for all the authority and power of the Tribune, lay in oppoing himlelf, and croffing the jurifle-ction of other Magistrates, and in diminishing or repressing their excessive and licentious power.

Or haply all these reasons and such like, are but words, and devised imaginations to maintaine discourse: but to say a truth, this Tribuneship having taken originally the first beginning from the common people is great and mighty in regard that it is popular; and that the Tribunes themselves are not proud nor highly conceited of themselves above others, but equall in apparell, in port, fare, and manner of life, to any other Citizens of the common fort: for the dignity of pompeand outward shew appertaineth to a Consult or a Pratour: as for the Tribune of the people, he ought to be humble and lowly, and as M. Curio was wont to fay, ready to put his hand under every mans foot; not to carry a lofty, grave, and stately countenance, nor to be hard of accesse, nor strange to be spoken with, or dealt withall by the multitude; but how soever he behave himselfe to others, he ought to the simple and common people, above the rest, for to be affable, gentle, and tractable; and hereupon the manner is, that the doore of his house should never be kept shut, but stand open both day and night, as a sase harbour, sure haven, and place of resuge, for all those who are distressed and in need and verily the more submisse that he is in outward appearance, the more groweth he and encreaseth in puissance; for they repute him as a strong hold for common recourse and retreat unto all commers, no lesse than an altar or priviled ged sanctuary. Moreover, as touching the honour that he holdeth by his place, they count him holy, facred, and inviolable, infomuch as if he do but go forth of his house abroad into the City, and walke in the street, "the manner was of all to cleanse and sanctifie the body, as if it were stained and polluted.

Or was it not for that they thought those people, who did it by law or custome, offended highly: but they themselves were directed thereto by expresse commandement out of the books of Sibylla. For reported it is, that one of their Votaries or Vestall Nuns named Helbia, riding on horse-back, was smitten by a thunderbolt or blast of lightning; and that the horse was found lying along all hare bellied, and her selfe likewise naked, with her smock and petticoat turned up above her privy parts, as if the had done it of purpose: her shooes, her rings, her coile and head attirecast here and there apart from other things, and with all lilling the tongue out of her head. This strange occurtent, the foothfayers out of their learning interpreted to fignifie, that fome great shame did betide the facred virgins that should be divulged and notoriously known; yea, and that the same infamy hould reach also as far as unto some of the degree of Gentlemen or Knights of Rome. Upon this there was a servant belonging unto a cercaine Barbarian horseman, who detected three Vestall Virtues as a servant belonging unto a cercaine Barbarian horseman, who detected three Vestall Virtues as a servant belonging unto a cercaine Barbarian horseman, who detected three Vestall Virtues as a servant belonging unto a cercaine Barbarian horseman. gins to have at one timeforfeited their honour and been naught of their bodies, to wit, Emilia, Licinia, and Martia; and that they had companied too familiarly with men a long time; and one of their names was Buttim, a Barbarian Knight and Maller to the faid enformer. So these yestall Votaries were punished after they had been convicted by order of Law, and found guilty: but after that this seemed a fearefull and horrible accident; ordained it was by the Senate, that the Priests should perule over the books of Sthyka's Propheties, wherein were found (by report) thole very Oracles which denounced and foretold this strange occurrent, and that it portended some great losse and calamity unto the Common-wealth: for the avoiding and diverting whereof, they gave commandement to abandon unto (I wot not what) maligne and devillish strange spirits, two Greeks, and two Galatians likewife; and so by burying them quick in that very place, to procure propiriation at Gods

LXXXIV. Why began they their day at midnight?

V As it not, for that all policy at the first had the beginning of military discipline? and in war, and all expeditions the most part of worthy exploits are enterprised ordinarily in the night before the day appeare?

Or because the execution of designes howsoever it begin at the sunrising; yet the preparation thereto is made before day-light: for there had need to be some preparatives before a worke be raken in hand; and not at the very time of execution, according as Mylon (by report) aniwered unto Chilo, one of the leven lages, when as in the winter time he was making of a Van.

Or haply, for that like as we fee, that many menat hoone make an end of their bafnesse of great importance, and of State-affaires; even to, they supposed that they were to begin the same at midnight. For better proofe whereof a man may frame an argument hereupon, that the Roman chiefe

Ruler never made league, nor concluded any capitulations and coverants of peate after mid-day.

Or rather this may be, because it is not possible to set down determinately the beginning and end of the day, by the rising and setting of the sun : for if we do as the vulgar fort, who distinguish day and night by the fight and view of eye, taking the day then to begin when the sun attieth 1 and the night fikewise to begin when the sun is gone down, and hidden under our horizon, we shall never have the just Æquinox, that is to say, the day and night equal! for even that very night which we shall esteeme most equalito the day, will prove shorter than the day, by as much as the body of bigneffe of the fun containeth. Againe, if we do as the Mathematicians, who to remedy this abfurdity and inconvenience, fer down the confines and limits of day and night, at the very inflant point when the fun feemeth to touch the circle of the horizon with his center; this were to overthrow when the un recement to touch the circle of the normon with his center; this were to overthrow all evidence; for fall out it will, that while there is a great part of the funs light yet under the earth (although the fun do hine upon us) we will not confeight at it is day, but day, that it is night fill. Seeing then it is to hard a matter to make the beginning of day and night; at the time or going down of the fun; for the abfurdities above faid, it remained that of necessity we take the beginning of the day to be, when the fun is in the midst of the heaven above head, or tinder our feet; that is to fay, the state of the fun is in the midst of the heaven above head, or tinder our feet; that is to fay, and the state of the fun is in the midst of the heaven above head, or tinder our feet; that is to fay, and the state of the fun is in the midst of the heaven above head. either moon-tide or mid-hight. But of twaine, better it is to begin when he is in the middle point under us, which is just midnight, for that he returneth then toward us into the East; whereas contrariwise after mid-day he goeth from us Westward.

LXXXV.

What was the cause that in times past they would not suffer their mives, either to grind corne, or to lay their hands to dresse meat in the kitchin?

As it in memorial of that accord and league which they made with the Sabines? for after that they had ravished and carried away their daughters, there arose sharpe, was seeween thems but peace-influed thereupon in the end : in the capitulations whereof this one article was exprelly let down, that the Roman husband might notforce his wife, either to turn the quernfor to grind com, norto exercise any point of cookery. LXXXVI.

Why did not the Romans marry in the month of May?

Sit for that it commeth between Aprill and June? whereof the one is confectated unto Venns, and the other to Juno, who are both of them the goddesses which have the care and charge of wedding and marriages, and therefore thinke it good either to go somewhat before, or else to stay

Or it may be that in this month they celebrate the greatest expiatory sacrifice of all others in the yeare? for even at this day they fling from off the bridge into the river the images and pourtraitures of men, whereas in old time they threw down men themselves alive? And this is the reason of the custome now adaies, that the Priestelle of Juno, named Flamina, should be alwaies sad and heavy, as it were a mourner, and never wash nor dresse and trim her selse.

Or what and if we say, it is because many of the Latine Nations offered oblations unto the dead in this month: and peradventure they do fo, because in this very month they worship Mercuri; and in truth it beareth the name of Maja, Mercuries mother.

But may it not be rather, for that as some do say, this month taketh that name of Majores, that is to say, ancients: like as June is termed so of Juniores, that is to say, yonkers, Now this is certainethat vouth is much meeter for to contract marriage than old age: like as Euripides faith very well:

As for old age it Venus bids farewell, And withold folke Venus is not pleat'd well,

The Romans therefore married not in May, but staied for June which immediately followeth after May.

LXXXVII.

What is the reason that they divide and part the haire of the new brides head, with the point of a javelind

S not this a very fign, that the first wives whom the Romans esponsed, were compelled to marriage, and conquered by force and armes.

Or are not their wives hereby given to understand, that they are espoused to husbands, martiall men and fouldiers; and therefore they should lay away all delicate, wanton, and costly imbellishment of the body, and acquaint themselves with simple and plaine attire; like as Lycurgus for the same reason would that the doores, windows, and roofes of houses should be framed with the saw and the axe only, without use of any other toole or instrument, intending thereby to chase out of the common-weale all curiofity and waftfull superfluity.

Or doth not this parting of the haires give covertly to understand, a division and separation, asis marriage and the bond of wedlock, were not to be broken but by the sword and warlike force?

Or may not this fignific thus much, that they referred the most part of ceremonies concerning marriage unto Juno: now it is plaine that the javelin is confecrated unto Juno, infomuch as most part of her images and statues are pourtraied resting and leaning upon a lance or javelin. And for this cause shegoddesse is surnamed Quiristia, for they called in old time a speare Quiris, upon which occasion Mars also (as they say) is named Quiris.

LXXXVIII

What is thereason that the money employed upon plaies and publike shews is called among them. Lucar?

May it not well be that therewere many groves about the City conferrated unto the gods, which they named Lucos: the revenues whereof they bestowed upon the fetting forth of fuch folemnities?

LXXXIX. Why call they Quirinalia, the Feast of fooles?

Hether is it because (as Juba writeth) they attribute this day unto those who knew not their own linage and tribe? or unto such as have not sacrificed, as others have done according to their tribes, at their feast called Fornacalia. Were it that they were hindered by other affairs, or had occasion to be forth of the City, or were altogether ignorant, and therefore this day was aligned for them to performe the said Feast.

What is the cause, that when they sacrifice unto Hercules, they name no other God but him, nor suffer a dog to be feen, within the pour prise and precinct of the place where the sacrifice is celebrated, according as Varto hath left in writing?

I S not this the reason of naming no god in their sacrifice, for that they esteeme him but a demi-god; and some there be who hold, that while she lived hereupon the earth, Evander erecked an altar unto him, and offered factifice thereupon. Now of all other beaths he could worft abide a dog, and hated him most: for this creature put him to more trouble all his life time than any other: wir-Or about neffe hereof the three headed dog Cerberus, and above all others, when Oconsus the fon of Licymoises adog by the hereof the three headed dog Cerberm, and above all others, when Oconum the ion of Licymmus the Hippo was flaine by a dog, he was enforced by the Hippocoontidesto give the battell, in which he loft coontides. many of his friends, and among the rest of his own brother Iphicles.

XCI.

Wherefore was it not lawfull for the Patricians or Nobles of Rome to dwell upon the mount Capitoll?

Mehr it not be in regard of M. Manlim, who dwelling there attempted and plotted to be King of Rome, and to plurpe tyranny; in hatred and detellation of whom it is faid, that ever after those of the house of Manlii might not have Marcus for their fore-name?

Or rather was not this an old feare that the Romans had (time out of mind?) For albeit Valerius Policida was a perionage very popular and well affected unto the common people; yet never ceafed the great and mighty men of the City to suspect and traduce him, nor the meane commoners and multitude to search him, until such time as himselse caused his own house to be demolished and pulled down, because it seemed to over-look and command the common market place of the city.

XCII.

What is the reason, that he who saved the life of a Citizen in the wars, was rewarded with a Coronet made of oake brunches?

As it not for that in every place and readily they might meet with an oake, as they matched in their warlike expeditions?

Or rather, because this manner of garland is dedicated unto Jupiter and Juno, who are reputed

Or might not this be an ancient cultome proceeding from the Arcadians, who have a kind of confanguinity wish oaks, for that they report of themselves, that they were the first men that issued our of the earth, like as the oake of all other trees, were XCIII.

Why observe they the Vultures or Geirs, most of. any other somles, in taking of presages by bird-slight?

Sit not because at the foundation of Rome there appeared twelve of them unto Romulus?

Or because; this is no ordinary bird nor familiar; for it is not so ease a matter to meet with an airy of Vultures; but all on a sudden they come out of some strange countrey, and therefore the fight of them doth prognostick and presage much.

Or elfe haply the Romans learned this of Hercules, if that be true which Herodorus reporteth: namely, that Hereules took great contentment, when in the enterprise of any exploit of his, there appeared Vultures unto him: for that he was of opinion, that the Vulture of all birds of prey was the justest: for first and formost never toucheth he ought that hath life, neither killeth he any living putett: for first and formost never counter in Sugar that have been in any firm creature, like as eagles, falcons, hauks, and other fowles do, that prey by night, but feedeth upon dead carrions: over and besides, he forbeareth to set upon his own kind: for never was there may yet who saw a Vulture eate the flesh of any foule, like as eagles and other birds of prey do, which chase, purfue and pluck in peeces those especially of the same kind, to wit, other foule. And verily as Efchylus the Poet writeth:

How can that bird, which bird doth eat,

Be counted cleanly, pure, and neat:

And as for men, it is the most innocent bird, and doth least hurt unto them of all other; for it deftroyeth no fruit nor plant whatfoever, neither doth it harme to any tame creature, And if the tale be true that the Ægyptians do tellsthat all the kind of these birds be females; that they conceive and be with young, by receiving the East-wind blowing upon them, like as some trees by the Westerne wind, it is very profitable that the fignes and prognoflicks drawn from them, be more fure and certaine, than from any others, confidering that of all besides, their violence in treading and breeding time; their eagernesse in flight when they pursue their prey; their styling away from some, and cha-sing of others, must need scause much trouble and uncertainty in their prognostications.

XCIV. Why stands the Temple of Esculapius without the City of Rome?

T Sit because they thought the abode without the City more wholsome than that within? For in I this regard the Greeks ordinarily built the Temples of Esculapius upon high ground, wherein the aire is more pure and cleare.

Orin this respect, that this god Afenlapins was sent for out of the City Epidaurus. And true it is that the Epidaurians founded his Temple; not within the walls of their City, but a good way from it. Or latily, for that the fercent when it was landed out of the galley in the Iffe, and then vanished out of fight, feemed thereby to tell them where he would that they should build the place of his

.xcv. Why doth the Litte forbid them that are to live chafte, the eating of pulse?

As touching beanes, is it not in respect of those very reasons for which it is said: That the Pythagoreans counted them abominable? And as for the cichling and cich pease, whereof the one in Greeke's called Adoug and the other is sair on which words seem to be derived of Erebus, that signifiest the darkmess of hell, and of Lethe, which is as much as oblivion, and one besides of the rivers internall, it carrieth some reason that they should be abhorted therefore.

Or it may be, for that the folemme suppers and banquets at sunerals for the dead, were usually ferred with pulle above all other viands.

Or rather for that those who are desirous to be chastle, and to live an holy life, ought to keep their bodies pure and stender; but so it is that pulse be flattone and windy, breeding superstuous extrements in the body, which had need of great purging and devacuation.

Or lastly, because they prick and provoke the slessly lusts for that they be full of ventosities.

XC V1

What is the reason that the Romans punish the holy Vestall vin gins (who have suffered their bodies to be abused and desisted) by no other meanes, than by interring them quick under the ground ?

I Sthis the cause, for that the manner is to burne the bodies of those that be dead; and to bury(by the means of fire) their bodies who have not devoutly and religiously kept or preserved the divine fire, feemed not just nor reasonable?

Or haply, because they thought it was not lawfull to kill any person who had been consecrated with the most holy and religious extentionies in the world is not to lay violent hands upon a woman consecrated; and therefore they devised this invention of suffering them to die of their ownsiders; namely, to let them down into a little vaulted chamber under the earth, where they left with them a lampe burning, and some bread, with a little water and milke; and having sodone, cast earth and covered them aloft. And yet for all this, can they not be exempt from a supersistious seare of them thus interred; for even to this day the Priestly going over this place, performe (I wot not what) anniversary stevices and tries, for to appease and pacific their gholts.

XCVII

What is the confethat upon the thirteemb day of December, which in Latinethey call the Ides of December, there is exhibited a game of chartest running for the prizes, and the horfe drawing on the right. hand that winnesh the victory, is facrificed and confecrated unto Mars, and at the time thereof, the course one behind that cutteth off his taile, which he carrieth immediately into the Temple called Regia, and therewith subtracts the Altar with bloods and for the head of the faid horfe, one troupe there is comming out of the first leaded Via facta, and another from that which they name Subutta, who excounter and try out by fight who shall have it?

MAy not the reason be (as somedo alledge) that they have an opinion, how the City of Trop.

Was sometime won by the meanes of a woodden horse: and therefore in the memorial thereof, they thus punished a poore horse?

As men from blood of noble Troy descended, And by the way with Latines iffue blended.

Or because an horse is a couragious, martiall, and warlike beast; and ordinarily, men use to present unto the gods those sarrifices which are most agreeable unto them, and sort best with them, and in that respect they sacrifice that horse which wan the prize unto Mars, because strength and victory are well bescenning him.

Or rather because the work of god is firme and stable: those also be victorious who keep their ranke and vanquish them who make not good their ground but sy away. This beast therefore is punished for running so swift, as if celerity were themainrenance of cowardise: to give us thereby covertly to understand, that there is no hope of fastery for them who seek to escape by slight.

XCVIII.

What is the reason that the first worke which the Censors go inhand with, when they be enstalled in the possossion of their Magistracy, is to take order upon a certaine price for the keeping and feeding of the sacred geese, and to cause the painted statues and images of the gods to be refreshed?

Hether is it because they would begin athe smallest things, and those which are of least dispense and difficulty?

Or in commemoration of an ancient benefit received by the means of these creatures, in the time of the Gaules war: for that the geese were they who in the night season described the Barbarians as they sealed and mounted the wall that environed the Capitoll fort (whereas the dogs slept) and with their gagling raifed the watch?

Or becaule, the Cenfors being guardians of the greatest affaires, and having that charge and office which enjoyneth to be vigilant and carefull to preserve religion; to keep temples and publike edifices it to look into the manners and behaviour of men in their order of life; they fer in the first place the consideration and regard of the most watchfull creature that is: and in thewing what care they take of these gees, they incite and provoke by that example their Citizens, not to be negligent and rechleste of holy things. Moreover, for respectively colour of those images and statues, it is a metessiary peece of worke; for the lively red vermilion, wherewith they were wont in times past to colour the said images, soon sadeth and passers have.

XCIX.

What is the case that among other Priests, when one is condemned and banished, they degrade and deprive him of his Priesthood, and chose a wother in his place to only an Angur, though he be consisted and condemned for the greatest crimes in the world, yet they never deprive in has for so long as he livest? Now those Priests they call Augurs, who observe the slights of brids, and foreshow things shereby?

Is a some do say, because they would not have one that is no Priest to know the secret mysteries of their religion and their sacred rites?

Or becaule their Augur being obliged and bound by great oaths never to reveale the fecrets pertaining to Religion, they would not feem to free and absolve him from his oath by degrading him, and making him a private person?

Or rather, for that this word Augur is not fo much a name of hionour and Magistracy, as of art and knowledge. And all one it were, as if they should seeme to disable a Musician for being any more a Musician: of a Physician, that he should be a Physician no longer; or prohibities a Prophetor Soothlayer, to be a Prophet or soothlayer: foreven so they, not able to deprive him of his sufficiency, not to take away his skill, although they bereave him of his name and title; do not subordisine another in his place: and by good reason, because they would keep the just number of the ancient institution.

What is the reasont hat upon the thirteenth day of August, which now it called the Idesof August, and beforetime the Ides of Sextilis, all fervants, as well maids, as men, make holy day, and women that are wrots love then especially to wash and cleanse their heads?

Might not this be a cause, for that King Servim upon such a day was borne of a captive woman, and therefore slaves and bond-servants on that day have liberty to play and dissorthemselves? And as for washing the head; haply at the first the wenches began locted on regard of that self-lay all day, and so the custome passed also muotheir Mistristes and other women free borne?

I.

Why do the Romans adorne their children with jewels pendant at their necks, which they ca!! Build ?

PEradventure to honour thememory of those first wives of theirs, whom they ravished: in fall your of whom they ordained many other prerogatives for the children which they had by them, and namely this among the rest?

Orit may be, for to grace the prowelle of Tarquinith? For reported it is that being but a very child, in a great battell which was fought againft the Latines and Tuscins together, he rode into the very throng of his enemies, and engaged himfelfe fortar, that being dimounted and unhoried; yet notwithstanding he manfully withstood those who hotely charged upon him, and encouraged the Romans to stand to it, in such fort as the enemies by them were put to plaine flight, with the loss of 56000, men whom they lest clead in the place; and for a teward of this vertue and valour, technologische the significant of the second state of the significant service and valour, technologische the significant of the second state of the significant service and valour, technologische the significant service and valour technologische th

Or elfe, because in old time it was not reputed a shamefull and visianous thing, to love young boies wantonly, for their beauty in the slower of their age, if they were slaves borne, as the Comedies even at this day do restlife: but they forbate most precisely to touch any of them who were steed borne or of gentle bloud descended. To the end therefore man might not pretend ignorance in such a case, as if they knew not of what condition any boies were, if they met with them naked, they caused them to weare this badge and marke of nobility about their necks.

Or peradventure, this might be also as a preservative unto them of their honour, continence and thastity, as one would say, a bridle to restraine wantonnesse and incontinency, as being put in mind thereby to be abassised to play menspares, before they had laid off the markes and signes of child-hood. For there is no apparance or probability of that which Varro alledgeth, saying, That because the £olians in their Dialect do call such, that is to say, Counsell, social, therefore such childent for a signe and presage of wisdome and good counsell, carried this jewell, which they named Balla,

But see whether it might not be in regard of the moone that they weare this device? for the figure of the moone, when she is at the full, is not round as a ball of boule, but rather star in manner of a lentile, or resembling a dish or plate; not only on that side which appeareth unito us, but also (as Empradeles saith) on that part which is under it.

Wherefore gave they fore-names to little infants, if they were boies upon the ninth day after their birth, but if they were girles, when they were eight daies old?

May there not be 2 naturall reason rendred hereof, that they should impose the names sooner upon daughters than sons: for that semales grow apace, are quickly ripe, and come betimes P p p 2 unto unto their perfection in comparison of males; but as touching those prelife dayes, they take them that immediately follow the seventh: for that the seventh day after children be born is very dangerous, as well for other occasions, as in regard of the navill-string : for that in many it will unknit and be loose again upon the seventh day, and so long as it continueth so resolved and open. an infant resembleth a plant rather than any animall creature?

Or like as the Pythagoreans were of opinion, that of numbers the even were females, and the odd male; for that it is generative, and is more firong than the even number, because it is compound: and if a man divide these numbers into unities, the even number sheweth a void place between; whereas the odde hath the middle alwayes fulfilled with one part thereof: even fo in this respect they are of opinion, that the even number eight, resembleth rather the semale, and the uneven num-

Or rather it is because of all numbers, nine is the first square comming of three, which is an odde and perfect number : and eight the first cubick, to wit four-iquare on every side like a die proceeding from two, aneven number: now a man ought to be quadrat odde (as we fay) and fingular, yea and perfect: and a woman (on lefs than a die) fure and fledfaft, a keeper of home, and nor cafily removed. Hereunto we do adjoyne thus much more also, that eight is a number cubick, a. rifing from two as the base and foot: and nine is a square quadrangle having three for the base: and therefore it feemeth, that where women have two names, men have three.

CIII.

What is the reason, that those children who have no certain father, they were wont to tearm Spurios?

Por we may not think as the Greeks hold, and as orators give out in their pleas, that this word Spurius, is derived of Spura, that is to fay, naturall feed, for that fuch children are begotten by the feed of many men mingled and confounded together.

But furely this Sparius, is one of the ordinary fore-names that the Romans take, fuch as Seature, Decimas, and Cains. Now these fore-names they never use to write out at full with all their letters, but mark them sometime with one letter alone, as for example, Titus, Lucius, and Marcius, with T, L, M; or with twain, as Spurius and Cneus, with Sp. and Cn. or at most with three as Sextus and Servius, with Sex. Ser. Spurius then is one of their fore-names which is noted with two letters S, and P. which fignific asmuch, as Sine Patre, that is to say without a father; for S. standeth for Sine, that is to fay, without; and P. for Pater, that is to fay, a father. And hereupon grew the error, for that Sine Patre, and Spurius be written both with the same letters short, Sp. And yet I will not flick to give you another reason, though it be somewhat fabulous, and carrieth a greater abfurdity with it : for looth they say that the Sabines in old time named in their language the name or privities of a woman, Sporios: and thereupon afterwards as it were by way of reproach, they called him Sparing, who had to his mother a woman unmarried and not lawfully espoused.

CIV W by is Bacchus called with them, Liber Pater ?

I Six for that he is the author and father of all liberty unto them who have taken their wine well; for most membecome and acious and are full of bold and trank broad speech, when they be drunk or cup-shotten?

Or because he it is who ministreth libations first, that is to say, those effusions and offerings of wine that are given to the gods?

Or rather (as Alexander faid) because the Greeks called Bacohus, Dionysos Elutherius, that is to fay, Bacchus the Deliverer: and they might call him fo, of a city in Bactia, named Eluthers

Wherefore was it not the custome among the Romans, that maidens should be wedded upon any dayes of publike their feasts; but widowes might be remarried upon those dayes?

VAs it for that (as Varro faith) virgins be * ill-apaid and heavy when they be fift wedded; but such as were wives before, be glad and joyfull when they marrie agained. And upon a seastival holy day there should be nothing done with any ill will or upon constraint. Or rather, because it is for the credit and honor of young damosels, to be married in the view of the whole world; but for widowes it is a dishonour and shame unto them, to be seen of many for to be wedded a fecond time: for the first marriage is lovely and definable; the fecond odious and delight and abominable: for women, if they proceed to marry with other men whiles their former husbands be living are ashamed thereof: and if they be dead, they are in mourning state of widowhood: and therefore they chuse rather to be maried closely and secretly in all silence, than to be accompanied with a long train and solemnity, and to have much adoe and great stirring at their mariage. Now it is well known that feastivall holidayes divert and distract the multitude divers wayes, someto this game and pastime, others to that; so as they have no leasure to go and see weddings.

Or last of all, because it was a day of publick solemnity, when they first ravished the Sabines daughters: an attempt that drew upon them, bloudy war, and therefore they thought it ominous and presaging evill, to offer their virgins to wed upon such holidayes.

Why do the Romans honour and worship fortune, by the name of Primigenia, which a man may interpret first begotten or first borne?

sit for that (as some say) Servius being by chance born of a maid servant and a captive, had Fortune to favourable unto him, that he reigned nobly and gloriously, king at Rome? For most Romans are of his opinion. Orrather, because Fortune gave unto the city of Rome her first original and beginning of so mighty an empire.

Or lieth not herein some deeper cause, which we are to setch out of the secrets of Nature and Philosophy; namely, that Fortune is the principle of all things, infomuch, as Nature confifeth by Fortune; namely, when to some things concurring calually and by chance, there is some order and dispose adjoyned.

what is the reason that the Romans call those who act comedies and other theatricall places, Hi-Ariones?

Six for that cause, which as Claudius Rusus hath lest in writing? for he reported that many years ago, and namely, in those dayes when Cains Sulpitius and Licinius Stelo were Consuls, there raigned a great peltilence at Rome, such a mortality as consumed all the stage-plaiers indifferently one with another. Whereupon at their instant prayer and request, there repaired out of Tujcase to Rome, many excellent and fingular actors in this kind: among whom, he who was of greatelt reputation, and had carried the name longest in all theaters, for his rare gift and dexterity that way was, called Hifter; of whose name all other afterward were termed Hiftriones, CVIII.

Why espoused not the Romans in marriage thase women who were neer of kin unto them?

NAS it because they were desirous to amplifie, and increase all alliances, and acquire more kinssolk, by giving their daughters in marriage to others, and by taking to wise others than their own kinred?

Or for that they feared in such wedlock the jarres and quarrels of those who be of kin, which are able to extinguish and abolish even the very lawes and rights of nature?

Or elfe, feeing as they did, how women by reason of their weakness and infirmity stand in need of many helpers, they would not have men to contract in marriage, nor dwell in one house with those who were neer in bloud to them, to the end, that if the husband should offer wrong and injury to his wife, her kinsfolk might succour and assist her.

Why is it not I awfull for Jupiters priest, wohm they name Flamen Dialis to handle or once touch

For meal, is it not because it is an unpersect and raw kind of nourishment? for neither continuers it the same that it was, to wir, wheat, &cc. nor is that yet which it should be, namely bread: but hath loft that nature which it had before of feed, and withall hath not gotten the use of food and nourishment. And hereupon it is, that the poet calleth meal (by a Metaphor or borrowed (peech) M, I. phaton, which is as much to say, as killed and marred by the mill in grinding; and as for leaven, both it telse is engendered of a certain corruption of meal, and also corrupteth (in a manner) the whole lump of dough, wherein it is mixed: for the faid dough becommeth less firme and fait then it was before, it hangeth not together; and in one word the leaven of the passe seemeth to be a very putrifaction and rottenness thereof. And verily if there be too much of the leaven put to the dough, it maketh it so share and sour that it cannot be eaten, and in very truth spoileth the meal quite.

C X. Wherefore is the faid priest likewise forbidden to touch raw slesh ?

Sit by this custome to withdraw him far from eating of raw things? Or isit for the same cause that he abhorreth and detesteth meal? for neither is it any mote a living animall, nor come yet to be meat: for by boyling and rofting it groweth to such an alteration, as changeth the very forme thereof: whereas raw flesh and newly killed is neither pure and impolluted to the eye, but hideous to fee to; and befides, it hath (I wot not what) refemblance to an ougly fore or or filthy ulcer.

What is the reason that the Romans have expressly commanded the same priest or Flamen of Jupiter, not only not to touch a dog or cat, but not so much as to name either of them?

O speak of the Goat first is it not for detestation of his excessive lust and leachery; and besides I for his rank and filthy favour? or because they are afraid of him, as of a diseased creature and subject to maladies? for surely, there seemeth not to be a beast in the world io much given to the falling sickness, as its; nor insecteth so soon those that either ear of the stell nor once touch it, when it is surprised with this evill. The cause thereof some says to be the streightness of those conduits and passages by which the spirits go and come, which often-times happen to be intercepted and stopped. And this they conjecture by the small and sender voice that the beast has similar the beatter to confirme the same, we do see ordinarily, that men likewise who be shipsed nothing malady, grow in the end to have such a voice as in some fort resembleth the bleating of goats. Now, for the Dog, true it is apply that he is not so leacherous, nor smelleth altogether is strong for ank as doth the Goat; and yet some there be who say, that a Dog might not be premitted to come within the castle of Athens, nor to enter into the sile of Desas, because, sor soon, les lines bit, hes openly in the sight of every man, as if bulls, bears, and stallows had their screen than bears, to do their kind with semales, and did not leap and cover them in the broad-field and open yard, without being abashed at the matter.

But ignorant they are of the true cause indeed: which is, for that a Dog is by nature fell, and quartellome, given to arte and war upon a very small occasion in which tespectage non-lithely from sanctuaries, holy churches, and priviledged places, giving thereby unto poor affilication-plicants, free access unto them for their safe and sure refuge. And even so very probable it is, that this Flamen or priest of Jupite, whom they would have to be as an holy, sacred, and living image for to flie unto, should be accessible and easier to be approached unto by humble intores, and shot as stand in need of him, without any thing in the way to impeach; to put back; or to affright hem which was the cause that he had a little bed or paller made for him, in the very porch or entry of his house; and that servain or slave, who could and means to come and fall down at his few; and lay hold on his knees was for that day freed from the whip; and past danger of all other punishment: say he were a prisoner with irons, and botts at his secretant could make this two approach per unto this priest, he was let loose, and his gives and fetters were thrown out of the house, not at the door, but shung over the very root thereof.

But to what purpole ferred all this, and what good would this have done, that he should shew shinfielfe to gentle, to affable, and humane, if he had a curst dog about thin to keep his door, and to affiright, chafe and stear all shole away-who had recourselumo him for succour. And yet 6 it is, that our anicents stouced on a dog to be altogether a cleant creature: For first and formost we do not find that he is confectated or dedicated unto any of the celestiall gode: the being sent unto certestiall and informall Proferious into the quarrefires and cross high wayer to make her asper, he seemeth to serve for an expiatory service to divert and turn away some calamity, once cleans (one fishly ordure, rather than otherwise: to sky working, that it Lacedemon they rut and sit dogs down along the mids, and to facrifice them to Mair, the most bloudy god of all others. And the Romans themicless upon the feast? They could not a scriptice and therefore it is no abstractly to think, that those who have taken upon them to serve the most loveraigne and purest God of all others, were not without good casts forbidden to have a dog with them in the house, not to be acquainted and similar with him.

For what cause was not the same priest of Jupicet permitted, either to touch an ivie tree, or it pass thorow away covered over head with a vine growing to atree, and spreading her branches from the?

Is not this like unto those precepts of Pythologicas: Eat not your meat from a chair: Sit not upon I a measure called Chemis: Neither step thost over a broom or * befom. For surely none of the Pythagoreansfeared any of these things, or made struple todo, as these words in outward shew, and in their litterall sense do pietend; but under such speeches they did covertly and figuratively solved somewhat else: even so this precept: Go not under a vine, is to be referred unto wine, and implied this much; that is not lawfull for the sad Priest to drink, for such as over-such schemes when the wine above their heads, and under it they are depressed and weighed down, whereas men and priests especially ought to be evermore inperious and commanders of this pleasure, and in no write to be subject unto it. And thus much of the Vine,

As for the ivie, is it not for that it is aplant that beareth no fruit, nor any thing good for mans use, and moreover is so weak, as by readon of that feeblenes it is not able to suffiain it selfe, but had need of other trees to support and bear it up: and besides, with the cool shadow that yeelds, and the green leaves alwayes to be seen, it dazeleth; and, as it were, bewitcheth the eyes of many that look upon it for which causes men thought that they ought not to nourish or emertain it about an house, because it bringeth no profit nor sufferit to class about any thing, considering it so hutrfull unto plants and admit it to creepupon them, whiles it slicketh saft in the ground: and therefore banished it is from the temples and sacrifices of the celetial gods, and their present adebatted from using it: neither shall a man ever see in the sacrifices or divine worship of Jimaa Athens, nor of Venus at Thebens any wilde ivie brought out of the woods. Many, at the sacrifices and services of Bacchus, which are performed in the night and darkness, it is suled.

Or may not this be a covert and figurative prohibition, of such blind dances and fooleries in the night, as theiebe, which are practifed by the priefts of Bacebus? for those women which are transfered.

ported with their furious motions of Bacebus, tun immediately upon the ive, and catching it in their hands, pluck it inpieces, or elfe, shew in between their section in 6 muchas they peak not altogether abfurdly, who fay, that this ivie bath in it a certain forit that flirreth and motent to maddelle, turneth mens, minds to turn, it directs them to extains it toublethe and comingregate them; and in one word makesh tham drunk with wine, and don't great pleafure unto them; who are otherwise disposed and enclined of themselves to high fanatical savishments of their without understanding.

What is the resson that these Priestivate Phinoins of Jupiter were not allowed, in the restake upon them, or to sue for any gaper man of States, but in regard that they be not equable chared due this to be not on the and in some for to make love the control of the control of

Or rather, because Priests having their functions determinate and certain, and the langs, underminate and uncertain, it was not possible, that when the occasions and times of both concurred together at one instant, one and the same perion should be sufficient for both who it could not otherwise be, but many times when both charges presed upon him and urged him at once, he should presermin the one on the other, and by that means now while, offend and fault in sufficient which of the other while of hur unto criticins and subjects.

What is he who among the Delphians is called Hostoter, and why name the one of they moneths Bylios.

They name Hoffeter that facrificer who offereth a facrifice when he is declared Hoffet, that is to fay, holy; and five there be who are all their life time accounted Hoffet, and those do and execute many things together with their prophets, and joyne with them in divers ceremonies of divine fervice, and gods worship, inamuch as they are thought to be descended from Deucation. And for the moneth called Byfis, many have thought it to be as much as Phyfius, that is to say, the foringing or growing moneth; for that then, the spring beginneth, and many plants at that time do arise out of ground and bud. But the truth is notio: for the Delphians never use B. in stead of Ph.like as the Macedonians do, who for Philippus, Phalacros, and Pheronice, say, Bilippus Balacros, and Beronice: indeed they put B. for P. and it is as ordinary with them, to say Batein, for Patein, Bieron, for Pieron: and so Bysius, is all one with Pysius, that is to say, the month in which they consult with their god Apollo, and demand of him answers and resolutions of their doubts: for this is the custome of the countrey, because in this moneth they propounded their demand unco the Oracle of Apollo, and they supposed the seventh day of the same to be his birth-day, which they furnamed also, Polypthous, not as many do imagine, because they then do bake many cakes, which are called Phihois, but for that it is a day wherein divers do refort unto the Oracle for to berefolved, and many answers are delivered: for it is but of late dayes that folke were permitted to consult with the Oracle when they lift in every moneth; but before time the religious Priestes of Apollo, named Pythia, opened not the Oracle, nor gave answer but at one time in the yeer, according as Calliftenes and Alexandrides have recorded in writing.

Who be they that are named Aposphendoneti?

IN times past the Eretrians held the Island Corcyra, untill Charicrates arrived there with a fleet from Corinth and vanquished them: whereupon the Eretrians took sea again, and returned toward their naturall countrey: whereof their fellow-citizens being advertised, such I say as stirred not but remained quiet, repelled them, and kept them off from landing upon their ground by chargingthem with shot from slings. Now when they saw they could not win them by any fair language, nor yet compell them by force of armes, being as they were inexorable, and befides many more then they in number, they made saile to the coasts of Thracia, where they possessed themfelves of aplace, where they report, Methon, one of the predecessors and progenitors of Orpheus, fometime dwelt: and there having built a city, they named it Methone; but themselves were furnamed Aposphendoneti, which is as much to fay, as repelled and driven back by slings.

What is that which the Delphians call, Charila?

"He citizens of Delphos do celebrate continually three Ennesterides, that is to fay, feafts celebrated every minth yeer, one after another successively. Of which, the first they name, Septerion; the second, Herois; and the third, Charila. As touching the first, it seemeth to be a memoriall representing the fight or combate that Phabus had against Python: and his flight after the conflict, and pursuit after him into the valley of Tempe. For as some do report he fled by occasion of a certain man-slaughter and murder that he had committed, for which he sought to be purged: others fay that when Python was wounded, and fled by the way which we call, Holy, Phabus made hot pursuit after him, infomuch as he went within a little of overtaking him, and finding him at the point of death: (for at his first comming he found that he was newly dead of the wounds which he had received in the foresaid fight) also, that he was enterred and buried by his son. (who as they fay) was named Aix: this novenary feast therefore, called Septerion, is a representation of this hiflory, or elie of some other like unto it. The second named Herois containeth (I wot not what) hidden ceremonies and fabulous fecrers, which the professed priests (in the divine service of Bacchia called Thyades) know well enough: but by such other things as are openly done and practifed, a man may conjecture, that it should be a certain exaltation of affumption of Semeleup into heaven. Moreover, as concerning Charilas, there goeth such a tale as this. It fortuned upon a time, that after much drought, there followed great famine in the city of Delphos, in formuch as all the inhabitants came with their wives and children to the court gates, crying out unto their King for the extream hunger that they endured. The king thereupon cauled to be distributed among the better fort of them, a dole of meal, and certain pulse, for that he had not sufficient to give indifferently among them all: and when there came a little young wench, a filly orphan, fatherless and motherless, who instantly belought him to give her allo some reliefe; the king smote her with his shoe, and slung it at her face. The girle (poore though she was, forlorne and destitute of alt wordly succour; howbest carrying no base mind with her; but of a noble spirit) departed from his presence, and made no more adoe, but undid her girdle from her wast and hanged her self therewith. Well, the samine daily increased more and more, and diseases grew thereupon: by occasion whereof, the king went in perion to the Oracle of Apollo, supposing to find there some meed and remedy: unto whom Prina the Propheteis made this answer: That the ghost of Charita should be appealed and pacified, who had dyed a voluntary death. So after long search and diligentenquity, hardly found in the end it was, that the young maiden whom he had so beaten with his shoe, was named Charila: whereupon they offered a certain sacrifice mixed with expiatory oblations, which they celebrate and performe from nine yeers to nine, even to this day. For at this folemnity, the king fitting in his chair, dealeth certain meal and pulle among all commers, as well frangers as citizens: and the image of Charila is thither brought, refembling a young girle: now after that every one hath received part of the dole, the king beateth the faid image about the eares With his shoe: and the chief governeis of the religious women, called Thyades, takes up the image, and carrieth it into a certain place full of deep caves: where after they have hung an halter about the neck of it, they enter it under ground in that very place where they buried the corps of Charila. when the had thrangled her felie.

What is the meaning of that which they call among the Eneians, Begged-flesh.

The Encians in times path had many transmigrations from place to place: for first they inhabited the countrey about the Plaine called Dation: out of which they were driven by the Lapithe, and went to the Æthice; and from thence into a quarter of the Province Moloffis, called Arava, which they held, and thereof called they were Parava. After all this they seized the City Cirrha: wherein after they had stoned to death their King Onoclus, by warrant and commandement from Apollo; they went down into that tract that lieth along by the river Inachus, a Countrey inhabited then by the Inachians and Acharans. Now they had the answer of an Oracle on both sides, to wit, the Inachians and Achaans, that if they yeelded and gave away part of their Countrey they should lose all: and the Encians, that if they could get once any thing at their hands with their good wils, they should for ever possesse and hold all. Things standing in these termes, there was a notable personage among the Æncians, nimed Temon, who putting on ragged cloaths, and taking a waller about his neck, diguiled himfelfelike unto a beggar, and in this habit went to the Inachians to crave their alms. The King of the Inachians scorned and laughed at him, and by way of disdaine and mockery tooke up a clod of earth and gave it him; the other took it right willingly and put it up into his budget: but he made no semblance neither was he seen to embrace this gift, and to joy therein; but went his way immediately without begging any thingelse, as being very well content with that which he had gotten already. The Elders of the people wondring hereat, called to mind the faid oracle, and prefenting themselves before the King advertised him not to neglect this occurrent, nor to let this man thus to escape out of his hands. But Temon having an inkling of their designe, made haste and fled apace, infomuch as he faved himfelfe, by the meanes of a great facrifice, even of an hundred oxen which he vowed unto Apollo. This done, both Kings, to wit, of the Inachians and the Encians sent defiance one to the other, and challenged combate to fight hand to hand. The King of the Aneians Phemius, feeing Hyperochus King of the Inachians comming upon him with his dog, cried out, and faid, That he dealt not like a just and righteous man, thus to bring an affistant and helper with him: whereat as Hyperochus turned his nead about, and looked back for to chase away his dog, Phemius raught him such a rap with a stone upon the side of his head that he selled him to the ground, and killed him outright therewith in the very place. Thus the Encians having conquered the countrey, and expelled the Inachians and the Achaans, adored ever after that stone as a facred thing, and facrificed unto it, and within the fat of the beaft facrificed enwrap it very charily. Afterwards, whenfor ever they have according to their vow offered a magnificent facrifice of an hundred oxen to Apollo, and killed likewife an oxe unto Jupiter: they fend the best and most daintiest piece of the said facrifice unto those that are lineally descended from Temon, which at this day is called among them, The Begged flesh, or the Beggers flesh.

Who be those whom the inhabitants of Ithaca, named Coliades? and who is Phagilus among them?

A Frer that Ulifest had killed those who wooed his wise in his absence, the kinssolke and friends of them being now dead, rose up against him to be revenged: but in the end they agreed on both fides to fend for Neoptolemus, to make an accord and attonement between them: who having undertaken this arbitrement, awarded that Unffes should depart out of those parts, and quit the Isles of Cephalenia, Ithaca, and Zacymhus, in regard of the bloudshed that he had committed. Item, that the kinsfolke and friends of the said wooers should pay a certaine fine every yeare unto Wyffes in recompence for the riot, dammage, and havock they had made in his house. As for Wyffes, he withdrew himselse and departed into Italy : but for the mulet or fine imposed upon them, which he had conferrated unto the gods; he took order that those of Ithaca should tender the paiment thereof unto his ion: and the same was a quantity of meale and of wine, a certaine number of *wax-lights or tapers, oyle, falt, and for facrifices the bigger fort and better grown of Phagili: now Phagilis. haply ha-ney combal Aristotle interpreteth to be a lambe.

What is the woodden dog among the Locrians, Ocrus was the ion of Physius, who had to his father Amphylion. This Locrus had by Cabya 2 fon named likewise Locrus: with him his father was at some variance; who having gathered a number of Citizens to him, consulted with the Oracle about a place where he should build a new City and people it in the nature of a Colony. The Oracle returned unto him this answer: That in what place a dog of wood did bite him there he should found a City. And so when he had passed over to the other fide of the fea, and was landed, he chanced to tread as he walked along upon a brier, which in Greek is called Kuroe Baros, and was so pricked therewith, that he was constrained there to To journe certaine daies: during which time, after he had well viewed and confidered the country he

Who is Doryxenus among the Megasiant?

He Province Megasis was in old time inhabited by certaine towns and villages; and the Citizens or Inhabitants being divided into five parts, were called Heraens, Pyraens, Megariens, Cynofiniens, and Tripodiffeans: now the Corinthians their next neighbours, and who ipied out all octations, and fought meanes to reduce the Province Megarica under their obedience; practifed to fetthem together by the eares, and wrought it fo, that they warred one upon another: but they carried such a moderate hand, and were so respective in their wars, that they remembred evermore they were kinsfolke and of a bloud: and therefore warred after a mild and gentle manner; for no man offered any injury or violence to the husbandmen that tilled the ground on either fide: and look who loever chanced to be taken priloners, were to pay for their ransome a certaine peece of money, fet down between them : which fum of money was received ever after they were delivered, and not before, because no man would demand it: for look who had taken a captive in the war, he would bring him home with him into his house, and made him good cheere at his own table, confult together, and then send him home in peace: and the party thus set free, when he came duly and brought his ransome aforeiaid with him, was commended and thanked for it, yea, and continued everafter unto his dying day friend unto him who received the money : and thus inflead of Dorydlass, which fignifieth a prisoner taken in war, he was called Doryxenus; that is to say, a friend made by war; for he who kept back the faid money, and defrauded the right mafter thereof; became all his lifetime infamous, not only among enemies, but also among his own fellow-Citizens, as being reputed a wicked, perfidious, and false wretch.

What is Palintocia among the Megarians?

He Megarians when they had expelled their tyrant Theagenes for a pretty while after nied good and moderate government in their common-wealth: but when as their flattering orators and clawbacks of the people began unto them once (as Plato very well faid) in a cup of the meere and undelayed wine of liberty, that is to fay, commended unto them excessive licenciousnesses they came tobe exceeding faucy and malepert, and were utterly corrupt and marred, infomuch as they commitredall infolent outrages that could be devised against the substantiall and wealthy burgesies: and among other bold parts, the poore and needy would prefume to go into their houses, and command them for to entertaine them with great cheare, and to feast them sumptuously: if they refused to to do, they would make no more ado, but take away perforce what soever they could lay hands on in the houle, and in one word, abuse them all most villanously. In conclusion, they made a statute and ordinince, by vertue whereof it might be lawfull for them to demand back agains at the hands of those ulirers, who had let them have money before time, all the interest and confideration for use which they had paied before, and this they called Palintoc a.

What City or Countreyis that Authedon, whereof the Propheteffe Pythia fp. the in thefe verfes?

Drinke out thy wine the lees, the dregs, and all; Anthedon thou thy countrey canst not call.

Por that Ambedon which is in Bania, is not so plentifull of good wines; Calauria indeed as fa-bles make report, was sometime called Irene, by the name of a Lady so cleped, the daughter of Neptane and Melanthis, who was the daughter of Alphem; but afterwards being held, and inhabited by Ambes and Hyperes, furnamed it was Anthedonia and Hyperes; for the aniwer of the oracle, as Ariftotle tellifieth Went in this manner :

operes; union whis manner:

Drinke out thy wine swith lees, with drees, and all,

Licely country, cauft not call;

Antificuou toos in j commissione course.

Nor Hypera that facred Island in there
Thou might if it drinks without degt page and cleere.

Thus (I say) writeth Arisoile: but Manassion saith, that Anthor being brother of Hyperes, was lost when he was but a very child; and when his brother Hyperes for to learth him our, travelled and wandered to and fro all about, he came at length to Pheres, unto Acastus or Adrastus, where by good fortune Anthosferved in the place of cup-bearer, and had the charge of the wine-lellar: now as they fate feafting at the table, the boy Anthos when he offered a cup of wine unto his brother, took knowledge of him, and said foftly in his eare:

Drinke now your wine, with lees, with dregs and all: Anthedon you cannot your countrey call.

What is the meaning of this by-word in Priene: Darkneffe about the oake?

The Samians and Prienians warred one against the other doing and suffering harme reciprocally, but so, as the damages and losses were tollerable, until such time as in one great battell sought between them, those of Priene put to the sword in one day a thousand Samians: but seven yeares as ter in another conflict which the Prienians had against the Milesians neere unto a place called Ague, that is to fay, Oake, they lost the most valiant and principall Citizens they had; which hapned at the wery time when lage By as being fent Embassadour into Samor, won great honour and reputation this was a would day and a pittifull, and heavy calamity to all the dames of Prione in generall; forthere was not one of them but this common losse in some measure touched; infomuch as this by-word was taken up amongst them afterwards, in forme of a curfed malediction or solemne oath, in their greatest affaires to bind them withall, by that darknesse at the oake; for that either their fathers, brethren, husbands, or children were then and there flaine.

XXI. What were they among the Candiots, who were called Catacautæ?

T is reported, that certaine Tyrthenians, having ravilhed and carried away by force a number of the Athenians daughters and wives out of Branzon, at what time as they inhabited the Islands Imbros and Lemnos, were afterwards chaled out of those quarters and landed upon the coast of Laconia, which they inhabited; where they entred into such acquaintance with the women of the Countrey, that they begat children of them; whereupon in the end they grew to be suspected and ill spoken of by the natural linhabitants, so that they were forced to abandon Laconia, and to returne againe into Candy under the conduct of Pollis and his brother Crataidas: where, warring upon them that held the country, they left many of their bodies who died in fundry skirmishes lying upon the land neglected and unburied : at the first, because they had no time and leasure to interre them, by reason of the sore war which they maintained continually, and the danger that would have insued, in case they had gone to take up their bodies: but afterwards, because they abhorred to rouch those dead carcailes that lay stinking and putrifying with the heat of the sun, for that they had continued fo long above ground : Pollis therefore one of their leaders deviled certaine honours, priviledges, exemptions, and immunities, to bestow partly upon the Priests of the gods, and in part upon those who buried the dead; and confectated folemnly these prerogatives unto some terrestrial deities, to the end they might be more durable and remaine inviolate: afterwards he parted with his brother by lot. Now the one fort were named Sacrificers, and the other Catacanta; who governed apart, with their own laws and particular discipline: by vertue whereof among other good orders and civill customes, they were not subject to certaine crimes and enormities, whereunto other Candiots are commonly given; namely, to rob, pill, and spoile one another secretly for these did no wrong one to another; they neither did steale, nor piller, norcarry away other mens goods.

What meaneth the Sepulcher of children among the Chalcidians?

Other and Eclus the fons of Xuthus arrived at Euboea, to feeke them a place of habitation; the which Isle was for the most part possessed and occupied by the Æolians. Now Cothus had a promile by oracle, that he should prosper in the world, and have the upper hand of his enemies, in case he bought or purchased that land: wherefore being come a shore with some few of his men, he found certaine young children playing by the sea-side; with whom he joyned disported with them, made much of them, shewing unto them many pretty gauds and toyes that had not been beforetime feen in those parts: and when he perceived that the children were in love thereof, and desirous to have them; he faid that he would not give them any of his fine things, unless by way of exchange he might receive of them some of their land: the children therefore taking up a little of the mould with both hands, gave the same unto him, and having received from him the foresaid gauds, went their wayes. The Æolians hearing of this, and withal discovering their enemies under saile directing their course thither, and ready to invade them, taking counsel of anger and sorrow together, killed those children: who were entombed along that great high way, by which men go from the City to the straight or frith called Emipus. Thus you see wherefore that place was called the Childrens Sepulchre

What is he whom en Argosthey call Mixatchagenas? and who be they that are named Elasians?

Sfor Mixarchagenas, it was the furname of Caffor among them: and the Argives beleeve veri-A tythat buried he was in their Territory, But Pollux his brother they reverenced and worshipped as one of the heavenly gods.

Moreover, those who are thought to have the gift to divertand put by the fits of the Epilephe, orfalling ficknesse, they name Elasia, and they are supposed to be descended from Alexidas, the daughter of Amphiaraus.

XXIV.

What is that which the Argives call Enchima?

Hole who have loft any of their neer kinsfolks in blood, or a familiar friend, were wont present-I juster their mourning was past, to lacrifice unto Apollo, and thirty days after unto Mercury: for this they thought, that like as the earth receiveth the bodies of the dead, so doth Mercury the fools. To the mimiter of Apollo they give barley, and receive of him again in lieu thereof, a piece of Helh of the beaff killed for factifice. No watter that they have quenched the former fire as polluged and defiled, they go to leek for others elsewhere, which after they have kindled, they road the faid Atth with it, and then they call that fielh, Encuifma.

What is the reason that it is not permitted at Rhodes for the Horald or publick Crier, to enter into the Temple of Oridion?

Is it for that Ochimus in times past assanced his daughter Crdipp unto Occidion, but Cercaphus The brother of Ochimus being enamoused of his Neece Crd ppe, perswaded the Herald (for inthose days the manner was to demand their brides in marriage, by the means of Heralds, and to receive them ar their hands) that when he had Cydippe once delivered unto him, he should bring her unto him: which was effected accordingly. And this Cercaphus being policifed of the maiden fled away withher : but in pro effe of time when Ochimus was very aged Gercaphus retuined home. Upon Whith occasion the Rhodians enacted a law, that from thence forth; there should never any Herald ferfoot within the Temple of Oeridion, in regard of this injury done unto him.

Lo, what was the cause that neither a Piper is allowed to go into his Temple, nor Achilles may be once named there.

XXIX. Who is that, whom the Epidamnians call Poletes.

He Epidamnians being next neighbours unto the Illyrians, perceived that their Citizens who converted, commerced, and traded in traffick with them, became naught, and fearing befides fome practife for the alteration of State: they choice every year one of the best approved men of their City, who went to and iro to make all contracts, batgains, and exchanges, that those of Epidamnus might have the Barbarians, and likewise dealt reciprocally in these affairs and negotiations, that the Illyrians had with them: now this factor that thus bought and fold in their name, was called Poletes. What is that, which in Thracia they call Arani Acta, that is to fay, the Shore of Aranus?

THE Andrians and Chalcidians having made a voyage into Thrace, for to chule out a place for to inhabit: furorized iointly together the Circ Sana which was harmed and the contract of the cont inhabit: surprized jointly together the City Sana, which was betrayed and delivered into their hands, And being advertised that the Barbarians had abandoned the town Achantus, they sent forth two spies to know the truth thereof : these spies approached the town so neer, that they knew for certain, that the enemies had quit the place and were gone. The party who was for the Chalcidians ran before to take the first possession of it in the name of the Chalcidians: but the other who was for the Andrians, seeing that he could not with good sootmanship overtake his fellow; stand his dart or javelin from him which he had in his hand; and when the head thereof stuck in the City gate, he cried out aloud, that he had taken possession thereof in the behalfe of the Andrians, with his javelin head. Hereupon arose some variance and controversie between these two nations, but its rake not out to open wars for they agreed friendly together, that the Erythrans, Samians, but it brake not out to open wars for they agreed friendly together, that the Erythrans, Samians, and Parians should be the indifferent Judges to arbitrate and determine all their debates and futes depending between them, But for that the Erythrans and Samians awarded on the Andrians fide, and the Parians for the Chalcidians: the Andrians in that very place took a folemn oath, and bound the same with imprecations, curses, and maledictions, that they would never either take the daughters of the Parians in marriage, or affiance their own unto them: and for this cause they gave this name unto the place, and called it the Shore or Bank of Aransi, whereas before it was called, the Port of the Dragon.

Why do the wives of the Eretrians at the solemn feast of Cetes, rost their stell meat, not at the fire, but against the Sun, and never call upon her by the name of Calligenia?

Who be they whom the Milesians eall Ainauta? A Fter that the tyrants Those and Dameseno-shad been defeated, there arose within the City two factions that maintained their several sides: the one named Plantis and the other Cheiromacha. In the end, that of Plontic (who were indeed the richest and mightiest persons in the City) prevailed, and having gotten the upper hand, seised the soveraign authority and government: and because when they minded to fit in confoltation of their weightieft affairs, they went a ship-boord, and lanched into the deep a good way off from the land; and after they had refolved and decreed what to do, returned back again into the haven, therefore they were furnamed Ainaura, which is as much to fay, as alway failing.

XXXIV. What was he who facrificed an Ox unto his Benefastor.

Therehovered sometime a ship of certain men of war, or rovers, and anchored about the coast of Islandship, within which there was an old man who had the charge of a number of earthen pots, containing Amphors a piece, with pitch in them: now it fortuned that a poor mariner or barger man named Pyrrbias, who got his living by ferrying and transporting passengers, approached the sid ship, and delivered the old man out of the Rovers hands, and saved his life, not for any gaine that he looked for, but only at his earnest request, and for very pure pity and compassion: now in recompence hereof, albeit he exspected none, the old man pressed instantly upon him to receive some of those pots or pitchers aforesaid: the Rovers were not so soon retired and departed out of the way, but the old man feeing him at liberty, and fecure of danger, brought Pyrrhim to these earthen reflels, and shewed unto him a great quantity of Gold and Silver mingled with the Pitch : Pyrthias hereby growing of a sudden to be rich and full of money, entreated the old man very kindly in all respects, otherwise, and besides sacrificed unto him a beefe : and hereupon, as they say, arose this common proverb: No man ever facrificed an Ox unto his Benefactor but Pyrrhias. and Millars bar

What is the cause that it was a custom among the maidens of the Bottiaans in their dancing, to sing, as it were, the faburden of a fong: Go we to Athens.

THe Candiots by report upon a vow that they this made, fent the first born of their men unto Diaphos s but they that were thus sens, feeing they could not find sufficient means there to live in plenty, departed from thence to feek out some convenient place for a Colony to inhabit and full they letled themselves in Japigia, but afterwards arrived to this very place of Thracia, where now they are, having certain Athenians mingled among them: for it is not like that Minos had cauled those young men to be put to death whom the Athenians had fent unto him by way of tribute, but kept them to do him fervices some therefore of their issue, and descended from them, being reputed natural Candiots, were with them sent unto the City of Delphos: which is the reason that the young daughters of the Bottleans in remembrance of this their original descent went singing in their sellival dances: Go we to Athens.

XXXVI. What hould be the reason that the Elientsprovet; when they chant begins to the bonour of Bacchus, pray-him to come unto them, below real, that is to say, with his Bull foot for the bymn runneth in this form w Pedferbit thee right worthy Lord Bacchus to come unto this haly maritime Temple of thine, accompa-"hied with the Graces," running I fay to this Temple with an Ox or Beefe foot: then for the faburden " Star, of the Song, they redouble; O worthy Bull; O worthy Bull ?

Sit for that some name this god, The son, or begotten of a Cow; and others rearm him Bull; or is the meaning of Both woll, with thy great foot, like as Homer when he called Juno or any other Birnifieth her to have a big and large eye, and by the Epithet Berraior, meaneth one that braggethand boatteth of great matters.

Of father because the foot of a Beefe doth no harm, howsoever horned beasts otherwise be hurtfill and dangerous: therefore they invocate thus upon him, and before it him to come loving and gracious unto them.

Otlastly, for that many are perswaded, that this is the god who taught men first to plow the ground and low corn.

Why hade the Tangrains a place before the City called Achilleum? for it is faid, that Achilles in his life time bare more hatred than love unto this City, as who ravished and stole away Stratonice, the Mother of Poemander, and killed Acestor the Son of Ephippus.

PoEminder the father of Ephippusat what time as the Province of Tanagra, was peopled and in-habited by towns and villages only, being by the Acharans befreged in a place called Stephon, for that he would not go forth with them to war, abandoneth the faid Fort in the night time, and went to build the City Pamandria, which he walled about. The Architect or Mafter builder and went to build the city a differented all his work, and derided it, in so much as in a mockery hee least over the trench; whereat Pamander took such displeasure, and was so highly offended, that he meant to fling at his head a great stone, which lay there hidden of old upon the nightly facilities nemeant to thing at his nead a great tione, which say the amount of disposition nightly sacrifices of Bacchus, But Pamander not knowing to much, pulled it upby force, and threw it at him; and milling Polycrithus, hit his fon Leucippus, and killedhim ontright. Hereupon according to the Law and Custom then observed, there was no remedy but needs he must depart out of Bastia, in manner of an exiled man, and to as a poor tuppliant and thranger to converte, wandring abroad in another country, which was neither fafe nor easie for him to doat that time, considering that the Acheans were up in arms and entred into the country of Tanagra, He sent therefore his son Ephippus unto A. were up in arms and content in the by earnest supplications and prayers prevailed so much, that he entreated both him, and also Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; yea, and Peneleus the son of Hipne curreace out i min, and and i programme to the second of the palament, who were all of their kindred; by whole means Pamander had fafe conduct, and was accompanied as far as the City of Chalcis, where he was affoiled, absolved and purged by Elpenor, for the murder which he had committed. In remembrance of which good turn by those Princes receithe murder which he had committed. ved, he ever after honoured them, and to them all erected Temples ; for which that of Achilles Contimeth unto this day, and according to his name is called Achilleum.

Who be they, whom the Bastians call Pioloes, and who be Æolies. He report goeth that Leucippe, Arsinoe and Alcathie, the daughters of Minyas, being enraged and bestraight of their right wits, longed exceedingly to eat mans sless, and cast lots among themselves, which of them should kill their own children for that purpose. So the lot salting upon Leucippe, the yeelded her fon Hippafar to be differented and cut in pieces: by occasion whereof, their husbands simply arrayed, and in mourning weeds for forsow and griefe were called Pfelors, as one would say, foul and moaky i and the women aware, that is so say, deltracted and troubled in their minds, or Ossaslos: so as even this day the Orchomenians, call those women who are descentions. dedfrom them by those names: and every second year during the festival days called Agrionia, the Priest of Bacchus runneth after them with a sword drawn in his hand, coursing and chasing them: yea, and lawful it is for him to kill any one of them that he can reach and overtake. And verify in our days Zoilus the Priest killed one; but such never come to any good after: for both this Zoilus himself upon a certain little Ulcer or fore that he had tell sick; and after he had a long time pined away and confumed therewith, in the end died thereof; and also the Orthomenians being fallen into publick calamities, and held in general for condemned persons, translated the Priesthood from that rate and linage, and conferred it upon the best and most approved person they could chuse.

What is the cause that the Arcadians stone them to death, who willingly & of purpose enter mithin the powprize and precinits of Lyczum: but if any come into it of ignorance and namures them they fend to E-

A S for these, may it not be that they are held free and absolved who do it upon ignorance; and by reason of this their absolution, this manner of speech arose, to send them to Elaster as which figuiffeth Deliverance: much like as when we fay thus, o's dues six xdear that is to fay, into the region of the secure sor thus, "Ees is a stead o too, that is to say, thou shalt go to the Manour of the Pleasant, Or haply it alludeth to the tale that goeth in this wife : that of Lycann sons there were but two only, to wit, Eleut her and Lebadas, who were not partakers of the horrible crime, that their Father committed in the fight of Jupiter, but fled into Bartia; in token whereof, the Lebadians enjoy fill their burgeosie in commune with the Arcadians; and therefore to Elember a they fend those, who against their wills or unawares are entred within that pourprise consecrate unto Jupiter, into which it is not lawful for any man to go.

Or rather, as Architemus writeth in his Chronicles of Arcadia, for that there were some who be ing ignorantly entred into the faid place, were delivered and yeelded unto the Phliafians, who put them over to the Megarians, and from the Megarians they were carried to Thehet, but as they were transported and conveyed thither, they were stayed about Eleuthera, by means of violent rain tersible thunder, and other prodigious tokens; by occasion whereof, some would have the City to

Moreover, whereas it is faid that the shadow of him who cometh within the precinct of Lycaum, never falleth upon the ground : it is not true, howbeit it goeth generally currant, and is confiantly beleeved for an undoubted truth. But is it not think you, for that the air turneth prefently into dark clouds and looketh obicure and heavy (asit were) when any enter into it : or because, that wholoever cometh into it incontinently, suffereth death. And you know what the Pythagoreans fay, namely that the fouls of the dead cast no shadow nor wink at all,

Or rather for that it is the Sun that maketh shadows, and the law of the countrey bereaveth him that entereth into it, of the fight of the Sun: which coverely, and anigmatically they would give us to understand understhese words: For even he who cometh into this place is called Elaphag; that is to say, a Stag; and therefore Cantharian the Arcadian, who fled unto the Elians of his owner accord to fide with them, at what time as they warred upon the Arcadians; and as he passed with his booty that he had gotten, went through this facred place: when after the war was ended, he returned to Lacedamon; was by the Lacedamonians delivered up to the Arcadians, by direction and commandment of the Oracle, which enjoined them to render the Stag.

XL.
What is that Demi-god in Tanagra, known by the name of Eunostus? And what is the teason that women may not enter within the Grove dedicated unto him?

His Eurostus was the son of Elieus, the son of Cephisus and Scias; so ramed of Eurosta a certain Nymph that nourished and brought him up: who being fair and just withal, was also that, continent, and of an auftere life. Howbeit the report goeth, that one of the daughters of Colloque mamed Ochna, being his Couzen-german became enamoured upon him: but when the had tempted him, and affayed to win his love : Eunoft us repulsed and rejected her with reproachfull teams; and went his way intending to accuse her unto her brethren: which the maiden suspecting and fearing, prevented him and slandered him first before her brethren Ochemus, Leon, and Bucohu, whom she incensed against Eurossius, tstat they would kill him, as one who by force had defloured their fifter. These brethren then having lien in ambush for the young man, murdered him treacheroully a for which fact Elieus cast them in prison; and Ochna her telse repenting of that which hehad done, was much troubled and tormented in mind therefore, being defirous besides to defirether felfe from the griefe and agony which the endured by realon of her love, and withat pitying her brethren imprisoned for her sake, discovered the whole truth unto Eliens and Eliens again unto Collonus: by whose accord and judgement, these brethren of Ochna fled their Country and were banished : but she cast her selfe voluntarily down headlong from an high rock, according as Mytis the Poetresse hath left in verie. And this is the cause, that book the Temple of Eurostus, and allothe Grave about it remained ever after, inaccessible, and not to be approached by women: infomuch as many times when there happen any great Earthquakes, extraordinary droughts, and other fearful and prodigious tokens from Heaven, the Tanagrians make diligent fearch and inquisition, whether there have not been some one woman or other, who secretly hath prefumed to come neer unitative faid place. And some have reported (among whom was one Clidamus a noble and hono-table personage) that they met with Eurossus upon the way, going to wash and cleanse himselse in the Sea. for that there was one woman who had been so bold as to enter into his Sanctuary. And verily Diocles himselfe in a Treatise that he made of Demi-gods, or such worthy men as had been deified, maketh mention of a certain Edict, or Decree of the Tanagrians, touching those things which Clidamus had related unto them.

How cometh it that in the country of Bootia, the river that runneth by Eleon, it called Scamander?

 $D_{\text{Trojan war}}^{Eimachus}$ the fon of Eleon, being a familiar companion with Hercules, was with him at the Trojan war: during the time whereof, continuing as it did very long, he entertained the love of Glaucia the daughter of Scamander, who was first enamoured of him, and so well they agreed together, that in the end she was with child by him. Afterwards it fortuned, so that in skirmish with the Trojans he lost his life: and Glaucia fearing that her belly would tell tales and bewray what she had done, fled for fuccour unto Hercules, and of her own accord declared unto him, how she had been surprised with love, and what familiar acquaintance there had passed between her and Deimachus late deceased. Hereules as well in piry of the poor woman, as for his own joy and contentment ofmind, that there was like to remain some issue of so valiant a man, and his familiar friend befide, had Glaucia with him to his ships: and when she was delivered of a fair son, carried her into the country of Bastia, where he delivered her and her fon into the hands of Eleon. The child then was named Scamander, and became afterwards King of that Country; who furnamed the river Inachus after his own name Scamander, and a little rivulet running thereby, Glancia, by the name of his Mother: as for the fountain Acidusait was so called according to his wives name; by whom hee had three daughters, who are even unto this day honoured in that country, and called by the name of the Virgins,

Whereupon arose this proverbial speech, dula xuela, that is to say, these things shall stand or prevail?

Diso the Captain General of the Tarentines, being a right valiant and hardy warriour, when as rald or Crier proclamed and published with a loud voicethat opinion which prevailed, lifting up his own right hand himself: Yea, but this (quoth he) shall carry it away when all is done. Thus Theophrassus reporteth this narration: but Apollodorus relateth moreover in his Rhytinus, that when the Herald had proclamed thus aufad anters, that is to fay, these be more in number, meaning the voices of the people; Yea, but (quoth he) avia Beariss, that is to fay, these better; and in so doing, confirmed the resolution of those who were in number the fewer. Upon what occasion was the City of the Ithacesians, named Alalcomena?

Most writers have recorded, that Amelia being yet a Virgin, was forced by Siftphus, and con-ceived Unifer. But Hister of Alexandria bath written moreover in his Commentaries, that the being given in marriage unto Laertes, and brought into the City Alalcomenium in Baotia, Was delivered there of Unffee; and therefore he (to renew the memory of that City where he was born, and which was the head City standing in the heart of the Country) called that in Ithaca by the name thereof.

Who be they in the City Ægina, which are called Monophagi?

O F those Æginets, who served in the Trojan war many died in fight, how beit more were drowned by means of a tempest in their voyage at sea. But those sew who returned were welcomed home, and joyfully received by their kinsfolk and friends: who perceiving all their other fellow Citizens to mourn and be in heavinesse, thought this with themselves, they ought not to rejoyce nor offer (actifice unto the gods openly, but in secret: and so, every man apart in his private house, entertained those who were escaped and came home safe with seasts and banquets: and served at the table in their own persons, unto their fathers, their brethren, couzens and friends, with admirsing any fixanger what foever: in imitation whereof they do yer every year factifice unto Neptune in any any manger which fartifices they call Thyai: during which folemnity they do feaff one another privately for the space of states days together with silence, and there is not a servant or slave there present towart at the board: but afterwards for to make an end of their feasting, they celebrate one folerm factifice unto Venus. And thus you may fee why they be called Monophagi, that is to fay, Eating alone, or by themselves.

What is the cause that in the Country of Caria, the image of Jupiter Labradeus is made, halding aloft in his hand an An, and neither a Scopeer nor a Thunder-bole, or Lightning?

Or that Hereules having flain Hippolite the Amazon, and among other arms of hers won her battel Ax, and gave it as a prefent unto Omphale: this Ax, all the Kings that raigned in Lydia after Omebale, carried as an holy and facred monument; which they received fucceffively from hand to Company, Called as a noty made to the model their next progenitors, untill fuch time as Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe, guest tunto one of his friends to carry, afterwards it chanced that Gyges put himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe to arms against Candaules diddaining to bear it himfelfe. daules, and with the help of Arcelis, who brought a power of men to aid him out of Ayles, both defeated him, and also killed that friend of his from whom he took away the said Ax, and put the same into the image of Jupiters hand, which he had made. In which respect he surnamed Jupiter, Later dam, for that the Lydians in their language called an Ax Labra.

Wherefore do the Trallians call the Pulse Ervil Catharter, that isto say, the Purger: and use it more then any other in their expiatory Sacrifices of Purification?

S it for that the Minyans and Lelegians, having in old time diffeized the faid Trallians of their Cities and Territories, inhabited and occupied the fame themfelves? but the Trallians made head afterwards, and prevailed against them, infomuch as those Lelegians who were neither slain in battel, nor escaped by flight, but either for seeblenesse, or want of means otherwise to live, remained fill, they made no reckoning of, whether they died or lived: enacting a law, that what Tallian foever killed either a Lelegian or Minyan, he should be abfolved and held quit, in case he payed unto the next kinsfolk of the dead party, a measure called Medimnia, of the said Ervil.

What is the reason that it goeth for an ordinary by-word among the Elitans to say thus; To suffer more miferies and calamities then Sambicus?

Here was one Sambicus of the City Elia, who by report having under him many mates and complices at command, brake and defaced fundry images and statues of brasse within the City Olympia, and when he had so done, sold the brasse and made money of it: in the end he proceeded Of ar as to rob the Temple of Diana (immaned Epifeopo, that is to lay, a vigilant patronelle and su-perinterdant. This Temple standeth within the City Elis, and is named Aristarchium. After this notorious sacriledge he was immediately apprehended, and put to torture a whole year together, to make him for to bewray and reveal all his companions and confederates : fo as in the end he died in theie torments, and thereupon arose the said common proverb.

What is the reason that at Lucedamon the monument of Ulysses, standeth close to the Temple of the Leu-

Ergiam one of the race descended from Diomedes, by the motion and instigation of Temenus induced, robbed out of Arges the renowned image of Minerua, called Palladium, and that with the privity and affiftance of Leager in this facriledge: now this Leager was one of the familians and inward companions of Temenus: who being fallen out afterwards with Temenus, in a fit of anger, departed to Lacedamon with the faid Palladium: which the Kings there received at his hands nght joyhilly, and placed it neer unto the Temple of the Lencippides i, but afterwards they tent unto the Oracle at Delphos, to know by what means they might keep and preserve the said image in safety: the Oracle made this answer, that they should commit the keeping of it unto one of them who had stollen it away! whereupon they built in the very place a monument in memorial of Ulyffer, wherethey shrined Palladium sand befides, they had the more reason to do; because in some lort Haffer was allied to their City, by his wives fide, Lady Penelope.

What is the reason that the Chalcedonian Dames have a custom among them, that when sever they meet with any men that be finangers unto them, but especially if they he Rulers or Magistrates, to cover and hide one of their cheeks.

He men of Chalcedon warred sometime against their neighbours the Bithynians, provoked therto by all lighe injuries and wrongs that mighe minister matter and occasion thereof: infomuch as in the days of King Zeiperus who raigned over the Bithynians. they affembled all their forces, and with a puissant power (beside of the Thracians, who joined to aid them) they invaded their country with fire and fword, spoiling all before them: until in the end King Zeiparns gave them battel neer unto a place named Phalium, where they lost the day, as well in regard of their presumptuous holdnesse, as of the disorder among them, insomuch as there died of them in fight 8000, men. Howbeit utterly they were not defeated, for that Zeiparns in favour of the Bizantines, was contented so grow unto some agreement and composition. Now for that their City was by this means very much dispeopled and naked of men, many women there were among them, who were confiraland to be remarried unto their enfranchited fervants, others to aliens and firangers comming from other Cities: but fome again, chusing rather to continue widows still and never to have husbands, then to yeeld to such marriages, followed their own causes themselves what matter soever they had to betried or dispatched in open court before the Judges or publick Magistrates; only they withdiew one part of their vaile, and opened their face on one fide: the other wives also who were married again, for modesty and womanhood, following them as better women then themselves, used the same fashion also, and brought it to be an ordinary custome.

Wherefore do the Argives drive their Ewes was the facred grove of Agenor, when they would have the Sirnot for that Agenar whiles he lived, was very expert and skilful about Sheep; and of all the Kings that ever were among them, had the most and fairest flocks of them?

Why do the Argives Children, at a certain festival time that they keep, call one another in play and spore Ballachrades?

Sit because, the first of that nation, who were by Inachus brought out of the mountains into the Iplain and champion country, made their chiefe (ood (by report) of wild hedge-Pears? Now thefe thock-Pears, some say, were found in Peloponnesus, besore they were seen in any other part of Greece, eren whiles that region was called Apia. And hereupon also it came that these wild Pears commonly called Achrades, changing their name into Apioi.

What is the canfe that the Eliens, when their Mares be hot after the Horfe, lead them out of their own confines to be covered by the Stations?

Bit for that Oenomaus was a Prince, who of all others loved best a good race of Horses, and took Igreatest pleasure in these kind of beasts; and curied with all manner of execrations, those Stalions which covered his Mares in Elis? and therefore they fearing to fall into any of these maledictions, avoid them by this manner.

What was the reason of this custom among the Guossaus, that those who took up any money at interest. fnatched it and ran away with all.

WWAs it to this end, that if they should deny the debt, and seem to destand the Usurers, they might lay an action of selony, and violent wrong upon them: and the other by this means might be more punished?

LIV. What is the cause that in the City of Samos they invocate Venus of Dexicreon.

TS it for that, that when in times past the women of Samos were exceedingly given to enormious Iwantonnesse and leachery, so that they brake out into many lewd acts: there was one Dexicreona Mountebank or consening jugler, who by (I wot not what) ceremonies and explatory sacrifices, cured them of their unbridled lust?

Or because this, Dexicreen being a Merchant-venturer who did trasfick and trade by sea, went into the Isle of Cyprus; and when he was ready to load or charge his ship with merchandize, Venus commanded him to fraight it with nothing elie but water, and then immediately to hoise up faile. according to which he did, and having put a great quantity of water within his vessel, he let faile according to which he day, in the falle and departed. Now by that time they were in the main fea, they were very much becalmed, so as and departed, NOW by that this days together, the rest of the mariners and merchants a ship-boord, tor want or a gate of which all die for very thirst: whereupon he fold unto them his water which he thought verny they mount as great quantity of Silver; of which afterwards he cauled to be made an image of Venus, which he called after his own name, Dexicreon his Venus. Now if this betrue, it feemeth that the goddesse purposed thereby, not only to enrich one man, but to save also the lives

How cometh it to passe, that in the Isle of Samos, when they sacrifice unto Mercury survamed Charidotes, it is lawfull for who sever will, to rob and riste all passengers?

Ecause in times past according to the commandment and direction of a certain Oracle, the an-Beient inhabitants departed out of Samos and went into Mycale, where they lived and maintain ned themselves for ten years space by piracy and depredation at sea; and afterwards being returned again into Samos, obtained a brave victory against their enemies.

Why is there one place wishin the Isle Samos called Panæma? Sit for that the Amazones to avoid the fury of Bacchus, fled out of the Ephesians country into Samos and there faved themselves? But he having caused ships to be built and rigged, gathered together agreat fleet, and gave them batrel, where he had the killing of a great number of them about this very place, which for the carriage and quantity of blood-fied there, they who faw it, marwelled thereat, and called it Panama. But of them who were flain in this conflict, there were by the report of some, many that died about Phlaon, for their bones are there to be seen. And there be that fay, that Plan also clave in funder, and became broken by that occasion; their cry was so lond; and their voice so piercing and forcible. LVII.

How commeth it that there is a publick hall at Samos, called Pedetes?

A Fter that Danisteles was murdered, and his monarchy overthrown, so that the Nobles or Senators Geomori, had the whole government of the State in their hands; the Megarians tooke A nators ocement, near the Menting government of the Graen meter manus, the Megarians tooke arms, and made war upon the Perinthians(a Colony drawn & deficended from Samo) carrying with them into the field, fetters and other irons, to hang upon the feet of their captive priloners: the faid Geomori having intelligence thereof, fent them aid with all fpeed, having ten Captains, manned also ocombined thirty (hips ofwar; whereof twin ready to faile, caught fire by lightning, and (is conflued in the very mouth of the Haven; howbeit the forefaid Captains followed on in their voyage with the reft, vanquished the Megarians in battel, and took six hundred prisoners: Upon which victory, being puffed up with pride, they intended to ruinate the Oligarchy of those noble men at home, called Geomori, and to depose them from their government and verily those rulers themselves. ministred unto them occasion, for to set in hand with this their design; namely by writing unto them, that they should lead those Megarians prisoners, festered with the same gives which they themselves had brought: for no sooner had they received these letters, but they did impart and shew them secretly unto the said Megarians, perswading them to band and combine with them, for to reflore their City unto liberty. And when they deviled and consulted together about the execution of this complotted conspiracy: agreed it was between them to knock the rings off or lockers of the fetters open, and fo to hang them about the Megarians legs, that with leather thongs they might be fastened also to their girdles about the waste, for fear that being slack, as they were, they should fall off and be ready to drop from their legs as they went. Having in this wife set forthand dressed these men, and given every one of them a sword, they made all the haste they could to Samos; where being arrived and fet a land, they led the Megarians through the marker place to the Senate house, where all the Nobles called Geomori were assembled and sat in consultation: hereupon was the fignal given, and the Megarians fell upon the Senators, and maffacred them every one. Thus having received the freedom of the City, they gave unto as many of the Megarians as would accept thereof, the right of free Burgeosie: and after that built a fair Town Hall, about which they hung and faltened the faid bolts and fetters of irons, calling it upon this occasion Pederes, that is to fay, the Hall of Fetters.

What is the reason that in the Isle of Coos, within the City Antimachia, the Priest of Hercules being arrayed in the babit of awoman, with a Miter on his head, beginneth to celebrate the sacrifice?

TErcules being departed from Troy with fix thips, was overtaken with a mighty tempest, and with one ship alone (for that all the other was lost) were cast by the winds upon the life of Coos and landed at a place called Laceter having faved nothing else but his armour and the men that were with him in the ship; where finding a flock of sheep, he defired the shepherd who tended them, to give him a Ram. The shepherds name was Antagoras; who being a lusty tall and strong man, would needs challenge Hercules to wreftle with him, upon this condition, that if Hercules could overthrow him and lay him along on the ground, the Ram should be his, Hercules accepted the offer; and when they were close at hand gripes, the Meropians, certain inhabitants of the site cour Amagoras, and the Greeks likewise to aid Heroules, in such fort, as there ensued a sharp and endight: wherein Heroules sinding himselfe to be overlaid and pressed with the multitude of his enemies, retired and fled (as they fay) unto a Thracian woman, where for to hide and fave his life, hediguised himselse in womans apparel. But afterwards having gotten the upper hand of those Meropians, and being purged, he espouled the daughter of Alciopus, and put on a fair robe and goodly flole. Thus you may see whereupon his Priest lacrificeth in that very place where the battel was fought; and why new married spoules being arrayed in the habit of women, receive their brides?

Whereof cometh it, that in the City Megaza, there is alinage or family named Hamaxocylysta?

N the time that the diffolute and infolent popular State of government, called Democratic (which lordained that it might be lawful to recover and arrest all moneys paid for interest and in considetation of uie, out of the Hiurers hands, and which permitted facriledge) bare sway in the City: it hapned there were certain pilgrims, named Theori of Peloponnesus, fent in commission to the Oracle of Apollo at Delphos, who passed thorow the Province of Megaris, and about the City Agiri, neer unto the lake there, lay and tumbled themselves upon their Chariots here and there, together with their wives and children, one with another as it fell out: where certain Megarians, such as were more audacious then the reft, as being thorowly drunk, full of insolent wantonnesse and eruel pride, were so lusty as to overturn the laid Chariots, and thrust them into the lake; so as, many of the said Theori or Commissioners were drowned therein. Now the Megarians (such was the confusion and diforder in their government in those days) made no reckoning at all to pupish this injury and outrage: but the counsel of the Amphyttiones, because the pilgrimage of these Theori was religious and facted, took knowledge thereof and sate upon an Inquistion about it; yea, and chastised those who were found culpable in this impiety: fome with death, others with banishment: and hereupon the whole race descending from them, were called afterwards Hamaxocylysta.

The Paralels, or a brief Collation of Roman Narrations; with the semblable reported of the Greeks.

In the Margin of an old Manuscript Copy, these words were found written in Greek: This Book was never of Plutarchs making, who was an exe cellem and most learned Author; but penned by some odd vulgar writer, alto-gether ignorant both of * Poetry, and also of Grammar.

* Or Lear-

Any do think, that ancient Histories be but Fables and Tales devised for pleasure. For mine own pare having found many accidents in our days, femblable unto those occurrents which in times past fell out among the Romans in their age: I have collected some of them together; and to every one of those ancient Narrations, annexed another like unto it, of her time, and therewith alledged the Authors who have put them down in writing. 1. Daty: Lieutenant General under the King of Perfia, being come down into the plain of Marather within the country of Attica, with a putifiant power of three hundred thousand fighting men, there pitched his camp, and proclamed war upon the inhabitants of those parts. The Athenians making small account of this so great a multitude of Batharians, sent out nine thousand men, under the conduct of these four Captains; namely, Cynegytus, Polyzelus, Callimachus, and Militades. So they firuck a battel, during which conflict, Polyzelus chanced to fee the vision of one represented unto him intpalling mans nature, and thereupon lost his fight and became blind: Callimachus wounded through divers parts of his body with many pikes and javelins, dead though he was, flood upon his feet; and Cynegyrus, as he stayed a Pethan thip which was about to retire back, had both his hands

Ashrabal the King being pollessed of Sicily, denounced war against the Romans: and Metellus bring chosen Lord General by the Senate, obtained a victory in a certain battel against him; in Which battel L. Glauco a Nobleman of Rome, as he held the admiral-ship of Astrubal lost both his hands: as Ariftides the Milefian writeth in the first Book of the Annals of Sicily, of whom Diodorns Siculus hath learned the matter and subject Argument of his History.

2. Xerxes

2. Xerxes being come to lie at anchor neer the Cape Artemissum with five hundred thonsand fighting men, proclamed war upon the people of that country: whereat the Athenians being much aftenied, sent as a fpy (for to view and survey his son. es) Agesslaus the brother of Themisslates; albeit his sather Needes had a dream in the night, and thought that he saw his son dismembred of both his hands; who entring the camp of the Barbarians in habit of a Persian, slew Mardonius one of the Capains of the Kings corpt de guard, supposing he had been Xerxes himselse: and being apprehended by them that were about him, was brought tied and bound before the Kings, who was then even ready to ofter sacrifice upon the Altar of the Sun: into the fire of which Altar, Agesslaus thrust his right hand, and endured the force of the torment, without crying or groaning at all; whereupon the Kings commanded him to be unbound: and then said Agesslaus unto him: Wee Athenians be all of the like mind and resolution, and if you will not believe me, I will put my left hand also into the fire: whereat Xerxes being mightily afraid, caused him to be kept safely with a good guard about him. This writteth Aga harfides the Samian, in his second Book of the Persian Chronicles.

Porfera King of the Tulcans, having encamped on the farther fide of the river Tyber, warred upon the Romans, and by cutting off the victuals and all provision that was wont to be brought to on the Romans, and by cutting off the victuals and when the Senate hereupon was wonderfully trombled: Manines a noble man of the City (taking with him four hundred other brave Gentlemen of his own age, by commission from the Consuls, in poor and simple array) passed over the River. and casting his eye upon the Captain of the Kings guard, dealing among other Captains, victuals and other necessaries, supposing he had been Porfera, killed him: whereu; on he was presently taken and brought before the King, who put his right hand like wise into the fire, and enduring the pains thereof whiles it burned, most stouch, seemed to simile thereat and said: Thou barbarous King, lo how I am loose and at liberty even against thy will: but note well this besides, that we are some hundred of us within thy camp that have undertaken to take away thy life: with which words Porfera was so affighted, that he made peace with the Romans: according as Aristides the Milesan writeth, in the third Book of his Story.

3. The Argives and the Lacedemonians, being at war one with another about the possession of the country Threatis, the Amphilipmen gave lentence that they should put it to a battel, and look whether side won the field, to them should the land in question appertain. The Lacedemonians therefore chose for their Captain Oi bryade: and the Argives, Thersander: when the battel was done, there remained two only alive of the Angives, to wit, Agenor and Chronius, who carried tidings to the City, of victory. Mean while, when all was quiet, Oibryades not fully dead, but having ione little life remaining in him, bearing himtels, and leaning upon the trun, hions of broken lances, caught up the targets and shields of the dead, and gathered them together, and sharing exceed a Trophee; he wrote therupon with his own blood: To Jupiter Victor and Guardian of Trophees. Now when as both those parties maintained still the controverse about the land, the Amphilipones went in person to the place to be eye-judges of the thing, and adjudged the victory on the Lacedemonians side: this written Christones in the third book of the Peloponnesaek History.

The Romans levying war against the Samnites-chose for their chief Commander Posthumina Alexanius, who being surprized by an ambush within a straight between two mountains, called Furia Conditines, a very nirrow passes, lost three of his Legions, and being himself deadly wounded, fell and lay for dead: howbeit about midnight, taking breath, was quick again, and somewhat revived, he arose, took the targets from his enemies bodies that lay dead in the place, and erected a Trophee, and dienching his hand in their blood, wrote in this manner: The Romans, to Jupiter Vistor, Guardian of Trophees, against the Simnites: but Marius surnamed Gwges, that is to say, the glutton, being sent thither asgeneral Captain, and viewing upon the very place, the said Trophees or executed: I take this gladly (quoth he) for a sign and presage of good fortune; and thereupon gave bartel unto his enemies and won the victory, took their King prisoner, and sent him to Roms.

as Ariffides writeth in his third Book of the Italian History.

4. The Perfians entred Greece with a puillant army of 500000, men: against whom Leonidas was fent by the Lacedemonians with a barid of three hundred, to guard the straights of Thermophyle, and impeach his passage: in which place as they were merry artheir meat, and taking their redeating steewhole main power of the Barbarians came upon them. Leonidas (ecing his enemies advancing forward, spake unto his own men and said: Sit still sirs and make an end of your dinner hardly, so as you may take your suppers in another world: so he charged upon the Barbarians and nonwishtanding he had many a dart sticking in his body, yet he made a lane through the presse of the enemies until he came to the very person of Xerxes, from whom he took the Diadem that was upon his head, and so died in the place. The Barbarians King gaused his body to be opened when he was dead, and his heart to be taken forth, which was found to be all over-grown with hair; as writeth Artistate in the first Book of the Persian History.

The Romans warring against the Carthaginians, sent a company of three hundred men under the leading of a Ciptain named Fabiu Maximus, who had his enemies battel, and lost all his men; himfelse being wounded to death, charged upon Annibal with such violence, that he took stom him the regal Diadem or Frontal that he had about his head, and so died upon it, as writteth Arishias

5. In the City of Celane in Phrygia, the earth opened and clave alunder; to as there remained a mighty chink, with a huge quantity of water iffuing thereout, which carried away and drew into the bottomlefie pit thereof, a number of house with all the persons great and small within them. Now Miest the King was advertised by an Oracle, that if he call within the saidpit the most precious thing that he had, both sides would close up again, and the earth meet and be firm ground. So he caused to be thrown into it a great quantity of gold and filter: but all would do no good. Then Anburus his son, thinking with himselle, that there was nothing so precious as the life and soul of man, after he had lovingly embraced his tather, and bid him tarwel, and withal taken his leave of his wise Timothea, mounted on horieback, and cast himselfe horse and all into the said chink. And behold, the earth immediately closed up: whereupon indus made a golden Altar, of Jupiter Idaus, touching it only with his hand. This Altar about that time, when as the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone: but after a certain prefixed time passed, it is seen all gold: this writeth Callishers in his second Book of Transformations.

The river Tybris runneth through the midft of the market place at Rome, for the anger of Jupiter Tas fine caused an exceeding great chink within the ground, which swallowed upmany dwelling houses. Now the Oracle rendered this answerunto the Romans, that this should casel in case they shug into the breach some costly and precious thing: and when they had cast into it both gold and sliver, but all in vain: Carrins a right noble young Gentleman of the City, pondering well the words of the Oracle, and considering with himselie that the life of man was more precious then gold, cast similarly into the said chinks, and so delivered his Citizens and Countrimen from their calamity: this hath Arifides recorded in hisfourtieth Book of Italian Histories,

6. Amphraraus was one of the Princes and Leaders that accompanied Pelynices: and when one day they were leafting merrily together, an Eagle loaring over his head, chanced to catch up his pirelin and carry it up aloft in the air, which afterwards when she had let sall again, stuck saft in the ground and became a lawrel. The morrow after, as they joined battel, in that very place, Amphiraraus with his chariot was swallowed up within the earth; and there standeth now the City Harma, for called of the charioties Trissmachus reporteth in the third book of his Foundations.

During the wars which the Romans waged against Pyrrhus King of the Epirotes, Paulus Amylisuws promised by the Oracle that he should have the victory, it he would set up an altar in that very place where he should see one Gentleman of quality and good mark, to be swallowed alive in the earth, together with his chariot. Three days after Valerius Conatus, when in a dream he thought that he saw himselfe adorned with his Prietly Vestments (for skilful he was in the art of divination) led forth the army, and after he had sain many of his enemies, was devouted quick within the ground. Then Paulus Amylius caused an Altar to be reared and won the battel, wherein he took alive an hundred and threescore Elephants cartying Turrets upon their backs, whom he sen to Roms. This Altar useth to give answer as an Oracle about that time that Pyrrhus was deseated:
according as Crisolaus writeth in the third Book of the Epirotick History.

7. Pyraichnes King of the Euberans, whom Hercules being yet but a young man vanquished, and tying him between two horses, caused his body to be plucked and torn in pieces; which done, he call it forthfor to lie unburied: now the place where this execution was performed, is called at this sig. Pyraichmes his horses, fituate upon the River Heraclius: and when foever there be any horses watered there, a man shall sensibly hear a noise as if horses neighed: thus we find written in the third book entituled, Of Rivers.

Tulius Hossius, King of the Romans, made war upon the Albans, who had for their King Metius Sufrius: and many times he seemed to retire and lie off, as loth to encounter and join battel; as lossing the street of the street o

8. Philip intending to force and fack the Cities of Methone and Olynthus as he laboured with much ado to passe over the River Sandanus, chanced to be shot into the eye with an arrow by an

Olynthian, whose name was After, and in it was this verse written:

Philip beware; have at thine eye:

After this deadt shaft lets flie.

Whereupon Philip perceiving himselfe to be overmatched, swam back againe unto his own company, and with the lose of one eye escaped with life, according as Callist benes reported in the third Book of the Macedonian Annals,

Profess King of the Tulcans lying encamped on the other fide of Tybris, warred upon the Romans: and intercepted their victuals: which were wont to be conveighed to Rome, whereby he put the City to great different in regard of famine: but Horatins Coekis being by the common voice of the people choicen Captain, planted himself upon the wooden bridge, which the Barbarians were defined to gain and for a good while made the place good, and put back the whole multitude of them prefine upon him to pats over it: in the end finding himself overcharged with the enemies, he common maded those who were ranged in bartel-ray behind him, to cut down the bridges mean while he recticed the violent charge of them all, se impea, hed their entrance, until furtitime as he was wounded in the ever with a dart; whereupon he leapt into the river, and swam over unto his fellows: thus Themings reported this parration in the third Book of Italian Histories,

Or Twi

9. There is a tale told of Icarius, by whom Bacchus was lodged and entertained, as Eratofibenes in Erigone hath related in this wife. Saturn upon a time was lodged by an husbandman of the country, who had a fair daughter named Entoria: her he deflowed and begat of her four fons, Janus, Hymnus, Faustus, and Falls; whom he having taught the manner of drinking Wine, and of planting the vine, enjoyned them also to impart that knowledge unto their neighbours, which they did accordingly: but they on the other fide, having taken upon a time more of this drink then their ufual manner was, feil asleep, and slept more then ordinary: when they were awake, imagining that they had drunk some poyson, stoned Icharius the husbandman to death: whereat his Nephews or Daughterschildren took such a thought and conceit, that for very griefe of heart, they knit their necks in halters, and strangled themselves. Now when there was a great pestilence that raigned amone the Romans, the Oracle of Apollo gave answer, that the mortality would ftay, in case they mone to the Romans, the Oracle of Apollo gave answer, that the mortality would ftay, in case they had once appealed the ire of Saurns and likewise pacified their ghosts, who unjustly lost their live, Then Lutatius Catulus, a noble man of Rome, built a Temple unto Saturn, which flundeth neerunto the mount Tarpeins, and erected an Altar with four faces; either in remembrance of those four Nephews abovefaid, or respective to the four seasons and quarters of the yeer; and with al instituted the month January, But Saturn turned them all four into Stars, which be called the forerunners of the Vintage: among which that of Janus ariseth before others, and appeareth at the seet of Vingo. as Critolass teltifieth in his fourth Book of Phanomena, or Apparitions in the Heaven.

10. At what time as the Persians overran Greece, and wasted all the Country before them : Paufanias general Captain of the Lacedamonians, having received of Xerxes five hundred talents of gold, promifed to betray Sparia: but his treason being discovered, Agestlans his Father pursued him into the Temple of Minerva, called Chalciacos, whither he fled for fanctuary; where he caused the doors of the Temple to be mured up with brick, and for familhed him to death. His mother tooke his corps, and cast it forth to dogs, not suffering it to be buried: according to Chryfermus in the fecond Book of his Story.

The Romans warring against the Latins, chose for their Captain Publius Decius. Now there was a certain Gentleman of a noble house howbeit poor, named Cassius Brutus, who for a certain sim of money which the enemies should pay unto him, intended in the night season to set the gates of the City wide open for them to enter m. This treachery being detected, he fled for fanctuary into the Temple of Minerva, lurnamed Auxiliaria; where Caffias his Father, named also Signifer, thut him up and kept him fo long, that he died for very famine; and when he was dead, threw his body forth, and would not allow it any sepulture: as writeth Chronymus in his Italian Histories, we

II Darius King of Persia having fought a field with Alexander the Great, and in that conflict lost feven of his great Lientenants and Governors of Provinces, besides 502, war-chariots armed with renchant fithes, would notwithflanding bid him battel again; but Ariobarcanes his ion, upomapit titul affection that he carried to Alexander, promifed to betray his father into his hands; whereat his father took such displeasure and indignation, that he caused his head to be smitten off. Thus re-porteth Arerades the Gnidian in his third Book of Macedonian Histories.

Brittis being chosen Consul of Rome by the general voice of the whole people, chased out of the City, Tarquinius Superbus who raigned tyrannically; but he retirng himselfe unto the Tufcaus, levied war upon the Romans. The fons of the fail Bruiks conspiring to betray their father, were dil covered, and so he commanded them to be beheaded: as Arifride the Milehan written in his An-

12. Epaminondas Captain of the Thebanes (warred against the Lacedomonians and when the time was come that Magistrates should be elected at Thebes, himselfe in person repaired thither having given order and commandment in the mean while unto his fon Stefenbrous, in nowifeso fight with the enemy. The Lacetherronians having intelligence given them, that the father was ab-feme, reproached and reviled this young Gentleman, and called him coward; wherewith hie was lo galled, that he fell into a great fit of choles, said forgetting the charge that his father had laid upon flim, gave the enemies battel, and atchieved the victory. His father upon his return, was highly offended with his fon, fortransgreffing his will and commandment and after he had fer a victorious Crown upon his head, caused it to bestrucken off, as Cressphon recordeth in theithird Book of the

The Romans during the time that they maintained war against the Samnites, chose for their general captain, Munlius furnamed imperious: who returning upon a time from the camp to Rome, for to be present at the election of Consuls, Araightly charged his son not to fight with the enemies in his ablence. The Samnites hereof advertized, provoked the young gendeman with most spirafull and villanous tearms, reproaching him likewide with cowardizes which he nor able to endute, was To far moved in the end, that he gave them battel and defeated them : but Manting his father when he was returned cut him shorter by the head for its as cestifieth Ariftides the Milehan.

13. Herealesheing denied marriage with the Lady Isle, took the reputie foncer to heart, that he forced and facked the City Occhaita, But Isleftung her felfe headlong down from the wall into the trench under it? howbeit foit foltimed that the wind taking hold of her garments as the fell, bare ther up fo, as in the fall the caught no harm, as witneffeth Nietas of Malea.

The Romans whiles they warred upon the Tulcans, chole for their Commander Valerius Tor-"Hudus; who having a fight of Clusia their Kings daughter, fancied her, and demanded her of him in marriage: but being denied and rejected, he wan the City, and put it to the faccage. The Lady Glufia flung herfelf down from an high tower; but through the providence of Venus, her habillements were so heaved up with the wind, that they brake the fall, and albeit she light upon the ground, she escaped alive. Then the Captain beforenamed, forced her and abused her body: in regard of which difinoror and vilany offered unto her, by a general decree of all the Romans, confined he was into the ille of Corfica, which lieth against Italy: as witnesseth Theophilus in the third Book of his Italian 14. The Carthaginians and Sicilians, being entred into league, banded themselves against the Roman, and prepared with their joynt forces to war upon them; whereupon Metellus was chosen Captain, who having offered facrifice unto all other Gods and Goddeffes, left out onely the Goddefs Vife.; who thereupon raifed a contrary wind to blow againft him in his voyage. Then Cajus Julius. the Southfayer faid unto him, that the wind would lie, in case before he embarked and set fail, he offered in ficrifice his own daughter unto Vefta. Metellus being driven to this hard exigent, was confirained to bring forth his daughter to be facrificed; but the Goddess taking pitty of him and her, instead of the Maiden substituted a yong Heifer, and carried the Virgin to Lavinium, where she made hera Religious Priestress of the Dragon, which they worship and have in great reverence within that City: as writeth Pythocles in his third Book of Italian affairs.

In like manner is the case of Iphigenia, which hapned in Aulis a City of Bastia: reported by Meril-lur in the third Book of Bootian Chronicles.

15. Brennus a King of the Galatians or Gallo-Greeks, as he forrayed and fpoiled Afia, came at length to Ephefus, where he fell in love with a yong Damfel, a Commoners daughter; who promifed to lie with him, yea and to betray the City unto him, upon condition that he would give unto her carquancts bracelets, and other jewels of gold, wherewith Ladies are wont to adom and fee out them-felves. Then Brennus requested those about his person to cast into the lap of this covetous wench, all the golden jewels which they had; which they did in such quantity, that the Maiden was overwhelmed underthem quick, and pressed toldeath with their weight: as Clitopho writeth in the first Book of the Galarian Hutory

Tapeta a Virgin, and yong Gentlewowan of a good house, having the keeping of the Capitol, during the the time that the Romans warred against the Albanes, promised unto their King Tatius, for to give him entrance into the Castle of Mount Tarpeius, if in recompence of her good service, he would bostow upon her such bracelets, rings, and carquanets, as the Sabine Dames used to wear when they trimmed up themfolies in best manner; which when the Sabines understood, they heaped upon het so many, that they buried her quick underneash them: according as Arifides the Milesian reporteth

16. The inhabitants of Tegea and Phonea two Cities, maintained a lingring war one against the other follong, until they concluded in the end to determine all quarrels and controversies by the combat of three Brethren, twins, of either fide. And the men of Tegen put forth into the field for their part, the fons of their Citizens, named Reximachus : and those of Phinea for themselves, the sons of Damo-Aretus. When these Champions were advanced forth into the plain, to perform their devoir, it foruned that two of Reximachus his fons were killed outright in the place; and the third, whose name was Crisclaus, wrought facts a first agem with his three concurrents, that he overcame them all: for making semblance as though he fled, he turned suddenly back, and slew them one after another, as he espied his advantage, when they were singled and severed asunder in their chase after him. At his retum home with this glorious victory, all his Citizens did congratulate and rejoyce with him, onely his own fifter named Demedice, was nothing glad therefore, because one of the brethren, whom he had flain, was espoused unto her, whose name was Demoticus. Critolaus taking great indignation hereats killed her out of hand, The mother to them both fued him for this murther, and required justice; howbeit he was acquit of all actions and indictments framed against him: as writeth Demaratus in the found Book of Arcadian acte.

The Romans and the Albanes having warred a long time together, chose for their Champions to decide all quarrels, three brethren twins, both of the one fide and the other. For the Albanes were three Guriatii, and for the Romans as many Horatii. The combate was no fooner begun, but those of Abalaid two of their adversaries dead in the dust; the third helping himself with a seigned slight, killed the other three one after another, as they divided afunder in pursuit after him ; for which victon, all other Romans made great joy sonely his own lifter Haratia shewed her self nothing well pleased herwith, for that to one of the other side she was betrothed in marriage: for which he made no more alo, but stabled his sifter to the heart: this is reported by Aristides the Milesian, in his Annales of

17. In the City Ilium, when the fire had taken the Temple of Minerva, one of the Inhabitants named Ilus ran thither, and caught the little Image of Minerva named Palladium, which was supposed to have fallen from heaven, and therewith loft his sight, because it was not lawful that the faid Image should be seen by any man; howbeit asterwards when he had appealed the wrath of the faid Goddels, he recovered his eye fight again : as writeth Dercyllus in the first Book of Foun-

Metellus a Nobleman of Rome, as he went towards a certain House of pleasure that he had neer unto the City, was flayed in the way by certain Ravens that flapped and beat him with their wings: At which ominous accident being aftonicd, and prefaging fome evil to be toward him, he returned to Rome; and feeing the Temple of the Goddele Fifth online, be ran thinker and took away the perty Image of Pallas, named Palladium, and so likewife suddenly fell blinde; howbeit afterwards being reconciled unto her, he got his fight again: this is the report of Arifides in his Chronicle.

18. The Thracians warring against the Athenians, were directed by an Oracle, which promifed them victory, in case they laved the person of Godrus King of Athers ; but he disguising himself in the habit of a poor labourer, and carrying a bill in his hand, went into the camp of the enemies, and killell one, where likewish hi was killed by another, and so the Athenians obtained victory : as So-wintern mane recond book of a making war against the Albaner, dreamed in the night, and saw a vision which promised him, that if himself dyed, he should added to the puissance of the Romans: whereupon he charged upon his enemies where they were thickest arranged : and when he had killed a number of them, was himlelf fkiln: Decine also his fon, in the war against the Gauls, by that means faved the Romans ; as faith driftides the Milefian. 19. Cyaniphis a Siracufian born, facrificed upon a time unto sill other gods, but unto Bacibus : whereat the god being offended, hunted him with drunkenness: so as in a dark corner he defloured forcibly his own daughter, named Cyane: but in the time that he dealt with her, the took away the ring off his finger, and gave it unto her nourle to keep, for to teffife another day who it was that this abused her. Atterwards the pestilence reigned fore in those parts: and Apollo gave answer by Oracle.

that they were to offer in facrifice unto the gods that turned away calamities, a godless and incessous person: All others wift not whom the Otacle madde; but Cyane knowing full well the will of Apolly; took her father by the hafe, and drew him per-force to the altar, and when the had caused himto be killed, factificedher felf after upon him : as writeth Dofubene in the third Book of the Chronieles of Whiles the feaft of Bucchus called Bacchanalia was celebrated at Rome, there was one Aruntus, who never in all his life had drunk Wine, but water onely, and always despised the power of god Bacchin : who tobe revenged of him, caused him one time be so drunk, that he forced his own daughter Medullina, and abused her body carnally; who having knowledge by his ring, who it was that did the deed, and taking to her a greater heart then one of her age, made her father one day druhk, and after she had a formed his head with Garlands and chaplets of flowers, led him to a place called the altar of Thunder, where with many tears the facrificed him who had furprized her, and taken away her virginity, as weiteth Ariftides the Milefian in I irthird Book of Italian Chronicles.

20. Erechtheus warring upon Eumolpus, warndvertifed that he should win the victory, if before he went into the field he facrificed his own daughter unto the gods : who when he had imparted this matter unio his wife Phraxithea, he offered his daughter in facrifice before the battel; hereof Emipides makeen mention in his Tragedy Erechtheus.

Marius maintaining war against the Cimbrans, and finding himself too weak, saw a vision in his fleep, that promifed him victory, if before he went to battel, he did facrifice his daughter named Gillpurmia: who setting the good of the weal publike, and the regard of his Countreymen, before thenatural affection to his own blood, did accordingly, and wan the field; and even at this day, two Altais there be in Germany, which at the very time and hour that this Sacrifice was offered, yeld the found of Trumpets, as Doretheus reporteth in the third Book of the Annales of

21. Cyampus a Theffalian born, used ordinarily to go on hunting; his wife a yong Gentlewoman chiertained this fancy of jealoufie in her head, that the reason why he went forth fo often, and flayed folding in the forrest, was because he had the company of some other woman whom he loved: whereupon the determined with her felf to lie in espial : one day therefore the followed and traced Cyanippus, and at length lay close within a certain thicket of the forest, waiting and expecting what would fall out and come of it. It chanced that the leaves and branches of the shrubs about her stirred; the hounds imagining that there was some wilde Beast within, seized upon her, and so tare in pieces this young Dime (that leved her husband is well) as if the had been a favage Beaft. C) anippus then feeing before his eyes, that which he never would have imagined or thought in his minde, for very grief of heart killed himfelf: as Parthenites the Poet ha h left in writing.

In Sybaris à City of Italy, there was fometime a yong Gentleman named Æmilius, who being abeautiful perfor, and one who loved passing well the game of hunting, his wife who was yong also, thought him to be enamored of another Lady; and therefore got herself close within a thicket, and chanced to flir the boughs of the shrubs and bushes about her. The hounds thereupon that ranged and hunted thereabour, light upon her, and tare her body in pieces; which when her husband faw, he killed himself upon her: as Clytonimus reporteth in his second Book of the Sybaritick

22. Smyrna the daughter of Cerynas having displeased and angred Venus, became enamored of her own father, and declared the vehemence of her love unto her nourse. She therefore by a wily device went to work with her Master, and bare him in hand that there was a fair Damsel, a neighbors daughter, that was in love with him, but abalhed and alhamed to come unto him openly, or to be feen at all with him . The Mafter believed this, and lay with her; but one time above the rell, defirous to know who the was with whom he accompanied, called for a light; and to foon as he knew it was his own daughter, he drew his fword, and followed after this most vilancus and incessions filth, intending to kill her: But by the providence of Venus, transformed she was into a Tree, bearing her name, to wit, Myrtle; as Theodorus reporteth in his Metamorphofes or Transmi-

Parallels of Romans and Greeks.

Waleria Tusculanaria, having incurred the displeasure of Venus; became amorous of her own father, and communicated this love of hers unto her noule: who likewife went cunningly about her Mafter, and made him believe that there was a yong Maiden, a neighbors childe, who was in fancy with him, but would not, in regard of modeftie, be known unto him of it, nor be feen when she should frequent his company. Howbeit her father, one night being drunk, called for a candle: but the Nourse prevented him, and in great hafte wakened her : who fled thereupon into the Countrey great with prevente and presente childe; where the caft her felf down from the pitch of a fleep place, yet the fruit of her womb lived: cames, we want to the did not miscarry, but continued full with her great belly; and when her time was come, delivered she was of a son, such an one as in the Roman language is named Sylvanat unit of treek Ægipanes. Valerius the father took füch a thought thereupon, that for very angulhof minde he threw himself down headleng from a steep rock: as recordeth Aristides the Milesian in the third Book of Italian Histories.

her Uncles by the Mother fide, offended hereat, would have taken allaway from the Damofel : But he took such displeasure thereat, that he slew his Kinsmen; and his Mother for to be revenged of his Brethrensdeath, buried the cursed spear: as Menylus reporteth in the third Book of the Italian Historics.

27. Telamon the sone of Eacus and Endeis, fled by night from his father, and arrived in the life of Enbag, * * The father perceiving it, and supposing him to be one of his Subjects, gave his daughter to one of his guard, for to be cast into the Sea ; but he for very commisseration and pitty, fold her to certain Merchants; and when the thip was arrived at Salamis, Telamon chanced to buy her at their hands, and the bare unto him Ajax; witness Aretados the Gnidian, in the fecond Book of his

Lucius Trocius had by wife Patris, a daughter named Florentia: her Calphurnius a Roman defloured. whereupon he commanded the yong maid-childe which she bare, to be cast into the sea; but the Souldier who had the charge fo to do, took compassion of her, and chose rather to sell her unto a Merchant; and it fortuned fo, that the ship of a certain Merchant arrived in Italy, where Calpburinus bought her, and of her body begat Contruscus.

28 Elu King of Tuskan, had by his wife Amphithea fix daughters, and as many fons; of whom Macareus the yongest, for very love defloured one of his fifters, who when the time came brought forth a childe; when this came once to light, her father fent unto her a fword, and the acknowledging the faule which she had committed, killed herself therewith, and so did afterwards her brother Macareus; as Softratus reporteth in the second Book of the Turcan story.

Papyrius Volucer, having espoused Julia Pulebra, had by her six daughters, and as many sons: the eldest of whom named Papyrius Romanus, was enamored of Canulia, one of his fifters, as she was by him with childe; which when the father understood, he sent unto her likewise a sword, wherewith the made away herself; and Romanus also did as much: thus Chrisppus relateth in the first Book of the Italian Chronicles. 29. Arifymus the Ephchan, son of Demofratus, hated women, but most unnaturally he had to do with ashe-Ale, which when time came, brought forth a most beautiful maid-childe, sirnamed Onos-celic: as Ariffotle writeth in the fecond Book of his Paradoxes, or ftrange Accidents.

Fulvius Stellus was at war with all women, but yet he dealt most beastly with a Mare, and she bare unto him after a time, a fair daughter, named Hippona; and this is the Goddels forfooth that hath the charge and overfeeing of Horses and Marcs: as Agefilaus hath set down in the third Book of Italian

30. The Sardians warred upon a time against the Smyrneans, and encamped before the walls of their City; giving them to underfand by their Ambassadors, that raise their siege they would not, unless they sent unto them their wives to lie withal: The Smyrneans being driven to this extremity, were at the point to do that which the enemies demanded of them: but a certain waitingmaiden there was, a fair and well favoured Damofel, who ran unto her mafter Philarchus, and faid unto him, that he muft not fail, but in any case chuse out the fairest Wenches that were maidservants in all the City, to dreis them like unto Citizens wives, and free born women, and so to fend them unto their enemies in stead of their Mistresses, which was effected accordingly; and when the Sardians were wearied with dealing with these Wenches, the Smyrneans issued forth, furprized and spoiled them; Whereupon it cometh, that even at this day, in the City of Smyrna there's a folemn Feast named Eleutheria; upon which day, the maid-servants wear the apparel of their Miffresses which be free-women : as faith Dosithens in the third Book of Lydian Chro-

Antepomarus King of the Gauls, when he made war upon the Romans, gave it out flatly, and faid, that he would never diflodge and break up his Camp, before they fent unto them their wives, for to have their pleasure of them: but they by the countel of a certain chamber-maid, sent unto them their. maid-fervants: The Barbarians meddled fo long with them, that they were tired, and fell found affeep in the end: then Rherana (for that was her name who gave the faid counfel) took a branch of a wilde fig-tree; and mounting up to the top of a rampier wall, gave a fignal thereby to the Conful, who fallied forth and defeated them : Whereupon there is a Feastival-day of chambermaids ; for so saith Ariflides the Milefian, in the first Book of the Italian History.

31. When the Athenians made war upon Eumolpus, and were at some default of victuals, Pyrander, who had the charge of the munition, and was Treasurer of the State (for to make spare of the provision) diminished the ordinary measure, and cut men short of their allowances : the inhabitants, suspecting him to be a Traytor to his Countrey in so doing, stoned him to death; as Califratus testifieth in the third Book of the Thracian History.

The Romans warring upon the Gauls, and having not sufficient flore of victuals, Cinna abridged the people of their Ordinary measure of corn: the Romans suspecting thereupon that he made way thereby to be King, floned him likewise to death: witness Aristides in his third Book of Italian

32. During the Peloponnefiack war, Pififiratus the Orchomenian, hated the Nobles, and affice ed men of base and low degree; whereupon the Senators completted and resolved among themfelves to kill him in the Councel-house, where they cut him in pieces, and every one put a gobbet of him in his bosom, and when they had so done, they scraped and cleansed the floor where his

The plague was fore in Falerii, the contagion thereof being very great, there was given out an Ora-cle, That the faid affliction would flay and give over, if they facrificed yearly a yong maiden unto Juno: and this superstition continuing always still, Valeria Luperca was by lot called to this sacrifice: now and this fupertition continuing aways min, y arms Experie was by not cannot to this tarctinee. I now when the fowerd was ready drawn, there was an eagle came down out of the air, and carried it away, and upon the altar where the fire was burning laid a wand, having at one end in manner of a little mallet: as for the fowerd, the laid upon a yong Heifer, feeding by the Temple fide; which when the yong Damfel perceived, after the had facrificed the faid Heifer, and taken up the mallet, the went from house to house, and gently knocking therewith all those that lay fites, rating them up; and faid to every one; to ment that excite a third art his moderate which when the moderate is made the properties of the control of the start of the start of the day the moderate when the moderate when the start of third art his moderate when the moderate when the start of the day this moderate when the moderate when the start of the day this moderate when the start of the B: whole, and receive health: wherenpon it cometh that even at this day this mysteric isstill performed and observed; as Arifides hath reported in the 919. Book of his Italian Histories.

36. Phylonome the daughter of Nydimus and Arcadia, hunted with Diana; whom Mars disguised like a Shepherd, got with childe. She having brought forth two Twins, for fear of her father threw them into the River Erymanibus; but they by the providence of the gods, were carried down the fiream without harm or danger, and at length the current of the water cast them upon an hollow oak, grow-ing up on the bank side, whereas a she-Woolf having newly kennelled had her den. This Woolt turned out her whelps into the River, and gave fuck unto the two Twins above faid: which when a flepherd named Tyliphus once perceived, and had a fights of, he took up the little Infants, and caused them to be nourished as his own children, calling the one Lycaftus, and the other Parrasius, who successive

Amulius bearing himselfinsolently and violently like a Tyrant, to his brother Numitor: first killed his son Enine as they were hunting; then his daughter Sylvia he cloistered up as a religious Nunto serve Juno. She conceived by Mars; and when the was delivered of two Twins, consessed the truth unto the Tyrant; who standing in sear of them, caused them both to be cast into the River Tybris; where they were carried down the water unto one place, whereas a fine Woolf had newly kennelled with her yong ones: and verily her own whelps the abandoned and cast into the River, but the Babes the fuckled. Then Fanitus the shepherd chancing to espy them, took them up and noursshed as his own; cal-ling the one Remus, and the other Remulus: And these were the sounders of Rome City: According to Ariftides the Milefian in his Italian Histories.

37. After the destruction of Troy, Agamemum, together with Cassandra, was mudered; but Orestes who had been reared and brought up with Stropbius, was revenged of those murderers of his father: as Pyrander saith in his four Book of the Peloponnesian History, Fabius Fabricanus, descended lineally from that great Fabius Maximus, after he had won and lacked Tuxing, the capital city of the Samnites, fent unto Rong the Image of Fenny Victories, which was to highly honored and worthipped among the Samnites. His wife Fabig had committed adultery, with a fair and well favored yong man, named Perronius Valentinus, and afterwards treacheroafly killed her hurband. Now had Fabia his daughter faved her brother Fabricianus, being a very little one, out of hindand. Now had rote in stanguer term for the representation, entire very interiors, out of danger, and first hin away factorly to be nourished and brought up. This youth when he came to age, killed both his mother and the adulterer also; for which act of his, acquis he was by the doom of the Senate: as Desiries delivereth the flory in the third Book of the Iralian Chronicles.

38. Businis the source Neptunes, and Anippe shughter of Nilvas, under the colour of pretended holisistily, and counterpurperstring of strangers that to facilities all guillengers; but Diring justice mas with him in the end, and revenged their death: For Harries for upon him and killed him with his clubs.

as Agathon the Santian hath written.

Hercules as he drave before him thorow Italy, Geryons kine, was lodged by King Faunus the fon of Mercury, who yied to facrifice all ftrangers and gueffe to his father : but when he meant to do fo unto Hercules, was himself by him flain a sa writesh Despilus in the third Book of the Italian Histories.

In his passesser in a resource response recognitive pain fush as sailed by or came unto him: and Perillus (who by his profession) was a skilled Brafe founder, had framed as liefer of brafs, which hagave muo this king, that he might burn quick in it the faid stranger. And verily in this one thing did this Tyrant shew himself just; for he caused the Artificer himself to be put into it : and the faid deifer seemed too low, whiles he was burning within : as it written in the third Book of Canles.

In Agefta a City of Sicile, there was sometime a cruel Tyrant, named Amilius Cenforinus, whose manner was to reward with rich gifts those who could invent new kindes of Engines to purmento torure: fo there was one named Aruntius Paterculus, who had devised and forged a Branco horse; and presented it unto the fordsaid Tyrans, that he might put inta it whom he would. And in truth the first act of justice that ever he did was this, that the party himself, even the maker of it gave the first hanfel thereof; that he might make tryal of that torment himfelf, which he had devifed for others. Him also he apprehended afterwards, and caused to be thrown down headlong from the hill Tarprius It should feem also that such Princes as reigned with violence, were called of him Emylii: for so Aristides reporeth in the fourth Book of Italian Chronicles.

40. Euenus the fon of Mars and Sterope, took to wife Alcippe daughter of Oenemaus, who bere unto him a daughter, named Marpille, whom he minded to keep a Virgin fill ; but Aphareus feeing her, carried her away from a dance, and fled upon it. The father made fuit after, but not able to recover her: for very anguish of minde, he cast himself into the River of Lycormus, and thereby was immogralized: as faith

Defithery in the fourth Book of his Italian History.

Anius King of the Tuekans, having a fair daughter, named Salia; looked ftraightly unto her that the should continue a Maiden: but Cathetus one of his Nobles, seeing this Damosel upon a time as the difforted her felf, was enamored of her, and notable to suppress the furious passion of his love, ravisled her, and brought her to Rome. The father pursued after; but seeing that he could not overtake them, threw himself into the River, called in those days Pareusus, and afterwards of his name Anio. Now the faid Cathetus lay with Salia and of her body begat Salius and Latinus; from whom are descended the noblest Families of that Countrey: as Aristides the Milesian, and Alexander Polibiftor write, in the third Book of the Italian History.

At. Eggitatus, an Ephelian born, having murdered one of his kinfmen, fied into the City Delphi, and demanded of Apollo in what place he should dwell: who made him this answer, That he was to inhabit there, whereas he faw the Peafants of the Countrey dancing, and crowned with Chaplets of Olive-Branches. Being arrived therefore at a certain place in Afia, where he faw the rural people crowned with Garlands of Olive leaves, and dancing; even there he founded a City, which he called

Elent: a system to the Salman waters at the first about or in occupinas.

Telegome the fon of Ulyffe by Girce, being fent for to feek his father, was advised by the Oracle to build a City there, where he should find the ruftical people and husbandmen of the Countrey, crowned with Chaplers, and dancing together: when he was arrived therefore at a certain coast of listing feeing the Peafants adorned with boughs and branches of the wilde Olivetree, passing the time merrify, and the pearant of the salman substants he built a City, which many that occurrent the named Priville and the property of the pearant of the salman substants and the pearant of the salman substants and the salman substants are salman substants. and dancing together: he built a City, which upon that occurrent he named Prinefis; and attenuards the Romans altering the letters a little, called it Prinefie: as Ariforti hath written in the third Book of the Italian Hiftory.

ANTIPHON.

Nipho the fon of Saphilus, and born in the Borough and Corporation of Rhamnus, was A prought up as a Spholar under his own father, who kept a Rhetorick School; whereunto Actibiades also (by report) was wont to go and refort when he was a yong Boy, who having gotten fufficiency of speech and elegimence, as fome think by himself (such was the quickness of his wit, and inclination of his nature) he betook himself to affaire of State: and yet he held a School nevertheless, where he was at some difference with Socrates the Philosopher in matter of Learning and Oratory, not by way of contention and emulation, but in manner of reprehension, and findfault with some points as Xenophon testifieth in the first Book of his Commentaries, as touching the deeds and fayings of Socrates. He penned Orations for some Citizens at their request for to be pleaded and and tayings or owners. The primed data is given out by fome, was the first who gave him felf to this pronounced in Judicial Courts: and as it is given out by fome, was the first who gave him felf to this pronounced in Justice to do: for there is not extant one Oration written in manner of a Plea, by any courfe, and proteffed fo to do: for there is not extant one Oration written in manner of a Plea, by any Course, and profession of a reason and of the course of the course who lived before his time, no, nor by those shart flourished in his days (for it was not the man-Oration who need before his time, no, not by those state to the mandate at the ways (10. It was not the manyet and cultom to compose Orations for others) Themistocles(I mean) Periods & Aristides; not with flandyet and continued to compose of the continued of the cont ing that the time pretend that they thus abhained, as it may appear by that which Bifforians have writupon their intulties they that a bovementioned. Moreover, if we look into the most ancient Oratou ten of every one of these men abovementioned. whom we can call to minde, to wit, Alcibiades, Critias, Lyfias and Archinous, who have written whom we can can to minute, to wat, the fame form and manner of pleading; it will be found that one and the fame file, and exercised the fame form and manner of pleading; it will be found that one and the name they all converted and conferred with Antiphon, being now very aged and far flept in years : for beeney an conversed and conserved with Annyons, being a man of an excellent quick and ready wit, he was the first that made and put forth the Institutions mg a man of an extending quite annual knowledge he was furnamed Nefter. And Cecilius in a cerons of Ocatory; fo as, for his profound knowledge he was furnamed Nefter. And Cecilius in a cerons of Ocatory; ons of Octory's 10 as, on this projection, conjectureth, that he had been formetime Schoolmaster to tain Treatife which he compiled of him, conjectureth, that he had been formetime Schoolmaster to tain a reasse which he compared of that Antipbo is so highly commended by him. In his Speeches and Thury dide; the Historigrapher 5 for that Antipbo is so highly commended by him. Thurydides the Hittorigrapher; for that Antippe is to ingust confuctions by min. In his opercities and Orations he is very exquifite and full of perfusion, quick and fabril in his inventions: in difficult matters very artificial, affailing his adverfary after a covert manner; turning his words and favings matters very attitudes, and to move affections withal, aiming always to that which is decent and fem-ly, and carrying the best apparance and shew with it. He lived about the time of the Persian war, when Gergias Leontinus the great Professor in Rhotorick flourished, being somewhat yonger then he was; and he continued to the subversion of the popular State and Government, which was wrought by the 400 Conspirators, wherein himself feenpulsar orate and Government, which was wrongen by the Company of two great Gallies at Sea, to have had a principal hand, for that he had the charge and command of two great Gallies at Sea, to nave nau a principal using, for the ne and the leading of certain Forces: during which time newon the vi-and was befides a Captain, and had the leading of certain Forces: during which time newon the viand wer bentue a Capetain, and procured unto them the ayd of many Allies: also he moved the yong clory in divers Battels, and procured unto them the ayd of many Allies: also he moved the yong ctory in civers patters, and proceded times there are a surface and item moved the yong and luftic able man of war to take arms; he rigged, manned, and fet out fixty Gallies, and in all their occasions was font Ambastader to the Lacedemonians, when as the City Ections was fortified with a wall: but after that those 400 beforefaild were put down and overthrown, he was together with Arwan: Durates that the sound of the 40 o. accused for the Conspiracy, condemned and adjudged to the punishment which is due unto Traytors. His corps was cast forth without separature; himself and all his posteroid. rity registred for infamous persons upon record : and yet some there be who report, that he was put to death by the thirty Tyrants, and namely among the reft, Lyfias teffifieth as much in a Oration which he made for Antiphoes daughter; for a little (daughter he had, unto whom Callefebrus made claim in right for his wife : and that the thirty Tyrants were they who put him to death, Theopen, beareth witness in the fifteenth of his Philippicks. But more modern surely was this man, and of a *or, Simo latertime, yea and the son of *Lyfidonides, of whom Crainus maketh mention, as of no wicked man in his Comedy called Pyrine. For how should be who before was executed by those 400, return to life again in the time of the thirty Ufurpers or Tyrants : but his death is reported otherwife, name ly, that being very aged, he failed into Gieily, when as the Tyramile of the former Denys was at the highest: and when the question was proposed at the table, which was the best brass? as some fail this, and others that : He answered, that for his part he thought that brass was best, whereof the statures of Harmodius and Arifogiden were made: which when Denys heard, he imagining that the speech imported thus much covertly, sato fet on the Syraculians. For to attempt fome violence upon his per-fon, commanded him to be put to death. Others report, that the faid Tyrant gave order that he flould be made away, upon indignation that he skoffed at his Tragedies.

There be extant in this Orators name threefcore Orations; whereof as Cecilius faith, five and twenty are untruly reported to be his. Noted he is, and taxed by Plato the Comical Poet; rogether twith P fander, for avarice and love of money. It is faid moreover, that he composed certain Trage-ties alone, and others with Diorificis the Tyrant, who joyned with him. At the fametime also when dies alone, and others with Diorificis the Tyrant, who joyned with him. At the fametime also when he gave his minde unto Poetry, he devised the art of curing the griefs and maladies of the minde, like as Physicians pretend skill for to heal the diseases and pains of the body. Certes, having built a little house at Corintb in the Market-place, he set up a bill on the gate, wherein he made profession, That he had the skill to remedy by words, those who were vexed and grieved in spirit: and he would dea mand of those who were amile, the causes of their forrow, and according thereto, to apply his comforts and confolations. Howbeit afterwards supposing this art and profession to be too base and mean for him, he turned his fludy to Rhetorick, and taught it. Somethere be who attribute unto Anispho the Book of Glaues the Rhegine as couching Poess; but principally is that Treatife commended which he made unto Hereditus; as also that which is dedicated to Erasistratus touching the Idea's; and the he made unto Hereditus; as ano that which is genicated to Ergiptratus touching the idea is and on Oration of Message which he penned for his own felf; and another against Demosthene; the Cappin, which he named Paramomon, for that he charged him to have broken the Laws. Also another Oration he wrote against Hipportaise the General Commander, and caused him to be condemned for histonium and the failed to answer at the day assigned for his tryal, that very year when Theoponium was Provost of the City, under whom the four hundred Conspirators and Usurpers of the common was were put down and overthrown. Now the decree of the Senate, by vertue whereof ordained it was That Antiphon (hould be judicially tryed and condemned, Cecilius hath put down in these terms. The one and twentieth day of Prytaneia, when Demonicus of Alopect, was Secretary or Publike Notary, Phi-lestratus of Pellene Chief Commander, upon the proposition or bill preferred by Andron: The Senate hath ordained as touching these persons; namely, Archirtolemus, Onomacles and Antiphon, whom the Captains have declared against; that they went in ambessage unto Lacedemon, to the loss and detriment of the City of Athens, and departed from the Camp, first in an enemies ship, and so passed by land by Decelia; that their bodies should be attached and cast into pisson, for to abide justice and punishment according to law. Item, that the Captains themselves, with certain of the Senate, to the numher of ten, fuch as it pleased them to chuse and nominate, should make presentment, and give in evidence, that upon the points alledged and proved, judgement might pais according. Item, that the The should call for the said persons judicially, the very next morow after they were committed and convent them before the Judges, after that they be chosen by lot: when and where they should ac-ouse the Captains, with the Orators abovesaid, of Treason; yea, and whosever else would come in, he should be heard. Item, when sentence is concluded and pronounced against them, then the judgement of condemnation shall be executed according to the form and tenure of the law established, in case of Traytors. Under the instrument of this decree, was subscribed the condemnation of Treason in this manner: Condemned there were of Treason, Archiptolemus the son of Hippodamus of Agryle, presents Antiphon the fon of Sopbilus, of Rhamus, likewife present; and awarded it was by the Court, that thefe two should be delivered over into the hands of the eleven Executors of Justice; their goods to be confiscate, the difm whereof to be consecrate unto the Goddels Minerva; their houses to be demolifted and pulled down to the very ground; and upon the borders of the plots wherein they flood, this State . Also, that it might not be lawful to enter to bury the body of Archiptolemus, and Of Archiptolemus, and of Arben within the City of Athens, nor in any part belonging to their Dominion or Territory. That their memory should be infamous, and all their posterity after them, as well Bastards as Legitimate; and that wholoever adopted any one of Archiptolemus or Amiphons children for his fon, himfelf should be held infa us. Finally, that all this should be engrossed and engraven in a column of brafe, wherein also should be fet down the Sentence and Decree which passed as concerning Phry-

ANDOCIDES. Il.

A Ndecides was fon of that Leaguras, who semetime made a peace between the Athenians and the Lacedemonians; born in the Tribe of Conductors on Themselves Houle, and as Hellanicus faith, even from Mercury; for the race of the Ceryces that is, Heraules pertaineth unto him; and therefore chosen he was upon atime with Glaucon, for to go with a flees of twenty fail, to aid the Corcyreans, who warred upon the Corinthians. But after all this, accused he was of impicty and irreligion; for that he with others had mangled and defaced the Images of Marcury, that flood within the City: Also for that he had trespassed against the holy mysteries and facred ceremonies of Ceres; in as much as being before time a wilde youth, and loofely given, he went in a makene night, and brake certain Images of the god Mercury; whereupon (I fay) he was judicially convented. And because he would not deliver and bring forth to be examined upon torture, that fervant of his, whom his accusers called for, he was held accains and convict of that crime which was laidso his charge; yea, and for the fecond imputation charged upon him very deeply suspected: for which also he was called into question, not long after the fetting forth of the great Armada at sa which went into Sicily, when the Corinthians had sent certain Ægestans and Leontines, into the City of Albers, unto whom the Athenians privately were to yield aid and fuccour, in the night feafon they brake all the Images of Mercury which flood about the Market-place; as Cratippus faith. Well, being suspected for offending against the facred mysteries of Ceres, and thereupon judicially called to his anfwer, he escaped judgement of condemnation, and was acquit; so that he would discover and declare the delinquents and offendors indeed. Now having employed his whole findy and endeavor thereabout, he wrought fo, that he found out those who were faulty as touching the facred mysteries aforefaid, among whom was his own father. As for all the rest, when they were convicted, he caused them to be put to death; onely his fathers life he faved, although he was already in prifor; promiting withal that he would do much good fervice unto the common-weal, wherein he falled not of his word. For Leagor as accused many who had robbed and embezelled the Cities Treasure, and committed other wicked parts, by the means whereof he was abfolved.

Now albeit Andocides was in great name and reputation for managing the affairs of commonweals yet nevertheless he set his minde to traffick and merchandize at sea; whereby he got amity, and entred into league of hospitality, with many Princes and great Potentates, but principally with the King of Cyrus: and it was then, that he ftole and carried away a Citizens childe, the daughter of Arigidas, and his own Neece, without the privity and confent of her friends, and fent her closely for a prefent to the faid King of Coprus: but when he was upon the point to be called in queftion judicially for when he was upon the point of be cancel in quenton justing a plant of the her privily away again out of Cyprus, and brough the home to Athens: Hereupon the King of Cyprus caufed hands to be laid upon him, where he was kept in prifon; but he brake loofe, and creaped to Athens, at the very time when the four hundred Configurators and Ulimpers governed the State: and being by them east into prison, he got away again when the said Olygarchie was diffolved. Howbeit he was driven out of the City, when the thirty Tyranoruked all, and uturped their Government. During which time of his exile, he abode in the City of Elis:

but when Ibrafibulus and his adherents returned into the City, he also repaired thither, and was sent in an ambasse to Lacedemon; where being taken again in a trip, he was for hissill demeanor banished.
All these premises appear evidently by his Orations which he hath written; for in some of them we finde how he answereth to those imputations which were charged upon him for violating of the foresaid holy mysteries: in others, he generally craveth for the favour of the Judges, and standeth upon the tearms of mercy: there is an Oration also of his extant, as touching the appeaching or discovery of those, who were faulty for those sacred ceremonies; as also his Agologic or defence against Phears,
of those, who were faulty for those sacred ceremonies; as also his Agologic or defence against Phears,

LYSIAS. III.

Thas the fon of Cephalus, the fon of Lysianias, who had likewise for his father Cephalus, bornin

Syracuse, but he went to dwell at Albens, partly for the affection that he bare to the City, and in part through the perswasion of Pericules the son of Xantippus, who being his friend and guest, perswaded him thereto; and the rather, for that he was a mighty man there, and exceeding rich: or as fome thinks he came to Athems, by occasion that he was banished out of Syracuse, at what time as the City thinks he came to Athems, by occasion that he was banished out of Syracuse, was tyrannically oppressed by Gelon: so he arrived at Atheus that yeer, wherein Philocles was Provost next after Phrasicles, in the second yeer of the 82. Olympias: at his first coming brought up he was, and taught with the noblest Athenians; but after that the City sent out the colony of Sybaris, which afterwards was named Thurii, he went with his eldeft brother Polemarchus (for he had befides him two other brethren, Eudemns and Brackillus, their father being now departed this life) to have his part fet out and alloted unto him out of his fathers lands, being not fifteen yeers old, that very year when as Praxiteles was Provost: where he remained, and was instructed by Nicias and Tissas, two Syracusans, Now having bought him an house, with the portion of land which fell unto his share, he lived there, in flate of a Citizen, and was called to government of common-weal, when his lot came, for the space of 63 years, until the time that Clearchus was Provost of Athens: but the year next following, when Callias was Provost, namely, in the 92 Olympias, when as the Sicilians and Athenians fought a field, by reason whereof many of their Allies stirred and revolted, and especially those who dwelt in Italy, and coasted thereupon, accused he was to have favored the Athenians, and sided with them, and thereupon was banished with three other. Now being arrived at Athens, in the yeer wherein Callias was Provost next after Cleceritus, while the four hundred Usurpers were possessed of the State, he there rested : but after the naval battel was stricken neer to a place called the Goats Rivers, when as the thirty Tyrante had the administration of the common-weal in their hands, banished he was from thence for the space of seven yeers, loft his goods and his brother Polemarchus; himself escaped with life narrowly out of the house at a postern gate, or back-door; in which house he had been best with a full purpose that he should end his life there ; and then he retired himself to the City Megera, where he abode. When as those of Phila had made a re-entry into the City, and chased out the Tyrange; for that he shewed himself (above all others) most forward in this enterprize, as having contributed (for the exploiting of this service) two thousand dragmes weight in filver, and two hundred targuets; and beingstent besides with Herman, waged three hundred and two Souldies, and wrought: so effectually with Ibrassless the Elian, his friend and old host, that he helped him unto gertain talenta of filver in regard whereof, Torafibulus (upon his return and re-entry into the City) unto gertain talenta of filver in regard whereof, Torafibulus (upon his return and re-entry into the City) proposed unto the people's That for and in confideration of these good services, the right of free Burproposed unto the people's That for and in confideration of these good services, the right of free Burproposed unto the people's That for any other people is the people of the geofie should be granted unto him. This happed in the yeer of the Anarchy, when there was no Provoft elected, next before the Provofiship of Euclider. This was granted and ratified by the people; only there was one drebinas flood up, and impeached the proceeding thereo, as being againt the law, becaute it was proposed unto the people; before it, was consulted upon in the Senate; to the foreful Decree, was annulled and revoked. Thus being disappointed of his right of Burgeofie, he remained nevertheless (during his life) as a Citizen, and enjoyed the same rights, franchises and priviledges that other Burgeffes did ; and fo dyed in the end, when he had lived the space of fourfeare and three yeers, or as fome fay, threefcore and fixteen; and as others write, fourfcore: fo that he invedto fee Demostrees a childe: It is faid, that he was born the yeer that Philecle was Provost. There go in his name four hundred Orations 5. of which sumber (according to Dissystus, and Certains). ha): two hundred and thirty be of his own making indeed: in the pronouncing of all which; he failed but twice, and had the foil. There is exam allo, that very Oration which he made against archivers in the maintenance and defence of the faid Decree; by vertue whereof, the right of Burgeosie was given unto him: also another, against the thirty Tyrants. Apt he was to pensuade; and in those Orations which he gave out to others, very briefand succind. There be found like wife of his making, certain introductions to Rhetorick, and speches delivered publishely before the people: Lettern-missive, Solemn Praises, Funeral Orations, Discourses of Loves, and one defence of Socrates, which directly seemed to touch the Judget to the quicks. His still was thought to be plain and casie, however, and the success of the people of the control of the state of the seements of the seements

H: composed likewise an Oration for Iphicrates, which he pronounced against Hairmolius; as also another wherein he accused Timotheus of treasons, and both the one and the other he overthrew; but assertive with the properties took upon him against or equive into the doings of Timotheus, calling him to account for the revenues of the Statewhich he had managed, and feet in hand again with this accused the control of the revenues of the Statewhich he had managed, and feet hand again with this accused that the state of the statewhich he had managed, and feet hand again with this accused anotation that Lysias penned for him. And as for himself, he was acquit of the critice, and additional but simulteus was condemned and since to pay a great sum of money. Moreover, he reheared in the great Affembly and Solemnity as the Olympick Games, a long Oration, wherein he persuaded the Greeks, that they should be reconciled one to another, and joyn together for to put down the Tyrans Dimplius.

I SOCRATES. IV.

I Serates was the son of one Theodorus an Erechthian, a man reckoned in the number of mean Citizens, one who kept a fort of servants under him, who made Flutes and Hauthoyès; by whose workmanship hes became for eich, that he was ableve bring 'up and set out his children in wordhipful manner. For other sons he had besides, to wit, Telespous and Diomestus; and also a little daughter unto them. Heretpon it is that he was twitted and flouted by the Comical Poets Aritophasia; and strais, in regard of those students, and before Plato some seven yeers. During his childhood, he had as good bringing up as any Athenian whatsoever, as being the disciple and scholar of Products the Chian; of Gonzias the Leontine, of Tysas the Syracusan, and Therameie; the profited Rhetorician; who being at the point to be apprehended and taken by the thirty Tyrants; and slying for refine to the alter of Minitus the Counseller, when all other friends were affrighted and maze a conely Isorate; also and showed himself for to assist the when all other friends were affrighted and amze a conely Isorate; also and the web himself began and prayed him to desire, saying, that it would be more dolorous and grievous wittohin, then his own calamity, in case he should see any of his friends to be troobled and endagered for the love of him. And it is said, that he helped him to compile certain Institutions of Rhetorick, a what time as he was malicioully and sailly slandered before the Judges in open Court: which Institutions are gone under the panea and title of Boton.

When he was grown to mans effate, he forbare to meddle in State matters, and in the affairs of the common-west]; as well for that he had by nature a finally and feeble voyce, as because harterally he was featfal and timerous; and befides, his effate was much impaired, by reason that he lost his partimony in the war against the Lacedemonians. It appeares that to other men he had been allistant in countes, and giving testimony for them in places of indegement: but it is not known that he pronounced above one onely Ocation, to wit, we Arrelvers, that is to say, concerning councerhange of goods. And having fet up a publike School, he gave himself to the study of Philosophy, and to write; where he composed his Paneary view Oration, and certain others of the Deliberative kinde:

and those that he wrote himself, some he read, some he penned for others; thinking thereby to exhort and ftir up the Greeks to device and perform such duries as beseemed them to do. But seeing that he missed of his purpose and intention, he gave over that course, and betook himself to keep a School : first, as some say, in Chies, having nine Scholare that came untothim; where when he saw that his Scholars paid him down in money his Minervals for their schooling, he wept, and faid, I see well now that I am fold unto these youths. He would confer willingly with those that came to devise and talk with him, being the first that put a difference between weangling Pleas, or contentious Orations, and ferious politick Discourses of common-weal, in which herather employed himself. He ordained Magistrates in Chies, erecting the same form of Government there, which was in his own Countrey. He gathered more filver together by teaching School, then ever any Proteffor in Rhetoriek or School-mafter was known to have done; so that he was well able to defray the charges of a Galley at Sca. Of Scholars he had to the number of one hundred . and among many others, Timotheus the fon of Conon; with whom he travelled abroad, and vifited many Cities: He penned all those Letters which Timosbeus fent unto the Athenians; in regard whereof he bestowed upon him a Talent of filver, the remainder of that money due by composition from Samos. There were besides of his Scholars Theopompus the Chian, and Ephorus of Cumes: Aschpiades also, who composed Tragical matters and arguments; and Theodettes, who afterwards wrote Tragedies (whose Tomb or Sepulchre is as men go toward Cyamite, even in the facred way or street that leadeth to Eleufis, now altogether ruinate and demolished: in which place he caused to be creeted and set up the statues of samous Poets, together with him; of all whom there remaineth none at this day but Homer alone;) also Leodanns the Athenian; Lacritus the Law-giver unto the Athenians, and as some say, Hyperides and Iseus. And it is faid, that Demofibenes also came unto him, whiles he yet taught a Rhetorick School, with an earnest purpose to learn of him, using this speech: that he was not able to pay him a thousand drachnes of silver, which was the onely price that he made and demanded of every Scholer; but means he would make to give him two hundred drachms, to he might learn of him but the fift part of his skill, which was a proportionable rate for the whole; unto whom Iserates made this answer. We use not, Demoftbenes, to do our bufiness by piece meal; but like as men are wone to fell fair fishes all whole ; even fo will I, if you purpose to be my Scholar, teach and deliver you mine Art full and entire, and not by halfs or parcels.

He departed this life the very yeer that Gheronides was Provost of Athens; even when the newscame of the discomfinire at Cherones, which he heard-being in the place of Hipperrates publike exercise; and voluntarily he procured his own death, in abstaining from all food and sustenance the space of sour days, having pronounced before this abstinence of his, these three first verses which begin three Tragedies of Euripides :

1. King Danus, who fifty daughters had. 2 Pelops, the fen of Tantalut, when he to Pila came. 3. Cadmus whilom, the City Sidon left.

He lived 98. yeers, or as some say, a full hundred, and could not endure for to see Greece sour times brought into servitude : the yeer before he dyed, or as some write, sour yeers before, he wrote his Panathenaick Oration: as for his Panegyrick Oration, he was in penning it ten yeers, and by the report of fome, fifteen, which he is thought to have translated and borrowed out of Gorgias the Leontine and Losses: and the Ocation concerning the counterchange of goods, he wrote when he was four fore yeers old and twain: but his Philippick Oration he fet down a little before his death: when he was far flepped in yeers, he adopted for his fon Aphaneus, the yongest of the three children of Plathane his wife, the daughter of Hippias the Orator, and professed Rhetorician. He was of good wealth, as well for that he called duely for money of his Scholars, as also because he received of Nicoeles King of Cypres, who was the fon of of Euggeres, the fum of twenty talents of filver for one Oration which he dedicated unto him : by occasion of this riches, he became envyed, and was thrice chosen and enjoyned told be the Captain of a Galley, and to defray the charges thereof: for the two first times he felgoing himself to be fick, was excused by the means of his son; but at the third time he rose up and took the about his fon whom he kept at School, faid, That he sent with him no other tobe his Guide and Governor, but a flave of his own: unto whom Horrates answered, Go your ways then, for one flave you shall have twain. He entred into contention for the prize at the folernn Games which Queen Artemifia exhibited at the Funerals and Tomb of her husband Maufolus: But this enchomiastical Oration of his which he made in the praise of him, is not extant: Another Oration he penned in the praise of Aelana; as also a third in the commendation of the counsel Arespagus. Some write, that he dyed by abstaining nine days together from all meat : others report but four; even at the time that the publike obsequies were solemnized for them who loft their lives Dut toul; even at the time that the public outeques were fortunized for tuent who for their with in the battel at Cherenea. His adopted fon Aphareus composed likewise certain Orations: enter red he was together with all his linage, and those of his blood, neer unto a place called, Cynorde was together with all his linage, and those of his blood, neer unto a place called, Cynorde you have been a sound on the form and father Theodorus; their mother also and her fifter Anaco, Aunt unto the Orator; his adopted so the control of t likewise Aphareus, together with his Cofin-Germain Socrates, son to the aforesaid Aunt Anace Ifocrates mothers fifter : his brother Theodorus, who bare the name of his Father, his Nephews, or children of his adopted Son Aphareus, and his natural Theadorus: moreover, his Wife

Plathanse mother to his adopted fon Aphareus: upon all these bodies there were six tables or tombs erected of stone, which are not to be seen at this day: but there stood upon the tomb of Isserates himfelf, a mighty great ram engraven, to the height of thirty cubits, upon which there was fyren or mere-maid feven cubits high, to fignifie under a figure his milde nature and cloquent file: there was befeise neer unto him, a table conteining certain poets and his own (cool-mafters: among whom was Gorgias looking upon an aftrological febzere, and I ferrates himself standing close unto him: surface. more, there is crected a brasen image of his in Eleusin, before the entrie of the gallery Stoa, which Timotheus the son of Conon caused to be made, bearing this epigram or inscription :

The Lives of the Ten Orators.

Timotheus upon a loving mind, And for to bonour mutuall kindnesses, This image of Mocrates bis friend, Erected hath unto the goddesses.

This state was the handy-work of Leechares. There go under his name threescore oration; of which five and twenty are his indeed, according to the judgement of Dionysius: but as Cecitius saith, eight and twenty; all the reft are fally attributed unto him. So far was he off from oftentation, eight and twenty.

and to little regard had he to put forth himself and them his fufficiency, that when upon a time there came three unto him, of purpose to hear him declame and discourse, he kept two of them with him, and the third he fent way, willing him to return the next morrow : Fer now (quoth he) I have a full theater in mine auditory. He was wont to fay also unto his scholars and familiars : That himself full theaterin time authors. The transport of the property and the transport of the property and transport of the property, and teach him good utterance, ten thousand. When one demanded of him how it was politic that the should make other men sufficient orators, seeing himself was nothing cloquent. Why not (quoth he) freing that whet-stones which can not cut at all, make iron and steel sharp enough and able to cut. Some fay, that he composed certain books as touching the art of the Rhetorick; but others are of opinion, that it was not by any method, but exercise onely, that he made his scholars good orators; this is certain, that he never demanded any mony of naturall Citizens born, for their traching. His manner was to bid his scholars to be present at the great affemblics of the City, and to relate unto him what they heard there spoken and delivered. He was wonderful heavy and sorrowful out of measure for the death of Socrates, fo as the morrow after he mourned and put on black for him. Again, unto one who asked him what was Rhetorick? he answered: Is is the art of making great matters of small, and small things of great. Being invited one day to Nicocreon the tyrant of Cypres; ashe fat at the table, those that were present, requested him to discourse of some theame; but he answered thus : For such matters wherein I have skill the time will not now serve; and in those things that fit the time, I am nothing skilful. Seeing upon a time Sophocles the tragical Poet, folcompared in the time, raninouning samua. Seeing upon a time corporers the tragical root, soluting wantonly and hunting with his eye, a young fair boy; he faid: O Sophobels an honeft man ought to contain not his hands only, but his eyes also. When Ephorus of Cunes went from his khool nun proficient, and able to do nothing, by reason whereof his father Demophius sent him again with a second salary or minerval; Horestes smiled thereat, and merrily called him Diphono, that is to say, bringing his money twice; so he took great pains with the man, and would himself a second the property of the second property of the se prompt him, and give him matter and invention for his declamatory exercife.

Inclined he was and naturally given unto the pleafures of wanton love; in regard whereof he used to lie upon a thin and hard short mattress, and to have the pillow and bloster under his head perfu-med, and wet with the water of saffron. So long as he was in his youth he married not; but being now striken in age and grown old, he kept a quean or harlot in his house, whose name was Lagisca, by whom he had a little daughter, who died before the was married, when the was about twelve years old. After that , he espoused Platbane , the wife of the Rhetoritian * Gorgias , who had three * Hippias. children before, of whom he adopted Aphareus for his own fon, as hath been faid before, who caufed his statue to be cast in brass, and erected it neer unto the image of Jupiter Olympius, as is were upon a colume, with this Epigram :

This portraid of liocrates in brass, His sonne adopted, Aphareus, who was, Erected bath to Jupiter, in view. Of all the world thereby to make a shew, That unto gods he is religious, And honoureth his father vertuous.

kissaid, that whiles he was but a young boy, he ran a course on horse-back; for he is to be seen all in brass in the castle or citadel of the city, sitting and riding his horse, in form and proportion of a boy within the tenile Court of those Priefts of Minerva, which attend there, to tarry the facred fecrets, not to be revealed, as some have reported. In all his life time there were two only successionmensed against him: the former, for the exchange of his goods, being challenged and provoked by Megaclides; for the triall whereof, he appeared not personally at his day, by reason of sickness: the fecond action was framed against him by Lysimachus, for the exchange of his goods, with charge to defray the expenses of maintaining a galley at fea: in which process he was cast, and forced to fee out agalley at fea: There was also a painted image of his in the place called Pompeium. And Aphareus composed verily orations, though not many, both judicial and jalso deliberative. He made also tragedlies, to the number of feven and thirty; whereof there be two which were contradicted. And he began to have his works openly heard in publick place, from the year wherein Lysistratus was Provost, anto that year wherein Sosieles was in place; to eight and twenty years: in which time he caused to cause the solution of the caused that civil places to be acted, and twice gained the prize of victory, having fet them forth by a principal Actor or Player, named Dyoussus. Actor of the Lennick kind, that is to say, full of mirch to move laughter.

There were the statues also to be seen within the Citadel, of the mother of Isocrates and of Theodorus, as also of Anaco her sifter; of which, that of his mother is yet extant; and it standeth necember to the image of Hygia, that is to say Health; onely the inscription is changed; but the other of Anaco is not to be sound. This Anaco had two sons, Alexander by Canes, and Usicles by Lysias.

Isaeus, V.

Seus was born in Chalcis: and being come to Athens, he fludied the work of Lyfias, whom he did fo nearly imitate, as well in the apt couching of his words, as in the witty device and fubtility of his inventions; that if a man were not very well practifed and perfect in the fille and manner of witting of their two Orators, hardly fise fhould be able to differen many of their Orations, and diffinguish one from another. He was in greatest name, about the time of Peloponnensiack war, as may be conjectured by his Orations; and continued unto the Reign of King Phillip. He gave over his publick school, and went to teach Demosthense privately at home, for the sum of ten thousand drachmes of silvers whereby he became very famous; and as some say, he it was that composed for Demosthense certain exhoratory Orations. Heleft behind him three score and sour Orations going in his name; whereof sitty are this indeed; a life some particular introductions of his own, and rules of Rhetorick. He was the first who began both to torm and to turn the sense of his fille unto the politick management of affairs; a thing that Demosthense oth most of all limitate. Of this Orator, Theopompus the comical Poet marketh mention in his Thojens.

AESCHINES. VI.

Eschines was the son of Atronteus, (a man who being banished in the time of the thirty tyrant, A was a means to aid the people, and to fet up the popular state again) and his mothers name was Glaucothea. He was of the borough or tribe Cothocis: fo that his parents were neither for nobility of race, nor yet for wealth and riches renowned in the City: but being young, and of a lufty and able constitution, he fortified and confirmed the same more by bodily exercise: and finding himself to have a strong brest and cleer voice; thereupon afterwards he made profession to act Tragordies, but (as Demosthenes faid of him by way of reproach) he went after others, and could never proceed higher than to act the third and last parts in the folemnities of the Bacchanale playes under one Aristodemus. When he was but a boy, he taught petties the letters; namely to fpel and read together with his Father: and being of some growth, he served as a common souldier in the wars. The Scholar and Auditor he was (as some think) of Isecrates and Plate; but according to Cecilius, of Leedamus. Being entred into the managing of State affairs, and that not without credit and reputation; because he made head and fided against the faction of Demostkenes, employed he was in many embassages; and namely unto King Philip, for to treat of peace : for which, accused he was by Demosthenes, and charged to have been the cause that the Nations of the Phocasas was rooted out, and for that he kindled war between the Amphyctions and the Amphissians, what time as he was chosen one of the deputies to be present in the affembly or diet of the Amphyctions, who made also an haven, whereby it hapned withal, that the Amphyctions put themselves into the protection of Philip, who being wrought by Æfebines, took the matter in hand, and conquered all the territory of Plosis: how-beit, through the port and favourable countenance of Eubnius the fon of Spinibarus a Proballufan, who was of great credit and reputation among the people, and spake in his behalf, he escaped, and was found unguilty, and carried it by thirty voices; although others fay, that the Orators hid penned their orations, and were at the point to plead; but upon the news of the overthrow at Cheronea', which impeached the proceeding of the Law, the matter was not called for, nor the cause pleaded.

A certain time after, when King Philip was dead, and his son Alexander gone forward in his expedition into Afia, he accused Esthibbon judicially, sor that he had passed a decree contrary unto the Laws, in the honour of Demostheese; but having on his side not the sift part of the suffrages and the voices of the people, he was banished out of Ashens, and fled to Rhodes, because he would not pay the fine of a thousand drachmes, in which he was condemned, upon his overthrow at the bar. Others say, that over and beside, he was noted with insamy, because he would not depart out of the City; and that he retired himself to Ephesia unto Alexander. But upon the decease of Alexander, when there was great trouble towards, he returned to Rhodes; where he kept a chool, and began to teach the art of Rhetorick. He read other whiles unto the Rhodians (and that with action and gesture) the oration which he had pronounced against Stephibons, whereas, when all the hearts marvelled, and namely, how possibly he could be cast, if he acked such an oration: You would never wonder at the matter (quoth he) my Masters of Rhodes, if you had been in place and head Demostbeues impleading against it. He left behind hima school at Rhodes, which afterwards was called the Rhodium school. From thence he sailed to Sames, and when he had stayed attimen the sile, which a while after, he died. A pleasant and sweet voice he had, as may appear both by that which Demosthener hath delivered of him, and also by an oration of Demochard.

which Demogrant natures at the street of this, and any or an oration of Demochares. There be found four orations under his name; one againt Timerbus; another as touching falle embaffage; and a third againt Cstipbon, which in truth be all three his: for the fourth entituded Deliace, was never penned by £Schimes. True it is indeed, that appointed and commanded he was to plead judicially the causes of the people of Deles; but he pronounced no fuch oration; for that Hyperides was cholen in stead of him, as saith Demosthemes. And by his own saying two brethren he had Aphobus and Demochares. He brought unto the Athenians the hist cidings of the second vistory which they obtained as Tamyne, for which he was rewarded with a Crown. Some give it out that £Ebines was scholar to none, and never learned his Rhectrick of any Masser; but being brought infels by his own industry, for that he ordinarily converted in judicial Courts, and places of judgement. The first time that ever he made publike speech before the people, was againt King Philip; and having then audience with great applants and commendation, he was prefently chosen embaffador, and sent to the Arcadiam; whilties when he was come, he raised a power of ten thousand men agains Philip. He presented and induced Timerebus for maintaining a brottel house; who fearing to appear judicially, and to have the cause heard, hung himselfs, as after a four Demosthemes; in some laces that Asterwards elected he was to go in embaffage unto Philip with Csessions in some places faith. Asterwards elected he was to go in embaffage unto Philip with Csessions in some and covenants; for which service he was judicially called to his answer and acquir, as hath been faid before.]

Licureus. VII.

Teurgus was the fon of Lycophron, the fon of Lycurgus; him I mean whom the thirty tyrants did to death, by the procurement and infligation of one Ariftodemus that came from Bata; who having been treasurer Generall of Greece, was banissed during the popular Government. Of the borough or Tribe he was named Buta, and of the family or house of the Escobutades: At the beginning, the scholar he was of Plato the Philosopher, and made profession of Philosophy: but afterwards being entred into familiar acquaintance with Ifocrates, he became his scholar, and deals in affairs of State where he wan great credit; as well by his deeds as words; and so put in trust he was with the mannagement of the Cities revenues: for Treasurer General he was the space of lifteen years; during which time, there went thorow his hands fourty millions of talents, or as some say, fourfore millions fix hundred and fifty talents. And it was the Orator Stratorles who preferred him to this honour, by propounding him unto the people. Thus I say at the first was he himself chosen Treafurer in his own name; but afterwards he nominated fome one of his friends; and yet nevertheless manuaged all, and had the whole administration of it in his own hands; for that there was a Statute enacted and published, that none might be chosen to have the charge of the publick treasure above five years. He continued alwayes an Overseer of the City works both Winter and Summer: and having the office and charge committed unto him provision of all necessaries for the wars, he reformed many things that were amise in Common-wealth. He caused to be built for the City four hundred gallin.He made the common Hall or place for publick exercifes in Lycenin, and planted the fame round about with trees: He reared also the wrestling Hall, and finished the theater which is at the Temple of Batchus, being himself in person to oversee and direct the workmen. He was reputed a man of such fidelity and fo good a conscience, that there was committed upon trust into his hands, to the summa of two hundred and fifty talents of filver, by divers and fundry private persons to be kept for their use. He caused to be made many fair vessels of gold and filver to adorn and beautist the City: as allosundry images of Victory in gold. And finding many publick works unperfect and half done, he accomplished and made an end of them all: as namely the Arfenals, the common Halls of armor and other utenfiles and implements, ferving for the Cities uses. He founded a wall round about the spacious cloissure, called Punathenaike, which he finished up to the very cope and butilments; yea and laid level and even, the great pit or chink in the ground; for that one Dinius, whose plot of ground it was, gave away the property which he had in it unto the City, in favour especially of Lycurgus, and for his sake He had the charge and custody of the City, and commission to attache and apprehend malefactors, whom he drove all quite out of the City: infomuch that some of the Octors and subtile sophisters would say, that Lycurgus dipt not his pen in black ink, but in deadly blood, when he drew his wits against malefactors: in regard of which benefit unto the Common weal, fo well beloved he was of the people, that when King Alexander demanded to have had him delivered into his hands, the people would not forgo him. But when as King Philip made war upon the Atheniaus the second time, he went in embassige with Polyendus and Demillbanes, as wel into Peloponnesis, as to other States and Cities. All this time he lived in good estimation among the Athenians, reputed evermore for a just and upright man, in such fort that in all Courts of juffice, if Lycurgus faid the word, it was held for a great prejudice and good foredom in his behalf, for whom he spake. He proposed and brought in certain Laws; the one to this effect, that there should be exhibited a solemnity of playes or comedies at the feast Chytra, wherein the Poets should do their best, and strive a vie within the theatre for the prize; and whosoever obtained victory, should therewith have the right and freedome of Burgeofie, a thing that before was not lawfull nor granted therewith have the right and nectorne of burgones a time that of the was not sawfull nor granted unto Poets; and thus he brought unto use and practife again, a folemn game which he had difcontinued. Another, that there should be made at the publick charges of the City, flatues of brase for the Poets £[cby]hu, Sophocles and Euripides; that their tragecides should be exemplified and the groffed fair, for to be kept in the chamber of the City; and that the publick notary of the City should read them unto the players, for otherwise unlawful it was to act them. A third there was, that no Citizen nor any other person resident and an inhabitant within the City (faitens, should be permitted, so buy any prisoners taken in war, such as were of free condition before, to make them slaves, without the confent of their first Masters. Item, that within the haven Pyreeum, there should be exhibited a folemp play or game unto Neptune, confifting of round dancer, no fewer than three : and that unto those who won the first prize, there should be given for a reward no fewer than ten pound of silver, and to the fecond, eight at the leaft; and to the third, not under fix, according as they fhould be adjudged by she tecond, eight at the reart same to the times not nines has according as they mount of acquaged by the Umpires. Item, that nodam: of Athens might be allowed to ride in a Coach to Elensin s for fear that the poor might be debased by the rich, and herein reputed their inferiors: but in safe any of them were so taken riding in a Coach, she should be fined and pay six thousand drachms: now when his own wife obeyed not his Law, but was surprized in the manner by Sycophants and Promoters, he himself gave unto them a whole calent, with which afterwards when he was charged and accused before the people : You fee yet (quoth he) my Mafters of Athense, hat I am overtaken for giving, and not for takir g filver.

Himet one day as he went in the ftreet, a publican or farmer of the forcin taxes and tribute for the City, who had laid hands u, on the Philosopher Xenocrates, & would have led him to prison in all hafte, because he paid not the duties imposed upon strangers; for which he gave the publican a rap on the head with the rod or walking staff which he had in his hand, and recovered the Philosopher out of his clutches; which done, he cast the faid officer himself into prison for his labour, as having committed a great indignity unto such a personage; a few dayes after, the same Philosopher meeting with the children of Lycurgus: I have (quoth he unto them) my good children rendeed thanks unto your father, and that right speedily, in that he is so praised and commended of all men for succouring and refcuing me. He proposed and published certain publick decree, ofing the help herein of one Euclide an Olynthian, who was thought to be a very sufficient man in framing and penning such acts; and albeit he was a wealthy person, yet he never wore but one and the same kind of garment both winter and fummer, yea , and the fame shooca he went in every day , what need soever was. He exercised himself continually in declaming both night and day, for that he was not fo fit to fpeak of a fudden and unprovided. Upon his bed or pallet where he lay, he had onely for his covering a sheepes skin, sell and all, and under his head a boulster, to the end that the sooner and with more eafe, he might awake and go to his fluidy. There was one who reproached him, for that he paid his money fluil unto fophisters and professed Rhetoricians, for teaching him to make orations: But (quoth he) again, if there were any would promife and undertake to profit make orations. But Quota he again, it there with a word in your athousand denices, but the one moity of all my goods. Very bold he was and resolute to speak his mind franchium to the people, and to tell them the truth plainly, bearing himself upon his nobility is info much as one day when the Ashenians would not fuffer him to make a speech in open audience, he crycd out with aloud voice; O whippe of Corfn, how many talents art theu worth? Another tims, when some there were who ca'led Alexander God: and what manner of God may he be (quoth Lycurgus) out of whose temple whosever go, had need to be sprinkled and drenched all over with wa-

After he was dead, they delivered his children into the hands of the elev n Officers for execution of justice, for that Thraficles had framed an acculation, and Menefachmus endicted them ; but upon the letters of Demogithenes, which in the time of his exile he wrote unto the Athenians, advertiling them that they were ill spoken of about Lycergus his children, they repented themselve of that which they had done, and let them go; and verily Democles the scholar of Theophrassus justified them, and spake in their desence. Himself and some of his children were buried at the Cities charges, over and against the Temple of Minerva Paonia, within the Orchard or Grove of Melanthius the Philosopher: and found there be, even in these our dayer, certain tombes with the names of Lycurgus and his children written thereupon. But that which is the greatest thing that foundeth most to the praise of his Government, he raised the revenues of the Common-weal unto twelve hundred talents, whereas before they amounted but unto three-score. A little before he died, when he perceived death to approach, he caused himself to be carried into the Temple of Cybele the great mother of the gode, and into the Senate-house, desirous there to render an account of his whole administration of the Common-weal: but no man was so bardy as to come forth and charge him with any unjust and wrongful dealing, fave onely Menefachmus; now after he had fully answered those imputations which he charged upon him, he was carried home again to his house, where he ended his daya; reputed all his lifetime for a good and honest man, commended for his eloquence, and never condemned in any fute, notwithstanding many actions and accusations were framed against

Three children he had by Galifto, the daughter of Abron, and fifter to Calens, the fon also of Abron, of the barrough Bata, who was Treasurer of the camp during the wars that year wherein Apron, or the survey of this affinity and alliance, Dinarchus maketh mention, in that oration which he made against Pafius. He left behinde him these children, Abron, Lycurgus, and Lycophron; of whom Abron and Lycurgus died without iffue; but Abron after he had with good reputation and credit, managed State matters, changed this life: and Lycophron having espoused Calutomacha, the daughter of Philippus Axienes, begat a daughter named Galeito, married afterwards to Cleombrotus, the fon of Dimocrates, an Acharnanian, who by her had a fon named Lycophron, whom Lycophron the grand-father adopted for his own fon; and he departed this life without children: after the decease of this Licophron, Callifto was remarried unto Socrates, unto whom the bare a fon, named Symmachus a who begat Aristonymus; and of Aristonymus came Charmides, whose daughter was Philippe, and the bare a fon, to wit, Lysander Medius, who became an interpreter also, one of the Eumolpides: of him and of Timothea the daughter of Glaucus descended Laodamia and Medius, who held the Priesthood and of Nepume Eretheus: Philippa also a daughter, who afterwards was a religious priestress, devoted to Mikerva; for before time, had Discles the Melitean espoused her, and she bare him a son named likewife Dioles, who was a Colonel of a regiment of footmen; and he took to wife Hedijle the daughter of Abron, of whose body he begat Philippide and Nicostrata; and Themistocles the torch-bearer son of Theophrastus married Nicostrata, by whom he had Theophrastus and Diocles, notwithstanding he was Priest unto Neptune Erechtheus.

There be found of this Orators penning, fifteen orations. Crowned he was many times by the people: and ordained there were for him divers statues and images, whereof there was one all of brass, according to a publike decree of the City, standing in the street Ceranicum, that year when Anaxicrates was Provolts under whom there was allowed unto himfelf and his fon Lycurgus, as alfo to his eldeft Nephew, table and diet in Psylamneum, by wertue of the same decree of the people: howbeit, after the decease of Lycurgus, Lycophron his eldelt son made sure by law for this git and donation. He peaded also many times for matters of Religion, and accused Autolycus the Senator, and one of the nigh Court Areopagus, Lysicles also the Captain, and Demades the son of Demius, tog:ther with Menefachinus, and many others, whom he overthrew and caused to be condemned every one. Moreover, hecalled judicially into question Diphilus, for that he took away out of the mettal mines, those micdle polis or props which supported the weight of earth bearing upon them, by which means he enriched himself, directly against the Laws: and whereas the penalty of this crime was death, he caused him to be condemned. He distributed out of his goods, unto every Citizen of Athens fifteen drachmes, or as some say, one mua, or pound of silver : for the totall sum of his wealth amounted unto an hundred and threefcore talents. He accused likewise Aristogiton, Cleocrates, and Autolycus, for that being no better then flaves, they carried themselves like men of free condition. This Lycurgus was surnamed Ibis, that is to fay, the black Stork : and men commonly would fay to Lycurgus, Ibis, like as to Xenophon, Notheris, that is to fay, the Howlet. The most ancient of this house, were descended from Erectheus, the fon of the Earth and of Vulcane; but the neerest, from Lycomedes and Lycurgus, whom the people honoured with publick funerals and obsequies. And this descent of their race, is drawn from those who were Priefts of Neptune, and let down in a full and perfect table, which hangeth up in the Temple Erechibium, and was painted by Ismenias the Chalcidian; where also stand certain statues of wood, as well of Lycurgus as of his children, to wit, Abron, Lycurgus and Lycophron which sometimes were made by Timarchus and Cephisodorus the sons of Praxiteles the imager. He who set up an I de licated the painted table before faid, was Abron, unto whom by order of hereditary succession, fell the Priesthood, bet he gave over his right thereto voluntarily unto his brother Lycophron : this is the re. fon that he is printed giving a three-forked mace unto his brother. Now this Lycurgus having caused to be engraven upon asquare pillar, abrief of his whole administration of the common-weal, caused it to be planted just before the wreftling hall, for every man to fee it that would. Neither could any man be found fo hardy, as to accuse him for robbing the State, or inverting any thing to his own use. He proposed unto the people, that there should be a coronet given unto Neoptolemus the son of Anticles, and a statue befides, for that he undertook and promifed to gild (all over) the altar of Apollo in the market place, according to the commandment and direction of the oracle. He demanded also, that honour should be decreed for Enonymus the fon of Diotimus, whose father was Diopithes, in that year wherein Cteficle was Provost.

DEMOSTHENES. VIII.

Dimotheme the son of Demothemes and of Cleebule the daughter of Gylon, of the linage or tribe of Peenia, being lest an orphan by his sather, at the age of seven years, together with a filter five years old; during the time of orphanage kepe with his mother a widow, and went to school unso ligerates, as some say, or as most men give out, to Iseus the Chalcidian the disciple of Iserates, who lived in Athers: he initiated Thueydides and Plato the Philosopher, in whose school there be that say he was first brought up: but as Heggias the Magurejan reporteth, being advertised that Callipratus the son of Empeds; an Aphidnean and samous Orator, who had been Captain and Commander of a Troop of horesmen, and who had declacated an altar to Mercury surnamed Agoraios; that is to say, the Speaker, was to make a solemn oration unto the people, craved leave of his Tutor and Schoolmalter, that he might go to hear him: and no sooner had he heard him speak, but he was in love with his cloquence.

But as for this Orator, he heard him but a while, even until he left the City; for banished he Now after that he was departed into Thrace, by which time Demosthenes grew to be a young man, then began he to frequent the company of Isocrates and Plato: howbeit, afterwards he took home into his house Isaus, whom he entertained the space of four years, and exercised himself in the imitation of his file, or (as Oesibius reporteth in his treatise of Philosophy) he wrought so, that by the means of Callias the Syraculian, he recovered the Orations of Zeihus the Amphipolitane, and by the help of Charicles the Chariffian, he got them also of Alcidamus, and those he gave hmiself wholly to imitate. But in process of time, when he was come to mans estate, and past a ward, seeing that his tutors and guardians allowed him not sufficiently out of his living and patrimony, he called them to account for their guardianship, that year wherein Timocrates was Provost of Athens. Now three tutors or Governors he had, to wit, Aphobus, Theripedes, Demophon alias Demea, whom he charged more then the rest, being his uncle by the mothers side; he layed actions upon them of ten talents apiece, and fo much he demanded of them by Law : he overthrew them all ; but he could not come by ought of that wherein they were condemned : for neither recovered he mony nor favour of the one or the other. * * * * When Aristophon was now so aged, that he could not take pains nor attend to set out the solema dances and shews, for which he was chosen commissary and overseer, he gave over his place, and Demolibenes in his room was substituted the master of the said dances : and for that in the open theater, as he was busie in his office about setting out and ordering the dances, Medias the Anagyrasian, gave him a box of the ear with his fift, he fued him in an action of battery : howbeit, he gave over his fute for the fum of three thousand drachmes of filver, which Midias payed him. This is reported of him, that being a young min, he retired himfelf apart into a certain cave, where he gave himfelf unto his book, having caused his head to be shaven the half of it, because he might not go abroad to be seen, and so leave his book: also, that he lay upon a very straight and narrow bed, for that he would the sooner arise, and with more ease: and there he extressed and sorced himself to frame his speech better: but for that he had an ill grace with him, ever as he spake, to shake and shrink up his shoulder, he remedied that, by flicking up a broch or lpit, or as some say, a dagger, to the floor over head, that for fear of pricking his shoulder, he might forget this evil custome that he had in his gesture : and according as he profited and proceeded forward in the art, he caused a mirror to be made just as big as himfel, before which he used to declaim, that thereby he might observe the evil gestures or illavoured faces that he made when he spake, and learn to reform and amend them; also, he used otherwhiles to go down to the water fide, to the haven Phalerium, for to exercise himself in declaming, even where the furging waves of the fea did beat upon the banks, to the end that he might at no time after be troubled nor put out and driven to an extalie, with the noise and clamour of the people when he should speak before them: but for that naturally he was short-winded, and his breath commonly failed him, he bestowed upon Neopt slemus a famous actor or stage-player, ten thousand drachmes of filver, to teach him for to pronounce long periods and fentences with one breath, and not taking his

When he began to enter into the management of the publike State, finding that the Citizens were divided into two factions; the one fiding and taking part with King Philip; the other speaking and pleading still for their liberties and fredom, he chose to join with that which was opposite in all their doings unto Philip; and all his life time he continued counfelling and perswading the people to succour those who were in danger to fall under the hands of Philip; communicating his counsels in the administration of State affairs, and devising evermore with Hyperides, Nausicles, Polyeucius, and Distionus: and therefore he drew into league and confederacy with the men of Athens, the Thebanes, Eubuans Corryceans, Corinthians, Buotians, and many others belides. One day he chanced to be out and his memory to fail him, so that he was hissed at by the people in a great assembly of the City: for which differece he was out of heart, and ill appaid, informed as in great diffeontentment he went home to his house; where by the way, Eunomus the Thrasan, being now an accient man, met with him, who cheered up Demosthemes, and comforted him all that he could : but most of all Andronicus the stage player; who said unto him: That his orations were as good as possibly might be, only he was wanting somewhat in action 3 and thereupon rehearsed certain places out of his oration, which he had delivered in that frequent affembly : unto whom Demosthenes gave good ear and credit, whereupon he betook himself unto Andronicus; insomuch as afterwards when he was demanded the question which was the first point of eloquence, he answered, Action; which the second, he made answer, Action; and which was the third, he faid, Action, fill. Another time he pur himself forth to speak in open audience of a great affembly, and was likewise whistled at, and driven out of countenance; for speaking some words that savoured too much of lufty youthfulnes; so that *i. Aefen He was flouted by the comicall Poets, Antiphanes and Timocles, who used to twit him with proved that he had pronounced the word aright; for that Æ conlapins was θεκίπες, that is to fay, a milde and geacious god: and for this manner of fwearing was often times troubled; but after he had frequented the school of Eubhalder the Milesian, and a Logician, he corrected and amended all. Bing one day at the folemnity of the Olympian games, and hearing Lamachai the Terit zan how he reheated an encomisfical oration in the praise of King Philip, and of Alexander his son; namely, how they invaded and over-ran the Thebanes and Olynthians, he came forward, and standing close into him, on the contrary side, alleadged testimonics out of antient Poets, importing the comm ndation of Thebanes and Olynthians both, for thebrave exploits by them atchieved; which when Lamachai heard, he gave over and would not speak a word more, but slipt away as soon as he could out of the assembly. King Philip himself would say unto them who related unto him the concions and orations that he made against him: Certes, I believe verily, that if I had heard him with mine own cars pleading in this wise, I should have given the man my voice, and chosen him captain to make war upon my self. And much to the same purpose the said Philip was wont to liken the cratiens of Demostrates unto Souldiers, for the was like force that appeared in them; but the speeches of succession and confirm that they made.

Being now thirtyseven years old, counting from Dexitheus to Callimachus, in the time of whose Provosiship the Olynthians by their embassage required aid of the Athenians, for that they were fore plagued with the war that King Philip levied against them; he perswaded the people to fend them succour: but in the year following, wherein Plato changed this life, King Philip utterly destroyed the Olynthians. Xenophon also the disciple of Socrates, had a knowledge of Demosthenes, either in his prime when he began to rife and grow up, or else in the very flour and best of his time; for X:nophon wrote his Chronicles as touching the acts and deeds of the Greeks, and specially of those affairs which paffed about the time of the battel at Mantinea, or a little after, namely, in that year when Charicles was Provost; and Demosthenes somewhat before that, had given his tutors and guardians theoverthrow at the bar. When as A Chines upon his condemnation was fled toward Ashens, there to live in exile; Demosthenes being advertised thereof, made after him on horse-back; whereupon Michines imagining that he should be taken prisoner, fell down at his feet, and covered his face, but Demotibenes willed him to arife and stand up, gave him comfortable words, and besides, put a talent of filver into his hands. He gave counsel unto the Athenians to entertain a certain number of mercenary fouldiers, strangers in the ille of Thafes, and to this effect he failed thither as Captain with the charge of a great galley under his hand. H: was chosen another time chief purveior of corn, and being accured for demeaning himself baldly, and pursoining the Cittes money, he cleared himself and was acquir. When Philip had forced the City Elatia, and was master of its, Demostheres abandoned the faid City, together with those who had fought in the battel of Cheronea; whereupon is thought that he forfook his colours and fled; now as he made hafte away, there chanced a bramble to take hold of his cassock behinde, whereat he turned back and said unto the bramble: Sive my life and take my ransome. Upon his target he had for his mot or device. Good fortune. And verily he it was that made the Oration at the funerals of those who lost their lives in the faid battel.

After this he applied his minde, and bent I is chief care to the reparations of the City, and being chosen commissive for repairing the walls, he laid out of his own (besides the defraying of the Cities money) an hundred pounds of silver: over and above that, he gave ten thousand for to be employed in the setting out of shawes, games, and playes; which done, he embarked himself in a galley, and sailed up and down from coast to coast, for to levy money of the allies and confederates; for which good services he was crowned many times: first by the means and motion of Demostles, Arithmicus, and Hyperides; who propounded that he should be nonoured with a coronet, of gold, and last of all, at the instant sure of Ctessphon: which decree was empeached and blamed, as contrary to the Laws by Diodous and Essenies: against whom he defended and maintained it so well, that he cartied it clean away; so as his accuser had not the sisting part of the suffrages and voices of the people on his side.

Afterwards when Alexander was passed onward his voyage into Asia, and Harpains sled into Atbens with a great sum of mony: at the first he would not sinstly him to be entercained and kept safely but after he was once arrived and set aland, and that he had received of him a thousand good pieces of gold, called Darik; then he changed his note and sung another song: for when the Athenians were minded to deliver the man into the haads of Antipater, he withstood them, and withal set down under his hand-writing, that his mony was laid up safe in the Citadel; the summe whereof he had declared already unto the people, whereas Harpains had specified it to be seven hundred and fitty alcans or somewhat above, as saith Fibiobarus. But after this when Harpains had broken prison, wherein he should have been kept, until some messengeng an ews came directly from Atxander, and was steaped and retired, as some say, to Candie, or as others, to Tenarus in Laconia; Demothenes was call intoquestion for corruption, bribery, and taking his mone; for that he neither declared the just quantity and summe of coin that thisther was brought, nor the negligence of hose who had the custody of it and him: thus I say was he brought to his 'answer judicially by Hipparides, Pytheus, Menesselowurs, Hymeraus, and Patrueles, who followed the sure so have taken thurty sondemend he went into exile, being not able to pay five fold; sorcharged he was to have taken thurty sondemend he went into exile, being not able to pay five fold; sorcharged he was to have taken thurty talents: others fay that he would not abide the iffur of judgement, and therefore went, voluntary before the day of triall into banishment. After this time the Athenians sent Polyentius in embassage to the communalty of the Arcadians, for to divert and withdraw them from the league and confederacy to the Macedonians: but when Polyenčius could not perswade them to revolt; Demositienes came upon them and shewed himself to second the motion, where he spake so effectually, that he prevailed with them: for which service he was highly admired, and thereby wan such favour and reputation, that after a certain time, by vertue of a publick decree, he was called home again out of exile, and a galley was set out of purpose to bring him back to Athens: and the Athenians moreover ordained, that whereas he owed unto the State thirty talents, in which he was condenned, he should cause an altar to be built unto Jupiter the Saviour, in the port Pyreum, and in so doing be held acquit and discharged. This decree was propounded by Demon the Phæanian his cousen Germain.

By this means he returned to the politick mannaging of affairs as before. Now when as Antipater was straightly bisieged by the Greeks, and enclosed within the City Limia, whereupon the Athenians offered facrifices for the good and joyfull tidings thereof, he chanced to let fall a word in talking with Agespiratus, a familiar friend of his, and to say that he was not of the same mind and opinion with 0 her, astouching the State: For I knowfull well (quoth he) that the Greeks are skilfull and able both to run a short carriere, and good to make a skirmish for a spurt and away; but to hold a long race, and to continue the war unto the end, they can never abide. But afterwards when Antipater had won Pharfalus, and threatned the Athenians to lay siege unto their City, unless he would deliver into his hands those Orators who had inveighed against him: Demosthenes for fear of himself, lest the City of Athens, and fled first into the Ille Egina, for to put himself within the liberties and franchifes of the temple or fanctuary, called Accium: but afterwards being affraid that he should be setched out from thence by the eares, he passed over into Calauria: where having in e'ligence that the Athenians were resolved and had concluded to deliver those Orators, and himfelf principally among the reft; he refted as a poor diffressed suppliant within the temple of Neptune: and when there came unto him thither Archias the pursuvant, surnamed Phygadotheres, that is to fay, the hunter of Fugitives who was a disciple and sectary of Anaximenes the Philosopher, perswading him to arife, and that no doubt he should be reckoned one of the friends of Antipater; he anfwered thus: When you play a part in a tragedy, you cannot make me believe that you are the man whom you reprefent; no more shall you perswade me now to give ear unto your counsel: and when the other laid hands on him and would have drawn him forth by violence, those of the City would not fuffer him; then faid Demofthenes unto them : I fled not unto Calabria for my fafety, and with any intention to fave my life, but to convince the Macedonians of their impiety and violence, even against the gods; and with that he called for writing tables, and wrote this dystichon; as saith Demetrius the Magnesian, which the Athenians afterwards caused to be set as an Epigram over the flatue:

Had thy good heart Demosthenes, met with as good an hand: The Greeks of Macedonian sword, hould never have had command.

This image of his standeth neer unto the purprise or cloister, wherein is erected the altar of the twelve gods, and made it was by the hands of Polyentins: but as fome fay, this was found written withal: Demostbenes to Antipater greeting. Philocharus faith, that he died of poyfon which he drank : but Satyius the historiographer reporteth, that the pen was poisoned wherewith he began to write his Epifile, and chancing to put it into his mouth, fo foon as ever he tafted thereof, died : Eratofthenes writeth otherwise, namely that he standing in fear a long time of the Macedonians, was provided of poison, which he carried within a little ring or bracelet that he wore about the wrift of his arm: and there be again who say, that he killed himself by holding his wind so long, that he was overcome and ftifled withal; laft of all, others write that he carried a ftrong poison within the collet of his signer, which he tafted, and died thereof,  two and twenty.

When King Philip was dead, he came abroad wearing a fair and rich new robe, although but a while before he had buried his own daughter, fo glad was he of the death of that Macedonian King. He aided the Thebanes also when they warred with Alexander, and all other Greeks he encouraged as much as possibly he could at all times; and therefore Alexander after he had destroyed the City of Thebes, demanded of the Athenians for to have him, menacing them if they would not deliver him into his hands. And when the faid King warred upon the Persians, and required of the Athenians their fhipping, Demojthenes opposed himself and denied it: For who is able to say (quoth he) that he will not use the same shippes even against our selves that send them. He lest behind him two sonnes by one wife, the daughter of one Heliodorus a principall Citizen. One da the ter he had, who died before she was married, being but yet a young child. A fister also he had, who being married unto Lacker the Leuconian his nephew or fisters sonne, bare Demektsres, a valiant man in warre, and besides, for policy and eloquence inseriour to none in his time. There is an image of his to be feen at this day, flanding within the common hall of the City, called Prytaneum, on the right hand as men do enter in and go toward the altar. The first man he was who male an oration to the people with a fword by his fide girded over his rebe; for in that habit it is faid, that he d'livered a speech unto the Citizens, when Antipater came to demand their Orators ! but afterwards, the Athenians both ordained allowance of diet in the Prytaneam for the kinred of Demoithenes, and also fet up a statue for himself when he was dead, in the Market place, that very year when Gorgias was Provost, at the fute of Demochares his nephew or fisters son, who required these honours for his Uncle : yea, and afterwards, Laches the sonne of Demochares a Leuconian, made fute for the like honours for himfelf, the year that Pitharatus was Provoft; which was ten years after; namely; his statue for to stand in the market place, allowance of diet in the palace Pritaneum, as well for himself as for the eld oft alwayes of his house and linage in every descent, with a priviledge of the highest room or uppermost place at all solemn sights and games. And these decrees as touching them both, are registred, and to be seen engrossed upon record. As for the image of Demochares, whereof we have already spoken, it was transported into the Palace or Hall of the City named Prytaneum.

There be extant orations which be his indeed, to the number of threescore and five. Some fay, that he lived a diffolute and riotous life, and that he would not flick to go in womans apparel, to banquer, to be one ordinarily in all masks and mommeries; whereupon he was furnamed Batqlus: though others there are, who fay that this was the name of his nourfe, and that thereupon he was to tearmed by way of flouting speech or nick-name. Diogenes the dogged Cynick, spied him one day in a Tavern; whereat Demothenes was abashed, and retired more inward into the house : Nay (quoth Discenses to him) the more you draw or farink backward, the further still you go into the Tavern. The fanic Diegenes faid to him upon a time, when he was disposed to scotf: That in words he was Acythian, that is to (ay, a tough Tartian and a brave Warrior; but in war, a fine and delicate burgels of Atheur. He took gold of Ephialies also, being one of the Orators who went in embassage to the King of Persia, and brought with him a great sum of money secretly to distribute among the Orators of Athens, to this end, that they might fir coals, and blow the fire, to kindle war against Philip: and it is faid, that he for his part had at one clap of the King, three thousand daricks. He caused one Anaxilus of the City of Orea, to be apprehended, who had otherwise been his familiar friend; and being cast into prison, put him to be examined by sorture, as a spie; and albeit he confeffed nought, yet he fued out a writ or decree that he should be committed into the hands of the eleven executioners of justice. One day when he meant to make a speech in the full affembly of the people, they were not willing to hear him: Why (quoth he unto them) it is but a short tale that I purpose to tell unto you: which when they heard; they gave him audience willingly: and then began he in this mauner: There was not long fince (quoth he) a young man who hired an Als in the time of Summer, from this City to Megara: now when it was noon time of the day, and the Sun exceeding hot, both the one and the other, as well the owner of the ass as he who hired him, would needs have the benefit of the affet shade, and stand under it, but they hindred and impeached one another; for the owner faid that he had let to hire, his Als, but not the shadow of him: the other again who hired him, pleaded that the As, shadow and all was in his power. Having thus begun his tale, he came down and went his way: the people then called him back, and prayed him to rell the tale out, and make an end thereof: Why my mafters (quoth he) how is it, that you are fo defirous that I should tel you a tale of the shadow of an As, and will not give methe hearing when I am to speak unto you of your affaires of great importance? Polus the famous actor and stage player made his boatt upon a time, that in two dates wherein he played his part, he had gotten a whole talent of filver: And I (quoth he) have gained five in one day, for holding my peace and keeping filence. His voice upon a fitme, when he made a speech unto the people, failed him: whereupon his audience being not well pleased, and himself somewhat troubled he said aloud unto them: You are to judge players by their pleasant and strong voice; but Orators by their good and grave sentences. Epicles seemed to upbraid and reproch him, for that he was alwayes musing and premeditating: I would be ashamed (quoth he unto him) if being to speak before so great an assembly of people, I should comunprovided. It is written of him, that he never pur out his lamp, that is to fay, that he never coaf-ed fludying how to file and polific (as it were) his orations, until he was fitty years old. He faid of hindil, that he drank nothing but fair water. Lyfias the Orator had knowledge of him: and I/or * How 2crates faw him to manage the affairs of State, until the battel of Charonea, yea, and some also of the greech this Socraticall Orators. The most part of his orations he pronounced *extempore and of a sudden, as to the having a ready and pregnant wit, and one who naturally was fitted to speak. The first that ever propo- which fed and put up a bill unto the people, that he should be crowned with a coronet of gold, was difficult with Anagyrafian the son of Nicophanes; and Diondus did second the motion with an oath.

HYPERIDES. IX.

HI Tperides the son of Glaucippus, who was the son of Dieny sus of the burrough Citytea, had a Hon who bare the name of his father Glaucippus, an Orator who composed certain orations and he begat another Orator, named Alphinus. He was at one time the scholar of Plato the Philolopher, of Lycurgus and of Isocrates. He dealt in the State at what time as Alexander the Great intended the affaires of Greece, and he croffed him as touching those captains which he demanded of the Athenians, as also about the Gallies which he required to have. He advised the people not to cals and discharge those souldiers which were entertained at Tenars, who had for their captain,

Chares, and whose friend particularly he was. He pleaded ordinarily at the first as an advocate for his fee; and was suspected to have received to have received part of that money with Ephialiei brought out of Persia. Chosen he was the Captain of one great Galley, at what time as King Philip went to lay siege unto the City Bizantium: and sent he was to aid the Bizantines. The very same year he took the charge of defraying the expenses of the folern dances; whereas the reft of the Cap-tains were exempt from all publick offices for that year. He passed a decree, that certain honour should be done unto Demosthenes; and when the faid decrees was by Diendas repealed, as made against the laws, and himself thereupon accused, yet found he was unguilty, and thereupon acquit, Friend he was to Demosthenes, Lyficles and Lycurgus; howbeit, in this amity he continued not unto the end: for after that Lyficles and Lycurgus were dead, when Demofthenes was once called in question the end: for active man spirits and appears were used with bands onely were free of bribery) was nominated and picked out from the reft, to frame an accuration against him, because they were all thought culpable in the same fault, and so he judicially accused him; but himself was charged by Ariftogrish for publishing acts contrary to the Laws, after the battel at Cherones, namely; That all the inhabitants and dwellers in Aibent, flould be Burgeffer of the City; that all flaves should manumized and made free; that all facred and holy reliques; that women and children should be bestowed with in the Port or Havan Pireaum : howbeit, absolved he was, and went cleer away. And when fome there were who found fault with him, and marvelled how he should be so negligent and overfeen, as not to know fo many laws which were directly opposite to the said decrees; he made this answer: If (quoth he) the arms of the Macedonians and the battel of Cheronea, had not dazzeled and dimmed my fight, I had never written nor proposed such an edict. But certain it is, that after this, Philip being affrighted, gave the Athenians leave to take up the bodies of their dead that lay in the field, which before he had denied unto the heralds that came of purpose unto him out Afterwards, upon the defaiture at Granon, when he was demanded by Antipater, and the people refolved to deliver him into his hands, he forfook the City, and fled into the Ille of Ægina, with other perfons who likewife were condemned, where meeting with Demoghtenesh de diddered him to hold him excufed, for that he had by confirmint accused him. And when he minded to depart from thence, furprized he was by one Archies (uroamed Phygadatheres, a man born in the City of Therii, and who at the first was a professel diago-player, but then imployed in the service and aid of Antipater; so he was apprehended perforce within the Temple of Neptunes, notwithstanding he held the image of the said god in his armes; and from thence brought to Gorints before Antipater; where being set upon the rack, and put to torrure, he bit his tongue off with his own teeth, because he would not discover the secrets of the City, and so ended his dayes the ninth day of the month Osbber: howbeit, Hemippus faith, that as he went into Macedonie, he had his tongue dut out of his head, and his deed corps was cast forth unto the beass of the field without sepalture: yet one Alphinus his cousing gemain, or as some say, the cousin of Glascippus his son obtained litence (by the means of Philophite a certain Physician) to take up his body, who burns the same in a suneral sire; the ashes and hone whereof, he carried to Albens assertions among his kinssolk and selends, contrary to the orders and decrees set down, both by the Macedonians and the Albenians: see by vertue thereof they were not only banished but interdicted, so as they might not be interred within their own Country Other say, that he was carried unto the City Clonewith others, where he died; and that his tongue was cut, and afterwards, himself murdred in manner aforefaid. Howbeit, his kinssen and friends gathered up his borns when his corps was burns, and buried them amonsh his parents and progenitors before the gates called Hippades, according as Helledorus hath recorded in the third book of

He had a fingular name above all other Orators, for speaking before the people's insomuch, as some have ranged him even above Dempsters. There go in his name, threefcore and seventeen orations of which, two and size are cruly attributed unto him, and no more. Given he wasted earlier to the love of women, which was the cause that his drove his two son out of his house, and brought in thicher Myreibina the most summands and coally courtifan in those dayes: and yet in Pyrecum he kept Aristagora, and at Elessia (where his lands and possificions by) he had another at command, namely, Philae a Thebrar born, who cost him eveney pounds weight of silver. His ordinary walk was every day thorow the fish market. And when the samous Courtes an Phyrae (whom he lawed also was called into question for Atheism and impiety, inquisition was made after him likewise; and so he was troubled with her and sor her fake, as it should seem: for, so much he declareth him-himself in the beginning of his oration; now when the was at the very point to be codemented, he brought the woman forth in open Court before the judges, tent her clothes, and slewed unto them her bare breft; which the judges seeing to be so white and fair, in regard of her beauty very absolved and dismissible her.

He had very closely and secretly framed certain accusatory declarations against Demosthenes, yet so, as they came to light in this manner; for when Hyperides lay sick, it fortuned that Demosthenes came one day to his house for rev visit him, where he found a book drawen full of articles against him the whereat when he was much offended, and took it in great indignation, Hyperides made him this answer: So long as you are my friend, this shall never hurt you; but if you become mine enemy, this shall be a curb to restrain you from enterprizing any thing prejudicial unto me. He put up a bill unto the people, that certain honours should be done unto folas, who gave unto Alexander the cup of poyson. He sided with Denssibenes, and joined in the raising of the Lamiack war, and made an admirable oration at the funerals of those who lost their lives therein. When King Philip was ready to embark and pass over into the Isle Eubea, whereupon the Athenians were in great fear and perplex ty he gathered together in a small time a Fleet of fourty fail, by voluntary contribution, and was the first man who for himself and his son rigged and set forth two gallies of war. When there was a controversie in Law between the Athenians and Delians to be decided, unto whether of them appertained by right the superintendance of the Temple at Delos, and that Eschynes was chosen to plead the by fight the counfel of Aeropagus elecked Hyperides; and his oration as touching this matter is at this day extant, entituled The Deltaque eration. Moreover, he went in embaffage to Rhodes, whiter there arrived other Embaffadors in the behalf of Antipater, whom they highly praised, as a good, mildes and gracious Prince: True it is (quoth Hyperides unto them again) I know well that he is good and gracious, but we have no need of him to be our Lord and Mafter how good and gracious foever he be. It is faid, that in his orations he shewed no action nor gesture at all: his manner was onely to fet down the case and lay open the matter plainly and simply, without troubling the judges any otherwise than with a naked narration. Sent he was likewise unto the Elians for to defend the cause of Calippus, one of the champions at the facred games, unto whom this imputation was laid, that by corruption he had carried away the prize, and indirectly obtained the victory. He of p pfed himself allo against the gift which was ordained in the honour of Phoeion, at the instant successful of Midias of Anagyri ra, the son of Midias, the year wherein Xenius was Provost, the 27. day of the moneth of May; and in this cause he was cast and had the overthrow.

DINARCHUS. X.

Inarchus the fon of Sosrates or Sostratus, born as some think in the Country of Attica, or as others would have him, in Corinth, came to Athens very young, at what time as King Alexander the Great , passed with his Army into Asia ; where he dwole, and frequented the lecture of Theophrathe, who fucceeded Arifforle in the Peripatetick school; he conversed also with Demetrius the Phalerian, and took his time especially to enter into the the administration of State affairs, after the death of Antipater, when the great Orators and States-men were some dead and made away, others banish ed and driven out of the City: and being besides friended and countenanced by Cassander, he grew in short time to be exceeding rich, exacting and taking mony for his orations, of those at whose request he composed them. He banded against the most renowned Orators in his time; not by putting himself forth to come in open place to speak before the people (for nogist nor grace he had there-in) but by penning orations for those who made head against them. And namely when Harpalus had broken prison and was fled, he composed divers accusatory declarations against all such as were suspected to have taken money of him, and those he delivered into the hands of their accusers to be pronounced accordingly. Long time after, being accused himself to have communicated, conferred, and practifed with Antipater and Caffander, about the time that the haven Munichia was furpilled by Antigonus and Demetrius, who placed there a garrison in that year when Anaxicrates was Provost of the City, he sold most part of his goods, and made mony, and when he had done, sled out of the way to Chalcis, where he lived as it were in exile the space will neer of 15. years; during which time, he gathered great riches, and became very wealthy, and fo returned again to Athens, by the means of Theaphrastus, who procured both him and other banished persons to be recalled and reflored : he abode then in the house of one Proxenus his familiar friend; where being now very aged, and befides weak-fighted, he loft his gold that he had gotten together; and when Proxenus his hoft would have given information thereof, and feemed to make inquisition, Dinarchus called him into question judicially for it; and this was the first time that ever he was known to speak & plead personally at the bar. This oration of his is now extant, and there are befides in mens hands threefcore and four more acknowledged all to be his, and yet fome of these are to be excepted, as namely, that against Aristogiton. Heelid imitate Hyperides, or as some think Demostheres in regard of that pathetical spirit in moving affections, and the emphatical force with appeareth in his stile. Certainly in his figures and exornations he followeth him very evidently.

Decrees proposed unto the people of Athens.

Demochares the son of Laches, of the burough Lencon, demandethsor Demosshenes the source of Lenosshenes of the burough of of Pania, a statue of brass to be setup in the market place or common Hill of Athens; also allowance of diet in the place Profession, and the first place or feat in all honourable assemblies for himself, and the eldest of his house in every descent for ever; for that he the faid Demosthenes hath alwaies been a benefactor to the City, and given counsel unto the people of Athens, in many of their honourable affairs to their behoof; for that he hath at all times exposed his goods to the service of the common weal, and namely, of his liberal and bountiful minde contributed eight talents of filver, and maintained one galley of war, at what time the people freed and delivered the isle Eubea : and another, when captain Cephisodo us fet out his voyage into Hellespont; as also a third when Chares and Phocion were sent as captains to Byzantium by the people. Item, for that with his own money he ranformed and redeemed many Citizens taken prisoners and captives in Pydne, Methone and Olymbus by King Phillip. Item, for that he defraied at his own proper coft and charges, the publick playes and daunces when the tribe of the Pandioinides failed to furnish the officers and wardens appointed thereto. Item, for that he armed many poor Citi-zens who had not wherewith to fet themselves forth to the wars. Item, for that being chosen by the people one of the Aediles or Commissaries, for repairing the City walls, he laid out of his own rurse to the value of three talents of filver, over and befides then thousand drachms which of his own mony he employed, in casting of two trenches about Pyreaum. Item, that after the disasterous battel of Charonea, he gave out of his own stock one talent; and another to buy corn with all in time of a dearth and great famine. Item, for that by his effectual remonstrances, fair perswasions, holesome counsels, and good demerits, he had induced the Thobanes, Eubeans, Corimbians, Megarians, Actiaus, Locians, Bizantines, and Massenians, to enter into a league as well offensive as defensive with the people of Athens. Item, for that he levied a power of ten thouland footmen well armed, and a thousand horsemen, over and above the contribution of monies, by the people and their allier. Item, for that being embaffador, he had perswaded the affociates and confederates of Athens, to make a contribution of money to the fum of five hundred talents and above, roward the wars. Item, for contribution or money to the turn or new numeror caretts and above, coward the ways. Then, for that he empeached the Pelopontenfant for aiding King Alexander against the Thebane; for which service he parted with his own filver, and went personally in embassage. As also in regard of many other good descript, and worthy exploits by him atchieved: in consideration likewise of much wise council and advice, which he hath given unto the people, and of his politick government and mannaging of State affairs, wherein he hath carried himself as well, yea and much better than any in his time: for the perfervation of the liberty and maintenance of the authority of the people. Over and besides, in that he was busilised out of his countrey by certain sedicious usurpert; who for the time suppressed the authority of the people: and finally lost his life in Calauria, in the quarrel of the said people, and for the love and good will that he alwaies bare affectionately unto the commonalty of people, and for the love and good was that he sawates were artectionately unto the commonary of alters, there being first of purpole from Antipate certain foolliders to apprehend him. Nowith-standing, which prefent danger wherein he flood, being now in the hands of his enemies, yet perfifted he firm and fast in his hearty affection alwaies unto the people; informed has he never did any deed, nor let fall any word prejudiciall to his Country, or unbeferning the honour of the people, as neer a he was unto his death. Subscribed, that very year when Pytharatus was Provist.

Laches the fon of Demochares, of the borough Leucon, demandeth in free gift of the Senate and people of Attens, for Demochares the fon of Lacker, of the tribe or borough Leucon, one flatte of braft to be erected in the market place: also his table and diet in the palace or City Hall Prytanaum for himself, and for him that shall be the eldest of his house in every descent for ever; as also the priviledge of presidence or first seat at all solemn sights and publick plaies : for that he hath alwaies been a ledge of prejudence of interest at an inclusion and a state of thems, as having deferved well of the common-weale in these particulars; (as well in those things which he hath, penned, proposed and negotiated in his embassage, as in the administration of common-weal; in that he hath canded the walls of the City to be built, made provision of harnels and armor, as well offensive as defensive; of fabricks and engines of battery, and of artillery with thot to be discharged out of them; in that he hath well fortified the City during the wars with the Bootians which continued for the space of four years: for which good service done, banished he was and chased out of the City by the tyrants, who oppressed the liberty and authority of the people: and in that being restored again and called home by an honourable decree of the faid people, when Diecles was Provoft, he was the first man who refirained the administration and management of those who made spare of their own goods, and sent embassages unto Lysimachus: in that also he levied for the good of the common wealth at one timthirty talents, and at another a hundred talents of filver; in that he moved the people by a bill preferred unto them, for to fend an embaffage to King Ptolemeus in Ægypt; by means whereof they that went that voyage, brought back with them fifty talents of filver for the people. Item, in that being sent embassiador to. Antipater, he received thereby twenty talents of filver, which he brought unto the people into the City of Eleufin, where he practifed and perswaded with them to receive the same Item, in that he suff-red banishment, because he was a protector and defender of the popular State, never fiding nor taking part with any faction of the uturpers; nor bearing Office or Magistracy in Common weal, after that the faid popular State was put down and abolished. Item, in that he only in his time, of all those who meddled in the affairs of State, never studied nor intended alteration, and to reduce his Countrey unto any another kind of Government, but popular. Item, in that by his politick counfel and administration be bath put in safety and security all judgements passed; all Laws enacted, all decrees concluded; yea and the goods and substance of all the Askenians: finally, in that he hath gone about and a tempted nothing prejudicial unto the popular Government, either in word or deed, Lycophron the son of Lycurgus, of the Burrough or Commonalty of Buta, hath presented this request That he might be allowed his diet in the Palace Prytaneum, according to the free gift granted hefore time to his father Lycurgus by the people, in that year wherein Anaxicrates was Provolt of the City, and the tribe Antiochis Prefident of Prytaneum: which Stratocles the fon of Ently dentis, of the Burrough Diomeia, proposed it in this form: Forasmuch as Lycurgus, the son of Lycophron of Buta; hath received of his Ancestors (as it were) from hand to hand a certain hereditary love and affection namicetters or the people of Atheus, and his Progenitors likewife, Diomedes and Lycingus, both during thic lives were electriced and highly honored by the people; and after their death, had this honor done unto them in testimony of their virtue and valor, as to be enterred at the publike charges of the City, in that confipences freet called Ceramicum: confidering also that Lycurgus himself (whiles he managed the affairs of the State) enacted many good and wholesome Laws for his Countrey, and being Treafurer-General of all the Cities Revenues, by the space of fifteen years, during that time, had the receit and laying out of the Publick moneys, to the fum of eighteen thousand and nine hundred talents . and for that many private mens stocks were put into his hands upon trust, for the considence they had inhim, in regard of his fidelity; in regard also, that he hath disbursed and layed forth of his own moneys at fundry times, and upon divers occasions, for the benefit of the City and Commonalty, as much as amounteth in all, to fix hundred and fifty talents: for that likewise in all his imployments, having been ever found most trusty, just and loyal, and to carry himself as an bonest man and good Citizen, he hath been many times crowned by the City: moreover, in this respect, that having been tofen by the people the Receiver of Finances, he gathered together a great mais of money, and brought the fame into the common cheft within the Citadel, and befides, provided ornaments for the golden Minerve, to wit, images of victory all of beaten gold, vessels to carry in procession both of gold and silver, besides other jewels of fine gold for the service and worship of the said goddess, and gold and invers between of this gold to the civit and any of the about a sold and namely, to the number of one hundred Campbore; that is to fay, Virgins carrying paniers or baskets with facred Reliques upon their heads. Item, for that being elected Commission for the Municions and Provisions necessary for the wars, he brought into the Citadel agreet number of Armours and Weapons, and among the reft, fifty thousand shoe; rigged and set assoc four hundred Galleys, some new bulls, others repaired and trimmed: over and besides, for that finding certain of the City works. unperfect, to wit, the Arcenal, the Armory and the Theatre of Bacchus, he caused them to be made up, and withal, finished both the Cirque or running place Panathenaicum, and also the empaled Park for publike execcise, and built the Lycium likewise, and adorned the City with many fair buildings and publike edifices: whereas also, King Alexander the great, having already subdued all Afia, and intending generally to be Commander over all Greece, demanded to have Lycurgus delivered up into his hands, for that he onely flood in his way, and croffed his defigns, the people would not delive his for any for that had to the contract of the history for the had to the contract of the history for the had to the contract of the history for the had to the history for the history for the had to the history for the history liver him for any fear they had of Alexander : and for that being oft times called judicially to his anfwer, and to render an account of his Government and Administration in a free City, and governfiver, and to render an account of his Government and Administration in a tree City, and governed by a popular State, he was always found innocent and unreproveable, no trained with any bribery, nor footted with corruption and taking gifts for to pervert justice all his life time. To the end therefore, that all men might know that they who are well sticked to the maintenance of liberty and popular Government be highly accounted of by the people while they live, and that after their death the City is willing to render unto them immortal chanks; in a good and happy hour, let it be ordained by the people, that Lycargus the son of Lycarbron of Buta, be honored to this vertue and righteculated that the people erech his statue all of brass in the Market-steed, unless it be in some place where the trade expressly forbiddeth it to stand. Item, that there be allowance of diet in the Presenter on the clied of this house in aware design season. Prinneum, to the eldest of his house in every descent for ever. Also, that the Decrees by him proposed, shall be ratified and engrossed by the publick Notary of the City, yea, and engraven in pillars of sone, and set up in the Cisadel neer unto the offerings confecrated unto the goddess Minerva: and for the engraving of the faid pillars, the treasury of the City shall defray fifty drachmes of silver out of those moneys which are allowed for the City decrees.

Of three forts of Government, Monarchy, Democraty and Oligarchy.

S I devifed with my felf, and purpofed to put queftion to for to be decided by this judicious company, a matter which yesterday I discourted of before you; me thought that I heard politick vertue in a true vision indeed (and not in the vain illusion of a dream) thus to say utno me :

The Golden base and ground that now belongs

Unto our work, is layed with facred fongs.

I have already layed the foundation of a Discourse, perswading and exhorting to the management of State affaire, if now we can proceed to build upon it the Doctrine fit for such an exhortation, which is a due debt unto Attieus: for meet it is and requisite, that after a man hath received an admonition inciting him to deal in Politick matter of common-weal, weal; and withal, in the mean time manage his own private business, both in safety, and also with tuen nonor as a just and meet of the first and discourse of one point; which as it is a very ma-First and formost therefore, we are to consider and discourse of one point; which as it is a very ma-terial precedent unto all that shall be faid, so it dependeth, and is necessarily to be inferred of that which hath been delivered already; namely, what maner of policy and government is beft: for a there be many fort of lives in particular men; fo there are of people in general: and the life of a there be many fort of lives in particular men; fo there are of people in general: and the life of a people or commonalty, is the Politick State and Government thereof. Necessary is is therefore, that people or commonancy is the belt; that a man of State may chule it from among the reft; or it we declare which is simply the belt; that a man of State may chule it from among the reft; or it leastwife, if that be impossible, take that which most refembleth the best. Now there is one significa-icanwine, it charter important, that is to fay Policy, which is as much as Burgeofie, that is to fay, the into not this word Politine, that is to fay Policy, which is as much as Burgeofie, that is to fay, the indownent and enjoying of the right and priviledges of a City: as for example, when we fay that the comment and thorough the definance of their City) gave unto Alexander the great; their Polities, that Megarians (by a publike Ordinance of their City) gave unto Alexander the great; their Polities, that is to fay, their Burgsofie: and when he feemed to laugh at this offer and grant of theirs, they made is to fay, their Burgsofie:

him answer again, That they had never decreed this honor to any, but first to Hercules, and now to himfelf: which speech of theirs he so admired, that he accepted of their gift, reputing it honorable, because it was so rare. Also the life of a Politick person, who administreth State-affairs, is called Policy; according to which sense and acceptation of the word, we commend the Policy of Pericles and Bist, that is to fay, their maner of Government; but contrariwife, we discommend that of Hyperholus and Cleon. Moreover, others there be, who call fome one worthy act or memorable deed tending to the good of the common-weal, by the name of Policy: as for example, the contribution of money, the final ending and diffolution of war, and the publishing or declaration of some notable deerer; in which signification we use commonly to say, Such a man bath this day been the author of a good

Policy, if haply he have done and effected some worthy things, importing the weal-publick. Over and above all these significations before specified, there is another; namely, the order and state of a City and Commonwealth, by which are managed and administred all the affairs thereof: and according to this sense we say, there he three forts of Policies, Monarchy; that is to say, Royally, that is to say, Seignory; and Democraty, that is to say, Popular Authority: of which three Heredo-tas maketh mention in the third book of his History, comparing them together; and it feemeth that these be the most general, for all others be (as it were) the depravations and corruptions of these according to want or excess, like asit falleth out in accords and consonances of mulick, when the first and principal strings or notes are stretched over high, or let down to low: and so he divided these three Governments among those Nations which had the largest Empire, and greatest Dominion: for the Perfians held the Monarchy and absolute Royalty, for that their King had plenary power in all thing, not subject to be called unto account by any person whatsoerer. The Spartians or Lacedemonians, not tubject to be catted unto account by any period wisitioeter. And operation of Laccocumonals, maintained a grave and fevere counfel, confifting of fome few, and those the best and principal perfonages of the City, who managed and dispatched all affairs. The Athenians embraced a popular Government, living under their own laws, free, and without all mixture whatsoever. Now of these States and Governments, when they be faulty and out of order, the transfersions, exorbitations and control of the state of the product of the state of the stat excesses, be called Tyrannies, tordly oppressions of the mightier, and unbridled rule, or licentions

mif rule rather of the multitude : to wit, when the Prince in his absolute Royalty taketh upon him

inschent pride, to commit wrong and outrage unto whom he lift: when some few Senators, or Rulers, in their Seignory enter into an arrogant and prefumptuous Lordlines, whereby they contemn and oppress all others: allo when the multitude in their popular ifonomy, run into Anarchy, unrulinets, diffordience, tearms of equality, and unmeasurable liberty: and in one word, when all these forts of Government fall to rash and witless folly: like as therefore a skilful and harmonical Musician can make use of all kinde of instruments, framing and accommodating himself by art and cunning unto every one, striking each one according as he knoweth the quality and nature thereof, to give the sweetth and most pleasant sound: howbeit, if he follow the counsel of Plate, will pass by the Fiddels, Rebecks, Dulcimers, the many stringed Psatteries or Virginals, the Vials likewise and the triangled Harpt, preferring before all others the Lute and Citheron or Bandora: even fo a good Politician, will handle with dexterity the Laconick Seignory, and manage well enough Lycargus his Oligarchy, applying and fitting his companions in Government, who have equal authority unto himfell, gently drawing and reducing them by little and little unto the bent of his bow; femblably, he will carry himself with wisdom and discretion in the popular State, as if he had to deal with an instrument of many founds, and as many firings, letting down and remitting fome matters, fetting up and extending other things in the Government, as he feeth his time, giving ease and liberty, and again, carrying a hard hand and a rigorous, as one who knoweth when to refift and withftand flourly any proceedings: But if he were put to his choice, among these musical instruments, as it were, of a politick Government ; certes, if he be ruled by Plato, he would never chuse any other but that Regal and

Princely Monarchia, which onely is able to maintain that direct, absolute and Vosty note (indeed) of vertue, and not fuffer it either by force of necessity, or upon affectionate favor and grace, to frame it

felf to gain and profit; for other Governments after a fort as they be ruled by a Politician, fo they rule him, and as he leadeth them, fo they carry him, for that he hath no affured power over those, from whom he hath his authority, but oftentimes he is enforced to exclaim and refound these verses of fuch honor as is just and meet for him.

A Breviary of the Comparison between Aristophanes and Menander.

The Summary.

HE preserreth Menander an excellent Comical Poet, in all respects before Aristophanes, who is here de-feribed and depainted in his colours. Then examine the in particular, what he had faid before its generality. He confidereth the file, disposition, uniformity, and artificial contribution of Menanders Comedius, shaining that Aristophanes in comparison of him, was no better then a counterfeit conzener, a crassy and prating companion, ignorant, and actions, and intollerable unto all : having written his Comedies not to be read of any honest men, but onely for lewd and dissolute persons.

A Brieviary of the Comparison between Aristophanes and Menander.

Ofpeak in general, and fummarily, he preferreth Menander by many degrees before Ariffophanes; butto come uuto particularities, fee what he addeth moreover : The ftile of Aritophanes, and his manner of language is unsavory and unpleasant, counterfeit, base and machanical, whereas in Menander there is no fuch thing to be feen. And verily a gross, ignorant, and unlettered Idiot may take pleasure and be delighted in Aristophanes his speeches; but a learned man will foon be displeased and discontented therewith. I mean, his Antitheta or opposite terms; his clauses ending alike, and his allusions to names, which Menander useth but now and then to good purpole, and with great reason and judgement, being therein very spary, wary, and religious whereas the other ever and anon abuseth them hand over head, and our of season, without all grace or life to commend them. Praised he is (forsooth) for these cold jests; namely, when he saith, That he had drenched over head and ears the Treasurers, who were not, Tapias, but Aapias. Also, this fellow doth breath our either malice or flanderous calumniation. Again, here is one that liveth for his belly, his tentrals and his guts. Likewife, even for very laughter, I thall break our a laughting. Moreover, what fhall I do to thee thou unhappy damned pitcher, and banified? femblably, you women, here I shall make you wilde and savage evils, like as I am my felf, who have been fed among wilde and savage worts : but these curled treffes and frished hairs furely have devoured my breft : laftly,

Come bring him hither his targuet round, with Gorgons hideous kead : But give me here my cake as round, as buckler in his stead.

Besides many other bald jests of the like fort; for there is in the composition and texture of his words, that which is Tragical and Comical both; proud and infolent; base also and lowly, dark and myflical, and anou plain and familar; fwelled, puft up and lofty; but afterwards, vanity, lightness, and lothforce feurrility, enough to overturn a mann flomach. Now there being in his writings such diversity, difference, and diffimilitude; yet giveth not he to every person that which is proper and besteming. As for example, he attributeth not unto a King, a high and losty language; to an Orator, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a woman, a plain and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unletter-tor, eloquent and pithy speech; to a business and speech and speech and of the speech and of the speech and speech terms: but he alloteth unto every person at a venture whatsoever attributes come first to hand; so that a man cannot know nor discern by any speech, whether he be a son or a father that speaketh, a Countrey Peasant or a Citizen; a god or an old woman, or some demi-god: whereas the stile and phrase of Menander is so uniform, so consonant, and like it self, that howsever it be conversant in fundry maners, and divers passions, howsoever it be accommodate to all forts of persons, yet it feemeth still one and the fame, and to keep the femblance in common and familiar words, and such as are always in use. And if perhaps otherwhiles according to the matter and present occasion offered, there be required some extraordinary narration or strange bruit and unexpected noise; he setteth a work and openeth (as it were) all the holes of his pipe; but presently and with a seemly grace he reduce th

Ttt 2 774 and composeth his voice to the natural thate again. Now about there be in all Arts and Mysteries recellent Artifans; yet was there never known any Shoo-maker to make a shooe; nor Artifacer a masker vifour; nor Taylor a robe or garment, that would fit at one time a man and woman both; a yong youth, an aged person, and a variet: but Menander hath so framed his phrase and speech, that proportionate it is and fuitable to all natures and fexes, to each state and condition, yea, and to every age, and this was he able to perform and do in his very youth, when he began to write: for then dyed he, when he entred into his flower and best time, either of composing or setting out and publishing his works at fuch an age, when as the ftile (as Ariflotle faith) is come to the very growthand height in them who make norship and confer them with those in the midfl, and which he made in his latter end, a man thereby may foon know how much he would have added to these in other, if he had lived longer: for that of them who put forth their works to be feen and read, fome write to the capacity of the multitude and vulgar fort, others for men of mark and understanding; and hardly is a man able to name the Author, who can skill how to observe that which is meet and besitting two kindes of people. As for Aristophanes he is neither pleasing unto the common fort, nor acceptable to men of worth and judgement; but his poesse may be likened unto an old, stale, and overworn Whore, who for sooth would counterfeit and honest married wife; for as the people cannot endure his arrogancy, so men of account and quality, deteft his intemperance and maliciousness; whereas Menander on the contary side, with a good and feemly grace, fatisfieth and contenteth all, ferving as a Lecture, a knowledge and exercise common to Theaters, Schools, Sports, Pallimes, Feafis, and Bankets, shewing thereby, that is porficia one of the goodlieft things that ever Greece brought forth; making it appear what a gay matter, and how puiffant is the dexterity of speech and language, passing throughout, with an attractive grace, which it is impossible to escape, ravishing and winning every mans car and understanding, who hath the knowledge of the Greek tongue. For wherefore thould a learned mantake pains to go unto the Theater, but for Menanders fake? when are the Theaters frequented and full of great Clerks. but when there is a marked, flow before of acting his Comedies? And at Banquets, for whom doth the table make room, or Bacchus give place more justly then for Menander? And as for Philosophers, great Scholars and Students, like as Painters when they have wearied their eyes with looking upon fresh, lively and bright colours, turn them to those that are verdant and green; as namely, upon herbs and flowers for to recreate and refresh their fight; even so Menander is he who entertained their minds and spirits (as it were) in a fair medow full of lovely and pleasant flowers, where their is shade, fresh and cool air, with milde and comfortable winds. What is the reason that the City of Aitem at this day is furnished with many singular Adors and Players of Comedies? even because the Comedies of Monander are fo full of many graces and pleafant conceits, fo favory, as if they fprang forth of the very fea, out of which Venus herfelf was born: whereas the conceits and jells of Ariftophanes are bitter and tharp withal, carrying with them a mordicative quality which doth bite, fting and exulcerate wherefoever they light. And verily, I wot not wherein lieth that lively dexterity which is fo highly commended in him; whether in his words and phrases, or in the personages and actors? Certes, those things which he doth imitate and counterfeit, encline always to the worfe part: his cunning casts and conveyances are nothing civil and gentle, but threwd and malicious: the rufficity in clowns that he refembleth, is not natural, but affected and foolish: his merry jests to move laughter, are nothing jocond, but racker ridiculous, and to be derided: this amorous parts be not lovely and delectable, but wanton and diffolius. In fum, it feemeth this man wrote not his posie to be read of any honest and sober person; for his filthy and lascivous terms are meet for leacherous folk, and those which are given over to all looseness, like as his bitter and fpiteful speeches, for envious and malicious persons.

Narrations of Love.

The Summary.

In this Discourse, Plutarch relateth five Tragical Histories, which show the pittiful accidents that hefel certain persons transported with the invariants and irregular assettion of Love; leaving thereby unto the Reader a fair and clear mirror wherein to be hold the judgements of God upon those that abandon themselves to be carried away by intemperance and hossenses.

Narrations of Love.

IN the City Aliartos, fituate within Bassia, there was fometime a yong maiden of excellent beauty, ammed Arificia, aud the daughter the was of Theophanes: and two yong Gentlemen there were, that made fuit unto her in way of mariage, to wit, Straton an Orchomenian, & Callylbenes of Aliartos forefaid. Now was Straton the richer of the twain, & far more enamored of the damfel; for feen her he had when the washo herfelf in the fountain of Ereyn, which is in Lebadia, against the time that the wasto carry in procession to Jupiter, firnamed King, a facred Panier, as the maner was of the Canephora to do. But Callishenes had the vantage of him, and was deeper in love, for that he was besides neer of kin unto the Virgin. So Theophanes her father being doubtful what to do (for he stood in fear of Straton, as one, who for wealth and noble parentage went well-neer beyond all the Bosotians) resolved at length to refer the choice unto the Oracle of Jupiter Tropbonius: but Straton, who was born in hand by those of the house about Artstoclea, that the inclined more unto him, labored earnefily, that the mator most to the put unto the election of the Damfel herself: Whereupon, when Theophanes the father demanded of her in the face of the world, whom she loved better, and would chuse to be her hushand; the preferred Callifibenes: whereat Straton thewed himself immediately not a little discontented for this repulse and difgrace; but two days after, he came unto Theophanes and Calliftbenes, pretending, and faying, that he would not fall out with them, but was defirous fill of their good favor and friendhip, however his ill fortune had envied him the marriage of the yong Virgin. They approving well mp, noverther and taking his words in very good part, invited him as a gueft to the wedding feaft; of this fpeech, and taking his words in very good part, invited him as a gueft to the wedding feaft; mean while, he provided him left of a good number of his friends, and befides, no small troop of ferman while, vants, whom he disposed secretly in their houses here and there, against the time that this maiden (afvalle, which was and maner of the Countrey) should go down to a certain fountain named Cifforifa, there to facrifice unto the Nymphs before her marriage day : now as the paffed by, those who lay in ambuft came all running forth from every fide, and feized upon her hody, but Straw, himfell principal-by, who drew and haled the Damfel unto him as hard as he could: Callifibenes again on the other fide, for his part (as became him) held her faft, and fo did they about him: thus the filly maiden was tugged and pulled to and fro fo long between them, that before they were aware, dead she was among them in their hands: upon which firange occurrent, what became of Callifbenes, it is not known, whether he presently made away himsels, or fled into voluntary exile; for he was no more seen as for Straton, in the very light of all men, there in the place, he killed himself upon the very body of the

2. There was one named Plaidon a Peloponnefian, aff ding the feignory of all Pelopponnefus, and being defirous that the City of Argor his native feat should be Lady over all others, layed an ambush fift, for the Corinthians, to intrap them : for he fent an embassage unto Corinth, to demand a levy of a thousand yong men, that were the luftieft and most valorous Gallants of the whole City. The Corinthians fent them accordingly, under the conduct of one of their Captains, named Dexander. Now the purpose of this Phidon was, to set upon this troop, and kill them every one, to the end that he might thereby enfeeble the Corinthians, and make the City ferve his own turn (as a ftrong Bulwark most commodiously (cated)to command and subdue all Peloponnesus. This defign of his he communicated untocertain of his friends for to be put in execution accordingly; among whom there was one named Abron, who being a familiar friend unto Dexander, revealed unto him the confpiracy: Whereupon the faid Regiment of a thousand yong men (before they were charged by the said ambush) retired themselves, and recovered Corinb in safety. Then Philan befurred himself to finde out the man who had thus betrayed and discovered his plot: which Abron fearing, withdrew himself to Corinib, taking with him his wife, children, and his whole family, where he fettled and remained in a Village named Maliss. belonging to the Territory of that City: There begat he a fon, whom of the very place which he inhabited, he named Meliss; and this Meliss in process of time had a fon of his own, called Adeon, who proved the most beautiful, and withal, the modestest lad of all other youths and (pringals of his age; in regard whereof, many there were enamored of him; but among the reft, one especially, named Archies, descended lineally from the noble race of Hercules, and for wealth, credit, and authority, the greatest person in all Corimb. This Archias, seeing that by no fair means and perswalions he could prevail with yong Atlant, and win his love, resolved with himself to use violence, and forcibly to ravish and carry away this fair Boy: so he came upon a time (as it were) to make merry, unto the house of Melissus his father, accompanied with a great train of friends, and attended upon with a good Troop of his own houshold-fervants, where he gave the attempts have away the Boy byforce: but the father with his friends made reliftance; the neighbors also came forth to refeue, and did all what they could, to hold and keep the youth with them; but what with the one fide, and what with the other, poor Alleon was so pulled and ugged, that between them he lost his life; which done, all the rest went their ways and departed; but Meliffus the father brought the dead corps of his childe into the Market place of the Coand one mention the same to rought the case copy of the conde most the market place of the committed this foul outrage. The Corinchians made no greater a matter of it, but onely shewed, that they were forry for his mishap; and so he returned home as he came without effect, attending and waiting for the folemn Affembly at the Ishmick games; where being mounted up to the top of Neptuines Temple, he cryed out against the whole race of the Bacchiade, and withal, rehearsed by way of commemoration, the beneficence of his father Abron unto them, and when he had cal-led for vengeance unto the gods, he threw himfelf down headlong among the Rocks, and brake his neck. Not long after there fell out to be a great drought, and the City was fore visited with famine, infomuch as the Corinthians fent unto the Oracle, for to know by what means they might be delivered from this calamity: Unto whom the God made this answer, That the wrath of Neptune was the cause of all their misery, who would by no means be appealed until they had revenged Actions death: which Archias hearing (who was himself one deputed to this embaffage) he was not willing to return again to Corimb, but croft dover the feas into Sicily, where he founded and built the City Syracufa, and there he begat two daughters, Ortygia and Syracufa, but in the end was himself treacherously murdered by one Telephus, whom in his youth he had abused as his minion, and who having the conduct of a ship had failed with him into Sicilie.

3.A poor man named Scedasus who dwelt in Leudra, a village within the Territory of the Thespians, had two daughters, the name of the one was Hipps, and of the other Mileiia, or as some write, clepid they were, Tecano and Enipps. Now this Seedassu was a bounteous and kinde person, yea, and a good fellow in his house, and courteous to all firangers, notwithstanding he had but small flore of goods about him. So therefortuned to visit him two yong men of Sparta, whom he friendly and lovingly entertained; who being fallen into fancy with his two daughters, had thus much power yet of thementertained; who being taken into takey was make you against and the business power yet of themselves, that in regard of their father Seedafus, and his kindenefs unto them, they attempted nothing rejudicial unto the hopeft pudicity of the virgins for that time; but the next morning took their prejudicial unto the hopeft pudicity of the virgins for that time; but the next morning took their leave, and went directly roward the City of Delphus, unto the Oracle of Apollo Pythius, for to that leave, and went directly roward the City of Delphus, unto the Oracle of Apollo Pythius, for to that purpose expressly took they this journey and pilgrimage: after that they had consulted with the God about such matters as they came for, they returned back again into their own Countrey; and as they passed thorow Baotia, took Scedasus house by the way, there for to lodge; who at that time was not at Leudra, out gone forth: howbeit his daughters according to their courteous bringing up, and their unal maner of entertainment, received these two guests into the house, who seeing their opportunity, and that maner of entertainment, received these two guests into the house, who seeing their opportunity, and that they were alone, forced and defoured the silly maidens: and after this deed, seeing them exceedingly they were alone, forced and defoured the silly maidens: offended and angry for this villany offered unto them, so as by no means they would be appealed, they proceeded farcher, and murthered them both, and when they had fo done, threw them into a certain blinde pit, and so departed. Scedafus being returned home, found all things else in his house fase and found as he left them, onely his two daughters he could not meet with, neither wift he what to fay or do, until fuch time as a Bitch that he had began to white and complain, running one while to him. and another while training him as it were to the pit fide, whereupon at length, he suspected that which was, and fo drew forth the dead bodies of his two daughters; understanding moreover by his neighbors, that the day before they had feen going into his house those two yong men of Lacedemon, who not long before had been lodged with him; he doubted presently that they were those who had committed this crime, and namely, when he called to minde that the first sime they came, they did nothing but praise the maidens, saying, That they reputed them most happy, whose sortine should be to espouse them for their wives. Well, to Lacedomon he went, for to confer with the Ephoriabout this matter; and by that time that he entred within the Territory of Argos, he was benighted, fo that he took up his lodging in a common lon or Hoftelry; within which he found another poor old man, born in the City Oreum, within the Province Helirea, whom when Scedafus heard to figh and groan grievoully, yea and to fall a curfing of the Lacedemonians, he demanded what the Lacede monians had done unto him, that he fared thus against them; the old man set tale an end, and said, That a subject he was of the Spattans, and that when one Arijtodemus was sent as Governor from the State of Sparta, into the City Oreum, he had dealt very cruelly, and committed many outrrom the state of state of state of the stat lence to hale him out of the publike wreftling place, where he exercised himself with other his sees and companions: The Warden of the exercises impeached the faid Governor, with the affiftance of many yong men, who ren into the refcue, in fuch fort, as for that present Artstodennus retired without effect; but the next morrow having fet out and manned a Galley of purpose, he came with a second charge, and carried away my childe; and no sooner was he rowed from Oreum, to the other fide of the water, but he offered to abuse his body; which when the youth would in no wise abide, nor yield unto, he made no more ado but cut his throat, and killed him outright in the place; which done, he returned back to Oreum, where he feasted his friends, and made great cheer: This accident was I foon advertifed of (quoth the old man) whereupen I went and performed the last duty unto my fon; and folemnized his funeral; and fo immediately put my felf upon my journey toward Sparta, where I complained unto the Ephori, or Lords Controllers, declaring unto them the whole fact, but they gave no ear unto me, nor made any reckoning of my grievance. Scedafus hearing this tale, was ill apaid and troubled in his minde, imagining that the Spartans would make as little account of him; and therewith to requite his tale, related for his part likewise unto the stranger, his own cafe; who thereupon gave him counfel, not fo much as once to go unto the Epheri, but to return immediately back into Bastia, and to creet a Tomb for his two daughters. Howbeit, Sudasus would not be ruled by him, but held on his journey forward to Sparta, and opened his griff unto the Lords Controulers beforefaid; and when he faw that they took small heed of his words, he addressed himself to the Kings of Sparta; yea, and afterwards to some particular Burgeosies of the City, unto whom he declared the fact, and bewailed his own infortunity. But feeing that all boned not, he ranup and down the freets of the City, firetching forth his hands up to heaven, and to the bun, and stamping upon the ground with his feet, calling upon the furies of hel to be revenged, and at last killed himself. But in process of time the Lacedemonians paid deerly for this their injustice: for when they were grown to that greatness, that they commanded all Greece, and had planted their Garisons in every City; first Epaminondas the Theban cut the throats of those Souldiers who lay in Garrifon at Thebes; whereupon the Lacedemonians made war upon the Thebanes, who went our with a power to encounter them as far as to the village of Leulira, taking that place for a good prefage unto them; for that before time they had been there delivered out of levisude, what time as Amph live chalded by Sibenelus; fled and retired himself unto the City of Thebes; where finding them subdaded by the Chalcidians, and made their tributaries. After he had slain Chalcedon the King of the Elbeaus, he cased the Thebanes of the tribute which they before had paid. So it fortuned, that the Lacedemonians were discomfited and defeated, neer unto the very same Monument or Tomb of the faid two daughters of Scedasus. It is reported moreover, that a little before this battel, Scedasus appeared in a vision or dream unto Pelopidas; one of the Captains of the Thebane Army, who had been altogether discouraged with certain signs and foretokens, which he judged and interperced to portend ill; whom Scedasus willed to take a good heart, for that the Lacedemonians were thicher come, for to suffer that punishment which they owed to him and his daughters; advising him withal, the day before the encountered with the Lacedemonians, to sacrifice a yong white sole or cols, which he should finde ready even before the Sepulchre of his two daughters. And then Pelopidas, whiles the enemies lay yet encountered at Tegea, sent before nnto Leulira, for to enquire of the said Tomb; and being enformed thereof by the inhabitants of the Country, advanced forward boldly with his Army, and wan the field.

4. Phocus, a Bæorian born (for descended he was from Gleisas) had a daughter named Callirrhoe, a maiden of fingular beauty, and furpaling honefly and fibriety withal. So there were to the number of thirty yong Centlemen, the nobleft and best reputed of all Bactia, who were all fuiters unto her in the way of marriage. But Phocus her father made always fome delay or other; and found means to put off fill from day to day, as fearing left he should be forced. At last seeing how he was overpressed with thele inftant wooers; he requested them to refer the election of him that should be her husband unto the Oracle of Apollo. The yong men taking indignation at these words and answer of his, fell upon him, and flew him: but in this affray and tumult, the yong maiden escaped, and ran thorow the fields into the Countrey: but the yong lufty fuiters made after and purfued her ; and she lighting upon certain husbandmen, who were laying together and piling up of wheat upon a floor in a rick, by the means of them faved herfelf; for the faid husbandmen hid her within the corn, fo as they paffed by who followed in chase after her. Thus having escaped this danger, she expected the solemn feast and general affembly, called Pambaotia, for that all the Bootians met together : then came sho to the City of Coronea, and there in habit and form of a suppliant, she sate before the altar of Minerva Itenia; where the related unto all comers the enormous wickedness and mischief committed by her woers, rehearsing them every one by name, and shewing in what Countrey each one was born. The Bootians took pity of the Damiel, and were highly difpleased and incensed against those yong Gentlemen: which they hearing, fled into the City Orchomenus, but the Orchomenians would not receive them : by occasion whereof they meant to put themselves within Hippora, a pretty Town neer unto Helicon, situate betyeen Thebes and Coronea, which gave them entertaintment. Then fent the Thebanes unto the inhabitants thereof certain perfons, to call upon them for to deliver up the murderers of Phoeus, that they might receive justice accordingly: but when they would not yield to to do, the Thebanes with other Bertians, gathered an Army, and went against them, under the leading of Phadus, who at that time was the chief ruler of Thebes, and laid fiege unto the faid Town, which being otherwise strongly fortified, was in the end forced for want of water ; where they stoned to death the murderers; brought the inhabitants unto bondage and flavery; rafed their walls, overthrew their dwelling houses, and divided their whole territories among the Thebanes and Coronwans. The report goeth, that over night before that this Town of Hippore was won, there was a voyce heard from the mount Helicon of one effloors iterating these words: Here I am, here I am; which voyce the thirty wooers knew all very well to be the speech of Fbocus. Also the same day that they were stoned, it is faid that the Monument or Tomb of this old man, which flood at Gleifas, flowed and ran with faffron. Thus when Phedus the Captain, and Ruler of the Thebanes, returned from war with victory, news came unto him that his wife was delivered of a daughter; which he taking to be a good prefage, named her thereupon Nicoltrata.

5. Alippus, a Lucedemonian born, esponsed a Lady named Democrita; by whom he was the father of two daughters, who always both giving counfel unto the City for the best things, and also ready in person to struce, and execute the same in all occurrences presented, for the good of his Countrey, incurred the envy and emulation of his concurrents in the Government of the State, who with false surplished and landerous imputations, went about to seduce the Epbori, buzzing into their heads, how this Alippus would overthrow the laws, and change the whole State and Commonwealth of Sparta: infomuch as they banished him out of his Countrey, and would not suffer his wise with her daughters to follow him: and that which works is, they did conflictate his goods, to the end that his daughters might have no portions to bellow them for their advancement in marriage. And notwithstanding that divers yong men in regard of their fathers vertue, made means for to marry these maidens without any dowry, yet his adversaries wrought fo cunningly, that they passed and and publiske Edic, forbidding expessly, that any man should seek unto them for marriage: for they alledged and presended that their mother Democrita had often times made her prayers unto the Gods, that her daughters and waited a certain solemn and session between the control of the City with their daughters, and waited a certain solemn and session and selfival day, which the Dames of the City, with their daughters, and waited a certain solemn and session and itself the hold of the solution of the state.

wives of Magiffrates and menof honor, watched and paffed the whole night by themselves in a great and spacious hall. When this day was come, the girded herself with a dagger or skein under her clothes, and taking her daughters with her, when night came, went into the Temple; and observing the opportunity of the time, when all the faid dants were buste in their divine service, and hard at their devotions in the hall abovefaid, when all the ways and passes were shut up, the brought a great deal of wood which was provided for the facrisce, and piled the same against the doors, and so set it on fire, but when their husbands came running for to help from all parts, Democrite killed her two daughters and herself upon them. The Lacedemonians not knowing upon whom to discharge their anger, caused the dead bodies of Democrita and her two daughters to be thrown without the confines and liberties of their Territory: for which act of theirs, God being highly displeased, fent (as the Chronicles do record) a great earthquake among the Lacedemonians.

Whether Creatures be more wife, they of the Land, or those of the water.

The Summary.

Nithis Treatife and Discourse, affording (among other things) much pleasure in the reading, Plutarch beingeth in two yong Gentlemen, Ariftotimus and Phoedimus, who in the presence of a frequent company plead the cause of living creatures: Aristotimus in the first place, for them of the land; and Phoedimus in the second, for those of the water : the drift and conclusion of whose pleas cometh to this point; that without resolving unto whom the prize ought to be adjudged, one of the company inserreth that the examples alledged both of the one fida, and of the other, do prove that those creatures have some use of reason. Moreover, we may diffinilly divide this book into three principal parts: the first containeth a conference between Sociarus and Autobulus, who gave ear afterwards unto the others: for Sociarus taking occasion to speak of a written difcourse recited in the praise of hunting, commendeth this exercise, and preservesh it before combats of Swordplayers and Fencers; which Autobulus will in no wife approve, but holdesh that this war against beasts, schoolcob(as it were) and trainesh men to learn for to kill one another afterwards. And for that some entrunce and access there was to be given unto the principal disputation, of the intelligence and knowledge which is in brute bealts, they do examine the opinion of the Stoicks, who bereave them of all understanding, passion and pleasure: which opinion of theirs being at large debated, is afterward refuted ; with this resolution, that man cut goeth house upmones incorp, and quickness of wit, in justice and equity meet for civil fociety, and yet begin, although they be more dull and heavy then men, are not therefore void of all discourse and natural rea son. Then Autobulus confirmeth this by the confideration of borfes and dogs enraged : a sufficient testimony that such creatures befor time had rea on and understanding. Sociarus opposith himself against such a confirmation, in the bibels of the Bricks and Peripateticks: whereupon Autobulus distinguishes of the arguments and inclining partly to the fide of the Pythagoreans, sheweth what maner of justice or injustice we ought to consider in the carriage of men toward bealts. And then come the two yong Gentlemen abovenamed in place; where Aristocimus taking in hand the cause of Land-benst', discourseth at large therenpon, which is the second part of this present treatise. True it is shat all the beginning of his plea is defedive and wanting howbeit, that which remaineth and is extant heweth sufficiently the careful industry of our author in searching into the History of nature, and examples drawn out thereof, as also ent of an infinite number of book; to passing good purpose. Well then, Aristocian sheweib in the first place; that the bunning of Land-beasts, is a far nobler and more commendable exercise then that of the water : and coming then to the point; namely, to the use of reason, which consistet in the election and presence of one thing before another, in provisions, forecasts, and preregatives in affections, as wel these which be mile & gentle, as the other which are violentin diligence and industry in arts and sciences in bardines sequity, temperance, courage and magnanimity, le proveth all this to be (without comparison) far more in land-creatures then in the other: for the proof and verifying whereof, he produceth bulls, elephants, lions, mice, fwallows, spiders, ravens, dogs, b.es, geefe, cranes, berous, pijnires, wolves, faxes, mules, partridges, bares, bears, such ins, and diver farts befides of four footed bealts: of fewil likewife, infells, worms and ferpents; all which are specified in particular afterwards: In the last part, Phoedinus making force excuse that be was not well prepared, taketh in band neverthelesisthe cause of fishes; and in the very entrance, declareth, that notwithst anding it be an hard matter to them the sufficiency of such creatures, which are so divided and severed from us 3 yet not with standing, produce he will her proofs and arguments drawn from certain and notable things, recommending fishes in this respect, that they are so wise and considerate (as he sheweth by examples) being not taughs, nourished, nor any ways framed and trained by man, like as most part of land-bealts be; and yet by the way be proveth by eels, lampreis and creccdiles, that filles may be made tame with men, and how our ancients efteemed highly the infittution of such mute creatures: after this he describeth their natural prudence, both in defending themselves, and also in offending and assailing others, alledging infinite examples to this purpose: as the skill and knowledge they have in the Mathematicky, their amity, their (ellowship, their love, their kinde affection to their yong ones: alledging in the end divers histories of dolphins love unto men ; whereupon Sociarus saking occasion to speak, inferreth that these two pleader, agree in one point, and if a man would joyn and lay together their arguments, proofs, and reasonisky would make bead passing well and strongly against those, who would take from beasts, both of land and water, all discourse of reason. Whether Whether Creatures be more wife, they of the Land, or those of the water.

Антовиция.

Emidai, a King of Lacedemon, being demanded upon a time what he thought of Tyricius: I take him to be (quoth he) a good Poet, to whet and pollish the courages of yong men; for that by his vertee he doth imprise in the hearts of yong Gentlemen an ardent affection, with a magnanimous defire to win honor and glory, in regard whereof, they will not fpare themselves in battels and fights, but expose their lives to all perils whatsoever: Semblably, am I greatly afraid my very good friends, left het discourse as touching the praise of hunting, which was read yelferday in this company, hath so flired up and excited beyond all measure our yong men, who love the game sowell, that from henceforth they will think all other things but access flires and by matters, or rather make no account at all of other exercise, but will run altogether unto this sport, and minde none other besides, considering that I finde my self now a fresh more horly given, and youthfully affectionate thereunto then mine age would require, infomuch as according to the words of dame Phadrá in Euripide:

All my defire is now to call
And cry unto my hounds in chafe,
The dapple Stag and Hinde withal,
To bunt and follow hard at trace.

So neer unto the quick did that discourse touch me, alledging such a number of proper and pithy

SOCLARUS

True it is that you fay, O Autobulus, for methought that therein he flitred up and awakened his fingular eloquence and skill in Rhetorick, which some time he had discontinued, and which lay affecp to gratific (a! take it) those yong Gentlemen who were present in place, and withat to sloace and disport himself among them; but that which pleased me most was this. When he represented unto our eyes by way of comparison, Sword-sencers fighting at sharp one with another to the titrance; alledging this for one of his reasons, wherefore he principally commended hunting, in that is divertesh and calleth away a certain affection that we have either naturally engrassed, or else acquired by use and custom to take pleasure in seeing men at swords-point enter into combat for life and death one against another, and turneth it especially hither, yielding unto usa fair, pure, and innocent speciacle of artificial cunning, conjoyned with hardiness and courage, guided with reason, against bruiss force and witels strength: and in so doing, giveth us to understand, that this sentence of Euripides is worthy to be prassed, when he saith,

Small is mans strength and puissance corporal 3 His wit is great, and prudence natural; It tames all fish beneath in sea so deep, And wily beasts aloft on earth that keep. A UTOBULUS.

And yet my good friend Soclarus, some there be who hold, that this inflexible rigor and favage into paffibility of not being moved at all with pity, came from hence into mens hearts, namely, from the cultom of killing of beafts in chase, and of learning not to have in honor the fight of bloodshed, and of the grievons wounds of beafts which they received, but to take delight in seeing them to dye, and to be cut in pieces: and like as in the City of Athens, when it was reduced under the tyrannic of the thirty Ufurpers, the first man whom they put to death was a Sycophant, of whom it was faid then, that he had well deferved it, and was rightly ferved; and so they saidby a second and a third : but from thence they went forward by little and little, until they came to lay hold upon honest men, and in the end spared not the best and mest vertuous Citizens: even so he that killed at first a Bear, or a Wolf, was highly commended, and thought to have done a very good deed; and an Ox or Swine that had eaten fome things provided for a Sacrifice or Oblation to the gods, was condemned as fit and worthy to dye: hereupon Stags and Hindes, Hares also and Goats, which men began already to eat, invited also the flesh of Sheep, yea, and in some places of Dogs and Horses to the table. But they who taught first to dismember, and cut in pieces for meat, a tame Goose, a house Dove, and familiar Pigeon, a dunghil Cock, or domestical Hen of the roust, and that not for to fatisfic and remedy the necessity of hunger, as do those Weezils and Cats, and but onely for pleafure, and to feed a dainty tooth, furely have confirmed and firengthened all that bloodiness and savage cruelty which was in our neture, and made it altogether inflexible and immoveable without any compassion: but contrariwise enseebled and dulled for the most part all natural mildress and humanity; whereas on the other fide, the Pythagoreans would have men to accustom themselves to use gentleness even towards beafts, as an exercise of pity and mercy to men: for custom, which traineth us familiarly by little and little to any passion and affection, hath a wondrous efficacy, to fee a man forward thereunto. But I wot not how, being entred into speech, we have forgotten our to see a man for war us to that which was begun yellerday, and should be continued and held on this day; for yelterday as you know very well, having agreed upon this, That all forts of living creatures have nor yenteresy as you allow the metalling the most of a learned and pleafant in them fome little difcourse and reason, we gave good occasion and matter of a learned and pleafant dispurations, unto our young Genclemen, who love hunting so well, namely, as souching the wir and dispurations, unto our young Genclemen, who love hunting so well, namely, as souching the wir and widom of beafts, whether there be more in them of the land, or those of the sea? which question we are, as I take it, this day to decide, in case Aristotimus and Phadimus hold on ftill, and persistintheir defiances and challenges, which yesterday they gave one another; for the one of them undertook unto his friends and companions, to maintain that the earth bringeth forth beafts of more fenfe, capacity and understanding; and the other contrariwise promised as much in the behalf of the water.

SOCLARUS.

That they do, Autobulus, they are of the fame minde fill to diffute it out, and here they will be anon for this very purpose; for I saw them in the morning betimes, addressing and making themselves ready: but if you think it good, before this combat begin, let us go in hand again with that which yeslerday should have been handled, and was not; partly for that the time and place served not thereto; or rather because the matter wat proposed unto them at the Table, and among the cups of wine, which went merrily about, and not treated of in good earnest and fadness indeed : for one there was, who feemed after a pragmatical fort to refound on the adverse part not impertinently, as if he came out of the Stoicks School; thus much, That like as mortal is opposite to immortal, corruptible unto uncorruptible, and corporal to incorporal; even fo, confefs we ought, that reasonable is contrary to unreasonables to that it one of them be, the other ought likewise of necessity to be, and that this onely couple of contrarics among so many other, ought to be lest defectuous or unperfect.

Auroвиция.

And what is he, friend Seclarus, who will fay, that it we admit in nature, that which is reasonable to subsist and have being; we should not likewise allow that which is unreasonable: for (no doubt) it is, and that in great measure, namely in all creatures which have no life nor foul : neither need we to feek farther for any other opposition unto that which is reasonable; for whatsoever is without life and foul, is incontinently opposite unto that which together with foul, hath the use of understanding and reason: and if any one there be who maintaineth, that nature for all this is not unperfect, in that every fubitance having foul is either reasonable or unreasonable : another will say unto him likewife, that a nature endued with life and foul, is not defective, namely in that, either it hath imaginatior, or elle is without; it is either fensitive, or else bath no fense; to the end that it may have on either tide these two oppositions or privations, making counterpoise one against another, about one and the fame kinde, as two contrary branches ariling out of one from or trunk. And if he think him to be abfurd, who demandeth that it should be granted unto him, that of a nature endued with foul, one branch fhould be fensitive, and another senseless; for that he thinketh that every nature which hatha foul is incontinently both fensitive, and also imaginative: yet for all this shall he have no more apparance to require that one should suppose this unto him for to be true; namely, that whatsoever hath foul, should be either reasonable or unreasonable, discoursing with those men, who held opinion that nothing hath sense, but the same hath understanding withal; and that there is not one kinde of animal creatures, but it hath some manner of opinion and discourse of reason, like as it hath sense and natural appetite: for nature, who as men fay, and that right truly, maketh all things for some cause, and to some end, hath not made a living creature sensitive, onely and simply to have a passive fense: but whereas there be a number of things proper and agreeable to it, and as many again for them, contrary; it could not possibly endure and continue the minute of an hour, if it knew not how to fit it felf with one, and to take heed and beware of the other. So it is therefore, that fenfe giveth unto every animal creature the knowledge of them both indifferently: but the discretion which accompanieth the faid fenfe, in chusing, receiving, and pursuing after that which is profitable; or resuing, rejecting and flying from that which is burtful and pernicious: there is no apparance at all of reason to induce us to fay, that those creatures have, if they had not withal some mean faculty and aptitude natural, to difcourfe, judge, conceive, comprehend, retain and remember: as for those creatures verily, from which you take altogether the gift of expectance, remembrance, election, provision, and preparation aforehand: and moreover, the faculty of hoping, fearing, defiring and refuling; good they have none atall of their eyes, of their ears, or any other fenle, apprehention or imagination, in cafe there be no use thereof: and far better it were for them, that they were clean destinate and quite deprived of fuch faculties, then to suffer travel, pain and forrow, and have not wherewith to put by and repel fuch inconveniences: and yet there is a discourse extant of the natural Philosopher Strate, shewing by plain demonstration, that impossible it is to have any sense at all, without some discourse of reason: for many times we run over the letters in Books and Writings with our eyes; yea, and we hear the found of words with our care, without conceiving and comprehending either the one or the other, but they fly and pass away, when as our minde is otherwise occupied : but afterwards when the minde is come again to it felf and united it, it runneth and pursueth after the same, and gathereth every thing together again which was scattered: In regard whereof it was not faid amis in old time:

The minde it is, that doth both hear and see : As for the rest, full deaf and blinde they bee.

As if the motion and pallion about the eyes and care, caused no sense at all, if the minde and under-Handing were away. And therefore Cleomenes King of Lacedemon, being one day at a feast in Egypt, where there was rehearfed at the table a pretty Acroame, or ear-delight, which pleased the company very well; being demanded the question what he thought of it? and whether he judged it not very well penned and fet down? As for that (quoth he) I report me unto you that heard it, and I refer it to your judgement; for my part, my minde was all the while in Peloponnefus. And thereforenecefary it is, that every creature which hath fenfe, should likewise be endued with discourse of reason and understanding, considering that by our understanding we come to sense. But set the case that the and many on need at all of the understanding, to exercise their functions and operations: but when the sense hath done her partyin discerning that which is proper and samiliar unto a living creature, from it that is contrary and adverse unto it, it passeth a way and is gone. What is it then that remembreth and calleth to minde? what is it that feareth things notiome and offenfive, and contrariwise defireth those which be good and wholesome? what is it that seeketh means to compassand get things when they are not prefent? what is it that devileth and prepareth offensive forts and retract, yes, and engines to catch and take? or contrariwife, thifts and policies to escape nets and grins layed for them, when they areat the point to be caught and surprized? and yet these men say as much as this comes to, when ever and anon in all their Introductions they dull our eart, and make our heads ake again with their * That is definitions; for they define millers, that is to lay, a project or deliberate purpole, to be a delign of to lay, Stobringing fomesomewhat to effect; ieisend, that is to say, endeavor, to be an appetite or desire before icks. an appetite; wasdordi, that is to fay, provision, to be an action before action; ushun, that is to fay, remembrance or memory, to be the comprehension of a proposition affirmative or negative, already paft; whereof the present truth was otherwise comprized by the sense : for of all these faculties, there is not fo much as one reasonless (I mean) not proceeding from the discourse of reason: and yet they Brocco much as one features and all concur, and are to be found inevery living creature: and even to verily, they define vibros, that is to fay, intelligences, to be notions laid up apart and referred within 5 but Justices, that is to fay, and the state of the stat cogitations, to be notions still in motion: as for passions, they confessing and defining them all in generality to be evil judgements, and false opinions, a wonder it is how they pass over so many eff cts and motions which are to be found in brute beafts; some proceeding from anger and choler, others againfrom fear: and besides all this, envy (I may tell you) and jealousie; when as they themselves (believe me) flick not to punish their horses, and beat their dogs, when they do a fault; not rashly and in vain, but confiderately, for to correct them, and make them wifer, working thereby and im ri ting in in vain, our connectacy stort to correct transparent many and the stort and transparent many them a displeasure with themselves proceeding from pain, which we call repentance: as touching other pleasures and delights, that which passeth and is received by the ears, they term it (for sooth) many, that is to fay, an enchantment; that which cometh by the eye, and a, that is to fay, bewitching; and they use both the one and the other against wilde beafts; for certain it is, that Stags and Horse do joy in the found of Whistles, Flues and Heuboys: also men call forth Crabish, Crevisses and grampels out of their holes perforce, with burning torches and light fire-brands: moreover, it is faid, that the fill Alofa hearing men to fing, to clay their hands, or otherwise to make a noise, will arise out of the water, and come abroad: likewise, the horn owl or bustard is (as it were) enchantarne out of the water, and come auroau; income, the nontown of bonard 18 (as it were) enchanced with the beholding of men dancing together in his fight, and to far overtaken he is with the delight thereof, that whiles he thinketh to counterfeit their jeftures, firring and moving his shoulders according to the measures with them, 'he suffereth himself (like a fool) to be taken by the fowler. As for those who of these matters speak so feolithly and absurdly, saying, that beasts rejoyce not, are not angry, nor fearful; and namely, that the * Nightingale doth not fludy, meditate and prepare against her finging; that the Bee hath no memory; but that the Swallow feemeth onely to make provision by a kinde of Providence; that the Lyon is (as it were) angry; and the Hinde given as though the were afraid: I wot not what answer they will make to those who shall urge them to this, that they phy massmay as fwel say, that the same creatures neither see nor hear, but seem onely (as it were) to hear and sense see see see and to have a voyce; and in one word, that they live not at all, but seem to live: for lassure said you (in my judgement) these are no more repugnant to evidence and daily experience then the other. *a.,as Pliny SOCLARUS.

I think no less (O Autobulus) and therefore range me among those of your opinion in this point. enless you Butto compare the maners, lives, actions, behaviours and conversations of men, with those of beasts, read xeal. and to affirm that beafts herein fort with us : besides, that I fee in this, great indignity derogatory to dozain this and to affirm that bealts herein fort with us: Deflutes, that the in this given unto them the beginning fente, that mans worthine is, I doubt much, and cannot conceive how nature hath given unto them the beginning the Swals of vertue, which is reason, and unto which reason is referred and doth aim, cousidering they cannot lew doth attain unto the end: and besides, there is not one of them all that sheweth any sign of tending there-not preto, of progress therein, or of desire and appetite that ways fore band:

AUTORULUS. Yea, but this (my good friend Soclarus) is no strange and absurd thing with these men, I mean 160 Pliny the Stoicks: for notwithstanding that they put down the natural love and affection which we have mendeth to the iffue of our own bodies begotten, for the foundation of civil fociety and of juffice, and fee the her India same in brute beasts very evident and puissant, yet for all that, they statly and stouchy deny that they stry in arhave any part of justice in them. And that which more is, Mules are not without all the instruments riscial of generation; for nature hath given to the males generative members, and to the females the parts fit building. for conception ; yea, and in the use of these members and instruments they have the same delight and pleasure which other creatures have; howbeit, they never speed, nor attain to the end of generation, Confider again on the other fide, whether it were not a ridiculous absurdity for such Philosophers as they would feem to be, to affirm and maintain, that Socrates and Plato, and fuch men as they, wereno less vicious then any vile flave or wicked wretch in the world, but that all were foolish, withes, lascivious tets vicious tiem any vici have or winded with them be equal) and then to lay the blame and fault in the fource and beginning of vertue, that is to fay, Reason, as being not pure nor perfect in brute beafasto the accomplishment of vertue: as if this were not fome defect and imbecility of reason, feeting they confels themselves that there is an impersection in the use of reason, of which all beasts be full: for we see in many of them, that there is cowardize, intemp:rance, injuffice and malice. Now he who affirmeth, that whatfoever is not apt and fitted by nature, to receive reason aright and in ample maner, is simply not capable of reason : first he doth as much as if he maintained, that neither the Ape is capable of ill-favored deformity, nor the Tortoile of flow pace, because the one of them is nor susceptible of beautiful favor, detormity, nor the 1 ortone on now page, occane the one of them is not interpulse or occanitud favor, nor the other of (wiftness and good footmanship. Again, he doth not fee and mark the difference between reason perfect, and simple reason; for reason simply proceedest from nature, but honest, vertuous, and rersfect reason cometh by industry, study, diligence and teaching; which is the cause that all creatures endued with a sensitive soul, are capable and susceptible of a kinde of discipline and learning by the endued with a sensitive soul, are capable and susceptible of a kinde of discipline and learning by the contractive soul and the sensitive soul industrial sensitive soul sensitive sensitive soul sensitive sensitive sensitive sensitive sensitive sensitiv means of this faculty of discourse and reason : marry this absolute and right reason indeed which we affect and feek for, and is nothing elfe but fapience and wildom, they are not able to name any one man that ever attained unto it. Like as therefore a difference there is between fight and fight, between flight and flight; for Hawks (se otherwise then Grashoppers do, Eagles also and Partridges flie not alike, even so all creatures endued with reason, have not the like vivacity, pomptitude and nimbleness of reason, as to reach up to the highest pitch and perfection thereof: for we may observe in some beasts many evident tokens of just fociety, of valor, of witty industry in their provision and dispose : and contrariwise in others as many figns of infociable violence and injuffice, of cowardize and fortifiness, as witnessed that which now moveth the contention & debate between our yong Gentlemen; for as if they both fupposed there was a difference in this behalf, some of them maintain, that naturally the beafts of the land are proceeded farther in vertue ; and others contrariwise affirm, the same of those in the sea and waters; a thing very evident, who foever will compare Storks with the river Horles; for those do nourish and feed their fathers who engendered them, whereas those do kill them, because they might ride and cover their mothers: as also who will but confer Cock Doves with Patridges; for Doves do often times (quash and mar the eggs, yea, and otherwhiles kills the Hens when they cove or fit, because they are not willing during that time to be troden; whereas the male Patridges take upon them part of the care and pain in fitting upon the eggs, and in their turn do keep them warm, that they chill not; yea, and that which more is, they be the first that bring meat in their bills unto the little ones newly hatched; and if haply the dam range abroad, rarry forth too long out of the neft, the male beau and pecks her with his bill, drives her home to her eggs and yong birds. As for Antipater who reproacheth and rebuketh both Afferand Sheep for their filthinds, and being so negligent in keeping themselves clean, he hath forgotten (I wot not how) to speaks of Ounces and Swallows: for the Ounces feek a by-place by themfelves apart, where no beflow their urine, and by all means hide and conceal that fine ftony (ubfance, called Lyncurium, which is engendred of it: and the Swallows teach their yong ones to turn their tails fo, as they may men out of their nefts. Moreover, why fay we not that one tree is more ignorant or untaught then another, like as we hold, and that truly, that a Sheepis more dull of capacity then a Dog? or that this herb is more fearful then that, like as we affirm very well, that a Stag is more timorous, or rathar less valorous then a Lyon: and as in things which are unmoveable, we never fay, that one is more flow then another; nor among fuch things as yield no found at all, that this hath a smaller or bigger voice then that; Semblably, it is never faid, that there is lefe wit, more dulnets, and greater intemperance in such or such things, unless it be in that kinde, whereof all by nature are endued with the gift of reason, and of prudence in some measure, which puiffance and faculty being given to some more, and to others less, is that which maketh all the difference that we fee. Yea marry, but there is no comparison, will some man say, between men and beafts; so infinirely surpasseth he them in fineness of wit, in justice and equity, beseeming civil fociety, that it is wonderful. And even fo (my good friend) there be many which in bigness and firength of body, in swesses of see, in quickness of eye-sight, and subtility, of hearing our go all the men in the world, and leave them far behinde, and yet for all this, we are not to infer and conclude that man is blinde, that he is impotent of hand and foot, or otherwise deaf: neither hath nature deprived us altogether of big arms and bodies, or of strength both in the one and the other, although in comparison of the Elephans and the Camel, our force and bulk of body is nothing: after the same maner may we speak of beafte; if their discourse and understanding be more groß, if their wit be more dull then ours, it followeth not thereupon, that they have neither reason nor natural wit: for without all question, both they have, seeble though they be and troubled, like as an eye is otherwhiles weak, dim, and muddy: and were it not that I certainly expect, and that among our yong men who are fludious, learned, and very well feen in the Books of our ancient Writers, that they will alledge an infinite number of examples, the one from the land, and the other our of the fea; I could not contain my felf, but recite and alledge here before you an innumerable fort of proofs and arguments, as well of the natural fubtility of beafts, as of their docility, which the beautiful and famous City of Rome hath afforded unto us to draw and lade up aboundantly by whole scuppers and buckets sull (as they say,) from the stately theaters of their Emperors, and the princely games exhibited there.

Bug let us leave this matter fresh and entire for those young men, thereby to embellish their discourses, and set out their eloquence: mean while, I would gladly examine and consider one point with you, now that we are at leisure. For I suppose, that in every part and natural power or faculty of our body, there doth befal some proper defect, some maime or malady, as namely, in the eye, blindness; in the legslameness; in the tongue, stutting and stammering; and that which is proper to one member, is not incident unto another : for we use not to fay, that a thing is become blinde, which never had power by nature to fee, nor lame, which was not ordained to go; neither was there ever man who would fay, that a thing stammered which never had tongue, or muffled and wharled, which naturally yieldeth no voice at all : and even so we cannot (to speak properly and truly) term that foolifh, furious, or enraged, which by course of nature is not capable of understanding, discourse and reason: for impossible it is, that a part may be said to be interested, affected or prejudiced in a thing, which never had an aptitude or natural power, that might receive diminution, privation, mutilation, or otherwise some infirmity: and yet I doubt not, but you have otherwhiles seen dogs run mad; and for mine own part I have known horfes enraged; and there be moreover, who affirm that kine and other beeves will be horn-wood, yea and foxes as well as dogs; but the example of dogs whereof no man makes doubt, may fuffice to prove and bear witness, that this kind of beast hath reason and understanding, and the same not in small measure to be contemned, but when it chanceth that it is troubled and confounded, then comes upon them that disease which is called rage and madness. For, that at fuch a time we cannot perceive in them, that either their fight or their hearing is altered : but like as he that should give out of a man, who is over-charged with a melancholike humour, or given to rave and go beside himself, that his understanding is not transported and out of order, that his discourse of reason is not out of the way, nor his brains broken, or memory corrupt, were very ablurd: for that the ordinary custome and behaviour of such foolish and bestraught persons sufficiently convinceth, that they are past themselves, and have lost the discourse of reason; even so, whosoever thinketh that mad dogs fuffer any other passion, then a consusion and perturbation of that part in them, which before time was wont to imagine, discourse and remember, in such fort, that when they be thus surprized with rage, they are so foolish and sortish, as they know not their best friends, who were wont to make much of them, but flie those places of their feeding and bringing up, which they used most to haunt and to converse in, and do not so much as discern, but oversee that which is presented plain before them: this man (I say) seemeth obstinately to strive against the truth, and not to comprehend that which daily experience doth fhew.

SOCLARUS. Certer, your conjecture in mine opinion is very good, and you are in the right: but the Stoicks and Peripareticles fifth stand against all this, and impogne it with tooth and nail, saying: That justice can-not have any other breeding and beginning; and that impossible it is to maintain that there is any justice in the world, if it be consessed that all beasts are any wayes capable of reason: for that necessary ry it is, either that we do injury in not sparing them; or in case we make no use of them for our food, that impossible it were for us to live; or else our life should remain distitute of such things as well it may not mils and be without. In sum, that we were to live in some fort a savage and beast-like life, if we should reject the profits and commodities which they, affird. For I pass by infinite thousands and millions of the Troglodyts and Nomades, that know no other feeding, but of flesh onely and nothing elfe: but as for us who feem to lead a milde, civil, and more gentle life, what work were there left for us to do upon the land? what bufiness have we at Sea? what skill or art should we exercise among the mountains? what ornament or beauty would there be in our life, if we were taught this once as a true leffon, that we ought to respect all beasts, and use all equity towards them, as being reasonable creatures as we are, and made of the same mould that we be? Certes, it were very hard to lay; and therefore there is no answer to affoil this doubt; no medicine or falve to heal this fore; no device to undo this knot, and difficulty, which taketh away, either all civility, or elfe all juffice out of mans life, unics we keep that ancient limit and law, whereby God having separated (according as Hefiodus faith) fundry natures) fundry natures, and diftinguished every kind a part by it felf.

To fifbes, beafts and feathered fowles, bath granted power and might,

One of another for to feed, because they have no right. To men alone, he justice cave therein to take delight.

Given (1 (ay) he hath justice unto them for to exercise among themselves: and as for other living creatures, as they, cannot deal justly with us; so it is certain that we cannot use, injustice to them: and look whosever reject this conclusion and resolution, have left no other use, nor so much as a simple way whereby justice may enter and come among us.

Now truly my friend, you have faid this very well, and even according to the mind and hearts defire of the femen: howbeit we are not to give and grant unto schefe Philosophers (as the manner is to tie about those women who have hard travel, some Operations) or medicinable drogue, to cause them for to have more speedy and east: deliverance) this device to hang upon them, that they may with east and without all pain, bear and bring forth justice unto us; seeing that in the main and most important points of all Philosophy, they would not allow Epicarus so small a things, and so vile, as it decline

one only atome, or indivisible body never so little aside, for to make way for the stars, for living creatures, and fortune to come into the world, and that thereby our free will might be faved : for they ought either to prove by demonstration, that which is doubtfull, or to suppose that which of it self is manifeft; and not to take this article as touching beafts, for to establish juffice, seeing that it is neither confessed and granted unto them, nor they otherwise do prove it; for another path-way there is to bring in julice among men, which is nothing to slippery, dangerous, and full of steep downfalls, nor that which leadeth thorough the subversion and overthrow of things most evident; even that which my fon and one of your familiar friends (Sociarus) having learned of Plate, doth fhew and teach those who will not obstinately contest, bus tollow reason and learn: for that man is not altogether clear and void of injuffice, in using beafts, and dealing with them as he doth, Heraclieus and Empedocles receive as an undoubted truth, complaining in many places, and reproaching nature, as if the were under necessity, and a very war, having in her nothing that is simple, pure, sincere, and unmixed, but performing all her operations by many unjust accidents and passions; seeing they hold that even her generation proceeded from injustice, namely, by conjunction of mortall with immortal, and in that the thing which is engendred thereof, rejoiceth to difmember unnaturally, that which engendred it: but haply all this may feem too bitter and exceeding sharp: well, there is another gentle means, and cafe remedy of this inconvenience, which doth not quite becave beafts of all use of reason, and saveth justice in those who use them as they ought; which mean and indifferent way being in times past brought in by wife men, was afterwards rejected, and wholly destroyed by a con peracy of gourmandife and fleshly pleasure together; howfoever Pythagoras would have recovered it again, by teaching men how they might make use and commodity of beaste, and yet do them no wrong nor injury; for they who punish and put to death those wilde bealts, which have no society nor fellowship at all with man, but rather do him much hurt and dammage, commit no injustice; no more than they who make them tame and familiar, training them up to their us, and imploying them in fervices, whereunto they are by nature most fit:

The race of horse and affes for to breed, With bulls encrease, which in the fields do feed. whom Prometheus in a trageedle of Efebylus, faith he bestowed upon us,

To ferve and drudge in flead of us, And do our works laborious.

Neither do they any wrong, who make tife of dogs to keep their flocks of goats and sheep: nor they who nilk goats and theep, and finar their fleeces for the wool, especially if they give them pa-flurage: for it can not be said, that men can not live, or their life is utterly undone, if they have not their platters of fifth, or their livers of geefe, or if they cut not beevs and goats into pieces for to ferv: up at their feasts: or if for their idle disport in theaters, or to take their pleasure in chase and he ming, they put not some to the combat and force them to fight whether they will or no; and kill cthers which have no desence of their own, nor any means to make resistance: for he who needs will have his delights and passines, ought in all reason (as I think) to make himself merry, and solace his heart with those that can play and disport together with him; and not to do (as Bion faid) like to little children, who joy in throwing stones at frogs, and make a game of it; mean while, the poor frogs have no pleasure in this their game, for they are sure to die for it in good earnest; even so we are not either to hunt or fish for any delight that we have in the pain, and much less in the death of other creatures: no more to take a pleasure in driving or taking them away from their whelps and young ones, a pittiful fight to behold; for they be not they that commit injustice, who use beatth, but such as misuse them unmercifully and cruelly, without any respect and commisseration.

SOCLARUS. Stay a while, good Autobulus, and put off this invective of yours unto another time; for now like comming towards us neer at hand, a crew of young Gentlemen, all great hunters and lovers of the gime, whom it were neither an easie matter to drive off unto another day, neither is it needful to provoke and offerd them.

Who of wilde beafts on mountains flain, and fishes caught in Sea,

Land-creatures compared with those of the water.

Withmany first fruits and effayes, to testifie bis prea, Hath often duly honoured. Diana goddess bright, Who cleped is Agrotera, and is Dictynna bight.

for lo, how he commeth directly towards us, as one who will not range himfelf to one fide more than to another. How say you, Optatus, do we not conjecture well, that you mean to be an indifferent arbitrator or common umpire between these two young Gentlemen.

OPTATUS. Very well gueffed of you Autobulus, I purpose so indeed; for long fince was the Law of Solor re-pealed and abolished, by vertue whereof, they were punished who in a civil sedition joyned not to the one fide nor to the other.

Autobulus.

Come hither , therefore, and fit by us , that if we have need of any testimonies, we trouble nor the books of Aristotle with dripping and turning over their leaves; for that we will refer our felves and fand to that which you shall say, as justly and truly delivered, in regard of your great knowledge and experience.

Sociarus.

How now my Mafters, you two Gentlemen, are you agreed between your felves of the order, who who shall begin first to speak?

PHÆDIMUS.

Yes Sociarus, we are at a point for that now, although we were long enough debating about it; for in the end (to use the very words of Euripides) Lot, Fortunes child, hath this case tried,

As one ordain'd doubts to decide.

and hath appointed that the land-beafts cause should be pleaded before theirs of the sea

SOCLARUS.

Well then it is time (Ariftotimus) that both you begin to speak, and we also to hear.

In this place a great defect and breach there is in the Greek originall, which cannot be made up and supplied without the help of some ancient copie, not yet extant.

The bar and the hall is for them that plead. But these destroy the spawn within the wombe, by running upon their females when they be great and near the time of casting the same. And one kind there is of spotted mullets, called thereupon Perdie, which feed upon their own slime and glutinous substance that proceedeth from themselves. As for the poulpe or polyp fish, he eateth and gnaweth himfelf, fitting ftill all Winter

In bonse full cold, without fire light,

In worself bale and wretched plight, fo idle is he, or fo blocklish and sensition, or eather subject to all these vicestogether; which is the reason that Plato also in his book of Laws, forbiddeth essons young men to see their minds upon fishing in the Sea, or rather he detesteth it in them, as an abominable thing, if they, should take a love thereto. For no exercise there is of hardiness and valour; no proof of wit or trial of wildom; no imployment of firength, fwiftness or activity of body in combats and fights with the wide mouthed fea-pikes, with congres or guiltheads, like as there is in hunting upon the land, where the fierce and courageous beafts exercife the fortitude of those who encounter them, and flirring up their animofity to enter upon daugers the wily and crafty, whet and sharpen the wits of such as set up-them, causing them to look about and bestir themselves every way with great circumspections; and the swift and light-sooted, trie the able, nimble, and painful bodies of those who have them in chase: in all which respects hunting is reputed an honest and commendable exercise: whereas contrariwise, fibing hath nothing in it to commend the game, and make it honourable; neither shall you ever find my good friend, any one of the gods, defirous to be called Congrossomus, that is to fay, the conger killer ; as Apollo glorled to be named Lycottonus, that is to fay, the killer of wolves: nor any of then delighted in the name of Triglobolus, that is to say, the striker of barbels: like as Diana Joyed in the epithit of Elaphobolus, that is to say, a shooter at stags and hinds: and no marvell, considering that it is more laudable for a Gentleman to take in chase a wilde Boar, a stag, a fallow deer, a roe buck, yea, and it were but an hare, then to buy any of these with his money: but surely it is more for his credit and reputation to go into the fish market as a cater to exchange his coin for a tunny, a lobstar, or the Amia, then to be feen fishing for them : for the cowardise, blockishness, stupidity, want of his and means in fishes, either offensive, or defensive, cause the taking of them to be dishonell discommendable, unlovely, and illiberal.

In fumme, forasmuch as the proofs and arguments which Philosophers alledge, to shew that bealts have some discourse and use of reason, are drawn from their projects, their elections in preferring preferring one thing before another, their provisions and forecasts, their memories, their affections, their tender care of their young ones, their thankfulness to those who have done them good, their hatred and rankor against them who have done them a shrewd turne : their industry to find out things necessary for them, the evident appearence of vertues in them, to wit, of fortitude; sociable equity and communion, temperance and magnanimity: Let us consider these maritime sea creatures, whe ther they have any one at all of these parts, or if there be any little shew thereof, it is so dark and obscure, that unneth or hardly it can be perceived, how diligent soever we be in searching after it; whereas in these terrene beasts, and such as the land breedeth, a man may conceive, yea and plainly fee most cleer, evident, and affured examples of cach, of the qualities before faid. First and foremost, behold I pray you the first feeting out, the preparatives and flourishes as it were, that buls and boan make against their combat, how they raise and cast up the dust with their feet all about them, as also how these whet and sharpen their tusks; the Elephants likewise for that one of their two teeth wherewith they root in the earth, or pluck up and cut fuch matter as they feed upon, is ordinarily thereby worn dull and blunt, they use it onely for these purposes, but the other they keep and reserve always thirp pointed and keen edged, for to ferve their turnes when they are to fight; the lion when he goeth in the forrest, marcheth evermore with his paws drawn in close and turned round, biding his cleyes and nailes within, for fear left being worn with going, their points should be dull and blum, asalfo because he would give no light by his tracts to the hunters that follow in chase; for hardly and with much ado shall you trace a lion by his foot, the print of his claws is so small that it cannot be feen, whereby they that are full upon their footing, yet mife of him, and wander a contrary way.

Ye have heard I am fure of the Ichnewnon or rat of India, how he prepares himself against he should fight with the crocodile, no less then a legionarie souldier armed at all pieces, in complear harness, such a deal of mud, and the same hardned and baked in manner of a crust, hath he all over his body, as it were a good curace of proof.

What provision and preparation the swallows or martines make against their breeding and laying time, we daily see; namely, how in building of their nests, they lay first as a ground-work underneath, good flicks, fliff flraws, and found bents, and those they enterlace afterwards with others that be more gentle and pliable; and if they fee that their nefts had need of some glurtinous mud to glue and fodder all together, what do they? marry they flie floting fo close to the water of some rigue and touch an expension of the transfer of which means they close up, binde, and knit as with parget or plastre, all chinks and breaches, and whatfoever was not well compact and united together in their nefts : as for the form and figure thereof, they make them not cornered nor yielding many sides and faces, but even and smooth as possible may be, and the same round as a ball; for surely this kind of workmanship is most durable without, and of greatest capacity within, and such as giveth least hold unto other beasts abroad that lie in wait

The cobwebs that spiders weave, which serve for patterns, as well for our women to make their webs of cloth, as for fishers to knit and work their nets, are in many respects very admirable : first in regard of the fine threads, and the subtile weaving thereof, which are not diffinet one from another, nor ranged after the order of the warpe and woofe in our artificial webs upon the loom, but are contiqued and run all into one, in manner of a thin hime, kell, and skin, united and fodred as one would fay, with I wot not what gluttinous humidity mingled among, after an invisible and impercepti-ble manner; then the tincture and colour thereof, which maketh it feem afar off like unto fome thick or duskish air, to the end that it self might the less be perceived; but principally and above all, the very governing, conduct, and mannaging of this fabrick and device made by her-felf, furpaffeth; namely, when some flie or small creature is gotten within the compass of this toil and entangled, to see how immediately the perceiveth it, and can skill quickly to pull in and draw the net; no hunter and fowler in the world, be henever fo cunning, more nimble, for to enclose the prey: all which because we daily fee in our continual experience presented unto our eyes, we believe and know to be true; otherwise we would hold all to be sables: like as we think that to be a tale of the crows and ravens in Barbary, who when they are very thirfly, and the water fettled fo low where they should drink, that they cannot reach unto it, cast stones into it for to make it rife so high, as they may easily meet with it. And verily upon a time, I marvelled my felf very much when I faw a dog within a ship, while the marriners were out of the way, to east little sones into an earthen pat, which was nothing neer full of oyle, how he should discourse and reason thus in his mind, that the lighter things, as namely oyle, must needs mount up and be driven alost, when the weightier such as the stones were, went down to the bottom. As much may be faid of the Bees of Candi, and the geefe of Cilicia. As for the Bees, being to double a point or cape lying into the fea, which is much exposed to the winds, they ballafe themselves with small grit or pretty stones, for to be able to endure the weather, and not be carried away against their wills with the wisd through their lightness otherwise. And the getse aforesaid being affraid of the eagles, which have their airies upon the high rocks, at what time as they should pass over the mountain Taurus, take every one within their bils a good big stone, thereby to sop and muzzle (asit were) their mouths, that being by nature clamorous and given much to gagling, they make no noise nor crie at all during their flight, and so in filence and satety both, get beyond the faid hill. The very order that cranes keep in their flying is wonderful and memorable : for when the air is troubled and the wind aloft, they flie not as they use to do when it is fair weather and calm, either all afront, or in manner of the half moon or croiffant : but presently at their first setting on; they cast themselves into a triangle with the point forward, thereby to cut and pierce the wind that bloweth before and about them, to the end that their rank thus ranged and fet in order, might not possibly be broken: afterwards when they are alighted and fettled upon the ground; look whose course and charge it is to watch all night, stands upright upon on: leg, and in the foot of the other classes a stone and holds it up a lose; for the continual straining of themselves to hold the said stone; keepeth them that long they cannot fleep : and when once they chance to let go their hold, the flour falling upon the rock, quickly awakneth her that let it fall. So that after I had feen this, I did not greatly wonder at Hercules, if he putting his bow under his arm hole, and clipping it haid with his Holding full fast in his right hand, mighty ftrong arm.

neither marvelled I much at him who first devised the means how to open an oyster close and hard faut, when I beheld once the crafty fabrilty of herons: for the heron when he hath fwallo wed down an oylter, or other fhell fifth, all whole and fall flut, alchough it put him to fome trouble, yet he endureth for a time and keepeth it within his craw or gifter, untill he perceive thet it is mollified and relaxed by the natural heat of his body, then caffeth he it up againg by vomit, findeth it gaping and wide open, and so picketh out of it the good meat therein.

As touching the industrious provision and care of house keeping which is in pismires, to discourse thereof in particular, and exquisitely to deliver the same, were a very hard piece of work, if not impossible; and to pass the same over in silence, argueth supine negligence: for look throughout the whole history of nature, you shall not find so small a mirror again for to represent greater things and more beautiful, being (as it were) a most pure and cleer drop, wherein appeareth most apparantly the full refemblance of entire vertue. Here may be feen lovely friendship and civil fociety: here shewe eth it felf the very image of valour and prowesse, with painful patience and industry : here may a man behold many feeds of continence, many sparks of wisdom, and as many of rightcouries Glean-ths the Philosopher, although he maintaineth not that beasts have any use of reason, made report nevertheless that he was prefent at the fight of such a spectacle and occurrent as this. There were (quoth he) a number of ants which went toward another ants hole, that was not their own, carrying with them the corps of a dead ant; out of which hole, there came certain other ants to meet them on the way (as it were) to parl with them, and within a while returned back and went down again; after this they came forth a fecond, year third time, and retired accordingly until in the end they brought up from beneath (as it were a ranfom for the dead body) a grub or little worm; which the others received and took upon their shoulders, and after they had delivered in exchange the aforesaid corps, departed home: moreover, it is worth the observation, although it be a thing daily seen of every man, what courtefie and civility they use in meeting one another, how those who be light and carry nothing, willingly give way unto fuch as be charged and loaden; and fuffer them to pals: likewise how they gnaw asunder and divide piece meal such burdens, as they being single, cannot bear whole, to the end that the same may be carried and transported from place to place by more in number. Aratus in his prognosticks setteth this down for a fign of rain toward, when they bring forth their feeds and grains, and lay them abroad to take the air :

When ants make half with all their egs aload, Forth of their boles to carry them abroad.

And yet there be some who in this place write not and that is to say, egger, but wa, as if they would say, their goods, to wit, the fruits or feeds which they have gathered and laid up for their provision, when they perceive them to begin to mould or be fufty, or fear that they will corrupt and putrifi: But that which surpasseth all other prudence, policy and wir, is their caution and prevention which they ule, that their wheat or other corn may not spurt and grow. For this is certain, that dry it carinot continue alwayes nor found and uncorrupt, but it will in time wax fost, refolve into a milky juice, when it turneth and beginneth to swell and chit : for fear therefore that it become not a generative feed, and to by growing, loofe the nature and property of food for their nourithment, they graw that end thereof or head, where it is wont to spurt and bud forth. For mine own part, I do not admit or believe all that which fome do anatomize of their caves and holes : who give out that there is not one direct and straight way leading down thereinto, nor the same easie and ready for any other creatur to pals through; but there be certain fecret allies, blinde-pathes, crooked turnings, and hollow cranks, which meet all at the end in three holes or concavities; whereof the one for footh is the common hall for them to meet altogether: the second is their cellar or ambry for their victuals and provision; and the third a by-room where they bestow their dead.

Well, I think it not amis nor impertinent, if next after pilmires, I bring forth upon the flage before you the Elephants, to the end that we may know the nature of this wir, and intelligence which now is in question, as well in the greatest beasts as the smallest creatures, and see how as it appear th in the one, fo it is not defective or wanting in the other. Other men'l am fore do make a wonder at this which the Elephant learneth, and is taught, whose docility is exhibited unto us in the theaters, by his fundry forts of gestures, and changes in dauncing, such as for their variety and exquisite elegandy it were very hard for men with all their memory, perfection of wit, and exercise, to remember, to express, and perform accordingly : but I for my part, me thinks, do fee more cleerly and evidently the prudence and fagacity of this beaft, in the passions, affections, and motions which he hath of himfell without teaching, a being more simple, sincere, and natural for not long since at Rome there were a number of them trained and exercised against the solemnity of their games and playes, in certain firange stations, intrinsementions, and hard turnings round, to go, to come to stand, and wheel about in a trice; but among them, there was one more dull, blockish, grosse, and flow, then the rest, both in conceiving, and also in retaining; by reason whereof, he being ever and anon reproached and rated with shamefull words, yea, and many times beaten well for his untowardness, was found otherwhiles alone by himself in the night, repeating as it were and conning his leffons by moonthine, labouring hard for to express and attain unto that which he had been taught. Agnon writeth. that before this time, in Syria there was an Elephant kept and nourished in a private mans house, whose Governour had allowed unto him from his maler, a certain measure of barly every day for his provender; but there was not a day went over his head, wherein he robbed and deceived him not of the one half; it fortuned, that one time above the rest the master of the house would need see the Elephant served, then his Governour powred out before him his full allowance, even the whole measure that was his due; but the Elephant casting an unhappy and untoward eye at him, divided his barly with the snout of his trunk, and put a part the one moity thereof, shewing the best way he could devise unto his master, the wrong that the governor aforesaid had done unto him: He reporteth likewlfe of another, who feeing that his keeper blended earth and flones among his barley, to make the measure to feem compleat; spied his time and came unto the pottage pot standing over the fire, wherein was fielh a feething for dinner, and filled it up with after.

Another being provoked and mifufed at Rome, by certain little boyes, who with their bodkins and penknives used to prick and punch his shout or trunk; seaught up one of them by the middle, and held him up in the air; of as it was though the would have crushed and squeezed the guts out of his bellyshey that saw the manner of it, took up a great cry incontinently for fear of the poor bby, but the Elephant set him down softly again upon the ground, in the very place where he caught him up, and doing him on hurt at all passed by judging it a sufficient chastisiment for so little a child, that he was only put in a fright: Thus much of tame and trained Elephants. As for those which are savage, and live in the wild fields at their libertry, wonderful things be reported of them, and namely as teaching their passes over rivers; for the youngest and least of them all, exposing himself to hazard for the rest, leadest the way, and wadeth first thorough; the other seeing him landed upon the bank on the other side, make this account, that if the least and lowed of their herd be tall enough to surrount the depth of the channel, we wish are bisers & higher, have no cause to sear any thing, but that they also may get over in safety.

they which are biger & higher, have no cause to sear any thing, but that they also may get over in safety.

And since I am sallen into this argument, and proceeded so far into it, me thinks I should not forget one example of Reinard, for the affinity and conformity it hath with this device last rehearfed: Those who have invented shoulous tales make report, that during the great deluge, Dencation used to let forth a dove out of the ark, to know what weather it was like to be abroad; for if the returned soon again, the brought news of tempest and rain, but if the slew clean away, and came no more back, she shewed thereby that it was calm and fair weather.

But true it is that the Thracians even at this day when they purpose to pass over a river frozen all over with ice, take a fox with them for their guide, to found the way before them, whether the ice be strong enough and able to bear; the fox goes gently before, and layeth his ear close to the ice, and if by the noise of the water running underneath and coming unto his ear, he guesseth that the ice is not thick not frozen deep, but thin and weak, he maketh a stay, and returneth if a man will lee him:contrariwise if he perceive by his ear no noise at all of water running under the ice, he passeth owned considently. Surely we cannot say that this is only an exquisite quickness in the sense of hearing, without any discourse of reasons but without all question a kind of syllogistim or reasoning, by consequence drawn from that runtal store in this fort: that which so under their; that which fiftereth is not frozen or congested; that is not congealed, must need be liquid; and whatsoever is liquid, yieldeth, and is not able to hold, ergo. &c.

The Logicians hold that the hound meeting with a quarferry or croß way divided into many paths, uftch a kind of argumentation or reafoning, which is called a disjunct proceeding from the enumeration of many parts; and in this manner discourseth with himself: It must needs be that the brast in chast, passed by one of these three wayers but his way it went not, nor yet the way; therefore it cannot chust, but this way he took, for the scene of the nofrile yieldeth him no other inteligence, then of the premiser and it was the discourse of reason, which gave him to understand the needlity of the consequence conclusion, intered upon the said premises and topositions. Howbeit, the dog hath need of no such thimony of Logicians, to false it is and counterfeit, because it is the small it felf and scent of the not, which by the track of the foot and the sluxion of the odour coming from the beast, shewesh him which way it sked, bidding farewel to these propositions either disjunct or conjunct, neither careful it for that cumeration of parts; but by many other effects, passions, functions, offices and actions which proceed neither from the sense of seeing nor of smelling, but onely from intelligence and discourse of reason, which they are evidently performed, a man may sufficiently perceive and comprehend what is the nature of a dog, whose continence, obedience, sagacity, patience and pains-taking in chase, if should now discourse. pon, I should but make my self-ridiculous unto you, who see the same daily, and have experience and practife thereof continually. But this one example will I alledge unto you; namely, that during the civil wars at Rome, when a Roman Citizen was murdered, the murderers could never cut off his head, until they environed his dog round, and flabbed him to death, who guarded his maters body, and fought most fiercely for him. King Pyrrbus as he travelled by the way, met with a dog who kept the dead corps of his mafter lately flain, and understanding by the inhabitants of the place, that he had continued three dates already, and never fittred from thence, nor yet cat or drunk oughts, the commanded the body to be interred, led the dog away with him, and made much of him: certain dayes after, there hapned a mufter or generall review to be made of the fouldiers, who shewed tain days satured the state of mafter; upon whom he ran immediately, baying and barking at them with open mouth and in great anger, eftfoons running back and making toward Pyrrbus; infomuch as not only the King, but all those who were about his person, entred into great suspition that those parties were they who had stilled his mafter; whereupon they were apprehended, put in prifon, and judicially brought to their answer upon the point, and together with other prefumptions and light evidences inferred against them, they were so hardly urged, that they consessed the fact, and suffered punishment accordingly. The like (by report) did the dog of learned Hefiodus, who detected the fons of Ganytlor the Naupaclian, of murder committed upon the person of his mafter. But that which our fathers faw themselves with their own eyes, whiles they were fludents at Athens, is more evident than all that hath been faid already. And this it was : A certain fellow had by flealth entred into the Temple of A culapius, and anceau.

Michigan from thence the fairest and goodliest jewels both of gold and silver among the oblations there, which were most portable, and thinking that he was not espied by any creature, made means to get away again secretly. The dog which kept the said Temple, and was named Capparus, did his best to bark and bay; but feeing none of the fextanes and wardens of the Church to come for all that, parfited the Church-robber as he fied away; and notwithflanding that he flung stones at him, yet gave nothe over his pursute, but traced him hard at heels all the night. When day light was come, he would not approach neer unto him, but kept aloof, followed him with his eye and never loft the fight of him; and notwithflanding that he cast him bread and other meat, he would none: so the night following the thief laid him down to sleep, the dog likewise kept all night hard by him; and the morrow morning when he took his way again, the dog likewife arole and went after. Met he any paffengers or waifaring men, he would fawn upon them and wag his tail; contrariwise he barked eagerly at the thief, and was ready to flie upon him. They who had the charge to follow with huy and cry, being informed thus much by the Travellers whom they met, as also of what bigness, colour and hair the dog was, continued their chase more willingly, and made such hot pursue that they overtook the fallow at Crommyon, and from thence brought him to Athens. The dog he marched before them all. and lead them the way, as jocound, pleafant, and gamefome as poffly could be, as taking great fly that this Church-robber had been the game and prey that he had hunted and gotten. The Athenian when they heard the truth of this matter related unto them, ordained that the faid dog fhould have a certain medure of corn allowed him at the Cities charges for his bread, and gave an effectall tharge to the Priests of that temple, to have a care of him to long as he lived: following herein the kindness and liberallity of their ancesters, which they extended in times past to a mule. For what time as Pericles caused to be built the Temple of Minerva, named Hecatompedon, within the caffle of the City, there were, as is ordinary for fuch buildings, conveyed thither daily stones, timber, and other stuff in carts and wagons drawn with beafts. Now when many of those mules which before time had willingly and painfully served, were now for very sge dicharged and fent away to passure: one there was among the rest, who every day would come into the high broad street Ceramicum, and go before those draught beasts which drew up stones to the mount, yea and accompany them, as if he encouraged and hartned them to labour and travel. The people of Athens commending and admiring the good heart and industrious mind of the beaft, gave order by a publick decree for his maintenance and keeping at the Cities coft, no less then they would have done for an old bruifed foulder, who now was past service. And therefore we must fay, that those Philosophers who hold : That there is no communion nor society of justice between us and bruit beafts, fay true, if they restrain their speech unto those creatures onely, which live in the fea and deep bottomless waters, with whom indeed we can have no fellowship at all of good will, love and affection, as being beafts far remote from all gentlenes, sweet converse, and good nature: and therefore Homer speaking unto a man, who seemed to be inhumane, cruel and unsociable, said elegantly thus: as if he would thereby give us to underfland, that the sca brings forth no creature that is milde, lovely, meek and gentle: but he that should say as much and apply the former proposition unto the land-beats, were himself cruel and savage; if I say, he denied that there was no reciprocal commerce of aminy and justice between King Lymachus and his dog Hyrcanus, who remained continually alone about his corps when he was dead s yea and at the time that it was burned in the suneral fire, leaps into it and was confumed into ashes with him for company. And reported it is, that there was another dog named within, did no less which Pyrrhus kept, I mean not the king of that name, but another private person.

for after his mafter was dead, he would never thir from the body and when the corps was carried forth in a couch upon the biere, he leaps upon it and was born withalf : and finally figuring himfelf into the fire and was burns with him.

When King Porus was fore wounded in a battel against King Alexander the Great; the Elephant upon whose back he rode and sought, drew forth with his trunkright gently for fear of doing barm, msny darts, arrows and javelins wherewith lie was shot; and albeit himself was grievoully hurt, yet netrainted he and gave over before he perceived that his Lord the King was ready to reel and fink down, by reason of the effusion of blood which he had lost: and then fearing that he would fall from on high to the ground, he gently couched and yielded with his body downward to the carth, that he might alight with ease and without all danger.

King Alexanders horse called Bucephalus, all while he was bare without his saddle and caparison, would well enough abide that his keeper should mount upon his back; was he trapped once and richly fet out with the Kings royal furniture, harnes, and ornament, he would suffer none to fis him but Alexander alone. And if others came neer him, and went about to get upon his back, he would run a front upon them souffing, storing and neighting, rising up all abore at them; and if they made not good halte to retire behind him and thy, he would be sure to have them under his feet and trample over them. I know full well that you think these examples are hudled together in a consused writer; but surely it is no easie matter to find any action of these noble beasts, which represente hone bare vertue and no more: for together with their kindness and natural love there is to be seen a certain defire of honour: amid their generosity a man may perceive a kind of industrious sagacity and wiscolom; neither is their wit and sabrily void of courage and magnanianity: howbeit, if men be disposed to dispose the tinguish and separate one from another by themselves; the dogs do represent an example of a mild and gende nature, together with an haughty courage and high mind, namely when they pass by and turn atide from those that submit themselves before them, according to that which Humar saith in one place:

The dogs ran forth with open mouth, they cryed and bark't amain: Ulylics wife his staffe let fall, and stirred not again.

For their manner is not to fight any longer against those who humbly fall down profitate, or she any semblance of lowly suppliants. Certes, the report goods of a principall Indian dog, who being for a singularity above all other, sent to fight a combat before King Alexander the Great, when there was let loose at him sist a stage, then a wildboar, and afterwards a beare made no reckoning of them, nor deigned once to slite out of his place nor rise up: but when he saw a lion presented unto him, then incontinently he stood upon his sees, and adderssed himsels to the combat; the wing evidently that he esteemed the lion alone worthy to sight with him, and disdained all therest. As for those here among us which are wont to hunt hates, it they themselves chance to kill them with fair play in the open little, they take pleasure to tear them in pieces; they lick and lap their blood full willingly; but if the hare being out of heart and in despair of her felf, as many times it falleth out, employ all the force and strength that the shath in one course for all, and run her self out of breath, so asher wind is now clean gone, and stread with all; the hounds sinding her so, will not once touch her, but they keep a wagging of their tailes round about her body, as if they would say, it is not for greedines of hares shath, but an earnest define to winne the prize in running, that we hunt thus as we do.

As touching the craft and subtiley which is in beafts; forasmuch as there be infinit examples thereof, overpass I will the wily pranks of foxes, wolves, crance and jayes: for common they be and every man teeth them ; onely produce I will the testimony of wife Thales, the most ancient of the seven fages, who by report was not least admired for his skill and cunning, in that he discovered right well the craftiness in a beast, and went beyond it. There was a company of mules that had falt a lead, and were carrying it from one place to another; and as they passed through the foord of a river, one of them chanced to fall under his burden into the water : the falt in his fack by this means taking wet, melted and refolved into water for the most part of it, in such fort as the mule having recovered himfelf upon all four, found that he was well lightned of his load, and presently conceived what was the reason; which gave so deep an impression in his memory, that ever after, as often as he was to go thorow a river, he would be sure to stoup and couch his body low; first leaning of one side, and then of another, purposedly and for the nonce to wet and drench the bags on his back which had falt in them. Thales hearing of this unhappy and shrewd wit of the mules commanded the muliter to fill the fices with the fame weight of wool and foundges, inflead of falt; to lay them upon his back, and for drive him with the reft. The mule left not his old wone; but when he perceived that he was overcha: ged now with water belides his ordinary load of wool and spunges, he took himself in the man er, and found that his craft now flood him in small stead, but did him hure; whereupon, ever after, he would go upright whenfoever he waded, and was very carefull that none of his packs or care riages should once (though full against his will) touch the water.

Partidges have another kind of fubrilly and craft, by themselves, and the same proceedeth from a certain natural love and motherly affiction to their young birds, whom, when they are yet so seek that they cannot fit and nake shift for themselves being pursued, they teach to cast themselves on their backs, with their heels and bellies upward, and to hold either a clot of earth or forne lock of fraw or fach like fluff, to cover and shadow their bodies withal: mean while, the old rowens turni those that follow in chase another way, drawing them toward themselves in flying to and fro just before them, even at their feet, seeming (as it were) by little and little to retire, and making as though they were scarce able to artic from the carth, and as if they were ready to be taken, untill such time as they have trained the sowlers far from their little ones.

The hares when they have kindled, and be afraid of the hunters, return to their formes, and carry their leverets, fome one way and fome another, to as many times there is an arpent or good acre of ground distance between them, to the end that if either hound or hunter should come upon them, they might not be all in danger at once to be taken; and they themselves run up and down backward and forward in divers places, crossing this way and that way, leaving their tracts very consusted, and inthe end take one great leap as far as ever they can, from their foresaid sooting, and spring unto their form, where they rest and take their repose.

The bear being furprized with a certain drowsie disease, called Pholia, before she be altogether so heavily benummed and supplied therewith, that the cannot well stir, maketh clean the cave into which she meaneth to retire her self: and when she is to go down into it, all the way besides which it toward it, she treadeth very lightly, bearing her self (as it were) upon her tiptoes: and being come rit, she turnes upon her back, and so eicheth forward her body as well as she can into her

Of red deer, the hynds commonly calvencer unto high-way fides, where ravenous beafts, such as live by prey, do not ordinarily haunt: The stags when they perceive themselves to be fat, well fielded, and good venison, seek blinde corners to hide themselves in, for the better security of their lives, as not trulking then to their heels and swift running.

The land-urchins are so wise and wary in desending and saving themselves, that they have thereby given occasion of this proverb:

A thousand wiles and mo, of crasty sox there are: The urchin one dath know, and that is singular, for when the urchin perceiveth Renard coming toward him,

All of a lump, as round as bur or ball, His body lies, with prick, befet withal: No means she hath, for thorny bristles thick, To bite, to vinch, or touch him to the quick.

To bite, to pineb, or touch bim to the quick.

Autumn, a little before vintage time, you shall have an urchin or hedge hog get under a vine, and with his feet shake the stock untill the grapes from their branches be fallen upon the ground, then he rouleth himself round like a soot-ball among them, and catcheth them up with his sharp pricks; infomuch as when we stood all of us sometime to behold the manner of it, is seemed as if a cluster of graps had been quick, and so crept upon the ground; so beste went he and covered all over with grapes: then so soon as he is gotten into his hole or nest, he offerest them ento his young ones to eat, to take from him and lay up for frote. This hole bath two scaes or prospects; the one regardeth the south, the other looketh into the North. When they foresee change and alteration of weather, like as skillful ship-masters turn their sailes according to the time; even so, they shut up that hole ontie which shadeth in the wind, and set open the other; which when one of the City Cyzicam had once observed and learned, he got a great name and reputation of a weather wise man, as if he foreknew of himself by some singular gift, and could foretell from which coast the wind would blow.

At touching focial love and fidelity, accompanied with wit and underflanding, the Elephant as King Juba weiteth, shew unto us an evident example: for they that hunt them are wont to dig deep trenches, and thatch them over with a thin coat of light straw or some small brush. Now when one of the heard chances to fall into a trench, for many of them use to go and feed together, all the rest bring a might deal of shones, rammed wood, and whatsoever they can get, which they sling into the ditch for to sill it up, to the end that their fellow may have means thereby to get up again. The same writer record: the also that Elephants use to pray unto the gods, to purific themselves with the sea water, and to adore the sun risingly listing up their trunked snour into the air, as it it were their handy and all this of their own accord and untaught. And to say a truth of all beafs the Elephant is most devour and religious, as K. Prokemass Philopater hath well testified: for after he had defaited Antichus, and was minded to render condign thanks unto the gods for so glorious a victory, among many other beafs for sacrifice, he slew four Elephants is but afterwards being much disquieted and troubled in the night with searful dreams, and namely, that God was wroth and threatmed him for such an uncouth and strange sacrifice; he made means to appease his ire by many other propitations obstations, and among the rest, he dedicated unto him four Elephants of brask, instead of those which were killeds no less the coiable kindness and good nature which lions show one unto another; for the younger fore which are more able and nimble of body, lead forth with them into the chafe for to hune and prey those that be elder and unweldys who when they be weary, six them down and reflywaiting for the other; who being gone forward to hunt if they meet with game and speed, then they all set up a toaring note altogether, much like unto the bellowing of bulls, and thereby call their sellows to them; which the old Lions hearing, presently run unto them, whereby they take their part; and devour they prey in common.

To speak of the amatorious affections of brute beasts, some are very savage and exceeding surious; others more milde, and not altogether unlike unto the courting and wooing used between man and woman, yea, and I may alve you, since lling somewhat of waiton and venerious behaviour: and such was the love of an Elephant, a counter suter or corrivall with Aristophanes the Grammarian, to a woman in Alexandria, that fold chaplets or garlands of slowers: neither did the Elephant hew lefs affection to her than the man, for he would bring her alwayes out of the futt market, as he passed by some apples, pears, or other fruit, and then he would stay long with her, yea, and otherwhile put his snout, as it were his hand, with her bosome under her parlet, and gently feel her soft paps and white skin about her fair breft.

A dragon also there was enamoured upon a young maiden of Etolia: it would come to visit her by nights, exceptalong she very bare skin of her body, yea, and winde about her without any harm in the world done unto her, either willingly or otherwise, and then would gently depart from her by the break of day; now when this serpent had continued thus for certain nights together ordinarily; at the last the friends of the young damosel removed her, and sent her out of the way a good way off; but the dragon for three or four nights together came not to the house, but wandred and fought up and down here and there as it should seem for the wench; in the end, with much ado, having sound her out, he came and clapsed her about, not in that milde and gettle mainter as before time, but after a rougher fort; for having with other windings and knots bound her hands and atties fall unto het body, with the rest of his tail he slapped and beat her legs, shewing a gentle kind of amorous dipleafure and anger, yet so, as it might seem he had more affection to pardon, than defire to punish

As for the goofe in Ægypt which fell in love with aboy; and the goat that cast a fancy to Glauce the minstrel wench: because they are histories so well known, and in every mans mouth: for that also I suppose you are weary already of so many tedious tales and narrations, I forbear to relate them before you: but the merles, crows, and perroquents of popinjaies, which learn to prate, and yield their voice and breath to them that teach him, so pliable, so tractable and docible, for to form and express a certain number of letters and syllables as they would have them, me thinks they plead sufficiently, and are able to defend the cause of all other beasts, teaching us as I may say, by learning of us, that capable they be not only of the inward discourse of reason, but also of the outward gift uttered by diffinct words, and an articulate voice: were it not then a meer ridiculous mockery, to compere these creatures with other dumb beafts which have not so much voice in them, as will serve to howle withall, or to express a groan and complaint? but how great a grace and elegancy there is in the natural voices and fongs of thefe, which they refound of themselves, without learning of any masters, the best musicians and most sufficient poets that ever were do testifie, who compare their fweetest canticles and poems unto their fongs of swans and nightingale: now, foralmuch as to teach, sheweth greater use of reason; then to learn we are to give credit unto Aristotle, who faith : that brute beafts are indued also with that gift, namely, that they teach one another : for he writeth that the nightingale hath been feen to train up her young ones in finging; and this experience may serve to testifie on his behalf, that those nightingales sing nothing so well, which are taken very young out of the neft, and were not fed nor brought up by their dams; for those that be nourished by them, learn withal, of them to sing, and that not for mony and gain, nor yet for glory, but because they take pleasure to sing well, and love the elegance above the profit of the voice: and to this purpose report I will unto you a flory which I have heard of many, as well Greeks as Romans, who were prefent and eye witnesses: There was a Barber within the City of Rome, who kept a shop over against the Temple, called Grecostists, or Forum Gracum, and there nourished a pie, which would so talk, prate, and char, as it was wonderfull, counting the speech of men and women, the voice of beafts, and found of muficall instruments, and that voluntarily of her felf without the constraint of any person, onely she accustomed her self so to do, and took a certain pride and glory in it, endeavouring all that the could to leave nothing unspoken, or not expressed: now it happed that there were folemnized great funerals of one of the weelthieft personages in the City, and the corps was carried forth in a great state, with the sound of many trumpets that marched before; in which so-lemnity, for that the manner was that the pomp and whole company should stand still and resa time in that very place, it fell out to, that the Trumpeters who were right cunning and excellent in their Art, stayed there, founding meloudiously all the while: the morrow after this, the pie became mute and made no noise at all, nor uttered not so much as her naturall poice which the was wont to do, for to experts her ordinary and necessary passions; informuch, as they who before time wondred at her voice and prating, marvelled now much more at her filence, thinking it a very strange matter to pass by the shop and hear her say nothing; so as there grew fome suspition of others professing the same art and trade, that they had given her some poison: howbeit, most men guessed that it was the violent found of the trumpets which had made her deaf, and that together with the fense of hearing, her voice also was utter extinct; but it was neither the one nor the other; for the truth was this, as appeared afterwards: the was in a deep fludy, and through meditation retired within her felf, whiles her minde was bulle and did prepare her voice like an instrument of musick, for imitation; for ar length her voice came again and wakened (as it were) all on a fudden, uttering none of her old notes nor that which the was accustomed before to parl and counterfeit; onely the found of trumpets the refembled, keeping the fame periods, the fame ftops, paufes and strains; the same changes, the same reports, and the same times and measures: athing, that continueth more and more that which I have faid before; namely, that there is more use of reason in teaching of themselves, than in learning by another. Yet can I not contain my self, but I must needs in this place recite unto you one lesson that I my self faw a dog to take our, when I was at Rome: This dog served a player who professed to counterfeit many persons, and to represent fundry gestures; and among other pretty tricks which his master taught him, answerable to turning general and a second of the second o supposed deadly; who took the piece of bread wherein the faid drogue was mingled, and within a little while after he had (wallowed it down, he began to make as though he trembled, quaked, yea and flaggered, as if he had been aftonied, in the end he stretched out himself, and Lay as siff as one furk dead, suffering himself to be pulled, haled, and drawn from one place to another, like a very block, according as the present argument and matter of the play required; but afterwards, when he understood by that which was said and done, that his time was come, and that he had caught his hinr, then began he at the first to Bir gently by little and little, as if he had newly revived or awakened, and flarred out of a dead fleep, and lifting up his head , began to look about him to and fro; at which object all the beholders wondred not a little; afterwards he arose upon his feet, and went directly to him unto whom he was to go, very jocund and merry: this pageant was performed to artificially. I cannot tell whether to say or naturally, that all those who were present, and the Emperor himself (for Vespassian the father was there in person, within the theater of Marcellus) took exceeding great pleasure, and joyed wonderfully to fee it.

But peradventure we may deferve well to be mocked for our labour, prating beafts as we do for highly, for that they be so docible and apt to learn, seeing that Democritus sheweth and proveth, that we our selves have been Appendices and Scholars to them in the principall things of this life; namely, to the spider, for spinning, weaving, detning and drawing up a rent; to the swallow, for architecture and building; to themelodious swan and shill nightingsle, for vocal musick, and all by way of imitation. After the Art of physick, and the *three kinds thereof, we may see in the nature of beafts,  aspective greatest and most generous part of each of them; for they lie not only that, which ordained drogues works, and medicines to purge ill humours out of the body, feeing that the tortoise take origin; wezals, to a second or the body, feeing that the tortoise take origin; wezals, to a second or the body.

when they have eaten a ferpent; dogs also when they be troubled with choler of the gall, purge them 249 93 min. felves with a certain herbe, thereupon called dogs grafs; the dragon likewise if he finde his eyes to be dim, clenseth, scoureth, and dispatcheth the cloudiness thereof with fenel; and the bear so soon as the is gon out of her den, feeketh out the first thing that the doth, the wilde herb called Aren, that isto fay, wake-robin, for the acrimony and sharpness thereof openeth her bowels when they are grown together, yea, and at other times finding her fell upon fulness, given to loth and distaste all food, she goes to find out ants nefts, where the fits her down lilling out the tongue which is glib and foft, with a kind of fweet and flimy humour, untill it be full of ants and their egges, then draweth she it again, swalloweth them down, and thereby cureth her lothing stomack. Semblably it is faid, that the Egyptians having observed their bird Ibis, which is the black stork, to give her self a clister of sea water, by imitation of her, did the like by themselvet. Certain it is, that their Priefis use to befprinkle, purifie and hollow themselves with that water out of which she hath drunk; for let any water be venemous, or otherwise hurtful and unholfome, the Ibis will none of is but also some beaftsthere be, which feeling themselves ill at ease, are cured by diet and abstinence; as namely wolves and lions, when they have devoured too much flesh, and are cloyed or glutted therewith, they lieme down, take their ease, cherishing and keeping themselves warm.

It is reported likewise of the tygre, that when a young kidde was given unto her, she fasted two dayes, according to the diet which she useth, before the touched it, and the third day being very hungry, called for other food, ready to burft the cage wherein the was enclosed, and forbear to can the faid kid, supposing that now she was to keep it with her, as a familiar and domesticals companion, Nay, that which more is, recorded it is, that elephants practife the feat of Chyturgerie; for flanding by those that are wounded in a battel, they can skill of drawing out tronchions of speces, jivelin heads, arrows and darts out of their bodies, with fuch dexecuty and case, that they will neither tear and hurt their flesh, nor put them to any pain what soever. The goats of Candy when they be shot into the body with arrows or dares, fall to cat the herb Dillamus, and thereby thrust them out, and make them fall off with facility, and by this means they have taught women with child, that this herb hath a property to cause abortive birth, and the child in their wombe to miscarry: for the said goats are no fooner wounded, but they run presently to this herb, and never feek after any other remedy. Wonderfulthese things are (no doubt) howbeit less miraculous, when we consider the natures of bealts, how they be capable of Arithmetick, and have the knowledge of numbring and keeping account; as the kine and oven about Sufa; for appointed they be there to water the Kings gardens, drawing up water in buckets with a device of wheels that they turn about in manner of a windle; and every one of them for their part must draw up an hundred buckets in a day; so many they will do 794

Over and belides, this advantage have land beafts, that by reason of their affinity as it were, and daily conversation with men, they get a tincture, as one would say from them, of their manners and fulhions, and confequently enjoy a kind of nurture, teaching, discipline, and apprentising by imitaion; which is able to dulce, allay, and mittigate all the bitternels and aufterity of their nature, no less than fresh water mingled with the sea, maketh it more sweet and porable: likewise all the unsociable wildeness, and heavy unweldiness therein, is stirreth up, when the same is once moved and set on foot by the motions that it learneth by conversing with men; whereas on the otherside the life of fra-creatures being far remote and devided by long and large confines from the frequentation of men, as having no help of any thing without, nor any thing to be taught it by use and custome, is altogether folitary and by it felf, as nature brought it forth, fo it continueth and goeth not abroad; neither mingled nor mixed with forrein fashions, and all by reason of the place, which they inhabit, and not occasioned by the quality of their own nature, for furely their nature conceiving and retaining with. in it felf as much discipline and knowledge as it is possible for to attain unto and apprehend, exhibiteth untous many tame and familiar celes (which they call facred) that use to come to hand; such as are among the reft, those in the fountain Arethulu, besides many other fishes in divers places, which are very obeisant and obsequious when they be called by their names, as is reported of Marcus Grasfus his lamprey, for which he wept when it was dead; and when Domitus upon a time reproached him for it; by way of mockery in this wife: Were not you the man who wept for your lampery when it was dead; he came upon him presently in this manner: And were not you the kind and sweet husband who having buried three wives never fied tear for the matter? the croendiles not only know the voice of the Priests when they call unto them, and endure to be handled and stroked by them, but alfo yawn and offer their teeth unto them to be picked and cleanfed with their hands, yea and to be skowred and rubbed all over with linnen clothes. It is not long fince that Philinus a right good man and well reputed, after his return from his voyage out of Eypt, where he had been to fee the Countrey recounted unto us, that in the City of Anteus he had feen an old woman lys a fleep on a little pallet together with a crocodile, who very decently and modefuly couched close along by her fide: And it is found in old records, that when one of the Kings called Ptolomai, called tinto the facred crocodile, it would not come nor obey the voice of the Priefts, notwithstanding they gently prayed and intreated her; a fign thought to be a prognostick and presage of his death, which soon after enfued: whereby it is plain that the kind and generation of these water bealts, is neither incapable, nor deprived of that facred and highly esteemed science of divination and foretelling suure things; confidering that even in the Country of Lycia; between the Cities of Phellos and Myrz, that is, a village called Sura, where I hear fay, the inhabitants use to fit and behold the filhes swimming in the water, like as in other places they observe birds flying in the air, marking their lying in wait and am-ture is not altogether eftranged from us, nor unfociable. Astouching their proper wit, and natural prudence, wherein there is no mixture at all borrowed from other, this is in general, a great argument thereof, that there is no creature that fwimmeth or liveth in the waters, except those which stick to stones, and cleave to rocks, that is so calle to be caught by man, or otherwise to be taken without trouble, as Asses are by Wolves; Bees by the أَمْدُونَة بِهُ فَوَالِقَّ, that is to fay, of drawing up a Serpent out of his hole. The flirep calleth as it were the Woolf, by the foot; like as by report the Leopard allureth unto him the most part of Beasts, who are willing to approach him for the pleasure they take in his smell, and above all others the Ape. But seacreatures generally all, have a certain inbred sagacity, a wary perceivance before hand, which maketh them to be suspicious and circumspect, yea, and to stand upon their guard against all forelaying; fo that the art of Hunting and catching them is not a small piece of work, and a simple cunning; but that which requireth a great number of engins of all forts, and asketh wonderfull devices, and fubril flights to compais and go beyond them; and this appeareth by the experience of fuch things, as we have daily in our hands. For first and formost the cane or reed of which the angle rod is made, fishcowould not have to be big and thick, and yet they had need of fuch an one as is tough and firong, for to pluck up and hold the fifthes, which commonly do mightily fling and struggle when they be caught; but they chuse rather that which is small and slender, tor fear lest if it cast a broad shadow, it might move the doubt and suspicion that is naturally in fishes; moreover the line they make not with many water knots, but defire to have it as plain and even as possibly may be without any roughness, for that this giveth as it were fome den untiation unto them of fraud and deceit : they take order likewife that the hairs which reach to the hook, should feem as white as possibly they can devise, for the whiter they be, the less are they seen in the water, for the conformity and likeness in colour to it: as bulh, their foudding away and purfute after them; whereby according to a certain skill that is among them, they can foretell future things to come. But this may fuffice to shew and declare that their na-

just, but more you shall not get of them, neither by fair means nor foul; for no sooner have they performed their task, but prefently they give over, and impossible it is to force them any farther then their account: notwithstanding triall hath been made 5 fo justly and exactly they both know, and also keep the reckoning, as Cresianus the Guidian hath left in writing. As for the Lybians they mock the Agyptians, for reporting this of their heaft called Oryse, asia great fingularity, that he fetteth upa certain ery that very day and hour, when as the star named by them Sube, and by us the Dog, or Sirius doth arife : for they give out, that with themall their goats together, at the very inflant when the faid ftar mounteth up within their horizon with the fun, will be fure to turn and look into the caft: and this they hold to be an infallible fign of the revolution of that flar, agreeing just with the rules and observations of the Mathematicians. But to close up and conclude at length this discourse, that it may come to an end, let us (as it were) take in hand the facred anchor, and for a finall conclusion knit up all with a brief speech of their divinity and prophetical nature. For certain it is, that one of the greatest, most noble and ancient parts of divination or foothfaying, is that which being drawn frem the flight and linging of birds, they call Augury : and in truth the nature of these birds being soquick, so active, so spiritual, and in regard of that agility and nimbleness very pliable, and obsequent to all vilions and fantafics presented, offereth it self unto God, as a proper instrument to be used and turned which way he will; one while to motion, another while into certain voices, layer and tunes, yea and into divers and fundry gettures: now to ftop and ftay, anon to drive and put forward, in manner of the winds; by means whereof he impeacheth and holdeth back fome actions and affections, but directeth others unto their end and accomplishment. And this no doubt is the reason that Euripides termeth all birds in generall the heraulds and meffengers of the gods: and particularly Socrates faid, that he was become a fellow fervitor with the fwans: femblably, among the Kings, Pyrrbus was well pleafed when as men called him the Eagle, and Antiochus took as great pleasure to be called the Sacre or the Hauk. Whereas contrariwife, when we are disposed to mock, to flout, or to reproch those that be dull, indocible and block ih, we call them fishes. To be short, an hundred thousand things there be that God doth shew, foretell and prognosticate unto us by the means of bealts, as well those of the land beneath, as the sows of the air above. But who that shall plead in the behalf of fishes or water-creatures, will not be able to alledge so much as one : for, deaf they be all and dombe; *blind also for any fore-tight or providence that they have, as being cast into a balefull place, and bottomless gulf, where impious Atheists and rebellious Titans or Giants against God are bestowed; where they have no fight of God, no more than in hell where damned fouls are; where the reasonable and intelledual part of the foul is utterly extinct, and the reft that remaineth, drenched or rather drowned (as a man would fay) in the most base and vile sensuall part, so as they seem rather to pant then to live.

HERACLEON. Pluck up your brows, good Phadimm, open your eyes, awake your spirits, and be-flir your self in the desence of us poor llanders and marktime inhabitants: for here we have heard not a discourse lwis merrily devised to pass away the time, but a serious plea premeditate and laboured before hand, a very Rhetorical declamation which might befeem well to be pronounced at the bar in judicial Court, or delivered from a pulpit and tribunal before a publick audience.

PHEDIMUS.

Now verily, good fir Heracleon, this a meer surprize and a manifest amough laid crastily of set purpose; for this brave Orator (as you see) being yet fasting and sober himself; and having studied his oration all night long, hath fer upon us at the difadvantage, and altogether unprovided, as being fill heavy in the head, and drenched with the wine that we drank yesterday. Howbeit, we ought not now to draw back and recule for all this : for being as I am an affectionase lover of the Poet Pindarus, I would not for any good in the world, hear this fintence of his juftly alledged against me.

When games of prize and combats once are fet,

for at great leifure we are all, and not the dances onely be at repose, but also dogs and horses, cast-nets, drags, and all manner of nets besides: yea and this day there is a generall cessation given to all creatures as well on land as in the lea, for to give ear unto this disputation. And as for you my masters here, have no doubt, nor be you afraid ; for I will use my liberty in a mean, and not draw out any Apology or counterplea in length, by alledging the opinions of Philosophers; the fables of the Egyptiant the headless tales of the Indians or Lybians, without proof of any testimonies: but quickly come to the point, and look what examples be most manifest and evident to the eye, and such as shall be testified and verified by all those Marriners or Travellers that are acquainted with the Seas, some few of them I will produce. And yet verily in the proofs and arguments drawn from creatures above the ground, there is nothing to empeach the fight, the view of them being fo apparent and daily perfented unto our eye, whereas the fea affordethus the light of a few effects, within it and those hardly and with much ado (as it were) by a glaunce and glimmering light, hiding from us the most part of thebreeding and feeding of fifthes: the means also that they use, either to affail one another or to defend themfelves, wherein I affure you there be actions of prudence, memory, fociety, and equity not a few, which because they are not known, it cannot chuse but our discourse as touching this argument will be less enriched and enlarged with examples, and to by confequence the cause more hardly defended and maintained.

Land-creatures compared with those of the water.

That peifeth down the fishers book, and holds the line extent; Which passing through transparent * born, that rural Ox head bare, To greedy fishes secretly brings death ere they be ware.

Some misunderstanding these verses, would infer thereupon, that men in old time used the hairs of an Ox tail to make their lines withal, faying that this word #6pes, which commonly in Greek is taken for an horn, fignifieth in this place hair; and that hereupon waya at is derived, which betokeneth to fheer an norm, inclination that is to fay, theering or clipping; as allo, that from hence it is that Artiblechus tearmeth a dainty and wanton Minion, who taketh delight in tricking and trimming the hair, and wearing a peruke curiously fet, wependent. But furely, this their collection is not true, for they used, as wedo, the hair of horse tails, to make their angle-lines withal, chuling those that grow either on Stone-horses or Geldings, and not of Marcs, for that ever and anon they wet their tails with staling, and by that means the hairs of them are tender, and apt to break. And Aristotle himself writeth, that in those verses above cited, there is no deep matter that requiresh such an exquisite and curious scanning; for that (in truth) fishers use to overcast the line neer unto the hook with a piece of horn, for fear left fiftes when they have [wallowed down the hook, fhould with their teeth bite or fret a two the line. And as for the hooks, they use those that be round, for to take Mullets, and the fiftes Amie, because they have narrow mouthes; for very wary they are to avoid the longer and straiter kinde: yea, and many simesithe Mullet suspecteth the tound hook, swimming round about it, and flurting with the tail the bait and meat that is upon it, and never line flapping, until he have shaken it off. and then devoureth it : but fay, he cannot speed that way, he draws his mouth together, and with the ve y edge and utmost brim of his lips he nibleth about the bait, until he have gnawn it off. The wide mouthed Sea-Pike, when he perceiveth that he is caught with the hook, sheweth herein more valor and animorfity then the Elephant; for he plucketh not out of another the dart or arrow flicking the body; but maketh means to deliver himfelf from the faid hook, shaking his head, and writhing itto and fro, until he have enlarged the wound, and made it wider; enduring most stoutly and resolutely the dolour to be thus rent and torn, and never gives over, until he have wrested and wrung the hook out of his body. The Sea-Fox, will not many times come neer unto an hook, he reculeth back, and is afraid of some deceitful guil; but say that he chance to be surprized, quickly he maketh shift winde himself off again: for such is his strength, agility, and slippery mosture withal, that he will turn himself upside down with his tail upward, in such fort, that when by overturning his stomach all within is come forth, it cannot chuse but the hook looseth the hold which it had and falleth forth.

These examples do show a certain intelligence, and withal a witty and ready execution of that which is expedient for them, as need and occasion requireth. But other fishes there be, which besides this industrious fagacity in shifting for themselves, do represent a sociable nature and loving affection one unto another; as for example, the Anthia and Scari: for when the Scarus hath swallowed down an hook, other of his fellows come leaping about him, and gnaw the line afunder; and if pradventure there be any of them gotten within a net, and entangled, their companions give them their tails without, which they hold as fast as they can with their teeth, and the other lie pulling and haling of them, until they have drawn them forth. As for the Anthia, they come to rescue and succorone of their one kinde with more audacity, for putting the line against their back, they fet to it the ridgebone, which is sharp soothed in maner of a saw, and with it they endeavor to file and saw it twain. And verily, there is not a creature living on the land (as far as we know) that hath the heart and courage to aid their fellows being in danger of life, neither Bear, Bore, Lyon, nor Leopard. Well may those gather altogether in heaps, which are of the same kinde, and run one with another round about the cirque or shew-place within the Amphitheaters: but to rescue or succor one another, neitheir know they the means how nor have the courage to do it: for they fly and leap backward as far as ever they can possibly from one that is hurt or killed in their fight: As for that story, my good friend, that alledge of the Elephants, that they cast into the ditch or trench whereinto one of their company is fallen, all that ever they can get and gather together, thereby to make a bank, that he may raile himself upon, and so get forth, it is very strange, and far set: and because it cometh out of the books of King Juba, it would feem to command us (as it were) by a Royal Edict, to give credit thereto. But say it were true, there be examples of Sea-creatures enough to prove that for sociable kindeness and prudence withal, there be many of them which give no place to the wisch of all those which the land affordeth; but as touching their communion and fellow thip, we will treat thereof apart, and that anon.

To return unto our fishers: perceiving as they do, that the most part of fisher scorn the line and hook, as stale devices, or such as be discovered, they betake themselves to fine force, and shut them up within great casting nets, like as the Persians use to serve their enemies in their wars, making this account, that if they be enclosed once within those nets, they are theirs sure enough, as if no discourse of reafon in the world, no wit and policy what soever will serve them to escape: for with hoop-nets or castnets are Mullets caught, and the Iulides, the Marmiri also, the Sargi, Sea Gogeon, and the wide mouth-- ed Pikes: but fuch as plunge themselves down to the bottom of the water, called thereupon βολίπια, fuch as are the barbel, the guiltheads, and the feorpions of the fea, those they use to catch and draw up with great drags and fweepnets. And verily this kind of net Homer calleth Panagra, which is as much to lay, as catching and swooping all afore it. And yet as cunningly deviced as these engines be, the fea-dogs have devices to avoid the same, as also the wide mouthed labran; for when he perceiveth that the faid sweepnet is a drawing along the bottom, he setteth all his strength to, scrapeth in the earth, and patter hit fo, as he maketh an hole therein; and when he hath thus digged (as it were) as deep a trench as will hide him against the incursion of the net, then he coucheth himself close within it, waiting untill the net be glided over him and past. The dolphin, it he be surprized, fand perceive that he is inclosed and clasped within the armes (as one would say) of a net, endureth his fortune resolutely, and never dismaieth for the matter; nay, he is very well appayed and pleased; for he is glad in his heart, that he hath fo many fiftes about him caught in the fame net, which he may devour and make merry with at his pleasure without pains taking; and when he sees that he is drawn up neer to the land, he makes no more ado but knaws a great hole in the net, and away he goes. But fay that he cannot dispatch this feat fo quickly, but he comes into the fishers hands, yet he dieth not for this at the first time; for they draw a rishor reed thorow the skin along his crest, and so let him go: but if he suffer himself to be taken the second time, then they beat and cudgell him well; and know him they do by the seames or skars remaining of the foresaid reed. Howbeit, this falleth out very feldome; for the most part of them, when they have been once pardoner, do acknowledge what favour they have received, and beware for ever after how they do a fault and come into danger again. But whereas there be infinit other examples of fubtile flights and witty wiles which fishes have invented, both to foresce and prevent a peril, and also to escape out of a danger, that of the cuttle is worthy to be recited and would not be paffed over in filence: for having about her neck a bladder or bag hanging, full of a black muddy liquor, which thereupon they call bloss, that is to fay, lak: when the figure or being perceives her felfbeset and compassed about, so as she is ready to be taken, she casteth forth-from her the faid ink full craftily, that by troubling the water of the sea all about her, and making it look thick and black, the might avoid the fight of the fisher, and so make an escape unseen. Following herein the gods in Homer, who many times with overspreading a back cloud withdraw and steal away those whom they are minded to fave ; but enough of this.

Now as touching their craft and fubtility in affailing and chafing others, there be many experiments and examples presented unto our fight: for the fish called the Star, knowing full well, that what soever he toucheth will melt and refolve, offereth and yieldeth her body to be handled, fuffering as many as pass by her, or approch neer to stroke him: and as for the cramp-fish Torpedo, you all know well erough her powerful property; not onely to benum and stupisse those who touch her, but also to transmit a stupefactive quality, even along the maishes and cords of the net, to the very hands of the fishen who have caught her. And some there be who report thus much moreover, as having farther experience of her wonderful nature, that in case the escape and get away alive, if men do baddle aloft in the water, or dash the same upon them, they shall feel the said passion running up to the very hand, and benumming their fense of feeling, as it should feem, by reason of the water which before was altered and turned in that manner. This fish therefore having an imbred knowledge hereof by nature, never fighteth a front with any other; neither hazardeth himfelf openly: but fetching a compass about the prey which it hunteth after, shooteth forth from her these contagious influences like darts, infecting or charming rather the water first therewith, and afterwards by means thereof the fish that she layeth for; fo that it can neither defend it felf, nor flie and make an escape, but remaineth as it were arrested, and bound fast with chains, or utterly astonied. The sea-frog, called the Fisher, which name he gat by a kind of fishing that he doth practise, is known well enough to many : and Ariftotle faith, that the cuttle aforesaid useth likewise the same craft that he doth. His manner is to hang down as it were an angle line, a certain small string or gut from about his neck, which is of that nature, that he can let out in length a great way when it is loofe, and draw ic in again close together very quickly when he lift. Now when he perceiveth some small fish neer unto him, he suffereth it to nibble the end thereof and bite it, and then by little and little privily plucketh and draweth it back toward him, until he can reach with his mouth the fish that hangeth to it.

As touching poulps or purcuttles, and how they change their colour, Pindarus hath ennobled them

His minde doth alter most mutable, To poulpe the fea-fish skin semblable, Which changeth bue to all things sutable, To live in all worlds he is pliable.

and learn fo to diffemble, Which of the rock whereto it sticks, the colour doth resemble.

True it is that the chamæleon also eftsoon changeth colours but it is not upon any crasty designe that he hath, nor yet for to hide himself, but only for that he is so timorous; for cowardly he is by nature, and searcth every noise. Over and besides (at Theophrasius, writeth) full he is of a deal of winde ; and the body of this creature wanteth but a little of being all lungs and lights; whereby it may be Xxx 2

guetled, that it standeth altogether upon ventofity and wind, and so consequently very variable and Subject to change: whereas that mutability of the Polype is a powerful and setled action of his, and not a momentary passion or instrmity: for he altereth his color of a deliberate purpose, using it as a sleight or device, either to conceal himself from that whereof he is afraid; or else to catch that whereof he feedeth: and by means of this deceitful wile, he preyeth upon the one that escapeth him not, and escapeth the other that passeth by and sees him not. But to say that he eateth his own cleys or long arms that he useth to stretch forth, is a loud lye; marry that he standeth in sear of the Lampray and the Conger, is very true: for these fishes do him many shrewd turns, and he cannot require them the like. fo flippery they be, and fo foon gone. Like as the Lobster on the other fide, if they come within his cluiches, holdeth them fast, and squeizeth them to death; for their glibby slickness serveth them in no flead against his rough cleys; and yet if the Polype can get and entangle him once within his long laces, he dyes for it. See how nature hath given this circular viciflitude to avoid and chase one another by turns, as a very exercise and tryal to make proof of their wit and sagacity.

But Arithotimus hath alledged unto us the Hedgehog, or land Urchin, and stood much upon I wor not what forelight he hath of the winds: and a wondrous matter he hath made also of the triangular flight of Cranes. As for me, I will not produce the fea Urchans of this or that particular coast; to wit, either of Bizantine, or of Cyzicum, but generally all, in what seas soever; namely, how against a tempest and storm, when they see that the sea will be very much troubled, they charge and ballast themselves with little stones, for fear of being overturned or driven to and fro for their lightness, by the billows and waves of the fea: and thus by the means of this weight, they remain firm and faftupon the little rocks whereto they are fettled. As for the Cranes, who change their maner of flying according to the wind; I say, this is a skilful quality, not proper and peculiar to one kinde of filks, but common unto them all; namely, to fwim evermore against the waves and the current, yea, and very wary they be, that the wind blow not their tails, and raise their skales, and so hurt and offend their bodies laid bare and naked, yea and made rugged by that means. Hereupon they carry their fnours and muzzels always into the wind, and so direct their course : and thus the sea being cut asront at their head, keepeth down their fins, and gliding smoothly over their body, layeth their scales even, soas none of them fland flaring up. This is a thing, as I have faid, common unto all fishes, except the Elops, whose nature is to swim down the wind and the water; neither feareth he that the wind will drive up his scales in so swimming, because they do not lie toward his tail, but contrary to other filles, to-

Moreover, the Tuny is so skilful in the Solflices and Equinoxes, that he hath taught men to observe them without need of any Aftrological rules; for look in what place or coast of the sea the winter Tropick or Solftice findes him, there refleth he, and flirreth not, until the Equinox in the Spring. But a wonderful wisdom (quoth he) there is in the Crane, to hold a stone in his foot, that by the fall thereof he may quickly awaken. How much wifer then, my good friend Aristotimus, is the Dolphin? who may not abide to lie ftill and ceafe ftirring, for that by nature he is in continual motion, and endeth his moving and living together: but when he hath need of fleep, he fpringeth up with his body to the top of the water, and turneth him upon his back with the belly upward, and to suffereth it partly to float and hull, and in part to be carried through the deep, waving to and fro, as it were, in a hanging bed, with the agitation of the fea, fleeping all the while, until he fettle down to the bottom of the fea, and touch the ground: then wakeneth he, and mounting up with a jerk a fecond time, fuffereth himself to be carried until he be settled down again; and thus hath he devised to have his repose and rest intermingled with a kinde of motion. And it is said that the Tunies do the like, and upon

And now forasmuch as we have shewed already the Mathematical and Astrological fore-knowledge that fishes have in the revolution and conversion of the Sun, which is confirmed likewise by the tellimony of Aristotle, listen what skill they have in Arithmetick; but first (believe me) of the Perspective Science; whereof as it should seem, the Poet Æschylus was not ignorant: for thus he saith in one

For Tunies in the other eye are thought to have a dim and feeble fight: and therefore when they enter into the sea of Pontus, they coast along the land on the right side; but contrariwise, when they come forth: wherein they do very wifely and circumspectly, to commit the custody of the body always to the better eye. Now for that they have need of Arithmetick, by reason of their society (as it may be thought) and mutual love, wherein they delight; they are come to that height and perfection in this Art, that because they take a wondrous pleasure to feed together, and to keep one with another in sculle and troops, they always cast their company into a cubick form, in manner of a battailon, solid and fquare every way, close, and invironed with fix equal fides or faces: and arranged in this Ordinance, as it were, of a quadrat battel do they swim, as large before as behinde, and of the one side, 23 of the other, in such fort, as he that lieth in espial to hunt these Tunies, if he can but take the just number how many there be of that fide or front that appeareth next unto him, may prefently tell what the number is of the whole troop, being affured that the depth is equal to the breadth, and the breadth even with the length. The

The fish called in Greek * Hamie, took that name, it may be thought, for their conversing in com- * Of aus. panies altogether; and fol suppose came the Pelamydes by their name. As for other fishes that be sociable is rosay, aland love to live and are feen to converse in great companies together, no man is able to number them, together. they be so many. Come we rather therefore to some particular societies and inseparable fellowships that some have in living together: among which is that *Pinnotheres, which cost the Philosopher of maci that form that in his decription, for in all his books as well of moral as natural Philosophy, neer. he is ranged formost. As for the Spongetheres, I suppose he never knew, for otherwise he would not * Some have left it out. Well, this Pinnotheres is a little slift, as they say, of the stabs kind, which goeth and take is so cometh evermore with the Nacre, a big shell sish keeping sliil by it, and site as it were a porter at his shell the surpose. fide, which he letteth continually to fland wide open, until he spie some smal fishes gotten within it, fuch as they are wont to take for their food : then doth he enter likewise into the Nacres shell, and Gemeth to bite the fleshy substance thereof; whereupon presently the Nacre shutteth the shell hard, and then they two together feed upon the booty which they have gotten prisoners within this enclosure.

Astouching the Spongotheres, a little creature it is, not like unto the crab fish as the other, but rather resembling a spider and it seemeth to rule and govern the spunge, which is altogether without life, without bloud and sense; but as many other living creatures within the sea, cleaveth indeed hard to the rocks, and hath a peculiar motion of the own, namely, to stretch out and draw in it self: but for to do this need, the hath of the direction and advertisement of another : for being of a rare, hollow, and fost confluention otherwise, and full of many concavities, void and so dull of sense besides, and idle withal, that it perceiveth not when there is any substance of good meat gotten within the said void and empty holes; this little animal at such a time giveth a kind of warning, and with it she gathereth in her body, holdeth it fast, and devoureth the same : but much more will this spunge draw in her self when a man comes neer and touches her; for then being better advertised and touched to the quick, the quaketh as it were for fear, and plucketh in her body to streight and to hard, that the divers, and fuch as feek after them have no final adoc, but find it to be a painful matter for to get under and cut them

The purple fishes keep in companies together, and make themselves a common cel, much like to the combs which bees doe frame, wherein by report, they do engender and breed : and look what they have laid up for their store and provision of victuals, to wir, mosse, reits, and such sea weeds, those they put forthout of their shels, and present them unto their fellows for to eat, banquetting round as it were every one in their turn, and keeping their course to seast, one eating of anothers provision. But no great marvel it is to fee such an amiable society and loving fellowship among them, considering that the most unsociable, cruel, and savage creature of all that live either in rivers or lakes or seas, I mean the crocodile, sheweth himself wonderful fellow-like and gracious in that society and dealing that is between him and the Trochilus. For this Trochilus is a little bird of the kinde of those which ordinarily dochaunt meres, marish:s and rivers, waiting and attending upon the crocodile as it were one of his guard : neither liveth this bird at her own finding nor upon her own provision, but of the reliques that the crocodile leaveth. The service that she doth for it is this: when she feeth the ichneumon, having plastred his body as it were with a coat of mud baked hard in manner of a crust, and like unto a champion with his hands all dufty, ready to wreftle and prepared to take hold of his enemy, lye in wait for to furprise the crocodile affeep, she awakeneth him partly with her voice, and partly by nibbing him with her bill. Now the crocodile is fo gentle and familiar with her, that he will gape with his chawes wide open, and let het enter into her mouth, taking great pleafure that the should pick his teeth and peck out the little morfels of flesh that stick between, with her prety beak, and withal, to scarific his gums. But when he hath had enough of this, and would thut and close his mouth again, he letteth fall the upper chaw a little, which is a warning unto the bird for to get forth: but he never bringeth both jawes together, before he know that the Trachilus is flowen out.

There is a little fish called the guide, for quantity and proportion of shape, resembling the gudgeon only withoutforth ir fcemeth like unto a bird, whose feathers for fear stand up; the scales stare fo, and are fo rough. This fish is ever in the company of one of these great whales, swimming before, and directing his course as if he were his pilot, for fear least he should light upon some shelves, run upon the fands in the shallows, or otherwise shoot himself into some narrow creek where he can hardly turn and get forth. The whale followeth hard after, willing to be guided, and directed by him, even as a thip by the helm : and look what other thing foever belides cometh within the chaos of this monfters mouth, be it beaft, boat, or ftone, down it goes all incontinently that foul great swallow of his, and perisheth in the bottomleffe gulfe of his panch : onely this little fill he knoweth from the reft, and receiveth into his mouth and no farther, as an anchor, for within it fleepeth; and while the fifth is at repole, the whale likewise resteth still, as if he ride at anchor; no sooner is it gotten forth, but he followeth on a fresh, never leaving it by day nor by night, for otherwise he would wander here and there: and many of these whales there have been loft in this manner, wanting their guide and pilot, which have run themselves a land, for default of a good pilot. For we our selves have seen one of them so call away not long fince about the ille Anticyra : and before time by report, there was another cast upon the fands, and not far from the city Bune, which lay there stinking and putrified; whereupon by the infection of the aire, there enfued a peftilence in those parts adjoyning. What should one lay? Is there any other example worthy to be compared with these societies so streightly linked, and enterlaced with mutual benevolence? Aristotle indeed reporteth great friendship and amity between Foxes and Serpents, joyning and combing together against their common enemy the Eigle, also between the Otides and Horses; for the bird Otis delighteth in their company, and to be the Eight, and whether the may rake into their dung. For mine own part, I cannot fee that the very Bes, or the Pifmires, are fo induftious and careful one for another. True it is, that they travel and labour in common for a publick weal; but to aime at any particular good, or to respect the private benefit one in common for a public was to an example of no beaft upon the land wherefoever: but we shall perceive this difference much better, if we convert our speech to the principal duties and greatest effices of society; generation (I mean) and procreation of young : First and formost, all fishes which haunt any sea, either neer unto Lakes, or such as receiveth great Rivers into it, when they perceive their spawning time to beneer, come up toward the land, and feek for that fresh water which is most quiet and least subject to agitation for that calmenesse is good for their breeding; besides, these Lakes and Rivers ordinarily have none of these monstrous Sea monsters; so as both their spawn and their young frie, is therein most safety, which is the reason that there are so many fishes bred about the Euxine sea; for that it mourisheth no Whales or other great fishes: onely the Sea-calf which there is but small, and the Dolphin who is as little. Moreover, the mixture of many great Rivers which discharge themselves into the Sea who is a little.

cause in the temperature of the water to be very good and fit for great bellied spawners. But most admirable of all others, is the nature of the fish Anthios, which Homer called the sacred fish; although fonce think that facred in that place, is as much to fay, as great : in which fense we term the great bone, her, that is to fay, facred; whereupon the ridge bone refteth: as also the great malady, called the falling fickness: sis termed in Greek heproros, that is to say, the facred fickness: others interpret it after the common and vulgar manner, namely, for that which is vowed and dedicated to force god, or otherwise abandoned : but it seemeth that Eratofthenes so called the Guilthead or Golden eye, asanpeareth by this verse of his.

but many take it for the Elops; for rare he is to be found, and hard to be taken : howbeit, many times he is feen about the coast of Pamphylia; and whenfoever the fishers can meet with any of them, and bring them home, both they themselves wear Chaplets of flowers for joy, and also they crown and a-dorn their Barques with garlands, yea, and at their arrival they are received with much shouting and clapping of hands; but the most part are of opinion, that the Anthios beforefaid, is he which they call the facred fift; and so he is held to be 3 for that wheresoever he is, there may no hurtful nor ravening monster be found there : infomuch as the Divers plunge down into the Sea for Spunges, boldly in those coasts where these be ; yea, and other fishes, both spawn and rear their young fry fasely there, as having him for their pledge and warant of all fafety and fecurity, as in a priviledged place. The cause hereof is hardly to be rendred; whether it be that such hurtful fishes upon a secret antipathy in nature, doe avoid him as Elephants a Swine, and Lions a Cock; or that there be some marks and signes of those coasts which are clear of fuch harmful monfters, which he knoweth well and observeth, being a fish quick of wit, and as good of memory. Common it is to all females for to have a natural care and providence for their young, but in fishes, the males generally are so respective that way, and so far off from devouring the feed of their own kinde, that they continue neer unto the spawn that the females have cast, and keepthe fame, as driftotle hath left in writing. Some Milters there be, that follow after the spawners, and sprinkle them a little about the tail; otherwife, the spawn or fry will not be fair and great, but remainun-perfect, and come to no growth. This property particularly by themselves have the Physides, that they build their nefts with the fea weeds or reits, covering and defending therewith their foam and fry against the waves of the fea.

Dog-fishes give not place in any fort to the most tame and gentle beasts in the world, for kinde love and natural affection to their young : for first they engender spawn, and after that, a quick fry; and that not without, but within, nourishing and carrying the same within their own bodies, after a kinde of second generation; but when they are grown to any bignesse, they put them forth and teach them how to fwim hard by them, and afterwards receive them by the mouth into their body, which ferveth in flead of a place of abode, of nourishment and of refuge, until such sime as they be so big, that they can shift for themfelves.

Moreover, the provident care of the Tortoise in the generation, nourishment and preservation of her young, ir wonderful: for out the goeth of the fea, and layeth her egges or caffeth her spawn upon the bank fide ; but being not able to cove or fit upon them, nor to remain her felf upon the land out of the fea any long time, the bestoweth them in the gravel, and afterwards covereth them with the lightest and fineft fand that the can get : when the hath thus hidden them furely, fome fay, that with her feet the draweth raics or lines, or else imprinteth certain pricks, which may serve for privy marks to her self, to finde out the place again : others affirme, that the male turneth the females upon the back, and fo lesveth the print of thell within the fand : but that which is more admirable, the observeth just the fortieth day (for in fo many daies, the egges come to their maturity, and be hatched) and then returneth the to the place where knowing her own treasure by the seal, the openeth it with great joy and pleasure, as no mandoth his caskes of jewels or cabinet where his gold lieth.

The Crocodiles deal much after this manner in all other points; but at what marks they aime in chusing or finding out the place where they breed, no mortal man is able to imagine or give a reason whereupon it is commonly faid, that the foreknowledge of this beaff in that respect, proceedeth not wheteporter of reason, but of some supernatural divination: for going neither farther nor nester than just to that gage and height where Nihus the river for that year will rife and cover the earth, there laieth in her egges : fo that when the pailant or countrey man chanceth by fortune to hit upon a Crocodiles neft, himself knoweth and telleth his neighbours how high the river will overflow that Summer following: so just doth she measure the place that will be drowned with water, that her felfmay be fure not to be drenched while the fitteth and coveth: furthermore, when her young be newly hatched, if the fee any one of them (to foon as ever it is our of the thell) not to catch with the mouth one thing or other cominginext in the way, be it fly, Pilmire, Gnat, Earth worm, Straw or Graffe, thedamne taketh it between her teeth, teareth it and killeth it prefently; but fuch as give fome proof of animofity, audacity and execution, those she loveth, those she cherisheth and maketh much of, beflowing her love as the wifest men judge it meet and reasonable, according to reason and differences. and not with blind affection.

The Sea-calves likewife bring forth their young on the dry land; but within a while after they train them to the fea; give them a taffe of the falt water, and then quickly bring them back again: thus pra-Alle they with them by little and little many times together, until they have gotten more heart and begin of themselves to delight for to live within the sea. Frogs about their breeding time, call one to another, by a certain amorous note or nuptial tunes called properly Ololugon. And when the male hath by this meanes entifed and allured the female to him, they attend and waite together for the night: and why? In the water they cannot possibly engender, and upon the land they fear to do it in the day time; dark night is no fooner come, but boldly they go forth of the water, and then without fear they class and embrace one another. Moreover against a showre of rain their crooking voice, such as it is, you shall hear more clear and shrill than ordinary, which is a most insalible signe of raine.

But (oh (weet Neptune) what a foule fault and groffeerrour was I like to have committed; how ab-furd and ridiculous should I have made my felf, if being amused and busied to speak of these Sea-calves and Frogs, I had forgotten and overpaffed the wifest creature, and that which the gods love best, of all those that do frequent and hant the sea? for what musick of the Nightingale is comparable to that of the Halcyon; what * artificial building of the Swallowes, and Martinets; what entier amity and * granty love of Doves; what skilful cunning of the Bees, deserveth to be put in ballance with these Sea-fowles 70, some Halcyones? Of what living creatures have the gods and goddeffes fo much honoured the bree-read end-ding, travel and birth? for that it is faid that there was hor one one little to wir Teles, that Takes, that Harryones: And the state of the was so well beloved, that it received the childbirth of Latona, when she was delivered of A their your pollo and Diana: which Iland floating before time; continued afterwards firme-land; whereas the pleasure birds. of God is fuch, that all feas should be still and calme without waves, winds or drop of raine falling upon them, all the while that the Halcyon laieth and coveth, which is just about the Winter Solftice, even when the daies be shortest : which is the reason that there is no living creature that men love so well; by whose meanes seven daies they have, and seven nights even in the very heart of Winter, during which time they may fafely faile, having their voyage by sea for those dales space, more secure than their travel by land. Now if I must say somewhat likewise of each particular vertue that this bird hath: first and foremost the semale is so loving to the male her mate, that she tarrieth not with him for one season onely, but all the year long keepeth him company; and that not for shamelesse lust and wantonnesse (for she never admitteth any other male to tread her) but onely upon a kinde love and tender affection; even like an honest wedded wife that keepeth onely to her husband. And when the male groweth to be for age weak and unweldy, in such fort as he cannot follow her, but with much ado, the beareth and feedeth him in his old age; the never for faketh nor leaveth him alone for any thing, but she taketh him upon her shoulders, carrieth him every where about, tendeth him most tenderly, and is with him still unto his dying day. Now for the affection which she beareth to her young, and the care that she hath of them and their fafety: when she perceiveth once that she is with egge-presently she goeth about the building of her nest; not tempering mude or clay for to make thereof motter; nor daubing it upon the walls, and spreading it over the rouse as the Swallows do; nor yet employing her whole body or the most part thereof about her work, as doth the Bee, which entring in h: hony-combe with her entier body; and working withal the fix feet together, devideth the place in fix angled cels: but the Aleyon having but one infirument, one tool, one engine to work withal, evan her own bill, without any thing else in the world to help her in her travel and operation; yes what workmanship she makes and what fabricks she frameth, like unto a Master Carpenter or Shipweight, hard it were to beleeve, unlesse a man had seen it, being indeed such a fabrick and piece of work, which onely of all other cannot be overthrown nor drenched with the fea; for first and foremost he goes and gathers a number of bones of the fish called Belone, that is to say, a Needle, which she joyneth and bindeth together, interlacing them some long-wife, others overthwart, much like as the woofe is woven upon the warpe in a loome, winding, plaining and twifting them up and down one within another; fo that in the end fashioned it is in forme round, yet extended out in length like unto a fishers weele or bow-net : after she hath finished this frame, she bringeth it to some Creek, and opposethit a-Stinft the waves, where the fea gently beating and dashing upon it, teacheth her to mend that was not well compact, and to fortifie it in such places where she fees it gapeth, or is not united close by reason of the sea-water that hath undone the composition thereof: contrariwise, that which was well joynted, the lea doth to fettle and drive together, that hardly a man is able to break, diffolve or doe it injury either with knock of stone or dint of edged tool. But that which yet maketh it more admirable, is the proportion and form of the concavity and hole within this vessel, for framed it is and composed in such fort, that it will receive and admit no other thing, but the very bird which made it, for nought elic can enter into it, fo close it is shut up, not so much as the very water of the Sea. I am affured that there is not one of you all, but he hath many times feen this neft: but for mine own part, who have both viewed, touched and handled it, and that very often, I am ready to fay and fing thus:

The like at Delos once I meen, Was in Apollos temple feen,

I mean the altar made all of horns, renowned amongst the seven wonders of the world; for that without foder, glew, or any other matter to binds and hold the parcels together, made it was and framed of homs which grew on the right fide of the head onely. But Othat this god would be fo good and gracious unto me, being in some sort musicall and an Islander, like himself, as so pardon me if If ing the praife of that firme and mer-maid fo highly commended; as also gently to hear me laugh I sing the praise of that firme and mer-maid fo highly commended; as also gently to hear me laugh I sing the praise of that firme and mer-maid for the single of the singl is to fay, a striker of barbels, knowing that even Venus, borne as she was of the sea, and instituting her facrifices neer unto it, taketh no pleafure that any thing should be killed. And moreover, ye wot well enough, that in the city of Lepis, the prices of Neptune cat nothing that cometh out of the fea, as alfo that in the city Eleusin, those who are professed religious, and admitted to the holy mysteries of Ceres, honour the barbel; yea, and in the city of Argos the prictireffe of Diana upon a devout reverence forbeareth to feed of this creature; for that these barbles doe kill and defroy all that ever they can, the sea hare, which is so venimous and so deadly a poison to man . in regard of which benefit, reported they are friendly unto mankinde, and preservers of their health, and therefore honoured they be, and kept as facrofanct: and yet you shall see in many cities of Greece, both temples and altars dedicated unto Diana surnamed Didynna, as one would say, affected unto fishers nets: like as to Apallo Delphinius: for certain it is, that the place which he especially chose above all others for his abode, the posterity descended from the Gretansians came to inhabit and people, being conducted thither by the guidance of a dolphin : and not because himself (as some fabulous writers report) being transformed into a dolphin, swamb-fore their fleet: but furely a dolphin he sent to direct those men in their navigation, and so he brought them to the bay of Cirtha.

Alfo written it is in histories, that chose who were fent by King Prolomeus surnamed Soter, to the city Sinope, for to carry the god Serapis, together with their Captain Dionyfius, were by force of wind and tempest driven against their wills beyond the cape or promontory Melea , where they had Pelaponne far on the right hand; and when they wandered and were toffed to and frou pon the feas, not knowing where they were, making account they were loft and caft away, there shewed himself before the prow of their (hip, a dolphin, which feened to call unto them, and who guided them unto the coasts, where there were many commodious havens and fair bairs for ships to harbour, and ride in with lafety; and thus he conducted and accompanied their thips from place to place, until at length he lafety; and thus he conducted and accompanied their thips from place to place, until at length he lafety; and thus he road of Circha; where after they had facrificed for their fafe arrival and landing, they understood that of two images there, they were to have away that of Pluto, and carry it with them, but the other of Proferpina to leave behinde them, when they had taken onely the mould and putern thereof. Probable it is therefore, that the god Apollo carried an affection to this dolphin, for that it loveth musick to well : whereupon the Poet Pindarus comparing himfelf anto the dolphin, such that he was provoked and firred up to musick by the leaping and dauncing of this file, or rather we are to think that the god is well affected unto him, because he is to kind and loving unto man: for the onely creature it is, that loveth man for his own fake, and in regard that he is a man; whereas of land beafts fome you shall have that love none at all; others, and those that be of the tamest kinde, make much of those onely, of whom they have some use and benefit; namely, such as feed them or converse with them familiarly, as the dog, the horse and the elephant : and as for swallows, received though they be in our houler, where they have entertainment, and whatfoever they need, to wit, shade, harbour and a necessary retrait for their safety, yet they be assaid of man, and shan him as if he were some savage beaft; whereas the dolphin alone of all other creatures in the world, by a as it he were tome tavage beaut; whereas he company assured an other creatmes in the works of accreain inflinct of nature, carrieth that fincere affection unto man, which is fo much fought for and defired by our best Philosophers, even without any respect at all of commodity: for having no need at all of mans belp, yet is he nevertheless friendly and courteous unto all, and hath succoured many in their diffreste; as the flory of Arion will teffine, which is fo famous, as no man is ignorant thereof: and even you Ariffeiimss your own felf , rehearfed to very good purpose the example of Hesselm:

Like as the dolphin fwims apace Directly forward to that place Whereas the pleasant sharomes do found, And whence their noise deth soon rebound: What time both winds and waves do lye At sea, and let no harmony.

But yet by your good leave, my friend, Of that your tale you made no end.

for when you reported unto us the fidelity of his dog, you should have proceeded farrher, and told out all, not leaving out (as you did) the narration of the Dolphins: for surely the notice that the Dog gave, by baying, barking, and running after the murderers with open mouth, was (I may tell you) but ablinde presumption, and no evident argument. About the Temple Nemeium, the Dolphins meeting with the dead corps of a man floating up and down upon the fea, took it up and laid it on their backs, shifting it from one to another by turns, as any of them were weary with the carriage, and very willingly, yea, and as it should feem, with great affection, they conveyed it as far as to the Port Rhium, where they laid it down opon the shore, and so made it known that there was a mati murthered. Myrtillus the Lesbian writeth, that Analus the Aolian being fallen in fansie with a daughter of Phineus, who according to the Oracle of Amphirite, was by the daughters of Pentheus cast down headlong into the sea, threw himself after her; but there was a Dolphin took him up, and brought him fafe into the Isle Lesbos. Over and befides, the affection and good will which a Dolphin bare unto a yong lad of the City Iafes, was fo hot and vehement, in the highest degree, that if ever one creature was in love with another, it was he; for there was not a day went over his head, but he would difport, play and swim with him, yea, and suffer himself to be handled and tickled by him upon his bare ikin : and if the boy were disposed to mount alost upon his back, he would not refuse, nor seem to avoid him; nay he was very well content with fuch a carriage, turning what way foever he reined him, or feemed to incline: and thus would he do in the prefence of the laftane, who oftentimes would all run forth to the fea fide of purpose to behold this light. Well on a day above the rest, when this lad was upon the Dolphins back, there fell an exceeding great shower of rain, together with a monstrous storm of hail; by reason whereof the poor boy fell into the sea, and theredyed: but the Dolphin took up his body dead as it was, and together with it shat himself upon the land; neither would be depart from the corps to long as there was any life in him, and to dyed, judging it great reason to take part with him of his death, who seemed partly to be cause thereof. In remembrance of which memorable accident, the Ialians represent the History thereof stamped and printed upon their coin, to wit, a boy riding upon a Dolphin; which flory hath caused that the fable or tale that goeth of Caranus is believed for a truth: for this Garanus, as they fay, born in Paros, chanced to be upon atime at Byzantium, wherefeeing a great draught of Dolphins taken up in a cafting-net by the fishers, whom they meant to kill and cut into pieces, bought them all alive, and let them go again into the fea. Not long after, it hapned that he failed homeward in a Foilt of fifty oars, which had aboard (by report) a number of Pyrats and Rovers; but in the streights between Naxos and Paros, the vessel was cast away, and swallowed up in a gust; in which shipwrack, when all the rest perished, he onely was faved, by means, as they fay, of a Dolphin, which coming under his body as he was newly plunged into the fea, bare him up, took him upon his back, and carried him as far as to a certain cave about Zacynthus, and there landed him: which place is shewed for a monument at this day, and after his name, is called Caranium. Upon this occasion, Archilachus the Poet, is said to have made these verfes :

Of fifty men by tempest drown'd, And left in fea all dead behinde; Coran alone alive was found, God Neptune was to him fo kinde.

Afterwards the faid Caranus himfelf dyed; and when his kinsfolk and friends burned his corps neer to the sea-side in a funeral fire, many Dolphins were discovered along the coast hard by the shore, shewing (as it were) themselves how they were come to hohor his obsequies; for depart they would not, before the whole solemnity of this last duty was performed. That the Scutchion or Shield of Ulifeshad for the badge or enfign, a Dolphin, Stefichorus hath teftified, but the occasion and cause thereof. the Zacynthians report in this maner, as Criteus the Historian beareth witness. Telemachus his fon being yet an infant, chanced to flip with his feet; and as men fay, to fall into a place of the fea, where it was very deep; but by the means of certain Dolphins, who took him as he fell, faved he was, and carried out of the water : whereupon his father, in a thankful regard and honor to this creature, engraved within the collet of his Signet, wherewith he fealed, the portrait of a Dolphin, and likewife carried it as his Arms upon his Shield. But foral much as I proteited in the beginning, that I would relate to you no fables, and (I wor not how) in speaking of Dolphins, I am carried farther then I was aware, and fallen upon Vliffes and Caranus, somewhat beyond the bounds of likelihood and probability, I will fet a fine upon mine own head, aud even here for amends lay a straw, and make an end. You therefore, my maffers, who are Judges, may when is pleafeth you proceed to your verdictfor if you will, both of you, confer your arguments, proofs and reafons, which you have alledged of the one fide and the other, and lay them all together in common between you, it will be seen how mightily you shall consuct and put down those, who would deprive bruit beasts of all understanding and difcourse of reason.

As for us, we were of minde a good while fince to fay according to the fentence of Sophocles: Your talk ere while which feem'd to difagree, Will foon accord and joint-wife framed bee.

Ell faid this was (in truth) of him unto those great Captains and Commanders who succeeded him, unto whom he made way, and gave entrance to the executions of a softex-ploits which they performed afterwards, when himself had to their hands chaided out of Greete the barbarous King Xerxes, and delivered the Greeks out of servicus et but as well may the same be said also to those who are proud of their learning, and stend highly upon their readition. For if you take away men of assistance also and etherent on Writers of them: ake away the Politick Government of Pericles at home sithe naval victories and trophies archived by Phomio, neer the promontory of Rhims; the nobls prowesses of Nicios, about the life Cythera, as also before the Citics of Corinh and Megara; take away the sea-sight of Demossbene before Pylos; the sour hundred Captives and Prisoners of Cleon; the worthy deeds of Tolmias, who stoured all the coasts of Pelopomassus; the brave about Mindeley and the batted which he won against the Bocotians in the place called Demossys; and withal, you blot out the whole History of Touciaides; take away the valorous endeavors of Touciand and Arabispus, neer unto the fill Lubos; the happy suppersion and abolition of the Tyrannical Oligarchy of the Thirty Usupers, by Therements; take away the valorous endeavors of Toraspibus and Arabispus, neer with the rate designs and enterprizes executed by those seven and and of the plays, preserved the traveled and resolute as to levy a power, and wage war against the Lordly Potentates of Sparia; and last of all Conon, who caused the Athenians to go to sea again and maintain the war; and therewishal, take away Cratispus and all his Chronicles. For as touching Xenophous, he was the writer of his own History, keeping a Book and Commentary of those occurrents and proceedings which passes which passes of the proceedings which passes the Systemian, composed the said Narration of his ass, to the end that Xenophou might win more credit, and be the better beleived, writing as he did of and credit unto. And among the reft, the skill of Painters craft hath not been leaft advanced and adorned by her. For Apollodorus the Painter, the first man who devised the mixture of colours, and the maner of darkning them by the shadow, was an Athenian: over whose works was set this Epigram by his own self-

Sooner will one, this carp and twit; Then do the like, or sample it.

So were Euphranor and Nicias, Asclepiodorus also, and Plistanens the brother of Phidias, whereof fome portrayed victorious Captains, others painted battels, and others drew to the life the Worthies and Deni-godes: like as Euphranor who painted noble Thessen, and set this picture as a paragon in comparison with another of Parrhassus making; saying that the Theseus of Parrhassus had eater roses, but his Theseus had been sed with good Ox bees: for to say a truth, that picture of Parrhassus was daintly and deletactly made, resembling in some fort that which Euphranor talketh of; but he that should see this of Euphranors doing, might say (not unsity) these verses out of Homer:

The people of Ercchtheus font, whom Pallas, daughter dear Of Jupiter that mighty god, sometime did feed and rear.

Euphranor also depainted the battel of hostemen before the city Mantinea, against Epaminondas, which seemeth not to be without some surious and divine instinct. The argument and subject matter whereof was this, Epaminondas the Theban, after the battel which he won before the Town Lendira, puffed up with glory in this greatness of his, determined resolutely to infult over Sparta, which now was already down the wind, and at once to tread and trample under foot the high spirit and reputation of that City. First therefore he invaded Laconia with a mighty power of threescore and ten thousand fighting men, spoiling and harrowing the Countrey as he went; whereby he withdrew all the neighbor Nations from their confederacy and alliance with the Lacedemonians. After this, when they put themselves in battel ray, and made head against him before Mantinea, he challenged and provoked them to fight: which they neither would nor durft accept, expecting aid that should come unto them from Athens. Whereupon he brake up his camp, and dislodging in the night scason secretly and contrary to all mens expectation, entred again into Laconia, in which journey and expedition he went within a little of furprizing the City of Sparta, and winning it, naked as it was and without defendans. But their Allies and Confederates having intelligence of his coming, came with all foeed to factor the Gity. Then Epaminondas made femblance that he would turn and bend his fraces to the wasting and fooling of their Territory, as he had done before. Thus having by this firstagem deladed his enemies, and lulled them afteen in fecurity, he departed fuddenly by n ghr ont of Laconia, having over-run and destroyed all before him with great celerity, and presented himself with his whole Army, before them of Mantinua, who looked for nothing less then fuch a guest, but were in confultation for to fend help to Lacedemon: but he interrupting and breaking their counfels, immediately commanded the Thebans to arm, who being brave and couragious Souldiers, invefted the City of Mantinea round about, flruck up the alarm, and gave an affault. The Mantineans hereat affonied, ranup and down the streets, howling and wailing, as being not able to sustain, and much less put back fo great a puiffance, which all at once, in manner of a violent fream, came running upon them; neither did they think of any aid or means to relieve themselves in this distress. But at the very point of this extreamity, the Athenians were discovered, descending from the hills down into the plains of Mantinea, who knowing nothing of this sudden surprize, and present danger wherein the City stood, marched folly, and took leiture; but when they were advertifed hereof by a vaunt Courrier who made means to get forth of the City; notwithflanding they were but a handful, in comparison of the great multitude of their enemies, and withal somewhat weary with their journey, and not seconded with any other of their Allies and Affociates, they advanced forward, and put themselves in order of battel against their enemies, who were in number many for one: the horsemen also for their parts being likewisee arranged, set spurs to their horses, and rode hard to the gates and walls of the City, where they charged their enemies to hotly with their horfes, and gave them to cruel a battel, that they gat the upperhand, and rescued Mantinea out of the danger of Epaminondas. Now had Euphranor painted this conflict most lively in a table, wherein a man might have seen the furious encounter, the couragious charge and bloody fight, wherein both horseand man seemed to puff and blow again for

But I suppose you will not compare the wit or judgement of a Painter, with the courage and policy of a Capaila, nor endure those, who prefer a painted table before a glorious Trophi; or the vain shadow, before the real substance, and thing indeed: how soever, Simonides said that Picture was a dumb Poesse, and Poesse a speaking Picture: for look what things or actions Painters do shew as prefent, and in manner as they were in doing, writings do report and record as done and past; and if the one represent them in colours and figures, and the other exhibite the same in words and sentences, they differ both in matter, and also in maner of imitation, howbit, both the one and the other shoot at one end, and have the same intent and purpose. And he is connect the best Historian, who hath the skill to set our a Narration, as in a painted table with divers aff ctions, and fundry conditions of persons, as with many images and pourtraictures. And verily this may appear in Thucydides, who diroughout his whole History, contendent to again unto this dilucidity of suite, striving to make the auditor of his words the spectator, as it were, of the deeds therein contained, and desirous to imprine in the Readers the fame passions of astonishment, wonder and agony, which the very things themfelves would work when they are represented to the eye. For Demost kenes, who put the Athenians in ordinance of battel, even upon the very fands and shore within the Creek of Pylos; and Brasidas; who hashing the Pilot of his Galley to run with the prow aland, walking along the hatches himself, and being there wounded, and ready to yield up his vital breath, funk down among the feats of the Rowers : alfo the Lacedemonians who fought a battel at fea, as if they had been on him land: the Athenians likewife, who upon the land embattelled themselves, and fought as if they had been within their Galleys ac sea again, in the Sicilian war, the description which he maketh of the two Armies arranged on the land, hard by the Sea fide, to behold their men fighting a naval battel, wherein the victory hung along time in equal ballance, and inclined neither to the one fide nor the other; by occasion of which doubtful iffue, they were in an intollerable agony, diffrest, and perplexity, to behold the fundry encounters and reciprocal charges and recharges, communicating their violence and heat of contention, evento the very bodies of the beholders upon the firond, who puffing, blowing, panting, and sweating in as great pain and fear, asif they had been personally in the very conflict: the orderly disposition, the graphical description, and the lively narration which he maketh of all this, whatis it but an evident representation of a picture? Now if it be not meet to compare Painters with Captains, there is as little reason to set Historians in comparison with them.

He who brought the news of the battel and victory at Marathon, as Heraclides of Pontus writeth. was one Thersippus of Eroe, or as most Historians report, it was one Eucless, who came running in a great heat from the field in his armor as he was, and knocking at the gates of the principal mens houses of Athens, was able to fay nothing elfe but this, x sigle, and x signer, that is to fay, rejoyce ye, all is well with us, and therewith his breath failed, and so he gave up the ghoft, and yet this man came and brought tidings of that battel wherein himself was an actor. But tell me, I pray you, if there were fome Goat-herd or Neat-herd, who from the top of an hill or high bank, had bekeld afar off this great service, and indeed greater then any words can express, should have come into the City with news thereof, not wounded himself, nor having loft one drop of blood, and for his good tidings demand afterwards to have the same honors and memorials which were granted unto Cynegirus, to Callimachus, and Polyzebus, enely because for sooth, he had made report of the doughty deeds, the wounds and death of these brave men; would you not think that he surpassed all the impudency that can be imagined? confidering especially, that the Lacedemonians, by report, sent unto him who brought the first word of the victory at Mantinea, which Thucydides described in his story, a piece of fielh from one of their dinners, or halls, called Phiditta, for a recompence of his happy news? And (to fay a truth) what are Historiographers else? but certain messengers to relate and declare the acts of others, having a loud and audible voice, and who by their pleasant eloquence and significant phrases, are able to set forth the matter to the best, which they take in hand : unto whom they owe indeed the reward due for good tidings, who first do light upon their compositions, and have the first reading of them: for surely, p: aifed they be onely when they make mention of fuch exploits, and read they be in regard of those lingular persons whom they make known, as the authors and actors thereof. Neither are they the goodly words and fine phrases in Histories that perform the deeds, or deserve so greatly to be heard: tor even Fortry hath a grace, and is esteemed, for that it describeth and relateth things, as if they had been done, and which carry a refemblance of truth: and according as Homer in one place

> Many false tales how for to tell, Much like to truth, she knows full well.

And it is reported, that one of Mennaders familiar friends said unto him upon a time: Menander, the Bacchanale feasts are at hand, and hast not thou yet done thy comedy? who returned him this an fwer, Yes, I wis have I, fo help me the gods, composed it I say, I have: for the matter thereof is laid forth, and the disposition digested already; there remaines the no more to be done, but onely to fet thereto the verses that must go to it. So that you see the Poets themselves reputed the things and deeds more necessiry and important then words and speech. The famous Courtizan Corinna one day reproved Pindurus, who then was a yong man, and took a great pride in himself, for his learning and knowledge : Thou hast no skill at all Pindarus (quoth she) in Poetry, for that thou dost not invent and device fables, which is indeed the proper and peculiar work of Poefie; as for thy tongue, it ministreth fome Rhetorical Figures, Catachreses and Metaphrases, Songs, Musical Measures and Numbers, unto the matter and argument onely, as pleasant sauces to commend the same. Pindarus pondering well these words and admonitions of hers, thought better of the matter, and thereupon out of his Poetical vein, poured out this Canticle:

Innenus, or the launce with it aff of gold, Sir Cadmus, or that facred race of old, Which Dragons teeth they fay fometime did yield Of Warriors brave, when fown they were in field: Or Hercules who was in fueb account,

And his main force of body, to surmount, &c. Which when he had shewed to Corinna, the woman laughed a good, and said, That corn should be fown out of ones hand, and not immediately from out of the full fack : for in truth, much after this fort had Pindarus gathered and heaped up a miscellane deale of sables, and powed them forthall huddle together in this one canticle. But that poelie confifteth much in the fine invention of Fables, Plate himself hath written: and verily a Fable or Tale is a false narration, resembling that which is vine, and therfore far remote it is from the thing indeed, if it be foothat a narration is the image of an act done, and a fable the image or shadow of a narration. Whereupon this may be inferred, that they who devite and feign fabulous deeds of armet, are so much inseriour to Historiographers that make tine reports, as Historiographers who relate onely such deeds come behind the actours and authours themselves. Certes this City of Athens had never any excellent or renowned work men in the teate of Postry, no not to much as in the Lyrick part thereof, which professes musicall odes, and songs: for Gruesias seemeth to have made his dithyrambes on canticles in honour of Bacebus, hardly and with much ado, and was himfelf barren and of no grace or gift at all; besides, he was so mocked and flouted by the comicall poets, that he grew to be of no reckoning and reputation, but incurred an ill and octions name: As for that part of Poetry which dealeth in representation of personages in plaies upon a stage, so small account they made at Athens of the Comedians and their profession? nay they diffained and formed it fo much, that a law there was enacted, forbidding exprelly, that no Senatour of the counfell Areopagus, might make a comedy: contrariwife, the tragedy floarified, and was in much request, for delivering the best care-sport, and representing the most wonderfull spectacle that men in those dayes could heare or behold; giving both unto fictions, and affections a deceivable power, which was of fuch a property, according to the faying of Gorgias: That he who decived thereby, was more just then he who deceived not; and he who was deceived became wifer than he that was not deceived at all; the deceiver (1 fay) was more just, because he performed that which he promised, and the deceived person wifer; for that such as are not altogether grosse, doluth, want the profined and caught by the pleafure and delight of words.

To come now to the main point: what profit ever brought these excellent tragedies unto the City of Athens, comparable unto that which the prudent policy of Themistocles effected in causing the walls of the City to be built; or to the vigilant care and diligence of Pericles, who adorned the castle and citadell with fo many beautifull buildings; or to the valour of Militades who delivered the City from the danger of servitude; or to the brave mind of Cimon, who advanced that State to the soveraignty and command of all Greece? If the Learning of Euripides, and the eloquence of Sophocles, or the sweet and pleasant tongue of Eschylus had freed them from any perils and extremities, or purchafed and procured them any glory more then they had before, good reason peradvanture it were, to compare poeticall fictions and inventions with warre-like triumphes and trophies; to fee the theater against the generalls pavilion and palace; and to oppose the schooling and teaching of players, how to all Comedies and Tragedies, unto prowesses and brave seats of arms. Will you that we bring in place the personages themselves i carrying with them the markes, badges and ensignes that testific their deed, and allow either of them entrance apart by themselves, and passage along by us. Then let theremarch on the one side poets with their Flutes, Harps, Lutes and Viols, singing and saying.

Letthem bring with them their furniture, their vestments and players apparell, their masks, their altars, their rolling engine and devices to be turned and removed to and fro all about the stage and scaffold together with their trevets of gold the prizes of their victories. Let them be accompanied with their traine, of players and actors, to wit Nicostrates, Callipides, Meniscus, and Pellus, and such as they, attending upon a tragedy, to trick and trim her, or to beare up her traine, and carry her litter, as if the were fome flately and fumptuous dame; or rather as inamillers, guilders, and painters of images following after. Let there be provision made I say of Habilliments, of visours, of purple mantis and royall robes of effate, of fabricks and pageants deviced to fland and be employed upon the flage of dancers, jefters, of flage keepers, wifelars and henchmen a troublefome fort and rable of grooms: and in one word let there be brought all the geere and implements belonging to fuch plaies exceeding collyand chargable: fuch as when a Laconian faw upon a time and wifely beheld, brake out into this freech, and that to very good purpole: ô how far amile and out of the way are the Athenians, to dipend to much money, and imploy such serious study in games and sooleries: surely they defray in the summure and setting out of a theater, as much as would serve to set associate royall armado at sea, and maintaine a pnissant army upon the land. For he that would set down and cast accompt how much every comedy cost them, shall find that the people of Athem, spent more in exhibiting the tragedies of Backe, Phenisse, of both the Ordipodes, and of Antigon, or in representing the calamities of Media and Press. Eletra, then they disburfed in their wars against the Barbarians, either to win the soveraignty and dominion over them, or to defend their own freedome and liberty; for many times their great captaines & commanders led forth their Souldiers to battell, having made proclamation before, for to carry with *anusa them fuch victuals as * required no fice for their drefling, this is certain, that the Captains of Gallict and Some ex- war-Ships, for their failers, having provided no other Cates, and Viands, but meal, Onions and Cheefe pound, for their Mariners, as well Rowers, as Sailers, have fo embarked them and gone to fea: whereas the unfolders, Wardens and Ediles who were to fet forth plaies and dances have (to their great coff) fed their abunorited. unroites, unbaked, ors and players with delicate Eels, with tender Lectuces, with Cloves of Garlick, and with good marrow-bones, feafting them a long time before, most daintily, and whiles they did nought elfe but exercise their voice, scour their throats and clear their breafts, they made good chear full merrily. And what good had these wastfull spenders of their good (spent about such vanities) in the end? If their Playes sped not well, but lost the victory, they were well mocked, hissed and laughed at for all their pains and coft : but fay they went away winners, and having the better hand, what got they by it? furely not a trevet or three footed flool, nor any other mark and monument of victory, as Demetrius faid, but to remain a lamentable example of unthrifts, who have laid all they had upon toyes and fooleries, and left behind them their houses, like empty sepulchres, and imaginary tombs. This is the end that cometh of fuch expenses about Poetry; and no greater honour is to be looked for. Now on the other fide, let us behold likewise their brave Captains and Warriours: and while thefe paffe along,

There (hould indeed be filence or good words. They ought to void out of this company, Who idle live, and never drew their swords In field, or ferv'd with care and agonie In common weal: whose beart would never stand To such Exploits, whose mind is eke profane, Who neither by Militades his band, That flew the Medes nor by the Persiaus bane, Themistocles, was ever institute, And sworn to Lawes of Knighthood resolute.

Yea mary, here (me thinks) I fee a Martiall Mask, and brave thew toward : fet out with foundrons embattelled on land, with fleets arranged for to fight at fea, loaden and hezvily charged with rich spoils

Alal' Alala, daughter dear, Of bloody VV ars come forth and bear:

Behold and fee a forreft of Pikes and Lances in the forefront, the very preamble and flourish before the battell : me thinks I hear one of them refound : Embrace death most hardy Knights, the bests crifice and most facred oblation that is, (for so faith Epaminondas the Thebane) fighting valiantly, and exposing your selves to the most honourable and bravest services that be in desence of Country, of your ancestors tombs and sepulchres, and of your Temples and Religion : me thinks also I seetheir your antenors to mand me in solemn pomp and procession, not drawing or leading after them for their prize and reward, an ox or a goat; neither be the said victories crowned with lvy, or smelling strong of new wine in the lees, as the Bacchanales do; but they have in their train, whole Cities, Mands, Continents and firm lands as wellimediterranean as maritime fea-coaffs, together with new Colonies of ten thousand men a piece, to be planted here and there; and withall, crowned they be and adorned on evesy fide with Trophies, with triumphs, pillage and bootie of all forts; the Enfigns, Badges & Arms that these victorious Captains give; the images also that they represent in shew, be their stately and beautiful Ten ples, as the Parthenon, the Hecatompedos; their City walls on the South fide; the arcenalisto receive and lodge their ships; the beautifull Porches and Galleries; the Province of the demy like Chersonesus, and the City Amphipolis: as for the Plain of Marathon, it goeth before the Laurest Garland, and Victory of Miltiades, Salamis accompanieth that of Themistocles, trampling under his feet, and going over the broken timber and shipwrack of a thousand Vessels: as for the Victory of Gimon, it bringeth with it an hundred Phenician great Gallies from the River Eurymedon: that of Demosthems, and Clean, comes from Sphalleria, with the Target of Captain Brafidas won in the field, and a number of his Souldiers captive, and bound in Chains: the Victory of Genon, walled the City, and that of Throftbulns reduced the people with Victory and liberty from Phyle: the fundry Victories of Alcibiades fet upright the State of the City, which by the unfortunate overthrow in Sicily recled, and was ready to fall to the ground; and by the battels fought by Nelous and Androclus in Lydia and Caria: Greece law all Ionia raised up again and supported. And if a man demand of each one of the other Victories, what benefit hath accrued unto the City by them? one will name the Ille Lesbos, and another Sames, one will speak of the Euxine Sea, and another of five hundred Gallies, and he shall have another talk of ten thousand Talents, over and above the honour and glory of Trophics. These be the causes why this city doth folemnize and celebrate fo many feftivall dayes, and hereupon it is, that it offereth Sacrifices, * The erry, no, nor when Curcinus lay with Aerope, or * Alidamus with Helior: But upon the fixth of names of Muy, even to this presented, the City holdeth setting the memory of that Victory, in the Plains of swo patts. Marathon: and the fixth day of another [of another *] moneth, maketh a folenm offering of wine unto the gods, in remembrance of that Victory which Chabrias obtained near unto the ille Naxes: and upon the twefth day of the same Moneth, there is another Sacrifice likewise performed in the Name of a Thanks-giving to the gods, for their Liberty recovered, because upon the fame day those citizens which were prisoners, and in bondage within Phyle, came down and returned into the City: upon the third day of March they wonne the famous field of Platea: and the fixteenth day of the faid March, they confecrated to Diana; for on that day this goddeffe shone bright, and it was full Moone, to the victorious Greeks, before the ille of Salamis. The noble victory which they atchieved before the City of Mantines, made the twelfth day of September more holy, and with greater folemnity observed, for upon that day, when all other their allies and affociates were difcomfitted and put to flight, they only by their valour wonne the field, and erected a trophic over their Enemies who were upon the point of victory. See what hath raifed this City to fuch grandence! Lo what hath exalted it to fo high a pitch of honour! and this was the cause that Pindarus called the City of Athens, the pillar that supported Greece; not for that by the tragedies of Phrynichus or Thefpis, it fet the fortune of the Greeks upright, but in regard of this, that as himfelf writeth, in another place, along the coast of Artemisium :

Where Athens youth as poet Pindar Said,

Of freedome first the glorious ground-worke laid.

And afterwards at Salamis, at Mycale, and Platees, having settled it firm and strong as upon a rock of diamonds, they delivered it from hand to hand unto others.

But haply fome man will fay: True it is indeed, all that ever Poets do, are no better than fports and pastimes: But what fay you to Oratours, they seem to have some prerogative and ought to be compared with martiall Captaines: whereupon it may feem, as Æschines scoffing merily, and quipping at Demostheres said: That there is some reason why the barre or pulpit for publick oration. may commence action and processe against the tribunals seat of generally, and their chaire of estate. Is is then meet and reasonable that the oration of Hyperides intituled Plataicus, should be preferred before the victory which Arifides wonne before the City Platea? or the oration of Lifias against the thirty tyrants, go before the maffacre and execution of them performed by Thrafybulus and Archias? or that of Ajchines against Timarchus, being accused for keeping Har'ots, and a brothell house, before the aide that Phocian brought into the City of Byzantidm, befreged ? by which succour he impeached the Macedonians, and repressed their infolent villanies and outrages committed in abusing the children of the Athenian confederates? or shall we compare the oration of Demosthenes as touching the crown, with those publick and honourable coroners which Themistocles received for setting Greece free? confidering that the most excellent place of all the faid oration, and fullest of eloquence, is that wherein the faid oratour conjureth the foules of those their auncestours, and citeth them for witnesses, who in thebattel of Marathon exposed their lives with such resolution for the safety of Greece? or shall we put in ballance to weigh against worthy warriours, these that in schooles teach young men Rhetorick, namely, such as Isocrates, Antiphon, and Iseus ? But certain it is, that this City honoured those valiant Captaines with publick funerals, and with great devotion gathered up the reliques of their bodies; yea, and the fame oratour canonized them for gods in heaven, when he fware by them, although he followed not their steps: and Isocrates who extelled and highly praised those who man-fully sought and willing were to spend their heart-blood in the battle of Marathm, saying, that they made to little account of their lives, as if their own foules had been elfe-where, and other mens in their bodies, magnifying this their Refolution, and the small reckoning which they made of this life; yet when himfelf was very old, upon occasion, that one asked him how he did: answered: Ido even as an aged man, (having above 90, yeeres upon my back) may do; and who thinketh death to be the greatest misery in the world : and how waxed he thus old? Certes, not by filing and sharpening the edge of his sword; not by grinding and whetting the point of his speares head: not with (couring and forbishing his head-peice or motion; not with bearing armes in the field; not by rowing in the gallies: but for footh with couching, knitting and gluing as it were together Rhetoricall tropes and figures; to wit, his antitheta, confilling of contraries, his parifa, standing upon equall weight and measure of fyllables, his homooptota, precisely obtaining the like termination, and falling even of his clauses, pollishing, smothing, and perusing his periods and sentences, not with the rough hammer, and pickax, but which the file and plainer most exactly. No marvail then, if the man could not abide the ruflling of harneis, and clattering of armour; no marvell (1fay) if he feared the shock and incounter of two armies, who was afraid that one vowell should runne upon another, and least he should pronounce a clause or number of a sentence which wanted one poore syllable; for the very morrow after that Miltiades had wonne that field upon the plaines of Marathon, he returned with his victorious Army into the City of Athens: and Pericles having vanquished and subdued the Samians within the space of nine moneths, gloried more than Agamemnon did, who had much adoe to winne Iroie, at the tenth years end; whereas Isogrates spent the time well near of three Olympiades in penning one Oration which he called Panegyricus: notwithstanding all that long time, he never served in the warres, nor went in any embaffage: hebuilt no City, nor was fent out as a captaine of a galley and warrethip, and yet that very time brought forth infinite warres: But during the space that Timosbeus delivered the ifle Eubea out of bondage; all the while that Chabrius warred at fea about the illand Naxos, and Iphicrates descited and hewed in pieces one whole regiment of the Lacedemonians, near the port of Lecheum, and in which time the people of Athens having enfranchifed all Citier, endued Greece throughout with the fame liberty of giving voices in the generall affembly of the States, as they had themselves, he sat at home in his house poring at his booke, seeking out proper phrases and choise words for the said oration of his, in which space, Pericles raised great por ches, and the goodly temple Hecatoupedes; and yet the comical Poet Gratinus, fcoffing even at this Pericles, for that he went but flowly about his works, speaketh thus as touching his wall, half done and half undone :

In words long fince our Pericles, hath rear'd us up a wall, But in effett and very deed, Confider now I pray you a little, the base mind of this great professor of Rhetorick, who spent the ninth part of his life, in composing of one only oration: but were it meet and reasonable to comthe ninth part of his life, in composing of the only transfer the tractal exploits of Demofibenes, being part the orations of Demofibenes as he was an orator, with the martial exploits of Demofibenes, being a captain; namely, that which he made against the inconsiderate folly of Comm, with the Trophis which himself erected before Pylos, or that which he wrote against Amathusius, as concerning slaves, with his worthy fervice, whereby he brought the Lacedzmonians to be flaves: neither in this reford, for that he compoled one oration for the graunting of free bourgefie, to those who were newly come to inhabit Athers, therefore he deserved as much honour as Alcibiades did, who combined the Mantineans and Elians, in one league to be affociates with the Athenians against the Lacedzmonians: and yet this must needs be confessed, that his publick orations deserved this praise, that in his Philippiques, he inciteteh the Athenians to take armes, and commendeth the enterprise of Leptines.

Whether of the twain is more profitable, fire or water,

The Summarie.

Nihis Academick declamation, Plutarch in the first place alledgeth the reasons which attribute more 1 profit unto water. Secondly, he proposet those that are in favour of the fire : whereunto he seemeth the rather to incline, although be refolveth not : wherein he followeth his own manner of philosophizing upon natural caules; namely, not to dispute eister for or against one thing! leaving unto the reader his own liberty, to suite unto that which be shall see to be more probable.

Whether of the twainis more profitable, Fire or Water.

He water is of all things beft, And gold-like fire is in request.

Thus said the Poet Pindarus: whereby it appeareth evidently, that he gives the second place unto fire. And with him accordeth Hefiodus when he faith: Chaos was the formost thing

In all the world that had being.

For this is certain, that the most part of ancient Philosophers called water by the name of Chas, த் ரம் ஜன், chat is to say, for that it followsh so easily. But if we should fland only upon relimonics about this question, the proof would be carried equally on both sides: for that there be in manner as many who think fire to be the primitive element, and principle of all things, and the very feed which as of it felf it produceth all things, so it receiveth likewise all into it felf, in that universaleonflagration of the world. But leaving the testimonies of men, let us consider apare the reasons of the one and the other, and see to whether side they will rather draw us. First therefore, to begin withal, may not this be laid for a ground? that a thing is to be judged more profitable, whereof we have at all times and continually need, and that in more quantity than another? as being a rool or needing instrument, and as it were a friend at all sea sons and every hour, and such as a man would say, present teth it selfevermore to do us service? As for fire, certainly, it is not alwaies commodious anto us; nay, contrariwife, it otherwhiles doth molest and trouble us; and in that regard we withdraw out felves far from it : whereas water ferveth our turns both in Winter and Summer, when we are fick, and when we are whole, by night and by day; neither is there any time or feafon, wherein a man flandeth in no need of it. And this is the reason that they call the dead, dallas as one would say, שום אוף confequence deprived of life. Moreover, without fire a man hath oft continued a long time, but without water never. And withal, that which hath been from the first beginning and creation of man, is more profitable than that which was invented afterwards. And there is no question, but that nature hath given us the one, to wit, water, for our necessary use; but the other (I mean fire) either fortune or industry hath devifed and found out as an appendant and acceffary. Neither can it be faid, what time of the world it was when as man had no water: nor ever read we in any records, that one of the gods; or demi-gods was the inventer thereof; for it was at the very inflant with them, hay, what and we say that it gave them their being? But the use of fire was but yesterday, or the other day, to speak of, found out by Prometheus; so that the time was when as men lived without fire; but void of water, our life never was. Now that this is no devited Poetical netion, this daily and present life of ours doth plainly testifie : for there be at this day in the world divers nations, that are maintained without fire, without house, without Hearth or Chinney, living abroad in the open wide air. And Diogenes the Cynick, seldome or never had any use of fire, insomuch as having upon a time swallowed down a Polype Fish raw : Loe (quoth he) my masters, how for your fakes we put our felves in jeopardy: howbeit without water, there was never any man thought that either we might live honeftly and civilly, or that our nature would possibly endure it. But what need is there that I should particularize thus, and go so near, as to search far into the nature of man? considering that wherereas there be fo many, or rather fo infinite kinds of living creatures, mankind onely in a manner knoweth the use of fire : whereas all the rest have their nourishment and food without the benefit of fire. Those that brouse, feed, flie and creep, get their living by eating herbs, roots, fruits and fleft, all without fire: but without water there is not one that can live, neither going or creeping on the Land, nor swimming in the Sea, nor yet flying in the air. True it is, I must need say, that dri-full writeth, how some beasts there be, even of those that devour sless, which never drank; but in very truth, nourished they be by some mostlure. Well then, that is more profitable without which no manner of life can consist or endure. Proceed we farther, and passe from those living creatures which use to seed upon Plants, and Fruits, even unto the same that are by us and them used for food: Some of them there be, which have no heat at all : others fo little, as it cannot be perceived. Contrariwife, moisture is that which causeth all kind of seeds to chit, to bud, to grow, and in the end to bring forth fruit: for what need I to alledge for this purpose either wine and oil, or other liquours which we draw, preffe out, or milk forth out of beafts paps, which we do fee daily before our eyes? confidering, that even our wheat which seemeth to be a dry nutriment, is ingendred by the transmutation, putrestaction, and diffusion of moisture. Furthermore, that is to be held more profitable, which bringeth with it no hurr nor dammage: but we all know that fire, if it break forth, get head and be at liberty, is the most pernicious thing in the world : whereas the nature of water of it felf doth never any harm.

Again, of two things, that is held to be more commodious which is the simpler, and without preparation can yield the profit which it hath, but fire requireth alwayes some succour and matter, which is the reason; that the rich have more of it than the poore, and Princes than private persons; whereas water is fokind and courteous, that it giveth it felf indifferently to all forts of people: it hath no need at all of tools or inflruments to prepare it for use; compleat and perfect it is in it felf, without borrowing enghe abroad of others. Over and belides, that which being multiplied as it were, and augmented, lofeth the utility and profit that it had, is by confeduence leffe profitable: and fuch is fire, refembling herein a ravenous wild beaft, which devoureth and confumeth all that it cometh near; infomuch as it were by the industry and artificiall means of him who knoweth how to use it with moderation, rather than of the own nature, that it doth any good at all; whereas water is never to be feared. Again of two things, that which can do good, being both alone, and also in the company of the other, is the more profitable of the twain: but to it is, that fire willingly admitteth not the fellowship of water, nor by the participation thereof, is any way commodious; whereas water is together with fire profitable, as we may fee by the fountains of hot water how they be medicinable, and very fenfibly is their help perceived. Never shall a man meet with any fire moist; but water as well hot as cold, is ever more profitable to man. Moreover, water being one of the four Elements, hath produced, as one may fay, a fifth, to wit the Sea, and the same well near as profitable as any one of the rest, for many other causes besides, but principally, in regard of commerce and traffick. For whereas before time, man & lile was favage, and they did not communicate one with another; this Element hath conjoyned, and made it perfect, bringing Society, and working Amity among men by mutuall fuccours, and recipro-ciall retributions from one to the other. Heraclitus faith in one place, if there were no Sunne, there had been no night a and even as well may it be faid ; Were it not for the Sea, man had been the most favage creature; the most penurious and needy, yea and the least respected in all the world: whereas now this element of the Sea hath brought the vine out of the Indians as far as Greece; and from Greece hath transported it unto the farthest Provinces : Likewise, from out of Phenicia, the use of Letters for Preservation of the memory of things: it hath brought wine: it hath conveyed fruits into these parts, and hath bein the cause that the greatest portion of the world was not buried in ignorance. How then can it be otherwife, that water should not be more profitable, fince it furnisheth us with another Element.

Buton the contrary fide, peradventure, a man may begin hereupon to make inflance oppositely in this manners. Taying, that God as a Master-workman having the four Elements before him, for to frame the Fabrick of this world withall; which being repugnant and refuling one another, earth, and water where pur beneath, as the matter to be formed and fallioned; receiving order and disposition, yea, and a vegetative power to engender and breed fuch as is imparted unto it by the other two, air, and hire, which are they that give form and fashion unto them, yea and excite the other twain to generation, which otherwise had lien dead without any motion. But of these two, fire is the chief, and hath dominion, which a man may evidently know by this induction. For the earth if it be not enchased by Constitut fubiliance, is barren, and bringent forth no fruit : but when at fire spreadent it self upon it, it infused into it a certain power, which causeth it to swell (as it were) and have an appetite to ingender For other cause there can be none rendred why rocks, cliffs, and mountains, be barren and dry, bat this, that they have either no fire at all, or elle participate very little the nature thereof : in lumme, to far off is water from being of it felf sufficient for the own preservation or generation of other things, that without the aide of fire it is the cause of the own ruin and destruction. For heat it is that keepeth water in good effate, and preferveth it in her nature and proper substance, like as it doth all things befides: and look where fire is away or wanteth, there water doth corrupt and putrifie; in fuch fore as the ruin and defruction of water, is the default of heat, as we may evidently fee in pools, marishes, and standing waters, or wheresoever water is kept within pits and holes without iffue; for such waters in the end become putrified and flink again, because they have no motion, which having this waters in the end decome purrised and tune against activities, keepeth those waters better, which have current and run apace, in that this motion preserveth that kind heat which they have. And hereupon it is, that To live, in Greek is expressed by Civ, for that Cor fignifican to boil. How then can it otherrits, that I of two things, it should not be more profitable, which giveth being and effence to the other, like as fire doth unto water? Furthermore, that thing, the utter departure whereof, is the cause that a creature dieth, is the more profitable; for this is certain and manifelt, that the same, without which a thing cannot be, hath given the cause of being unto the same, when it was with it. For we do feethat in dead things there is a moisture, neither are they dried up altogether; for otherwise, moist bodies would not putrifie, considering that putrefaction is the turning of that which is drie to be moiff, or rather the corruption of humors in the fielh; and death is nothing elfe, but an utter defect and extinction of heat : and therefore dead things be extream cold, in fo much as if a man should fet unto them the very edge of rasours, they are enough to dull the same through excessive cold. And we may see plainly, that in the very bodies of living creatures, those parts which participate least of the nature of fire, are more senceless than any other, as bones and hair, and such as be farthest removed from the heart: and in manner a, all the difference that is between great and small creatures, proceedeth from the prefonce of fire, more or left: for humiditie fimply it is not, that bringeth forth planes and fruits; but warm humiditie is it that doth the deed: whereas cold waters be either barren alrogether, or not very fruitful and fertil; and yet, if water were of the own nature fructuous, it must needs follow, that it felf alone, and at all times, should be able to produce fruit : whereas we see it is clean contrary; namely, that it is rather hurtful to fruits.

And now to reason from another head, and go another way to work, to make use of fire, as it is fire, need we have not of water; nay, it hurteth rather, for it quencheth and putteth it out clean: on the other fide, many there be, who cannot tell what to do with water without fire; for being made hot it is more profitable, and otherwife, in the own kind, hurtful. Of two things therefore, that which can do good of it felf without need of the others help, is better and more profitable. Moreover, water veeldeth commod ty but after one fort only, to wit, by touching, as when we feel it, or wash and bath with it:
whereas fire serveth all the five senses, and doth them good: for it is felt both neer at hand, and also sen afar of: fo that among other means that it bath of profiting, no man may account the multiplicity of the uses that it affordeth: for that a man should be at any time without fire, it is impossible : nay he cannot have his first generation without it: and yet there is a difference in this kind, as in all other things. The very sea it self is made more commodious by hear, so as it doth heat more by the agitation and current that it hath, than any other waters : for of it felf other wile it differeth not. Also for fach as have no need of outward fire, we may not fay that they fland in need of none as all; but the reason is, because they have plenty and flore of natural heat within them; so that in this very point, the commodity of fire ought to be effeemed the more. And as for water, it is never in that good flate, but some need it hath of help without it ; whereas the excellencic of fire is fuch, as it is content with it felf, and requireth not the aid of the other. Like as therefore, that Captain is to be reputed more excellent, who kn. we to order and furnisha citie so as it hath no need of forrein allies; so we are to think, that among eleme to that is the worthier, which may oftentimes confift without the fuccour and aid of another. And even as much may be faid of living creatures, which have leaft need of others help. And yet haply it may be replied contrariwife, that the thing is more profitable which we use alone, by it self, namely, when by discourse of reason we are able so shufe the better. For what is more commodious and profitable to men than reason? and yet there is none at all in brute beasts. And what followeth hereupon? Shall we infer therefore that it is less profitable, as invented by the providence of a better nature, which is god? But fince we are fallen into this argument: What is more profitable to mans life than arts? but there is no are which fire devifed not, or at leastwife doth not maintain : And hereupon it is, thatwe make Unican the prince and mafter of all arts. Furthermore, whereas the time and space of life it very short that is given unto man, as short as it is, yet seep, as Ariston faith, like unto a falle baily on published cane, taketh the half thereof for it felf. True it is, that a man may lie awake, and not fleep, all night long; but I may afwel fay, that his waking would ferve him in small stead, were it not that fire presm-ted unto him the commodities of the day, and put a difference between the darkness of the night and th: light of the day. If then there be nothing more profitable unto man than life, why should we not judg fire to be the best thing in the world, fince it doth augment and multiply our life? Over and befides, that of which the five fenfes participate moft, is more profitable : but evident it is, that there is not one of the faid fenies maketh use of the nature of water apart and by it felf, unless some air or fire be tempered with it: whereas every fone findeth benefit of fire at of a vivificant power and quickning; vertue; and principally our fight above the reft, which is the quickeft of all the fenfesin the body, as being the very flame of fire, a thing that conformeth us in our faith and belief of the gods? And as Plato faith, by the means of our tight we are able to conform our foul to the motions of

The Summary.

W E bave bere another declaration of Plutarch, wherein he examineth and discusses after the manner of the Academick philosophers, without deciding or determining any thing, a natural question as touching Primitive cold. And in the very first entrie thereof, resutesh those who are of opinion, that this first cold is the privation of heat: hewing on the contrary fide, that it is meer apposite unto beat, as one fulfiance to amober, and not as privation unto babitude. Then proceeded be to dispute of the essence, nature, and some tain of this cold : for the electing of which point, he examineth at large three opinions : the first, of the Stoichi, who attribute the primitive cold unto air : the second, of Empedocles and Chrylippus, who ascribe the cough there of moto water. Unto all their reasons and arguments be maketh answer and inclinest be a third opoint a manuly, that earth is that primitive cold. Which position be consirmed by divers arguments, yet refolveth be not, but leavesh it to the discretion of Phavorinus, unto whom he writeth, for to confer all the reafors of the one part and the other, without refting in any particular opinion, supposing that to suspend and boid his judgment in matters obscure and uncertain is the wiser part of a philosopher, than to yield and grant his consent either to one part or the other. Wherein we may see, that in regard of natural philosophy, our author was of the Academicks fell: but as touching the moral part, we have feen before, and specially in divers treatiles of the former tome, that he followeth of all the ancient philosophers, those who were least impure and sorrupt, such I mean, as in all there discourses had no other light to direct them, but Nature.

Of the Primitive or first Cold.

S there then (o Phavorinus) a certain primitive power and substance of cold, like as fire is of heat, by the preference and participation whereof, each one of the other things is faid to be cold? or retther are we to hold and fay, that cold is the privation of heat, like as darkness of light, and station of moving; and namely, confidering that cold is stationarie and heat motive? and the cooling of things which were hot, is not done by the entrance of any cold power, but by the departure of heat? for as foon as it is once gone, that which remaineth is altogether cooled; and the very vapour and fleim which feething waters do yield, paffeth away together with the heat, which is the reason that refrigeration diminisheth the quantity thereof, in as much as it chaseth that heat which was, without the entrance of any other thing into the place? Or rather, may not this opinion be suspected? first and formoft, for that is overthroweth and taketh away many powers and puissances, as if they were not qualities and habitudes really subfifting, but only she privations, and extinctions of qualities and habitudes: as for example, heavines of lightness, hardness of softness, black of white, bitter of sweet, and fo of other Cemblable things, according as each one is in puilfance contrary unto another, and not as privation is opposite unto babitude. Moreover, for as much as every privation is idle and wholy without action, asblindness, deafnes, filence and death, for that thefe bethe departures of formes, and the abolitions of bultances, and not certain natures nor real subflances apart by themselves. We see that cold afterit be entred and imprinted (as it were) within the body, breedeth no sewer nor less accidents and alterations than doth heat; confidering that many things become stiff and congealed by cold, many things I (ay, are flaied, retained, and thickned by the means thereof : which confiftence and flability unape to ftir and hard to be moved, is not therefore idle, but it is weighty and firm, having a force and power to arreft and to hold in. And therefore privation is a defect and departure of a contrary power; whereat many things be cooled, although they have plenty of heat within: and fomethings there be, which cold doth conftrain and conftipate fo much the more, as it findeth them hotter, like as we may observe in iron red hot, when by quenching it becommeth the harder. And the floick philosophers do hold, that the natural spicies inclosed within the bodies of young infants lying in the womb, by the cold of the ambient air environing them about are hardned (as it were) and refined, and so changing the nature become a foul. But this is a nice point and very disputable; yet confidering that we see cold to be the efficient cause of many other effects, there is no reason to think that it is a privation. Furthermore, privation is not capable of more or less; for so of twain that see not at all, the one is not more blind than the other: and of two who cannot speak, one is not more dumb than another; neither of twain who live not, is one more dead than the other: but among cold things we may well admit more and less, overmuch and not overmuch, and generally, intentions and remiffions, like as in those things that are hot: and therefore each matter according as it suffereth more or less, by contrary Puissances Produceth of it felf some Substances, cold and hot, more or less than others; for mixture and composition there can be none of Habitude with Privation; neither is there any power which receiveth or admitted the contrary unto it to bring a Privation, nor ever maketh it her companion, but yieldeth and giveth place unto it. But contrariwife, cold continueth very well, as it is mixed with heat, unto a certain degree; like as black with white colours; base notes with small and shrill; swees savours, with cart, and authere; and by this affociation, mixture and accord of colours, founds, drogues, favoure, and tafts; there are produced many compositions exceeding pleasant and delectable: for the opposition which is between habitude and privation, is alwayes at oddes and enmity, without any means of reconciliation, confidering that the effence and being of the one, is the defiruction of the other: whereas that fight which is occasioned by contrary powers, if it meet with firtime and feafon, ferveth often times in good flead unto arts, and to nature much more, as well in other productions and procreations, as in changes and alterations of the air: for in the orderly governance and rule whereof, God who dispenseth and disposeth them, is called Harmonicall and Musicall; not in regard that he maketh a friendly accord between base and treble, or a loving medley of white and black, but for that by his providence he ordereth fo well the accord and dilcord of the Elementary heat and cold of the world, that in a certain moderation, and without excesse they krive, and yet are reconciled again, by taking from the one and the other, that which which was excellive, and reducing them both in such a temperature and estate, as appertaineth. Semblably, a man may sensibly feel cold as well as he doth heat; whereas you shall never see, hear, or touch, nor by any other fanse perceive a privation, for it need to have some substance with it that doth affect the senses, and where there appeareth no fubstance, there we must suppose a privation, which is as it were the deniall of substance, like as blindnesses is the negation of sight; silence of voice; void emptinesses, of a body: for never shall one perceive voidnesse by the sense of feeling; but where there is not a body to be touched; there we must suppose is vacuity: neither do we hear filence, but when we hear no noise at all, then we understand there is silence: the like we are to say of those who are blind, of the naked and disarmed, there is no sense of such privations, but rather a barre and negative of sense: and even so, we should have no feeling and perceivance of cold, but onely where there wanted heat, there we should have imagined cold to be, in case it were nothing else but a deprivation of heat; but if it be so, that like as heat is selt by the warmth of the skin, and diffusion or dilatation of the sless; even so is cold alfo by the aftriction, and condenfation thereof, therefore it appeareth evidently, that it hath a proper, Principal, and particular fource, as well as heat over and belides, in every kind, privation is one, and ti mple, but fubftances have many differences, and as many powers and faculties : for filence is never but arter one fort, whereas the voice is divers, one while troublefome, another while delightfome. Senfes, colours, and figures semblably have like differences, which dispose and affect diversly the Subject which they approach unto, but that which is not palpable, not coloured, and generally not qualified with any quality, hath no diverfity, but is ever alike. Now then, doth this cold refemble these privatives in such fort, as it worketh no diversity in the accidents thereof? Or rather is it clean otherwise? for as sometimes there conveyinto bodies great and profitable pleasures by cold, so contrariwise it findeth as much then natural heat of the body is not alwayes chafed quite forth and clean gone, but oftentives the natural heat of the body is not alwayes chafed quite forth and clean gone, but oftentimes being pent and restrained within the body, it fighteth and maketh resistance, which combate of two contraries, is called horrour, quaking or trembling; but when the faid heat is altogether vanquished, there must needs ensue a benumming and congelation of the body, but if heat get the victory, it bringesh a certain warmth, and dilatation, with pleasure, which Homer by a proper term calleth lante but; whereby it appeareth evidently unto every man, and as much by these accidents it is manifest, or rather nore, than by any other arguments, that cold is opposite unto heat, as one substance to another, or as passion to passion; but not as privation to habitude, or negation to affirmation; and that it is not the corruption or utter destruction of hear, but a nature and puissance active by it self and powerfull, to corrupt and defroy: for if it were not fo, we must not have Winter to be one of the four seasons of theyear; northe North wind one of the four winds, as if the one were but a privation of the hot feafor, and the other of the South wind, and we shall be driven to say, that they have no proper Source, and peculiar Principle: howbeit there being in the univerfall world four principal bodies, which in regard of their plurality, fimple nature and puilfance, most men call the Element, and suppose them to be the principles of all other bodies, to wir, fire, water, air, and earth, it followethby icceffary confequence, that there be also four primitive and fimple qualities, and which be they, if they be not heat, cold, moisture, and drynesse? by the means whereof, the said Elements both do and fuffer all things interchangeably? And like as in the Elements and Principles of Grammar, which b: the Letters, there be be brieves, and longs; like as also in musick noter; there is high and low, baf., and treble. and one of these is not the privation of the other; even so we are to think, that in these fraturall bodies of the Elements, there be contrarieties of moisture against drinesse, and et cold against heat, if we will believe either reason or outward sense; or else we must say as old Anaxmenes was of opinion; that there is nothing hos or cold absolutely in substance; but we must confidently think that these be common passions of the matter coming, and occasioned after mutations: for he affirmeth that the thing, which is pent, confirit, and thickned in any matter, the fame is cold and that which op neth, and relaxeth it felf, for fo he useth this proper term xexaes, is hot; and therefore it is not without some reason, that we commonly say, that a man bloweth both hot and cold; out of his mouth; for the breath is cooled when it is pressed close between the lips, but issuing forth of the mouth all open, it is hot by reason of the rarky, and laxity thereof: howbeit, Arifforle faith; that it was meere ignorance in him thus to fay: For that when we breath with our mouths wide open; we let forth the hot air that is within us, but when we make a blaft with our lips together we blow not out the breath that arifeth from our felves, but drive that Air from us that is before our mouth, which is cold, and felt before the other that commeth out of us. Seeing then that upon necessity enforced by so many reasons, we must admit a substance of cold and heat, proceed we & continue our first intent to search what is the Subffance, nature, & Fountain of the aforesaid Primitive Cold? They then who fay that starkness and stiffness for cold, trembling and quaking of the body, and the flaring and flanding of hairs upright, and fuch like accidents and pallions, are occasioned by certain triangular forms with unequal fides which are within our bodies, although they fail and mils themark in particularity; yet so it is, that they fetch the beginning from whence they should, for firely the foundation and original of this Inquifition ought to be drawn as it were from the god-defs Vota, after the common proverb, even from the universal nature of all things. And herein it feeneth, that a Philosopher most of all differeth from an Empirick Physician, a Husbandman, a Minfirel, and other fuch particular artificers, whom it sufficeth to know and understand the last and conjunct causes. For soit be, that a Physitian do comprehend the neerest and next cause of his patients malidy, for example, of an ague, that is a shooting or falling of the blood out of the veins into the arteries; and the Husbandman conceive that the cause of blasting or Maying his corn, is an hot gleam of the Sun after a hower of rain: and the player upon the fluites comprile the reafon of the bale found, is the bending downward of his infirement, or the bringing of them one neer unto another: it is fufficient for any of the the to proceed to their proper work and operation: But a natural Philosopher who fearchethinto the truth of things, only for meer knowledg and speculation, maketh not the knowledg of the last causes the end, but rather taketh from them hib eginning, and ariseth from them to the primitive and highest causes. And therefore well did Plato and Democritus, who searching into the causes of heat and of heaviness, stated not the course of their inquisition, when they came to fire and earth, but referring and reducing things sensible, unto intelligible principles, proceeded forward, and never stated until they came unto the least parcels, as it were to the smallest section and principles. thereof: Howbeit, better it were first to handle and discuss these sensible things, wherein Empedocles, Straton, and the Stoicks do repose the essences of all powers : the Stoicks attributing the primitive cold unto air, but Empedocles and Straton unto water : and another peradventure would suppose the earth rather to be the substantial subject of cold. But first let us examin the opinions of these before named. Confidering then that fire is both hot and fhining; it must needs be that the nature of that, which is contrary unto it, should be cold and dark: for obscurity is opposite unto brightness, like as cold to heat: and like as darkness and obscurity doth confound, and trouble the fight; even so doth cold the sense of feeling: whereas heat doth dilate the sense of him that toucheth it, like as cleerness the fight of him that feeth it; and therefore we must needs fay, that the thing which is principally dark and millie, is likewise cold in nature. but that the air above all things els is dim and dark, the very Poets were not ignorant; for the air they call darkness, as appeareth by these verses of Homer.

For why, the air stood thick the ships about, And no moon shine from heaven shewed throughout.

And in another place :

The air anon be foon dispatcht, and mift did drive away : VVith that, the Sun shone out full bright, and battel did display.

And hereupon it is, that men call the air wanting light, repas, as one would fay, reper pair, that is to fay, void of light : and the gross air which is gathered thick together, is , by way of privation of all light. Air also is called, axad and oulx another is to say, a milt: and look what things soever hinder our fight, that we cannot fee thorow, be differences all of the air ; and that part of it which cannot he feen, and hath no colour is called a sethat is to fay, and sethe, to wit, invisible, 2 2 6500, which is as much to fay, as a geson, for want of colour. Like as therefore the air remaineth dark, when the light is taken from it; even fo when the heat is gone, that which remaineth, is nothing but cold air. And therefore, fuch air byreason of coldness, is named Tartarus, which Hesiodus seemeth to infinuate by these words, rdelacorn civila, that is to fay, the airie Tartarus; and to tremble and quake, he expresses by this verb, malacilar. These are the reasons alledged in this behalf. But for as much as corruption is the change of any thing into the contrary, let us confider whether it be truely faid, The death of fire is the birth ofair? For fire direth as well as living creatures, either quenched by force, or by languishing and going out of it felf. As for the violent quenching and extinction thereof, it she weth evidently, that it tur-

The vapour of the air thick, neth into air: for finoak is a kind of air, and according as Pindarus writeth,

Is wont against the fineak to kick.

And not only that, but we may see also that when a flame beginneth to die for want of nourishment, as in lamps and burning lights, the very top and head thereof doth vanish, and resolve into dark and obscure air: and this may sufficiently be perceived, by the vapor which after we are bathed or sit in a stouph, slicth and steimeth up along our bodies, as also by that smook which ariseth by throwing cold water upon 1 namely, that heat when it is excinguished, is converted into air, as being naturally opposite unto fire : whereupon it followeth necessarily , that the air was first dark and cold. But that which is more, the most violent and forcible impression in bodies by cold, is congentation, which is a passion of water, and action of the air: for water of it fell is given to spread and flow, as being neither folide nor compact and fast by nature; but hard it becommeth, thick also and stiff, when it is thrust close to by the air-and cold together coming between : and therefore thus we say commonly:

If after Somb, the North-winde straight do blow,

We shall be sure anon to have some snow.

For the South wind prepareth the matter wich is moisture, and the air of the North wind comming upon it, doth file and congeale the same : which appeareth manifeltly in snow, for no sooner hath it evaporated, and exhaled a little the thin and cold air in it, but immediatlic it resolveth and runneth to water. And Arifforle writeth, that plates and plummets of Lead, do melt and refolve with the cold and rigor of Winter, fo foon as water only commeth unto them, and be frozen upon them. And the air (as it should feem) by pressing such bodies together with cold, breaketh and knappeth them asunder. Moreover, the water that is drawn out of a Well, or Spring, is sooner frozen and turned to Ice, than any other, for that the air hath more power over a little water, than a great deal. And if a man draw up a small quantity of water in a bucket, out of a pit or well, and let the same downagain into the Well, yet fo, as the veffel touch not the water, but hang in the air, and fo continue there but a while, that water will be much colder than that which is in the bottom of the well: whereby it appeareth manifestly, that the primitive cause of cold, is not in water, but in air. And that soit response in immension, such that the state of the state o ching neer unto it, so much it frizeth and congealeth. And this is the reason that Barbarians when they are to pals great rivers frozen over with Ice, fend out Foxes before them: for if the Ice be not thick, but superficial, the Foxes hearing the noise of the water running underneath, return backagain. Some also that are disposed to fills, do thaw and open the Ice with cashing hot water upon it. and so let down their lines at the hole; for then will the fishes come to the bait and bite. Thusic appeareth that the bottom of the river is not frozen, although the upper face thereof fland all over with an Ice, and that fo ftrong, that the water thereby drawn and driven in fo hard, is able to crush and break the boats and veffels within it; according as they make credible relation unto us, who now do winter upon the river Danow with the Emperour. And yet without all these sar-fee examples, the very experiments that we find in our own bodies, do testisse no less: for after much bathing or sweating. alwaies we are more cold and chill; for that our bodies being then open and refolved, we receive at the pores, cold together with air in more abundance. The same befalleth unto water it felf, which both sooner cooleth and groweth also colders, after it hath been once made hor; for then more subjeft it is to the injury of the air: confidering also that even they who fling and cast up scalling water into the air, do it for no other purpose, but to mingle it with much air. The opinion then of him, O Phavorinus, who afligneth the first cause of cold unto air, is founded upon such reasons and probabilities as thele. As for him that afcribeth it unto water, he laieth his ground likewise upon such principles: for in this manner writeth Empedocles: .

Behold the Sun how bright alwaies, and hot he is befide, But rain is ever black and dark, and cold on every fide.

For in opposing celd to hear, as blackness unto brightness, he giveth us occasion to collect and infer, that as heat and brightness belong to one and the same substance, even so cold and blackness to another. Now that the black hew proceedeth not from air, but from water, the very experience of our outward fenses is able to prove: for nothing waxeth black in the air, but every thing in the water. Do but cast into the water, and drench therein a lock of wool, or piece of cloth, be it never so white, you shall when you take it forth again, see it look blackiss, and of will it continue, until by heat the mossibute be fully stucked up and dried, or that by the press or some waights it be squeized out. Mark the earth, when there fallect a shower of rain, how every place whereupon the drops fall, seems black, and all the reliber side retainest the same colour that it had before. And even water it self, the deeper that it is, the blacker hew it hath, because their is more quantity of it: but contrastivite, what part soever thereof is near unto air, the same by and by is lightsome and cheerful to the eye.

Consider among other liquid substances, how Oyl is most transparent, as wherein there is most syr: for proof whereof, See how light it is, and this is twithch causeth it to swim above all other liquers, as being carried aloft by the means of ayr. And that which is more, it maketh a calm in the Sta, when it is flung and sprinkled upon the waves, not in regard of the slippers smoothness, whereby the windes do glide over it, and will take no hold, according as Aristote saits; but for that the waves being beaten with any humor whatsoever, will spread themselves and ly even: and principally by the means of Oyl, which hath this special and peculiar property, above all other liquors, that it maketh clear, and giveth means to see in the bottome of the waters, for that humidity openeth and cleavest, when ay comes in place: and not only yeeldeth a clear light within the sa to Divers, who sisher both in the sight for spunges, and puck them from the rocks whereto they cleave, but also in the deepet holes thereof, when they spure it out of their mouths; the ayr then is no blacker than the water, but less cold is for trial hereof. Iook but upon Oyl, which of all silquors having most ayr in it, is nothing cold at all, and lift it size at all, it is but gently, by reason that the ayr isocopporate within it, will not suffer it to gather and congeal hard: mark work men also and Artisanes how they do not dip and keep their Needlets, Buckles, and Classe, or other such things made of Iron, in Water, but in Oyl, for fear less the excessive cold of the water would marr and spoile them quite.

fland the more hereupon, because I think it more meet to debate this disputation by such proofs, rather than by the Colours; considering, that Snow, Hail, and Ice, are exceeding white and clear, and withful most cold; contartivise, pitch is hotter-then honey, and yet you see it is more dark and dukish. And here I cannot chuse but wonder at those who would need shave the air to be cold, because forsont it is dark; as also they consider not how others take and judge it hot, because it is light: for remebosity and darkensels be not to familiar and near Coussin; unto cold, as p-ponderosity and unweldings for broper thereto: so many things there be altogether void of heat, which nowithstanding are bright and clear: but there is no cold thing light and nimble, or mounting upward; for but no sooner resolve they into a liquid nature and substance, but incontinently they fall, and lost their lightness and agility, no lesse than their heat, when cold is ingendered in them: contrarivise, when he at cometh in place, they change their motion again to the contrary, and their substance mounting that perishes his not transmuted into the contrary but the truth as, all things are killed, and die by their contrary; for so fire being quenched by fire; turneth into air. Ando this purpose. Elebulus the Poet said truly, although tragically, when he called water the punishment of fire, forthes be his words:

The water stay, which fire doth flay.

And Homer in a certain Battell opposed Vulcane to the river, and with Neptune marched Apollo, not fo much by way of fabulous fiction, as by Physicall and naturall reason: and as for Archilechus, a wicked woman, who meant clean contrary to that which she said, and shewed, wrote elegantly in this wife.

The crafty Quean in right hand water cold, And in the left, bot fire did closely hold.

And among the Persians, the most effectuall manner of supplication, and that which might inno wish rejected and denied, was, if the suppliant with fire in his hand entred into a river, and there menaced to fling it into the water, if he might not have his request granted: and then he obtained verily his petition, but afterwards punished he was for that threatning which he used, as being wicked, wretched, and unnaturall. And what Proverb is there readier in every mans mouth than to fay, when we would fignific an unpossible thing. This is to mingle fire and water together ? which testifieth thus much, that water is the mortall enemy unto fire, warring with it, punishing and quenching it, and not the air, which receive thand entertaineth fire, and into the fubstance whereof it is transfinited: for if that into which a thing is turned when it perisheth, were contrary unto it. then fire should be more contrary to air then water it. For air when it doth gather and thicken is converted into water but when it is more fubil it resolveth into fire, as also in like case, water by rarefaction is resolved into air, and by condendation becometh earth, not upon any semity or contrariety that it hath to these both, as leskeit, but rather by reason of some amity and kindred that is between them. Well, whether way of these two it is that these Philosophers will take, they overthrow fill their intent and purpose. But to say that it is the air which causeth water to frize and become ice, it is without all sence, and most abfurd: for we see that the very air it self is never conglaciate nor frozen, nor hardened, considering that mits, fogs, and clouds are no congelations, but onely gatherings, and thicknings of a moift and vaporous air: for the true air indeed which hath no vapour ar all, and is altogether dry, admitteth no such refrigeration as may alter it to that degree, and heighth. And certain mountains shere be which are not subject either to Clouds, Mists or Dews, for that their heads reach up to that Region of the air which is pure and exempt from all humidity: whereby it is apparent, that these gatherings, and thickening which are seen in the air beneath, proceed from cold and moissure, which is mingled therewith and runneth from else where. As for the bottoms of great rivers which be never frozen to ice; great reason there is of it: for that the upper part being glazed over with ice, suffereth not the exhalation which artifeth from beneath to paffe through, but keepeth it enclosed, and striketh it downward, whereby is ingendered a certain heat in the water that runneth in the bottome. And hereof we may see afair demonstration in this, that when the ice is broken, the water rifeth up, and there mounteth withall a great quantity of vapours, and exhalations; which is the reason also that the bellies, and other concavities within the bodies of living creatures are alwayes hotter in Winter, i for that they hold and contain the hear, which the coldnesse of the circumstant air driveth inward. As for the drawing and flinging up of water into the air, it taketh not onely the heat away from waters, but also their cold, and therefore they that defire to have their fnow, or the liquour expressed out of it exceeding cold, move it as little as they can, for this flirring chafeth away the cold both of the one& the other. But that it is the inward power of the water, and not of the air that doth it, a man may thus discourse and begin again: First, and formost, it is not probable, that the air being so near as it is to the elementary fire, touching also as it doth that ardent revolution, and being touched of it again, hath a contrary nature and power unto it: neither is it possible that it should be so, considering that their two extremities are contiguate, yea and continuate one to the other: neither foundeth it, and is conformable to reason, that nature hath fastened with one tenon (as they fay) and placed fo near together the killer, and that which is killed, the confumer and that which is confumed; as if the were not the mediatreffe between them of prace, unity and accord, but rather the work-Miftris, of war, debate, and discord.

For furely her order and custome is not to joyn front to front substances that be altogethet contrary, and open enemies one to the other; but to place between them fuch as participate with the one and the other, which are fo feated, disposed and interlaced in the middle, as that they tend not to the desirabi on, but to the affociation of two contraries. Such a fituation and region hath the air in the world. being spred under the fire, and before the water, for to accommodate and frame it self both to the one and the other, and to conjoyn and link them both together, being of it fell neither hot nor cold. but it is as it were a medley and temperature of them both; not (I fay) a pernicious mixture, but a gracious, which gently entertaineth and receiveth these contrary extremities. Furthermore the air is alwaies equal, and yet the Winter is not evermore cold alike: but fome parts of the work be cold and exceeding moift; others cold, and as dry, and that not cafually and by fortune, butfor that one and the fame substance is susceptable, both of heat and cold. For the greater pair of Africk is hot and dry, altogether without water. And those who have travelled through Scittia, Thraita, and Pentus, do report that there be exceeding great lakes therein, and that those kingdoms be watered with many mighty deep rivers; also that the countries in the midft between, and those parts which adjoyn upon those huge meeres, and fens be extream cold, by reason of the vapours that articition them. As for Posidonius, when he faith that the cause of that moisture is this, that the fenny and morish ayr is ever fresh and moist, he hath not solved the question which was probable, but made is more doubtful and without probability; for the air feemed not alwaies fo much colder, as it is more freshin case cold be not engendred of moisture : and therefore Homer said much better :

Is alwaies bleak, andblows full cold. as if he pointed with his very finger to the fource and fountain of cold. Moreover, our fence doth oftentimes beguile and deceive us, as namely, when we touch wool or cloths that be cold, for we think that they be moist and wet, for that there is one substance common to both these qualities, and both these natures be neighbours and familiar. Also in those climates of the world, where the Winter is extream hard and rough, the cold many times cracketh and breaketh vessels of brass and of earth; not any I mean that is void and empty, but all full, by reason that the water by the coldness thereof, doth violence unto them : how loever Theophrasius thinketh, that it is the air that burfteth fuch veffels : using cold as it were a spike or great nail to do the feat. But take heed that this be not rather a pr and elegant speech of his, than founding to truth; for if air were the cause, then should vessels full of pitch or milk, fooner burft than other. More likely it is therefore, that water is cold of it felf, and primitively, for contrary it is to the heat of fire, in regard of that coldness, like as to the driness thereof, in respect of humidity. To be brief, the property of fire in general, it to diffipate, divide, and legregate; but contrariwile, of water to joyn, conglutinate, unite, and binde, knitting and clofing together by the vertue of moisture. And this makes me think that Empedocles upon this occasion, ever and anon calleth fice a pernicious debate, bus water a fast amity; for fewel and food of fire, is that which turneth into fire, and every thing turneth which is most proper and familiar; as for that which is contrary, the same is hardly to be turned, as water which of it self, it is impossible to burn, causing both green or wet herbs, as also moift or drenched wood, hardly to take fire, and so in the end with much a do, they kindle and catch fire, although the same be not light and clear, but dark, din and weak, because the viridity or greenness, by the means of cold, fighteth against the heat, as his

Peifing now and weighing these reasons, conser them with the others. But for that Chrystopus estreming the air to be the Primitive Cold, in that it is dim and dark, hath made mention of those on the mind was a single process. And the state of the single desirous to say somewhat against them: By the same reason (quoth he) may a man as well assume that the carth is the said primitive cold; for that it is farthest from the elementary sire, rejecting this argument and reason as false, and altogether absurd. Me thinks that I can well show, that the earth it self wanteth no probable proofs, laying my soundation even upon that which Chrystopus hath taken for the ayr: And what is that? namely, because it is principally, and above all things else observe and dark; for if he taking to contrarieties of powers, thinketh of necessity the one must follow upon the other; certes, there he infinit oppositions and repugnances, between the earth and the air; for the earth is not opposite unton the ayr, as heavy unto light, nor as that which bendeh downward unto that which tendeth upward only; nor as mallie, unto rare; or flow and stedsast, unto outck and moveable; but as most heavy unto most light; nor as that which bendeh to mide, unto that which turneth continually round. Were is not then very absurd to say, that upon so many, and those so great oppositions, this also of heat and cold, did not likewise jointly sollow? Yes evily, but fire is clear and bright, and earth dark: nay rather it is the darkest of all things in the world, and most without lights; for air is that which doth participate of the first plant he regression, exhibiting it self as the very body of light: for as one of the Dithyrambick poets said.

No somer doth the sun appear In our borizon fair and clear, But with his light the pallace great Of ayr and windes is all repleat.

And then anon it descendeth lower, and imparteth one portion thereof to the Lakes, and to the sea; the very bottoms of the rivers do rejoyce and laugh for joy, so far forth as the ayr pierceth and entreth into them : the earth onely, of all other bodies, is evermore deflitute of light, and not penetrable with the radiant beams of Sun and Moon; well may it be warmed a little, and present it self to be fomented with the heat of the Sun, which entreth a little way into it, but furely the folidity of it will not admit the resplendent light thereof; onely it is superficially illuminated by the Sun, for all the bowels and inward parts of it be called Orphne, Chaos, and Ades, that is to fay, darkness, confufion, and hell it felf: and as for Erebus, it is nothing elfe, to fay a truth, but terrefirial obscurity and mirk darkness within the earth. The Poets seign the night to be the daughter of the earth; and the Mathematicians by reason and demonstration, prove, that it is no other thing then the shadow of the earth, opposed against the Sun: for the ayr as it is full of darkness from the earth, so it is replenished with light from the Sun; and look how much of the ayris not lightened nor illuminate, to wit; all the shadow that the earth casteth, fo long is the night, more or less; and therefore both man and heaft make much use of the ayr without their houses, although it be night season: and as for beasts, namy of them go to relief and pafturage in the night, because the ayr hath yet some reliques and traces left of light, and a certain influence of brightness, dispersed here and there: but he that is enclosed within house, and covered with the rouf thereof, is as it were blinde and full of darkness, as one environed round about within the earth: and verily the hides and horns of beafts, so long as they be whole and found, transmit no light through them: let them be cut, sawed, pared, and scraped, they become transparent', because ayr is admitted into them. And I think truly that the Poets estioons hereupon call the earth black, meaning thereby dark, and without light, so that the most important and principal opposition, between clear and dark, is found rather in the earth then in the ayr: But this is impercinent to our question in hand; for we have shewed already that therebe many clear things which are known to be cold, and as many brown and dark which be

But there be other qualities and puissances more proper unto cold, namely, ponderosity, steadipels, folidity, and immutability, of which the ayr hath not fo much as one, but the earth in cart bath them all more then the water. Furthermore, it may be faid, that cold is that which most senfibly is hard, as making things stiff and hard : for Theophrasus writeth, that those fishes which be frozen, with extream rigour of cold, if they be let fall upon the ground, break and knap in pieces, no less then glasses or earthern vessels: And your self have heard at Delphi, of those who passed over the hill Pernaffus, to fuccor and relieve the women called Bacche, who were furprized with a sharp pinching wind and drifts of fnow; that their cloaks and mantles through extremity of cold, were as flark and fliff as pieces of wood, infomuch as they brake and rent into tattars, fo foon as they went about to fretch them out. To fay yet more, excessive cold causeth the snews to be so stiff, as bardly they will bend a the tongue likewise so start, that it will not stir or utter any voyce, congealing the moift, foft, and tender parts of the body; which being feen by daily experience, they proceed to gather this confequence: Every power and faculty which getteth the mastry, is wont to pure and convert into it felf, that over which it is predominant: whatfoever is overcome by heat, becometh fire; that which is conquered by spirit or wind, changeth into ayr; what falleth into water, if it get not forth again, diffolveth, and in the end runneth to water. Then must it needs follow, that fuch things as are exceeding cold, degenerate into that primitive cold whereof we speak : now excessive cold is first; and the greatest alteration that can be devised by cold, is when a thing is congealed and made an ice, which congelation altereth the nature of the thing so much that in the end it becometh as hard as a stone; namely, when the cold is so predominant, as well all the moisture of it is congealed, as the heat that it had driven out perforce. Hereupon it is that the earth toward her center, and in the bottom thereof, is frozen altogether, and in manner nothing else but ice, for that the excessive cold, which never will yield and relent, there dwelleth and abideth continually, as being thrust and driven into that corner, farthest off from the elementary fire. As touching those rocks, crags, and cliffe, which we fee to appear out of the earth: Empedocles is of opinion, that they were there fer, driven up, fuffained, and supported by the violence of a certain boiling and swelling fire within the bowels of the earth; but it should seem rather, that those things out of which all the heat is evaporate and flowen away, be congealed and conglaciate so hard by the means of cold: and this is the cause that such crags be named in Greek adya, as one would fay, congealed: toward the head and top whereof, a man shall see in them many places black again, namely, whereas the heat flew out when the time was, fo as to fee to, one would imagine that they had heretofore been burnt; for the nature of cold is to congeal all things, but fome more, others less; but above all, those in which it is naturally at the first inharent: for like as the property of fire is to alleviate, it cannot otherwise be, but the hotter that a thing is, the more light also it is: and so the nature of moisture is so often; insomuch as the moister any thing is, the fofter also it is found to be: semblably, given it is to cold, to aftringe and congeal: it followeth therefore of necessity, that what soever is most aftrict and congealed, as is the truth, is likewise the coldest; and look what is cold in the highest degree; the same must be principally and naturally that cold, whereof we are in question. And thereupon we must conclude, that the earth is both by nature cold, and also that primitive cold; a thing apparent and evident to our very sense for dire and clay is colder then water: and when a man would quickly inffocate and put out a fire, he throweth earth upon it. Black-smithes also, and such as forge iron, when they see it red hot, and at the point to melt, they firew upon it small powder, or grit of marble or other stones that have fallen from them, when they were squared and wroughe, for to keep it from resolving too much, and to cool the excellive heat: the very dust also that is used to be thrown upon the bodies of wrestlers, doth cool them and repress their sweats. Moreover, to speak of the commodity that causeth us every year to remove and change our lodgings, what is the meaning of it? winter maketh us to feek for high lofts, and fuch chambers as be far from the earth; contrariwife, fummer bringeth us down to the Halls and Parlors beneath, driving us to feek retiring rooms, and willingly we love to live in vaults within the bosom of the earth: do we not thus, think you, directed by the inftinct of nature, to seek out and acknowledge that which is naturally the primitive cold? and therefore when winter comes, we lay for houses and habitations near the sea-side, that is to say, we fly from the earth as much as we can because of cold, and we compass our selves with the air of the sea, for that it is hot : contrariwise, in fummer time, by reason of immoderate heat, we covet mediterranean places farther within the land, and far removed from the fea, not for that the ayr of it felf is cold, but because it seemeth to spring and bud, as it were, out of the primitive cold, and to have a tindure, as I may so say, after the manner of iron from the power which is in the earth: and verily among running waters, those that arise out of rocks, and descend from Mountains, are evermore coldest: But if Wells and Pits, such as be deepest, yield the coldest waters, for by reason of their profundity, the air from without is not mingled with these; and the others pass through pure and sincere earth, without the mixture of ayr among. As for example, such is the water neer the cape of Tenarus, which they call Styx, destilling by little and little out of the rock, and so gathered unto an head: which water is so extream cold, that there is no veffel in the world will hold it, but onely that which is made of an Affes hoof; for put it into any other, it cleavesh and breaketh it. Moreover, we hear Physicians fay, that to speak generally, all kindes of earth do restrain and cool: and they reckon unto us a number of minerals drawn out of entrails of the earth, which in the use of physick yield unto them an aftringent and binding power: for the very element it felf from whence they come, is nothing incifive, nor hath the vertue for to ftir and extenuate; it is not active and quick, not emollitive, nor apt to forcad; but firm, stediast and permanent, a as square Cube or Dye, and not to remored; whereupon, being massic and ponderous as it is, the cold also thereof having a power to condensate, constipate and to express forth all humors, procureth by the asperity and inequality of the parts, shakings, horrors and quakings in our bodies: and if it prevail more, and be predominant, so that the heat be driven out quite and extinct, it imprinteth an habitude of congealation and dead supefaction. And hereupon it is, that the earth either will not burn at all, or elfe hardly and by little and little: whereas the ayr many times of it felf fendeth forth flaming fire, it shooteth and floweth, yea, and feemeth as inflamed, to lighten and flash : and the humidity which it hath, ferveth to feed and neurish the heat thereof. For it is not the folid part of wood that burneth, but the oleous moissure thereof; which if it be once evaporate and spent, the folid substance remaineth dry, and is nothing else but ashes. As for those who labor and endeavor to shew by demostration, that the same also it changed and confumed, for which purpose they sprinkle it eftsoons with oyl, or temper it with greats, and fo put it into the fire again, prevail nothing at all : for when the fatty and uncteous substance is burnt, there remain still evermore behinde, the terrestrial parts. And therefore earth being not onely immoveable in respect of situation, but also immutable in regard of the very substance, the ancient called it sets, that is to say, Vofts, standing, as it were, sure and stedfast within the habitation of the the gods: of which steadiness and congealation, the bond and link is cold, as Architectus the Nawrallist faid : And nothing is there able to relax or mollisie it, after it hath once been baked in the fire or hardened against the Sun. As touching those who say that they feel very sensibly the winde and the water cold, but the earth not fo well ; furely thefedo confider this earth here, which is next unto us, and is no other thing in truth, then a mixture and composition of ayr, water, sun and heat; and methinks this is all one, as if a man should fay, that the elementary fire is not the primitive and original heat, but rather scalding water, or an iron red hot in the fire; for that in truth there is no touching of thefe, or coming near unto them; as also, that of the faid pure and celefial fire, they have no sensible experience nor knowledge by feeling, no more then they have of the earth which is about the centre, which we may imagine to be true, pure and natural earth, as most remote and farthest separate from all other . howbeit, we may have some guess and token thereof by these rocks here with us, which from their profundity fend forth a vehement cold, which is in maner intolerable. And they likewise, who defire to drink their water passing cold, use to throw pibble stones into it, which thereby cometh to be more cold, sharp and piercing, by occasion of the great and sresh cold that aristh from the said stones. And therefore we ought thus to think, that when our Ancients, those dep Clerks and great Scholars I mean, thought there could be no mixture of earthly things with heavenly. they never looked to places high or low, as if they hung in the scales of a ballance, but unto the difference and diverfity of their powers; attributing the qualities of heat, electness, agility, celerity and lighmetis, unto that immortal and eternal nature: but cold, darkness and tardity, they assigned as the unhappy los and wretched portion of those infernal wights that are dead and perished. For the very body of a creature, all while that it doth breath and flourish, in verdure as the Poets fay, hath life and heat, but so soon as it is destitute of shele, and left in the onely portion and possession of the earth, it presently becometh stiff and cold, as if heat were in any other body naturally, rather then in that which

Compare now, good Sir Phavorinus, these arguments with the reasons of other men, and if you find that they neither yield in probability, nor over-weigh them much, bid all opinions and the fliff maintaining of them farewel, and think that to forbear resolution, and to hold off in matters obscure and uncertain, is the part of the wifest Philosopher, rather then to settle his judgement and affent to one or other.

Natural Questions.

The Summary.

His Collection of divers Questions taken out of Natural Philosophy, and resolved by the Author according to the Dollrine of Naturalists, being so clearly distinguished by it self, requiresh no long deduction: for that at the very first sight each Question may sufficiently be understood.

Natural Questions.

I.
What is the cause that Sea-water nourisheth no trees ?

Sit for the same reason, that it nourisheth no Land-creatures? for that a plant, according to the opinions of Plato, Anaxagoras and Democritus, is a living creature of the Land. For fay that it serves for food to plants growing within the fea, as also to fishes, and is to them their drink, yet we must not infer thereupon, that it feedeth trees that be without the fea, and upon the land : for neither can it pierce down to their roots, it is fo grofs, nor rife up in the nature of fap, it is fo heavy. That it is groß, heavy, and terrestrial, appeareth by many other reasons, and by this especially, for that it beareth up and sustaineth both vessels and swimmers more then any other.

Or is it principally for this, that whereas nothing is more offensive and hurtful to trees then dryn-is, the water of the lea is very deficeative? which is the reason that falt withstandeth putrifaction so much as it doth, and why the bodies of those who are washed in the sea, have incontinently their skin excceding dry and rugged.

Or rather may it not be, for that oyl is naturally an enemy to all plants, caufing as many of them mare rubbed or anointed therewith to dye: Now the fea-water flandeth much upon a kinde of fattinels, and is very uncteous, in such fore that it will both kindle, and also increase fire : and therefore we give warning and forbid to throw fea-water into flaming fire.

Or is it because the water of the sea is bitter and not potable, (by reason (as Aristotle saith) of the humearth that is mixed with it? like as lie, which is made by calling fresh water aloftupon as for the running and passing through the said as marreth that sweet and potable quality of the water: as also within our bodies, the unnatural heats of an ague turn humors into cholar. As for those plants, woods or trees, which are faid to grow within the Red-sea, if they do, certainly they bear no fuit; but nourished they are by the fresh rivers, which bring in with them a deal of mud; an argument hereof is this: for that fuch grow not far within the fea, but neer unto the land.

What might the reason be, that trees and seeds are nourished better with rain, then any other water that they can be watered withal?

Sit for that rain as it falleth, by the dine that it maketh, openeth the ground, and causeth little hole, Lwhereby it pierceth to the roots, as Lætus faith?

Oris this untrue? and Lutus was ignorant hereof, namely, that morish plants, and such as grow in pools, as the reed Mace, Canes and Rushes, will not thrive if they want their kinde rains in due feafon? But true is that which Aristotle faith, That the rain water is all frosh and new made, whereas that of Meers and Lakes is old and stale.

Or haply, this carrieth more shew and probability with it then truth, for certain it is, that the water of Fountains, Brooks, and Rivers, come as new and fresh as they: for as Heraslitus saith, It is impossible for a man to enter into one and the same River twice, because new water cometh still, and runneth away continually, and yet these nourish less then rain waters.

Isthis therefore the reason, because the water from heaven is light, subtile, airous, and mixed with a kinde of spirit, which by that subtility, sentreth soon, and is easily carried to the root of plents : and hereupon in the fall it raiseth little bubbles, because of the air and spirit enclosed within.

Or doth the rain water nourish more in this regard, that it is sooner altered and overcome by that which it nourisheth; for this is it that we call concoction properly: contrariwise, crudity and indigestion, when things are fo strong and hard that they will not suffer; for such as be thin, timple, and unfavory, are most easily and soonest altered; of which kinde is rain water, for being engendred as it is in the ayr and the winde, sit falleth pure and clean; whereas springing waters, are like to the earth, out of which they iffue, or the places through which they pass, gathering thereby many qualities, which cause them to be unwilling to be digested, and more slow to be reduced by concoction, into the substance of that which is to be nourished thereby: on the other side, that rain waters be case to be changed and transmuted, it appeareth by this, that more subject they are to corruption and purressed on, then those either of rivers, or of pits and well: and concoction seemeth to be a kinde of puression as Empedaeles beareth witness, saying:

When in vine-wood the water putrifies, It turns to wine, whiles under bark it lies.

Or rather the trueft and readieft reason that can be alledged, is the sweetness and wholesomenss of rain waters, falling as they do so presently, so soon as the wind sends them down: and hereupon it is that beasts desire to drink thereof before any entire types, and the Frogs and Paddocks expecting a rain, for joy sing more shell and merrily, ready to receive and entertain that which will season the deal and dormant waters of standing lakes, as being the very seed of all their sweetness: for Araus reckough also for one of the signs of a shower toward, writing thus:

IV hen wretched brood, The Adders food, Tom out of Annding lake, (The Tad-pole fires, I mean) defires fresh rain, and loud doth* coak,

What might be the cause that shepherds and other herdmen give salt unto their sheep and cattel which they feed?

I Sit as most men do think, to the end that they should fall the better to their meat, and so consequently feed fat the sooner? because the acrimony of falt, provoketh appetite, and opening the pora, maketh way unto the nourishment for to be digested and distributed more easily throughout the whole body? in regard whereof the Physician Apollonius, the son of Harophilus, gave council and prescribed lean folk, and such as thrived not in their sidils, not gross sweet wine, thick gruel, and frumenty but falt sisten of the picle. Anchoves, powdred meats, and such as were condite in brine: the subtle acrimony whereof might in manner of setting a peruse for wans of hair, serve to apply nutriment through the pores of the body into those parts that need it.

Or rather may it not be for health-sake? in which regard they use their castel to lick falt, thereby

Or achter may it not be for health-fake? In which regard they life their cattet to like fair, they to take down their rank feeding, and reftrain their großens and corpulency? for fuch as grow excepting fat, are fubj: it to breed difeafes: but fall confumeth and difpatcheth this fat; and by this means also when they be killed, they are fooner and with greater expedition flayed, because the fat which kinit and bound the kin faft to the flesh, is now become more sthin, gentle, and pliable through the action yof the falt: befides, the blood also of such as be ever licking of fait, becometh more liquid; and nothing there is within, that will gather and grow together, in case there be salt mingled there-

It may be moreover, that they do it for to make them more fruitful and apper for generation; for we fee that Sale Bitches, which have been fed with falt means are more hot, apter to grow proud, and fooner with whelp. And for this cause, those Keels and Barges that transport falt, breed greater flore of mice, for that they engender the oftner.

How commeth it to pais, that of rain waters, such as fall with thunder and lightning, which thereupon becalled squares, are better for to water seeds or yong plants, then any other?

May it not b:, i e ause they be full of wind and ventofity, by reason of the trouble and confused agitation of the air? And the nature of wind and spirit is to stir the humidity; and by that means doth send it forth and distribute it the better?

Or isit morrather, that heatfighting against cold, is the cause of thunder and lightning in the air which is the reason that seldom there is any thunder in winter: but contraristifs, veryoften in the Spring and Autumn, for the inconstant and unequal distemperature of the ayr; which being supposed, the heat concocting the humidity, causest it to be more pleasant and profitable unto the plant of the careth.

Or why may it not be, because it thundreth and lightneth especially and more often in the spring, then in any other season of the year, for the reason before alledged: now the spring showers and rails are most necessary for sects and such services against the summer time: whereupon those Countreys wherein there be many good ground showers in the spring, as the life of Sicily, bring forth plenty of good states.

How is it, that there being eight hinde of * favours, there is no more but onely one of them, to wit, faltish, * wue.] that cannot be found naturally in fruits? For as souching the bitter favor, the Olive halb it affirst, in prime and the Grape is four at the beginning: but as these fruits begin to change, and grow to their ripenses. It make the bitterness of the Olive turneth into a fastly and untiment favour, and the sharp verdue of the Grape choice of into a speak, of wine: semblably, the barshous in the unripe Dates, as also the suffere and unipensal (Savours) sharpes in Pomegranets, changed into sweetness. As for Pomegranets, some there he as also other to expend Apples, which are simply long, and never have other safte. And as for the sharp and biting savour, the object its ordinary in many roots and seeds.

The state of that the falt favour is not primitive nor engendred originally, but is rather the corruption of dotho San other primitive favours; and in that regard cannot ferve to nourifh any creature, living with grafs pers, and or grain? but it is to forme inftead of a fauce, because it is a means that they should not upon fulness my bearite in the lotter of that which they feed upon.

Orbecause, that like as they, who boil Sea water, rid it from that sale, brackish and biting quality to by This that is that: so, in those that are hot by nature, the salt savor is dulled and mortiside by hear meat is so or rather, for that a savour or smack, according as Plate Saith, is a water or juice passing thorow for the savory is savory as the savory as the savory as the savory is savory as the sav transmitted thorow them any groß or terrettrial subtance. Or else we must say, that saltnessis in some fort a kinde of bitterness, according as Homer signifiesth $\frac{h_1h_2}{H_2}$, in these vertex:

Bitter falt-water at mouth he cast again, And all therewith his head did drop again.

And Plate affirmeth, that both the one and the other favor, is abfierlive and liquefactive; but the fakith, less of the twain, as that which is not rough: and so it will seem that bitter different from sale in excess of drynes, for that the salt savour is also a great drier.

What is the cause, that if solkuse ordinarily and continually to go among youg trees or shrubs, full of dew, those parts of their bodies which do touch the twigs of the said plants, are wont to have a scurf or mange rise woon their whin?

I Sit (as Læus faith) for that the dew by the fubtility thereof doth fret and pierce the skin? Or rather, because like as the blaft and mil-dew is incident to those feeds or plants that take wet and be drenched; even so, when the smooth and tender superficial parts of the skin be fretted, scarlind, and dissolved a little with the dew, there arise ha certain humor, and filleth the fretted place with a smart and angry scurf: for lighting upon those parts which have but little blood, such as be the small of the legs and the feet, it biteth and gnaweth the superficies of them. Now that there is in dew a certain inordinate quality, it appeareth by this that it maketh those who are gross and corpulent, to be leaner and more spare of body; witness our women who are given to be fat, and would be fine, who gather dew with linnen cloathes, or else with looks or fleeces of wool, thinking therewith to take down and spand their foggines, and make themselves more gant and lender.

What is the caufethat Barges and other Vessels in Winter time, go more slowly upon the Rivers then at other seasons, but they do not supon the sea?

W Har (ay you to this? May it not be, for the tile ayr of Rivers being always groß and heavy, in Winter is more infpiffate by reason of the circumstant cold, and to is an hindrance to the course of hips?

Or haply this accident is to be imputed to the water of Rivers, rather then to the air about them; for cold driving in and reflexining the water, smaketh it more heavy and grois; as we may perceive in water houreglaffes, for the water rounted not of them more leifurely and flowly in winter then in fummer. And Theophrafius writeth that in Thracia, nee unto the mount called Pangwan, there is a fountain, the water whereof is twice as much heavy in winter as it is in fummer, weigh it in one and the fame veffel full. That the thickness of water maketh a Veffel to pass more fluegiably, it may appear by this, that the Barges of the River carry greater fraights by far, in winter then in fummer: because the water being thick, is fronger and able to bear more. As for the sea-water, it cannot be made more thick in winter, by reason of the own heat, which is the cause that it congealeth not, and if it gather any thickning, it feemeth to be very flender and little.

What is the reason that we observe, all other waters, if they be moved and troubled, are the colder, but the feathe more surging and waving, the botter it is ?

S is because, if there be any heat in other waters, the same is a stranger unto it, and coming from without, and so the motion and agitation thereof doth diffipate and drive the same forth again: but that heat of the fea which is proper and natural to it, the winds do fiir up and augment. That the sea is naturally hot; may evidently be proved by this, that it is so transparent and shining; as also for that it is not ordinarily frozen, heavy though it be and terrestrial.

9. What should be the cause that in winter the sea-water is less bitter and brackish in taste?

Por to (by report) writeth Diony fus the great conveyer of conduits, who in a Treatife of that argument, faith, that the bitterness of the sea-water is not, without some sweetness, seeing that the sea receiveth fo many and so great rivers: for admit that the Sun do draw up that which is fresh and potable out of it, because it is light and subtil; that is but from the upper part onely: and withal, it doth more in fummer than in any other feafon, by reason that in winter his beams are not so strong to strike, for that his heat likewise is but faint and feeble: and so a good portion of the sweetness remaining behinde, doth delay that excessive bitterness and brackishness, like a medicine, that it hath. And the same befalleth unto river waters, and all other that be potable : for even such in summer time become worse and more offensive to the tafte then in winter, by how much the heat of the Sun doth resolve and dissipate the light and fweet parts thereof ; but in winter it runneth always new and fresh; whereof the sea cannot chuse but have a good part, as well because it is evermore in mesion, as also for that the rivers running into it, be great, and impart their fresh water unto it.

What is the reason, that men are wont to pour sea-water into their wine vessels, among the wine? And the common report goeth, that there were sometime certain Mariners and Fishermen who brought with them an Oracle, commanding to plunge and dip Bacchus in the fea: And fuch as dwell far from the fea, in-flead of fea water, put in baked plaster of Zacynthus?

TS it to this end, that the hear thereof should help to refist the cold, that it take not away the heart of I the wine? Or rather clean contrary, doth is not weaken the headiness of wine, by extinguishing the power and strength thereof?

Or it may be, that seeing wine is much subject to alteration, and will quickly turn, the terrestrial matter which is cast into it, having a natural property to restrain, to binde and to stop, doth in some fort condensate and stay the waterish and spiritual substance of it. Now the salt, together with the sea water, coming to subtiliate and consome that which is superfluous, and naught in the wine, and not the proper substance thereof, keepeth it so, as it will not suffer any strong and evil smell or corruption to be ingendred therein: B. fides all the groß and terrestrial parts of the wine, slicking and cleaving to that which settleth to the bottom, and being drawn downward with it, maketh a residence of the less and dregs, and by consequence leaveth the rest more clear, pure, and neat.

What is the cause that those who fail upon the sea, are more sick in the stomach, then they that fail upon rivers, yea, though the weather be fair and the water calm?

Is it for that of all the fences, fmelling, and of all passions, fear causeth men most to be stomach fick?

I for so soon as the apprehension of any peril seizeth upon a man, he trembleth and quaketh for sear, his hiir stareth and standeth upright, yea, and his belly groweth to be loose. Whereas there is none of all this that troubleth those who sail or row upon the river: for why, the smell is acquainted with all freshand potable water, neither is the sailing so perillous: whereas upon the sea men are offended with firinge and unufual finelle, yea, and be etc-foon afraid, how fair foever the feafon be, not trufting upon that which they fee present, but misdoubting that which may fall out. And therefore little or nothing ferveth the calm without, when the mind within is toffed, troubled, and vexed, partly with fear, and in part with diftrust, drawing the body into the fellovvship of like passions and perturbaWhat is the reason that if the sea be sprinkled alost with oyl, there is to be seen a clear transparence, together with a calm and tranquility within?

THether is it (as Aristotle faith) because the wind gliding and glancing over cyl which is smooth and even, hath no power to ftir it, or to make any agitation.

Or, this reason may well carry with it some probability as touching the outward part, and upmost superficies of the sea: but seeing that they also, by report, who plunge and dive to the bottom thereof, holding oyl within their mouthes, if they spurt the same forth when they are in the bottom, have a light all about them, and are able to fee cleerly in the deep; a man cannot attribute the cause thereof unto the gliding over of the wind. See therefore if it may not rather be, for that the oyl by the folidity and thickness that it hath, doth drive before it, cut, and open the sea water first, being terreftrial and unequal; which after being returned and drawn together again into it felf, there be left fillin the midft between, certain little holes which yield unto the eyes a through-light and transpa-

Or rather is it, for that the ayr mingled within the fea, is by reason of heat, naturally lightsome and perspicuous; but when it is troubled and flirred, becometh unequal and shadowy; when as the oyl therefore by means of folidity cometh to pollish and smooth the said inequality, it resums th again the own plainness and perspicuity.

13. What is the reason that fisher mens nets do rot in winter rather then in summer, notwithstanding that all other things putrifie more in summer then in minter?

Sit because (as Theophrastus supposeth) the heat then beset round about with the circumstant cold, giveth place thereto, and theretore causeth the bottom of the sea as well as of the earth, to be the hotter ? which is the reason that spring waters be w armer, yea, and both lakes and rivers do reak and fmoak more in winter then in summer, because the heat is kept down and driven to the bottom by the cold, which is predominant over it ?

Or rather are we to fay, that the nets rot not at all, but whenfoever they be stiff congealed with cold which drieth them up, foon broken afterwards they are with the violence of the waves, and fo feem asif they were rotten and putrified indeed: for in more danger they are in cold and trofty weather; and like as firings and finews over-firetched do break, feeing especially that the sea in winter most commonly is troubled, which is the reason that they use to restrain and thicken them with certain tincures, for fearthey should be overmuch relaxed and resolved; for otherwise, if it were not for that doubt, being not so dyed and besmeared all over, they would sooner deceive fishes, because they could not perceive them to foon; for that the colour naturally of the lines and threds refembling the air, is very meet to deceive within the fea-

What is the reason that a fat, strong, and heavy clay ground, beareth wheat best : but contrariwise a light and fandy foil, is better for barley?

M Ay not this be a reason, that of all compliant which is more strong and solid, requireth larger soud, and the weaker lest, and more strader nourishment? now it is well known that barley is amore feeble and hollow grain then wheat is: in which regard it will not abide and bear plentiful nouriture and strong. An argument and testimony hereof we may have of that kinde of wheat which is called three-moneth wheat, for that in drier grounds it liketh better, and cometh up in greatee planty: the reason is, because it is not so firm and solid as others, and therefore requireth less nucciment: in regard whereof, also it cometh sooner to ripeness and pericetion.

How cometh this common proverb, Sow wheat in dirt, and barley in dust?

TS it not, as I faid before, because wheat is able to overcome more nourishment, but barley cannot en-much moisture to drench and drown it? haply it should be Or in this respect, that wheat being a stiff and hard kinde of grain, resembling the nature of wood. of doth fooner come and chit within the ground, in case it be well foked and fostned with moisture, that is to and therefore liketh better of a wet ground; whereas the drier foil, at the first fowing agreeth better fow, unless with barley, and is more commodious for it, being as it is, a more loose and spungeous kinde of youunder- grain.

Or because such a temperature of the ground in regard of the heat, is more proportionable, and thus, that their ricks left hurtful unto barley, being as it is the colder grain? their ricks left hurtful unto barley, being as it is the colder grain?

Or rather, husbandmen are afraid to *thrain their wheat upon a dry and fandy floor, because of

What is the reason that when the * Calamacic fish is seen in the Sea, it is a sign of a great tem-

Sit because all soft and unscaly fishes are very impatient of cold and of foul-weather, they be so bare and naked, and have withal their fielh exceeding tender, as being covered, neither with fhelf nor thick tkin, ne yet scale; but contrariwise, having their hardy, griffly, and bony substance within? which is the reason that all such fishes be called Malacia, as one would say, Soft and tender. For which cause naturally they soon forescen tempest, and feel cold coming, for that it is offensive unto them: and therefore likewife, when the Poulpe or Polyp runneth to land, and catcheth hold of some little rocks, it is a token that there is great wind toward. And for the Calamary, he leapeth forthlfor to avoid the cold and the trouble or agitation of the water in the bottom of the fea: for of other foft fish:s, his fi:sh is most tender and aptest to be pierced and hurt.

19. Why doth the Polyp change his colour?

Is it according to the opinion of Theophrafius, because it is a fearful and timorous creature by nature; and therefore when he is troubled or amazed as his spirit turneth, so he altereth withal his colour, even as we men do ? whereupon we fay in the common proverb:

> The coward, in view Soon changeth hem.

Or may this be a good probable conjecture of the change, but not fufficient, for the refemblance? considering that he changeth fo, as he refembleth the rocks which he fettleth upon. Unto which property, Pindarus alluded in these verses:

> His minde doth alter most mutable, To Poulpe the Sea-fish skin semblable; Which changeth bue to each thing suitable: To live in all worlds be is pliable.

And Theognis:

Put on a minde like Polype fish, and learn so to dissemble: Which of the rock whereto it sticks, the colour deth resemble.

Also, men usually say, such as surpass others for cunning and cautelous dealing, study and practife this: that for to fave themselves, and not to be seen or known of those about them, they always willbe like unto the Poulpe, and change their colours, that is to fay, their maners and behavior.

Or do they think fuch an one to make use of his colour readily, as of a garment, to change and put on another whenfoever he will?

Well then, the Poulpe fish himself, by his fear may haply give the occasion and beginning of this change and passion; but the principal point of the cause consisteth in something else. And therefore weigh and confider what Empedocles writeth:

> Wot well, all mortal things that bee, Defluxions have in some degree.

For there pass away continually, many defluxions, not onely from living creatures, plants, earth and fea, but also from stones, brass and iron: for all things perish and yield a smell, in that there runneth fomething always from them, and they wear continually : infomuch as it is thought that by these defluxions are ell attractions and infultations; and fome suppose their embracings and connexions; others, their fmilings: fome their impulsions, and I wot not what circumplexions and environments, to be mentioned unto (uch delivations; and especially from rocks and flones along the sa continually, wathed and dashed with the waves, therebe decisions pass of some parcels and small fragments, the which do cleave unto other bodies, and cling about those which have their pores more frict and close, or else pass throw such as have the same over rare and open. As for the sless of the Polype, it is so see to, similar and spongeous, like unto honey-combs, apt to receive all such defluxions and decisions from other bodies, when as then he is assaid, his wind goeth and cometh, and withal, shutteth up his body, and tringeth it together, that he may receive and retain in the superficies of his skin, the defluxions that come from that which is next it: for the rivels and wrinkles of his fost skin, which are knit with fear, are instead of crooks and bending cleys fit to entertain the defluxions and parcels lighting upon them, which featter not here and there, but gathering upon the skin, make the superficies thereof to be of femblable colour. And that this is a true cause, it may appear by one great argument, namely, that neither the Polyp doth refemble in colour all that which is neer unto it, nor the Chameleon the white colour; but both the one and the other, fuch things onely, as the defluxions whereof are proportionate unto their pores and fmall paffages.

What is the cause that the tears of wilde Bores be sweet, but of Stags and Hindes, saltish and unpleasant to the tafte ?

Eat and cold are the cause of both; for the Stag is cold of nature, but the Bore exceeding hot and fiery: whereupon it is, that the one fleeth away, the other maketh head, and stands to it when he is affaulted, and then is it most of all that he sheddeth tears, upon a fell heart : for when plenty of heat (as I faid before) mounteth up unto his eyes, and so the humor that distilleth from his eyes, is sweet. Others say, that these tears are pressed and wrung out from the blood being troubled, like as whey from milk and of this opinion was Empedocles. And forasmuch as the blood of the wilde Bore is black and thick in regard of hear, but that of Stags and Hindes, shin and waterish, great reason there is that the tears which pass from the one in anger, and the other in sear, should be such as is aforesaid.

What is the reason, that tame Swine do farrow often in one year, some at one time, and some at another; whereas the wilde of that kinde, bring forth Pigs but once in the year, and all of them in a manner upon the same days, and those are in the beginning of Summer: whereupon we say in our vulgar Proverb :

> The night once past, of wilde Sows farrowing: *Twill rain no more be fure, for any thing.

TSit (think you) for the plenty they have of meat; as in truth, fulness brings wantonness, and of full feeding comes lust of breeding: for abundance of food causeth superfluity of seed, as well in living creatures as in plants. As for the wilde Swine, they feek their victuals themselves, and that with travel and fear: whereas the tame have always frore thereof, either naturally growing for them, or elfe provided by mans industry.

Or is the cause of this difference to be attributed unto the idle life of the ore, and the painful I. bor of the other: for the domestical and tame are fluggish, and never wander far from their Swincherds: but the other range and rove abroad among the forrests and mountains, running to and fro, dispatching quickly all the food they can get, and spending it every whit upon the substance of their bodies, leaving no superfluities, expedient for geniture or seed.

Or may it not be, that tame Sows do keep company, feed and go in heards together with their Bores, which provoketh their luft, and kindleth the defire to engender: according as Empedacles hich written of men in thefe verfes :

The fight of eye, doth kindle lust in breft, Of looking, liking, then loving and the rest.

Whereas the wilde, because they live apare, and pasture not together, have no such desire and lust one to another; for their natural appetite that way is dulled and quenched.

Orrather, that is true which Ariftoile faith, namely, that Homer calleth a wilde Bore 226ms, as having but one Genetory, for that the most part of them, in rubbing themselves against the trunks andiflocks of trees, do crush and break their stones.

What is the reason of this usual speech; that Bears have a most speet hand, and that their sless is most pleasant to be eaten?

Because those parts of the body which do best concoct and digest nourishment, yield their sich most delicate: now that concocteth and digesteth best, which stirreth most, and doth greatest exercise: like as the Bear moveth most this part, for his fore-paws he useth as feet to go and run withal, he maketh use also of them as of hands to apprehend and catch any thing-do take hold of those vapors and defluxions which the said beaffs leave behinde them in the wood as they pass: but in the spring time these are consounded, or utterly extinct by many other smells of plants and shrubs, which as then be in their flower, and coming upon the ayr that the beafts made, and intermingled therewith, do trouble and deceive the fent of the hounds, whereby they are put out and at default, that they cannot truly hunt after them by their trace; which is the reason (men say) that upon the Mountain Eina in Sicily, there is never any hunting with hounds, for that all the year long there is such abundance of flowers, both in hills and dales, growing, as it were, in a meadow organ-den, whereof the place smelleth all over so sweet, that it will not suffer the hounds to catch the sent of the beafts. And verily, there goeth a tale, that Pluto ravished Properpina as she was gathering flowers there : in which regard the inhabitants honoring the place with great reverence and devotion, never put up or hunt the beafts that pasture about that Mountain.

What is the reason, that when the Moon is at the sull, it is very hard for hounds to meet with wilde beasts by the trace or fent of the footing?

I Signot for the same cause before alledged, for that about the Full-Moon there is engendred flore of dew: whereupon it is that the Poet Aleman calleth dew the daughter of Jupiter, and the Moon in thele verles :

Dame Dew is Nourse, whom of god Jupiter And ludy Moon, men call the daughter.

For the dew is nothing elf: but a weak and feeble rain: And why? because the heat of the Moon is but infirm: whereof it cometh to país, that she draweth up vapors indeed from the earth, as doth the Su, but not able to setch them up alostonor there to comprehend them, letteth them fall again.

25. What is the cause that in a white or hoary frost, wilde beasts are bardly traced?

W. Hither is it for that they being loth for very cold to range far from their dens, leave not many marks of their footings upon the ground; which is the refer that they being loth for the property of the p marks of their footings upon the ground : which is the reason that at other times they make spare of that prey which is neer unto them, for fear of danger if they should be forced to range far abroad in Winter, and because they would have ready at hand about them at such an hard season to

Or elle is it requilite that the place where men do hunt, have not onely the tracts of the beaft to be feen, but also of force to affect the fent of the hounds, and to fet their noffrile awork; but then do they move this sense of theirs, when as they are gently dissolved and dilated as it were by heat: whereas the ayr if it be extream cold, congealing as it were the smells, will not suffer them to spread and be diffused abroad, thereby to move the sense; and hereupon it is (as folk say) that persumes, oyntments, and winer, be less fragrant and odoriferous in winter, or in cold weather, then at other times, for the ayr being it felf bound and shut close, doth likewise stay within it all sents, and will not suffer them Wbat

What is the cause that brute beasts, so often as they are sick, or feel themselves amiss, seek after divers medicinable means for remedy, and using the same, findemany times help? as for example: Dogs when they be fromach fick, fall to eat a kinde of quitchy grafs, because they would cast and nomit choler; Hogé search for Gray-fishes of the river, for by feeding upon them they cure their headach; the Tontois likewife having eaten the flesh of a Viper, eateth upon it the herb Origan; and the Bear when she is fall in the stemach, and doth loath all victuals, licketh up Pifinires with her tongue, which she ne soener bath swallowed down, but she is warished, and yet none of all this were they taught, either by experiences or some casual occasion ?

Sit then the finell that moveth them to feek thefe remedies, and like as the honey-combs by the odor fir up the Bee : and the flesh of dead Carions the Vultures, drawing and alluring them afar off: so the Cray-fishes invite unto them Swine, Origan the Tortoife, and Plimires the Bear, by certain sente and fluxions which are accommodate and familiar unto them, without any fense leading them thereto by discourse of reason, and teaching them what is good and profitable ?

Or rather be they the temperatures of the bodies disposed unto sickness, that bring unto these creatures such appetites, engendring divers acrimonics, sweetnesses, or other strange and unusual qualities: as we fee it ordinary in great-bellied women, who during the time that they go with childe fall no ear grit and earth with greedine is? infomuch, as expert Phylicians fore-know by the fundry appe-tites of their Patients, whether they shall live or dye, for so Mnefitheus the Phylician doth report, that in the beginning of the Pneumony or inflamation of the lungs, one patient of his, longing for to eat Onions, escaped that malady; and another, whose appetite flood for Figs dyed for it, of the fame difeafe: for that the appetites follow the temperatures, and the temperatures are proportionate

It flandeth therefore to great reason that beafts likewise, such as are not surprized with mortal maladies, nor fick to death, have that disposition and temperature, whereby their appetites do move and provoke each one to that which is good and wholesome, yea and expedient to the cure of their fickness;

What is the cause that Must or new Wine, continueth sweet a long time, in case the vessel wherein it is kept be cold round about it?

[Sit because the alteration of this sweet favor into the natural taste of wine, is the very concoction of the wine; and cold hindereth the faid concoction, which proceeds th from heat-

Or contrariwise, because the proper juice and natural savour of the Grape is sweet, for we say, that then the grape beginneth to ripen, when it wasteth (weet. Now cold not fuffering new wine to ex-hale, but keeping the kinde hear thereof within, preferveth the faid fweetness still. And this is the very cause that those who make their vintage in a rainy constitution of the weather, do finde that their new wine will not work to wel in the vatte, because that such ebullition proceedeth of the heat, and cold doth refirein and refresh the said heat.

What is the cause that of all savage beasts, the Bear doth never lightly gnaw the net, and toil with her, teeth, whereas Wolves and Foxesuse ordinarily to eat the same?

TSit for that her teeth grow far within her mouth, in such sort that the cannot get within the cords of the nets, having besides so great and thick lips between, that they hinder her for catching hold with her faid fange.

Og rather because the having more force in her fore-feet, which the useth instead of hands, therewith he doth tear and break the cords; or elfe having ule both of her paws and also of her mouth : the imployeth those to the burfling of the nets, and with her teeth fighteth, and maketh her part good against the hunters. Befides the tumbling and rolling of her body that she doth practife, serveth her in as good flead as any thing elfe. And therefore feeing herfelf in danger to be taken within the toil many times, caffeth herself round upon her head, and endeavoreth that way to escape, rather then either by paws or fangs to burft the toil.

What is thereason that we wonder not to see any sources or springs of cold water, like as we do of bot a notwithstanding it is evident that as beat is the cause of these, so is cold of the other.

Or we must not say as some hold opinion, that heat indeed is an habitude of it self, but cold nothing elfe but the privation of heat: for it were in truth more wonderful how that which hath no Substance, should be the cause of that which hath a being. But it seemeth that nature would have us to wonder hereat, onely for the rare fight hereof; and because it is not often seen, therefore we bould enquire for some secret cause, and demand how that may be, which is but seldom observed.

How many strange and wonderful fights doth it represent unto us in the night season, and what beauty (heweth it unto us in the day time? and the common people wonder at the nature of these things * * As also at the Rain bows, and the divers tincures, forms and pictures of the clouds appearing by day : and how they be adorned with fundry shapes, breaking out of them in manner of bubbles.

What is the canfe that when vines or other youg plants, which be rank of leaves, and otherwise fruitlesis,

I S is because that Goats in Greek (1909), which are exceeding fat, be less apt to gender, and hardly for their fatness can leap the semales. For generative seed is the superfluous excrement of that nourishment which is conglutinate to the substantial parts of the body. Now when as any living creature or plant is in very good plight and grown grofs, it is an evident fign, that the nouriture is employed and spent altogether in the maintenance of it self, leaving no execrement at all, or the same very small, and not good for generation.

What is the reason, that if a vine be Sprinkled and drenched with wine, especially that which came of the the own grape, it dryeth and withereth away?

S there not the same reason hereof as of the baldness in great drinkers, when as the wine by means of heat, causeth the moisture to evaporate which should feed the hair of their head? Or is it not rather, because the very liquor of wine cometh in some fore of putrefaction, according to the verses of Empedocles :

When in vine-wood the water putrifies, It turns to wine, whiles under bark it lies.

When as then a vine cometh to be wet with wine outwardly, it is as much as if fire were put into it, which doth corrupt the natural temperature of that humor which should nourish it?

Or rather, pure wine, being of an affringent nature, foaketh and pierceth to the very root, where flutting up and enclosing the pores, it empeachesh the entrance of that sap (by vertue whereof, the vine is wont to bud, burgen, and flourish) that it cannot run to the flock?

Or may it not be, it is clean contrary to the nature of a vine, that the liquor which once went out of it, should return again into it? for a liquor or humor whiles it is within the plans in the nature of a fap, may well have power to feed the fame; but that being departed once from thence, it should joyn thereto again, or become a part thereof, Leannot fee how it is possible.

Or, for that it containeth much falt therein, by reason of such store of earth mingled therewith: now it is well known, that falt above all other things caufeth leanness.

- Or becaule standing as it doth still, and not exercised with running and stirring, it getteth a certain malignant quality, which is hurtful and offentive to all living creatures drinking thereof; for by occasion of that hurtful quality, neither is it well concasted, nor yet can it feed or nourish any thing. And verily the same is the very cause that alldead waters of Pools and Mears be unwholesome, for that they cannot digest and dispatch those harmful qualities which they borrow of the evil property, either of ayr or of earth.

TSit not think you, because this wind is wont to blow when the sky is very well cleansed, and the ayr exceeding clear and without all clouds; for the thickness and impurity of the air, doth not (I may fay to you) a little impeach and interrupt the course of the winds.

7 Hether is it because the pores and passages of their vital spirits be exceeding streight, and if it chance that fmoak be gotten into them and there kept in and intercepted, it is enough to ftop the poor Bees breath, yea and to strangle them quite?

Or is not the acrimony and bitterness (think you) of the smoak in cause? for Bees are delighted with fweet things, and in very truth they have no other nourishment; and therefore no marvel if they duef and abhor smoak, as a thing for the bitterness most adverse and contrary unto them: and therefore honey-Mafters, when they make a smoak for to drive away Bees, are wont to burn bitter herbs, as Hemlock, Centaury, &c.

What is the reason that at a certain time of the year, Skee Wolves do all whelp within the compass of twelve days?

Ntipater in his Book containing the History of living creatures, affirmeth, that She Wolves exclude forth their young ones about the time that Maft-trees do flied their bloffoms; for upon the tafte thereof their wombs open: but if there be none of fuch blooms to be had, then their young die wishin the body, and never come to light. He saith moreover, that those Countries which bring not forth Oaks and Maft, are never troubled nor spoiled with Wolves. Some there be who attribute all this to a tale that goes of Latona; who being with childe, and finding no abiding place of reft and tins to a case that goes of Lateria, which et ale which time, the went to Delos, being fafery by reason of Juno, for the space of twelve days; during which time, the went to Delos, being transmuted by Jupiter into a Wolf, obtained at his hands, that all Wolves for ever after might within that time be delivered of their young.

39. How cometh it, that water seeming white alost, sheweth to be black in the bottom?

TSit, for that depth is the mother of darkness, as being that which doth dim and mar the Sun beams before they can descend so low as it : as for the uppermost superficies of the water, because it is immediately affected by the Sun, it must needs receive the white brightness of the light; the which Empedocles verily approveth in these verses:

A River in the bottom seems,

by shade of colour black; The like is seen in Caves and Heles, by dapth, where light they lack.

Or many times the bottom of the Sea and great Rivers being full of mud, doth by the reflection of the Sun-beams represent the like colour that the faid mud hath ?

Or is not more probable, that the water toward the bottom is not pure and sincere, but corrupted with an earthly quality, as continually carrying with it somewhat of that, by which it runneth and wherewith it is flirred; and the fame fetling once to the bottom, causeth it to be more troubled and les transparent?

Platonique Questions.

What is the reason, that God other-whiles commanded Socrates to do the part of a Midwise, in helping others to be delivered of Child-birth, but forbade himself in any mise to procreate children? according as it is written in a Teatife, shtituled, Theætetus. For we ought not to think, that if be had been disposed to cavil, to jest or to speak ironically in this place, be would have abused the name of God. Besides, in this felf same Treatist be attributesh many other sigh and magnifical speeches unto Socrates, and namely, while among many others: Cerces (quot be) there be many men (right good sir) who carry this minds to time-ward, that they are disposed plainly to carp, and bite me, in case at any time I seem to rid them of any foolish spinion that they have, neither think they that I do it of good will and meaning well unto them; shewing themselves herein far short of this doctrine, That no God beareth evil will to men: no more ve--rily do I this unto them upon any malice: but furely I cannot otherwise choose, neither do I think it lawzifull for me either to smother up and parden a lye or'to dissemble and suppress a truth.

And Heraclitus:

Mans nature we must needs confesse, Is heavenly and a god doubtlefs.

Orrather in very truth there was some Divine and Celeffial cause, which suggested and inspired into Secrates this manner of Philosophy; whereby fifting as he did continually, and ex mining others, he cured them of all swelling pride, of vain error, of presumptuous arrogancy; likewise of being odiout, first to themselves, and afterwards to those about them of their company : for i. fortuned about his time, that a number of these Sophisters swarmed over all Greece, unto whom youn a Gentlemen reforting, and paying good fums of money for their falary, were filled with a great weening and opinion of themselves, with a vain perswassion of their own learning and zealous love to good Letters. fornding their time in idle Disputations, and frivolous contentions, without doing any thing in the world, that was either good, honest, or profitable. Socrates therefore, who had a special gift by with manner of speech and discourse, as it were by some purgative Medicine, to argue and convince, was of greater authority and credit when he consuted others, in that he never affirmed not pronounced resolutely any thing of his own; yea, and he pierced deeper into the souls and hearts of his hearers, by how much he scemed to seek out the truth in common, and never to favorize and maintain any opinion of his own: for this begetting of a mans own fancies, mightily impeacheth the faculty and power to judge another, for evermore the Lover is blinded in the behalf of that which beloveth: and verily, there is nothing in the world that loveth fo much the own, as a man doth the opinions and reason whereof himself was the father; for surely that distribution and partition among children which is commonly faid to be most just and equal, is in this case of opinions and reasons most unjust; for in the former every one must take his own, but in this he ought to choose the better, yea, though it were another mans: and therefore once again, he that fatherth somewhat of his own, becometh the worse judge of other mens: And like as there was sometime a Suphister or great learned man, who said: That the Elians would be the better Umpires and Judges of the Sacred Olympick Games, in case there were never any Elian came in place to perform hisprizes; even for he that would be a good Prefident to fit and determine of divers Sentences and Opinions; no reason there is in the world that he should defire to have his own Sentence crowned, no nor to be one of the Parties contending, and who in truth are to be judged by him. The Grecian Captains after they had defeated the Barbarians, being affembled in Council to give their voices unto those whom they deemed worthy of reward and honour, for their Prowess; judged themselves all to have done the best service, and to be the most valorous Warriours. And of Philosophers I affire you there is not one but he would do as much, unless it were Socrates, and such as he, who confess that they neither have, nor know ought of their own : for these in truth be they who only hew themselves to be uncorrupt, and competent Judges of the truth, and such as cannot be chal-loged: for like as the ayr within our cars if it be not firm and steady, nor clear without any voice of the own, but full of finging founds, and ringing noises, cannot exactly comprehend that which is faid unto us; even so, that which is to judge of reasons in Philosophy, if it meet with any thing that refoundeth and keepeth an hammering within, hardly will it be able to understand that which shall be delivered without forth: for the own particular opinion which is domestical and dwelleth at home, of what matter soever it be that is treated of, will always be the Philosopher that hitteth the Mark, and toucheth the truth best; whereas all the refifull be thought but to opine probably the truth. Moreover, if it be true that a manificat able prefetly to comprile or know any thing, by good right and reason their did God forbid him to cast forth these sales Conceptions, as it were, of untrue and unco oftanooptions, and forced him to reproove and detect those who ever had such : for no small profit, but right great commodity comes by fuch a speech as is able to deliver men from the greatest evil that is, even the spirit of error, of illusion and vanity in opinion.

So great a gift as God of special grace, Gave never to Afclepius bis race,

Forthe Physick of Socrates was not to heal the body, but to cleanse and purific the foul, sestered inwardly and corrupt. Contrariwise, if it beso, that the truth may be known, and that there be but one truth, he who learned it of him that found it not out, hath no less than the inventer himself; ye, and better received it he, who is not perswaded that he hath it : nay, he received that which is imply best of all: much like as he who having no natural children of his own body begotten, taketh the best that he can choose, for to make his adopted childe. But consider here with me, whether other kinds of Learning deferve not haply to have much study imployed in them, as namely, Poetry, Mathematicks, the art of Elequence, and the opinions of Sophisters and great Clerks: Therefore God of that D. wine power what soever, forbad Socrates to engender them; but as touching that which Socrates the sheemed to be the only wisdom, to wit, the knowledge of God and spiritual things, which he himfall calleth the amorous Science; there be no men that beget or inventit, but call the same only to remembrance: whereupon Socrates himself never taught anything, but proposing only unto young men certain beginning of difficulties and doubts, as it were the fore-throws of Child-birth, firedup, awakened, and drew forth their own natural wits, and inbred intelligences: and this was it that he called the Midwives Art, which brought nothing into them from without, as others would make them believe, who conferred with them, that they infused reason and understandding, but shewed only and raught them, that they had already within themselves a minde and underthanding of their own, and the fame fufficient to nourifh, though it were confused and unperfect,

What is the reason that in some places he called the Soversign God, father and maker of all things ?

W As it for that he is in truth the father of gods, such as were ingendred, and also of men, as Homer calleth him, like as the maker of those Creatures which have neither reason nor soul? for according as Coryfippus faith, we use not to call him the father of the secondine wherein the infant is inwrapped within the womb, who conferred general feed, although the faid fecondine be made of

Or uleth he not a Metaphor, as his manner is, when figuratively he termeth him Father of the world, who is the efficient cause, according to his usual manner of speaking; as namely, in the Dialogue entituled Symposium, where he maketh Phedras the father of amatorius discourse, for that he it was, who proposed and set abroad the same : like as he named Gallipedas in a Dialogue bearing his name, The father of Philosephical Discourses, for that there passed many beautifull speeches in Philosophy,

Or rather was it not, because there is a difference between father and maker, as also between generation and creation? for whatfoever is ingendred, is made, but not è converio; whatfoever is made, is likewife ingendred: femblably, who hath begotten, hath also made; for generation is the making of a living creature: but if we consider a workman, to wit, either a Mason or Carpenter, a Weaver, a Luce Maker, or Imager; certes, the work is diftinct and separate from the Maker : whereas the moving principle, and the puissance of him who begetteth, is insufed into that which is begotten; it contained his nature, being as it were a parcel distracted from the very substance of him who ingent dred it. Forafmuch then, as the world doth not refemble a conjunction of many pieces, fct, joyned, fastened and glued together; but hath in it a great portion of the animal life, yea, and of divinity, which God hath infufed and mingled in the matter, as derived from his own nature and fibblance; good reason it is therefore, that he should be firnamed both the father and maker of the world, being aliving creature as it is. These points being very conformable and proportionate to the opinion of Plato, confider withall a little, if this also which I shall deliver, be not likewise accordant thereunto; namely, that the world being compared of two parts, to wit, of body and of foul : the one, which is the body, God hath not ingendred; but having the matter thereof exhibited unto him, he hath formed, shaped and fitted it, binding and limiting it according to the infinity thereof, with terms, bounds and figures proper thereto: but the foul having a proporition of understanding discourse of reason, order and harmony, is not only the work, but also a part of God, not by him, but even of him, and iffuing from his own proper fubriance. In his Book therefore of Politiques or Commonwealth, having divided the whole world, as it were a line into two fegments or sections unequal, he fubdivideth either section into other twain, after the same proportion; for two general kinds he make the first of all things; the one sensible and visible, the other intelligible; unto the intelligible kinde he attributeth in the first degree the Primitive forms and Idee; in the second degree, the Mathematicks: and as for the fensible kind, heattributeth thereto in the first rank, all follid bodies, and in the fecond place, the images and figures of them. Also to every one of these sour members of his said division, he giveth his own proper judge: to the first of Idees, understanding; to the Mathematicks, imagination; to the follid bodies, faith and belief; to the Images and Figures, Conjecture. To what end then, and upon what intention bath he divided the whole world into Sections, and the fame unequal? and of those two Sections, whether is the greater, that of sensible objects, or that of intelligible? As for himfelf, he hath not showed and declared it: but presently it will appear, that the portion of sensible things is the greater : for the indivisible substance is of things intelledual, being evermore of one fort, and refling upon the same subject in one state, and reduced to very short and narrow room, and the same pure and near: whereas the other being fored and wandering upon bodies, is that section of sentible things, and near: whereas the other being spread and wandering upon bodies, is that section of sentible things. And abody as Moreover, the property of that which is incorporal, is to be definite and determinate. And a body as touching the matter thereof, is indefinite and undeterminate; becoming sensible, when by participation of the intelligible it is made finite and limitable. Over and besides, like as every (ensible thing bath many Images, many shadows, and many figures, and generally, out of one only pattern there may be drawn many Copies and examples, imitated aswel by Act as by Nature; so it cannot choose, but the things that here be sensible, should be more in number than they above, which are intelligible, according to the opinion of Plato, Supposing this, that things sensible be as it were the images and examples of the original paterns, to wit, the intelligible Idea. Furthermore, the intelligence of these Ideas and the original paterns, to wit, the intelligible Idea. Furthermore, the intelligence of these Ideas and forms by substraction, deduction and division of bodies, is ranged answerable to the order of the Markov and the substraction of the thematicks, arifing from Arithmetick which is the Science of Numbers, into Geometry, to wit the of measures; then asterwards to Astrology, which is the knowledge of the stars, and in the highest place above all the reft, setteth Harmonics, which is the skill of sounds and accords: for the subject of G ometry is this, when as to quantily in general, there is adjoyned magnitude in length and breadth; of Screenietrie, when to the magnitude of length and breadth, there is added depth or profundity. It is useful to the magnitude of length and breadth, there is added depth or profundity. It is useful to the proper fubject of Aftrology is this, when to the folid magnitude there cometh motion. The fubject of Harmony or mulick, when to a body moving, there is adjoyned found or voice. If we

Chraft then and take away, from moving bodies, voice ; from folid bodies, motion ; from fuperficies, doth and profundity; and from quantities, magnitude; we shall come by this time to the intelligible The which have no difference among them, in regard of one and fole thing : for unity maketh no numher unless it come once to touch Binary or two, which is infinite: but in this wife having produced a umber, it proceedeth to points and pricks, from pricks to lines, and so forth from lines to superficies, from superficies to profundities; from thence to bodies, and so forward to the qualities of bodies subin to passions and alterations. Moreover, of intellectual things, there is no other judge but the underfunding or the mind; for cogication or intelligence, is no other thing but the understanding, so long uit is applied unto Mathematicals, wherein things intellectual appear as within mirrours; whereas, for the knowledge of bodies, by reason of their great number, nature hath given unto us five powers and facilities of feveral and different fenfes for to judge withal : and yet fufficient they are not to discover all objects; for many there be of them to * small, that they cannot be perceived by the senses And like * a, although every one of us being composed of soul and body, yet that principal part, which is our m/a, some fair and understanding, is a very small thing, hidden and enclosed within a great mass of flesh; even meadenfor the life it is, that there is the same proportion within the universal world, between things "erist", so the same proportion within the universal world, between things "erist", so the same same and intellectual are the beginning of corporal: now that which that is to say, they moceedeth from a beginning, is always in number more, and in magnitude greater, than the faid be-are fo far

But on the contrary, a man may reason thus and say : First and formost, that in comparing sensible and corporal things with intellectual, we do in some fort make mortal things equal with Divine, for God is to be reckoned among intellectuals. Now this is to be granted, that the content is always lefe than the continent; but the nature of the universal world, within the intellectual comprehendeth the fafible. For God having fet the foul in the midft, hath spred and stretched it through all within, and net without forth hath covered all bodies with it. As for the foul it is invisible, yea and inperceptible milling natural fenfes, according as he hath written in his Book of Laws; and therefore every one of mis corruptible; but the world shall never perish; for that in each of us that which is mortal and fibicate diffolution, containeth within it the power which is vital; but in the world it is clean contransfor the principal puilfance & nature, which is over after one fort immutable, doth always preferve the corporal part, which it containeth and embraceth within it felf. Befides, in a bodily nature and orporal, athing is called individual and importable for the smalness thereof, to wit, when it is so little that is cannot be divided, but in the spiritual and incorporal, it is so called for the simplicity, sincerity and purity thereof, as being exempt from all multiplicity and diversity: for otherwise folly it were to culta guels at spiritual things by corporal. Furthermore the very present time which we call Now , in Gid to be inpartible and indivisible : howbeit, inflant together it is every where, neither is there any part of this habitable world without it; but all passions, all actions, all corruptions and generations throughout the world are comprised in this very present Now. Now the only instrument to judge of things intellectual is the understanding, like as the eye, of light; which for simplicity is uniform, and very way like unto it felf; but bodies having many diversities and differences, are comprehended by disens inflruments, and judged some by this, and others by that. And yet some there be who unworthis lydifestern and contemn the intellectual puissance and spiritual which is in us: for in truth, being goddy and great, it surmounteth every sensible thing and reacheth up as far as to the gods. But that which of all others is most, himself in his book entituled Symposium, teaching how to use love and low-matters, in withdrawing the soul from the affection of beauties corporal, and applying the same to those which are intellectual, exhorteth us not to subject and inthral our selves into the lorely beauty of any body, nor of one study and science, but by erecting and lifting up our minds lok from such bale objects, to turn unto that vast ocean indeed of pulcritude and beauty, which is

How connects it to pass, that considering he affirmets evermore the soul to be more ancient than the body, as the very cause of the generation of it, and the beginning likewise thereof, yet contrariwise be saithy that ue foul was never without the body, nor the understanding without the foul, and that of necessity the foul, and the understanding in the foul? for it seemeth that herein there is some contradiction; namely, that the body both is, and is not, in safe it be true, that it is together with the soul, and yet nevertheless ingendred by the foul?

Sit because that is true which we oftentimes do say? namely, that the soul without understanding, I and the body without form have always been together, and neither the one nor the other had ever. commencement of being nor beginning of generation; but when the foul came to have participation. of understanding and of harmony, and became to be wife by the means of consonance and accord, then caused the mutation in matter, and being more powerful and strong in her own motions, drew and threed into her the motions of the other? and even for the bodies of the world had the first gemuion from the foul, whereby it was shaped and made uniform. For the foul of her felf, brought not forth the nature of a body, nor created it of nothing, but of a body without all order and whatfoever, he made it orderly and very obeifant : as if one faid that the force of a feed or tenel is always with the body, but yet nevertheless the body of the fig-tree or olive-tree is engendred of the feed or kernel, he should not speak contrarieties; for the very body it felf being moved and altered by the feed, springeth and groweth to be such: semblably the matter void of form and indeterminate, having once been shapen by the soul, which was within, received such a form and disposition.

What is the reason, that whereas there be bodies and figures, some consisting of right lines, and others of circular, he hash taken for the soundation and beginning of those which it and of right lines, the triangle Mosclets, with row equal sides, and Scaleman, with three sides all unequal. Of which, the triangle with two even legs composed the cube or square body, which is the element and principle of the earth and the triangle with three unequal legs made the pyramidal body, as also leadardon with eight sace; and to forestend and receive the condition of the state of t

Is it as some do imagine and suppose, because he attributed the Dodecaedron, that is to say, the body such two live faces unto the Globe or round Sphare, in saying that God made use of this form and figure, in the framing of the world? For in regard of the multitude of elements, and bluntness of angles, it is farthest off from direct and right lines, whereby it is stexible, and by stretching forth round in manner of a Bill made of twelve pieces of Leather, it approaches the nearest unto roundness, and in that regard is of greatest eapacity; for it contained twenty angles folid, and every one of them is comprised and environed within three fit to buse or blunt angles, considering that every of them is composed of one right and six parts; moreover compact it is and composed of twelve Pentagons, that is to say, bodies with five angles, having their angles, and fides quals; of which every one of thirty principal triangles, with three unequal legs; by reason whereof, it seemeth that he followed the degrees of the Zodiack, and the clays of the year together, in that division of their parts so equal and fiftin numbers.

Or may not this be the reason, that by nature the right goeth before the round? or rather, to foesk more truly, that a circular line termeth to be fome vicious passion or faulty quality of the right, for we use ordinarily to say, that the right line doth bow or bend; and a circle is drawn and described by the center, and the diffence from it to the circumference, which is the very place of the right line, by which it is measured out; for the circumference is on every fide equally diffant from the Center. Moreover, the Counts, which is a round Pyramis; and the Cylindre, which is as it were a round column or pillar of equal compais, are both made of figures with direct lines, the one; to wit, the Counts by triangle, whereof one lide remaineth firm, and the other with the base goeth round about it : the Cylindie, when the same befalleth to a parallel. Moreover, that which is less, cometh nearest unto the beginning, and refembleth it most: but the least and simplest of all lines is the right; for of the round line that part which is within, doth crook and curb hollow, the other without doth bump and bunch. Over and belides, numbers are before figures, for unity is before a prick; feeing that a prick is in polition and fituation an unity, but an unity is triangular, for that every number triangular, eight times reprated or mulciplied, by addition of an unity becometh quadrangular, and the same also befalleth to unity; and therefore a triangle is before a circle, which being fo, the right line goeth before the circular. Moreover, an element is never divided into that which is composed of it: but contrariwise, every thing elfe is divided and refolved into the own elements whereof it doth confift. If then the triangle is not refolved into any thing circular; but contratiwife, two diameters croffing one another, part a circle just into four parts; then we must needs infer the figure confisting of right lines, went before those which are circular: now that the right line goeth first, and the circular doth succeed and follow after, Plato himself hath thewed by demonstration, namely when he faith, that the earth is composed of many cubes or square solid bodies, whereof every one is enclosed, and contained with right lined fuperficies, in fuch manner disposed, as yet the whole body and mass of the earth seemeth round like a globe, so that we need not to make any proper element thereof round, if it be so that bodies with right lines, conjoyned and let in fome fort one to another, bringeth forth this form : Over and befides the direct line, be it little or be it great, keep th always the same rectitude : whereas contrariwise we see the circumferences of Circles if they be finall, are more coping, bending, and contract d in their outward curvature; contrariwing if they be great, they are more extent, law, and fored, infomund as they that fland by the outward circumference of Circles, lying upon a flat fuperficies, touch the fame underenth, purply by a prick if they be famall, and in part by a line if they be large; to as a man may very well contective. That many right lines loyned one to another, sail to tail by piece meal, produce the circumference of a circle. But confider, whether there be none of these our circular or sphærical Figir s, exquifitely and exactly perfect; but in regard of the extensions and circumtensions of right lines, or by reason of the exility and smalness of the parts, there can be perceived no difference, and thereuppin there lieweth a circular and round figure: And therefore it is, that there is not a body here, that by nature doth move circularly, but all according to the right line; so that the round and spizitcal Figure is not the element of a lenfible body, but of the foul and understanding, unto which he attributeth likewise the circular motion as belonging unto them paturally. In what sense and meaning delivered be this speech in his Book entituled Phædrus, that the nature of a wing, whereby that which is heavy and ponderous, is carried up alost, of all other things that belong anto a body, buth a certain communion and participation with God?

Sit because the discourseth there of love; and love is occupied about the beauty of the body, and this beauty for the resemblance that it hath to divinity, doth move the mind, and excite the reminifcence thereof ?

Ocrather are we to take it fimply without curious (earching farther into any mysterie thereof? namely, that the foul being within the body, hath many faculties and powers, whereof that which is the discourse of reason and understanding, doth participate with the Deity, which he not unproperly and impertinently termeth a wing, because it lifeth up the foul from things base and mortal, unto the confideration of heavenly and celestial matters.

How is it that Plato in some places faith, the Antepprillasis of motion, that is to say, the circumstant contrariety debarring a body to move, in regard that there is no voidnels or vacuity in nature, is the sause of those species which we see in Psylicians Vennoss and Eupping glossy or Siralousing down our Vinadas of twoming of mally weights, of the course ance of waters, of the sall of lightnings; of the atraction that ambee maketh, of the drawing of the loadstone, and of the accord and consonance of voice. For it seemed by a saint all easion to yield one only cands, for so many effects so divers and so different in kinds. First, as touching the respiration in living creatures, by the Antespecificis of divers and so different in nature, and are nothing, for that they be integret else some some saint to be miracles, and wonder in nature, and are nothing, for that they be integret else but bodies reciprocally and by alternative course, driving one another out of place reand about, and mutually succeeding in their rooms, he hathless for 10 be discossed by us, bowe acts of 1 them particularly us done?

Infland formost for Ventoses and Cupping-glasses, thus it is. The ayr that is contained within the Ventose, striking as it doth into the flesh, being inflanned with heat, and being now more fine and twill then the holes of the brasse (box or glass) whereof the Ventose is made, getteth forth, not into a wid place, for that is impossible, but into that other ayr which is round about the said Ventose without forth, and driveth the same from it; and that forceth other before it, and thus as it were from haid to hand, whiles the one giveth place, and the other driveth continually, and so entered into the vicant place which the first less, it cometh at length to fall upon the slesh which the Ventose slicketh saft using, and by heating and inchasing it expresses the humor that is within, into the Ventose or Cupping-Vent.

The swallowing of our Victuals is after the same manner, for the cavities as well of the mouth as of the stomack, be always full of ayr: when as then, the meat is driven within the passinge or gullet of the throat, partly by the tongue and partly by the glandlous parts or kernels called tonsels, and the mucles which now are stretched, the ayr being pressed and strained by the said meat, solloweth it hard as it gives he place, and slicking close, it is a means to help for to drive it downward.

Semblably the weighty things that be flung, as big flones and fuch like, cut the ayr and divide it, by reason that they were sent out and levelled with a violent force; then the ayr all about behind, according to the nature thereof, which is to follow where a place is left vacant and to fill it up, pursuch the mass or weight aforca's d that is lanced or discharged forcibly, and settent forward the motion thereof.

The flipeting and ejaculation of lightning is much what after the manner of thefs weights thrown inmanner aforefaid, for being inflamed and fet on a light fire, it flatheth out of a cloud by the violence of a flroke, into the ayr, which being once open and broken, giveth place unto it, and then closing up together above it, drivith it down forcibly against the own nature.

As for Amber, we winth not think that it draweth any thing to it of that which is preferred before 18, nomore than dorh in 18 but fift, as touching the faid flone; it fendeth from it I wot not what firong and flattous flaxions, by which the ayr next adjoyning giving back, driven that which is before it; and the fame tuning round and recentring again into the void place, doth thruft from it and withal earry with it theiron to the flone. And for Amber it has likewife a certain flagrant and flattulent fpirit, which when the outstide thereof is rubbed, it put filtiforth by reason that the pores thereof are by that mist a opened. And wright hat which flight not out of it, worketh in some measure the like effect that the Magnet or Load-flone did: and drawn there are unto it such matters neer at hand as be mich light and dry, by reason that the fubilance coming thereof is but flinder and weak: neither is it fift frong nor hat sufficient weight and force, for to chase and drive before it a great deal of ayr, by means where of it might overcome greater things, as the Load-flone doth. But how is it that this ayr driveth and doubt and difficulty that much troubleth all those who suppose that this ayr driveth and doubt and difficulty that much troubleth all those who suppose that this meeting and cleaving of two bodies together, is either by the attraction of the flone, or by the actual motion of their on. Iron line that so hollow and foungeous as is wood, nor for stiff and cologas is gold or flone, but it hat finall boles, passages and rough aspects, which in regard of the unequality are well proportionate and fortable to the ayr, in such wife, as it runneth not easily through, but hath certain stays by the way to catch hold of, fo as it may stand steady and take such sure footing, as to be able to force and drive before it the iron untill it have brought it to kifs the load-stone. And thus much for the causes and reasons that may be rendred of these effects.

As confidering the running of water above ground, by what manner of comprellion and coardiation round about, it should be performed it is not to case cither to be perceived or declared. But thus much we are to learn, that for waters of Lakes, which flir not but continue always in one place, it is because the air, spred all about, and keeping them in on every fide, moveth not nor leaveth unto them any vacant place. For even to the upper face of the water, as well in Lakes as in the Sca, rifeth up into cant prace. For even to the upper law wares and billows, according to the agitation of the ayr; for the water ftill followeth the motion of the ayr, and floweth or is troubled with it, by reason of the inequalities. For the froke of the ayr, downward maketh the hollow dent of the wave : but as the fame is driven upward it causeth the swelling and furging tumor of the wave until fuch time as all the place above containing the water be fetled and layed, for then the waves also do cease, and the water likewise is still and quiet. But now for the course of waters which glide and run continually above the face of the ground : the cause thereof is because they always follow hard after the ayr that giveth way, and yet are chased by those behind by compression and driving forward, and so by that means maintain a continual stream that never refleth : which is the reason also that great rivers when they are full and do overflow the banks, run with a more (wift and violent ftream; and contrariwife when there is but little water in the channel, they glide more flowly, because the ayr before doth nothing so much give place, for that they are more feeble: neither is there to great an antiperiffalis to urgeand prefs them forward; and even to the fpring-waters must of necessity boyl and rise upward, for that the outward ayr entring closely into the void hollow places within the ground fendeth up again the water forth.

The paved floor of a dark close house, containing in it a great deal of flill ayr, without any wind from without entring into it, if a man do cast water upon it, engendreth presently a wind and cold vapour; by reason that the ayr is displaced and removed out of his seat, by the water which fell, and is thereby beaten, and receives the froke and dist thereof. For this is the ature of them, to drive one another, and likewife to give place one to the other interchangeably, admitting in no wife any emptine wherein the one of them should be so settled, as that it did not reciprocally seed the change and alteration of the other.

To come now unto the above named symphonic and consonance, himself hath declared how it is that sounds and voices do accord: for the small and treble is quick and swift; whereas the big and base is heavy and flow. And thereupon it is, that small and shrill sounds do move the sense of hearing before others: but if when these begin to fall and decay, the flow and base begin to succeed and receive them, the mixture and temperature of them both, by a kind of conformity yieldeth a delight and pleasure to the car, which they call a symphonic or accord. And that hereof the ayr is the instrument, it may evidently appear by that which we have faid already : for voice is a stroak or percussion by the ayr of that which the ear doth hear ; for as the ayr is smitten by motion, so it striketh again the auditory organ forcibly, if the motion be quick ; and gently, if the fame be flow : and that which is ftricken forcibly with a violence, cometh first into the fense of hearing, but afterwards, turning about and meeting with that which is more flow, it followeth and accompanieth the fenfe.

What is the meaning of Timzue, when he saith: That the souls are dispersed and sowen (as it were) upon the ground, the moon and all other inftruments of time what feeper?

S it because he was of opinion, that the earth did movelikeunto the Sur, Moon and other five Planets, which he calleth the inftruments of time, because of their convertions? and held befides that we ought not to imagine the earth fo framed, as if it were firm and immoveable, fast fixed and perpetually to the axle-tree or pole that paffeth thorow the world; but that it turneth round in manner of a wheel : like as afterwards Ariftarchus and Seleucus have thewed; the one supposing it only, the other affirming so much, flatly. To say nothing of that which Theophrastus wrote; namely, how Plate toward the latter end of his days, repented that he had affigued unto the earth the center and middle of the world, a place iwis unfit and unmeet for it? Or rather, because this is directly repugnant unto many sentences which this Philosopher undoubtedly held, we ought therefore to change the writing of this place of Timeus, by putting the Dative Cale in flead of the Genicive, to wit, xin for xin : yea, and to understand by the instruments of time, not the Planets or Stars, but the bodies of living creatures; according as Aristotle hath defined the foul, to be a continual act of a bod , Natural, Organical, having life potentially : fo that the fentonce in the forefaid place should be read thus. The souls have bin diffeminated & sown by time in organical bodies, meet &agreeable for them. And yet even this is contrary unto his own opinion: for that not in one only place, but in many, he hath called the flars, infiruments of time, confidering that he affirmeth that the very Sua was made to diffinguish & keep the number of time with other Planets. The best way is therefore to understand, That the careh is the instrument of time, not because it moveth as do the stars; but for that so continuing as it doth, always firm & fleady in it felf, it giveth means unto the flars moving round about it, to rife and to fall, whereby are limited the day and the night, which are the first measures of time and therefore himself hath called it the Guardian, yea, the Artizan indeed and right truely of night and day: for the Gnomons in Sun Dials, not moving with the shadows but standing still and keeping their place, are the infirmments and measures of time, representing the obstacle of the earth opposite unto the Sun moving round about it; like as Empedocles faith:

The earth fet just twixt Sun beams and our fight, Shuts up the day and bringeth in the night.

And thus much for the enodation of this knot. nu the But haply this a man may doubt to be a strange and absurd speech, to say that the Sun, together with the Moon and the Planets, were made for diffinction of times: for otherwife by it felf, great is the digmity of the Sun; and Plate himself in his Books of Common-wealth, calleth him the King and Lord may of all the sensible world, like as Good he pronounceth to be the Soveraign of the intelligible world. of all the tempore world, the as Oldat he promonted it to be the Soverage of the alternative world, and the Sun ((aith he) is the very lifte extract from that Good, giving unto thing, vifible, together with their apparance, being also, and fibrifitance; like as Good giveth unto intelligible things this with their apparance, being also, so the second strength of the hould be the inftrument of time, and an evident rule and measure of the difference that is of swiftnea or of flowness among the eight heavenly Spheres, seemeth not very decent; no nor any noise consonanto reason. It remaineth therefore thus much to fay, those who trouble themselves about these points, for very ignorance are deceived, supposing that time according to the definition of Aristole, is diemeasure of motion, and the number in regard of priority and posteriority: or the quantity it motion after the opinion of Speusppus: or else the distance of motion, and no other thing, as the could describe it. A figure for force one condens Soicks describe it, defining for footh one accident, but never coming neer unto the substance and power thereof, which as it should seem, the Poet Pindarus imagined & conceived not amiss when he said:

That is supported in the support of the heaven: for time be Pythegoras also, who being asked what Time was? answered: The soul of the heaven: for time be is what it will be, is not some accident or passion of any motion, but it is the cause, the puissance and the principle of that proportion, and order that containeth and holdeth together all things, according to which, the nature of the world, and this whole univerfality, which also is animate, doth move, or rather the very same proportion it self and order which doth move; is the thing that we call time:

For walk it doth with filent pace, In way whereas no noise is made :

Gonducting justly to their place,
All mortal things that page and fade.
And verily according to the minde of ancient Philosophers, the subflance of the soul was defined to be a number moving it felf; which is the reason why Plato said: That Time and Heaven were made together; but motion was before heaven, at what time as there was no heaven at all; for why, there was no order nor measure what loever, no nor any diffinction, but an undeterminate motion, like as the matter was rude without form and figure, but after that nature once had caff this matter into a colour, and had shaped it with form and figure, and then determined motion with periodical revolutions, the made withal, both the world and time both at once; which two are the very images of God: to wit, the world of his substance, and time of his eternity; for God in that he moveth, is Time, and in that hehath being, is the world. This is the reason why he saith: That both of them coming together, full likewice both be diffolved together, in cale that ever there will be any diffolution of them. For that which had a beginning and generation, cannot be without time, no more than that which is intelligible without eternity; in case the one is to continue for ever, and the other being once made, shall never perish and be dissolved. Time then being so necessarily linked and interlaced with the heaven, is not fimply a motion, but as we have faid already, a motion ordained by order, which hash a just meafure, set limits and bonds, yea and certain revolutions; of all which, the Sun being Superintendent, Govemor and Director, for to dispos; limit, and digest all ; for to discover, set out and shew, the alterations and feafons the which bring forth all things, as Heraclitus faith: confessed it muit be, that he is a workman cooperant with that chief and foveraign God, the prince of all, not in petty, base, and frivolous things, but in the greatest and most principal works that be.

PLato in his Books of Common wealth, having excellently well compared the symphonic of the three faculties and powers of the soul, to wit, the reasonable, the irascible and concupifcible, unto the Mulical harmony of the notes, Mele, Hypate, and Nete, hath given occasion for a man to doubt, whether he fet the trafcible or reasonable part, correspondent to the mean? seeing that he shewed not his meaning in this present place; for according to the situation of the parts of the body, wherein these faculties are feated, furely the couragious and irafeible is placed in the mids, and answered to the region of Mese the mean; but the reasonable is ranged into the place of Hypate; for that which is alost, first and principal our Ancestors used to call Hypaton; according to which sense Xenorates called Impiter or the ayr (that I mean which converfeth above where all things continue the same, and after one fort) Hypatos; like as that which is under the Moon, Neatos. And before him Homer speaking of the soveraign God and Prince of Princes, faith thus 3 474 x 2544780, that is to fay, our Soveraign and Supream of all Rulers. And in truth, nature hath by very good right given unto the best part of the foul, the higheft place in lodging the discourse of reason, as the Governor of the rest within the head; but hath removed far from thence to the bale and inferior members, the concupifcible: for the low fituation is called For here yon have a Pronoun, a Participle, a Nown, a Verb, a Preposition, an Article, a Conjunction, and of this is an Adverb. For the Particle, 82, is put in stead of the Preposition ets, that is to say, to: and naminous unperfect, that is to fay, to thy Tent, is after the manner of allwars, that is to fay, to Athens: But what shall depend ng we answer in the behalf of Plato.

TS it for that in old time they called that wiro, 20,000, that is to fay, the first speech, which then feeten was named πρότασις, that is to fay, a Proposition, and now they term δέβαμα, that is to fay, die nity: which when they utter sirst, they either lye or speak truth. And this Proposition is compound ferwing the td of a Nown and a Verb, whereof the one is called by the Logicians, προσι, that is to say, the case; turn as it the other, xarmopnua, that is to fay, the predicable or pradicatum. For when we hear one fay, Socrates stands, it teacheth; and again, Socrates is turned; we say the one is true, and the other is salfe. and we renot to be quire no more words. For it is probable that men at the first had need of speech and voice articulate, done into when they were defirous to explain and fignific one unto another the actions and the persons and the English doers thereof: like as the passions and the persons who suffer the same. For as much then, as by the Verb we express sufficiently the actions and passions; and by the Noun, the persons doing or suffering as he himself faith; it seemeth that these be the two parts of speech that he meaneth : as for the rest, a man may well and truly fay, that they fignific nothing, no more than do the groans, fighs and lamentations of Players in a Tragedy, yea, and many times I wis, a smile, a reticence or keeping silence, which otherwhiles may well express a speech, and make it more emphatical; but surely, no necessary and fignificative power have they to declare ought, like as the Verb and the Noun hath: only they ferve as accessary adjuncts, to vary illustrate and beautifie the speech; like as they also diversifie the very letters, who put to their spirits and aspirations, their accents also to some, whereby they make them long and fhor, and reckon them for elements and letters indeed, whereas they be passions, accidents, and diverfifications of elements, rather than diffinet elements by themselves; as it appeareth manifelly by this that our ancients contented themselves sufficiently to speak and write with fixteen letters and no more. Moreover, consider and see whether we do not take the words of Plato otherwise than he delivered them; when he faith that the speech is tempered of these two parts, and not by them. Take heed (I fay) we commit not the fame errour as he doth, who should cavil and finde fault with one for faying, that fuch an ointment or falve was made of wax and galbanum, alledging against him for so faying, that he lest out fire and the veffel, without which a man knoweth not how to temper the faid Simples or Drugs: for even fo, if we should reproove him because he omitted the naming of Conjunctions, Prepositions, and other parts of speech, we were likewise to be blamed : for in truth, a speech or sentence is not compounded of these parts, but by them and not without them. For like as he, who should the series pronounce simply these Verbs, To beat, or, To be beaten; or otherwise these bare Nowns, Socrates or Probagoras; giveth some light (such as it is) of a thing to be conceived and understood: but he that should come out with these odd words, For, or Of, and say no more, a man cannot imagine what he meaneth thereby, nor gather any conception either of action or of body; for if there be not fome other words pronounced with them or about them, they resemble naked sounds and vain noises without any fignifications at all: for that neither by themselves alone, nor one with another, it is possible that they should betoken any thing. Nay, admit that we should conjoyn, mingle and interlace together Conjunctions, Articles and Prepositions all in one, minding to make one entire body of them all, we shall seem rather to creak than speak : but so soon as a Verb is joyned to a Noun, that which refulteth thereupon is immediatly a fentence and fignificant speech. And therefore not without good reason some do think that these two (to speak properly) be the only parts of speech. And peradventure Homer had some such meaning, and gave us so much to understand, by saying in so many > ιπ 🗫 τ' έφατ' έκ τ' ὀνόμαζεν. `He (pake the word, and with the same, Immediately out came the name.

For by 🕳 🕒 , that is to fay, the word, his manner is to fignifie a Verb : as namely in this other verfe चैंγшोळ में μάλα वैंडिल डेंक्फ रेंक्फ ਹैυμαλγές डॅसलाइ. Now furely moman, much to blame thou art, This word to speak, it strikes so to my beart.

As also elsewhere:

xüite nine & Esire, ins. I siden hink.) surd, asas designer drapnikasas dehad. Adieu good kather z guest and friend Farewel: And if Some word unkind Hath been let fall, I wish it may By winds and storms be caught away.

For surely it is neither Conjunction, Article, nor Preposition, that can be said either unkind, or to touch the heart, but some Verb signifying a shamefull deed, proceeding from an undecent and dishoneft pallion. And therefore you fee how we are wont to praife Poets and Historiographers, or otherwise to blame and dispraise them, saying in this wife: Such a Poet hath used Attick Nouns and elegant Verbs: and contrariwise, Such an Historiographer hath used trivial and base Nouns

Neate, according as appeareth by the denomination of the dead, who are termed Nigmen and English that is to fay, inferior or infernal : and for this cause, some there be who say, that the wind which bloweth from bineath, and out of places unicen, that is to fay, from the Pole Antartick, is called No. 19, that is to fay, the fouth. Since then it is fo, that there is the fame preportion of contraffery between concupifible and reasonable parts of the foul, as there is between lowest and highest, last and fift; it is not possible, that reason should be the highest and principal, and not withal, correspondent to Hypate, but to some other note in Musick : for they who attribute unto her as unto the principal faculty and power Mese, that is to say, the mean, see not (ignorant as they be) how they take from her that which is more principal, to wit, Hypate, which cannot fit well either with ite or luft, for both theles the one and the other are made for to follow, and be commanded by reason, and not to command or go before reason. Moreover it should seem by nature, that anger ought to have the mean and middle place, confidering that naturally reason is to command; and anger both to command and be commanded, as being on the one fide subject to the discourse of reason, and on the other fide, commanding lust, yea, and punishing it, when she is disobedient to reason. And like as in Grammar, those Letters which we call femi-vowels, be of a middlenature, between mute confonants and vowels: for that as they found more than the one, fo they found lefs than the other: even fo in the foul of man, wrath is not fimply a meer paffion, but hath many times an apparance of duty and honefly mixed with defire of revenge. And Plate himself comparing the substance of the soul unto a couple of horses drawing a chasiot, and guided by a chariot man, who driveth them, and understandeth by the driver and guide, as every man well knows the discourse of reason: now of the two steeds that of lusts and pleasures is frampold, skittish, flinging, winsing, unruly altogether, and unbroken, stiff necked, deas, hardly caring either for whip or fpur; where as the other of ire, is for the most part tractable, and obeisant to the bridle of reason, yea, and ready to joyn with it in execution of good things. And like as in a chariot with two horses, the driver or chariot man is not in vertue and pulssance the middle, but rather one of the horses, which is worse than the chariot man, and better than his fellow that draweth with him : even so likewise hath not he given the middle place into that part which doth rule and govern in the foul, but unto that wherein there is less passion than in the first, and more reason than in the third : for this order and disposition observeth the proportion of the irascible to the reasonable part, as is of Diatesfaron to Hypate; and to the concupiscible, as Dipente to Nete: also of the reasonable part to the concupifeible, as Hypateto Nete, which is Dia-pason: But if we draw reason and the discourse thereof to the mean, anger shall be farther off from Just and concupifeence, which some of the Philosophers held to be one and the self-same thing, for the great similitude and resemblance between them.

Or rather, it is but a ridiculous thing to attribute unto the places, first, midst, and last, seeing (as we do) how in a harp, lute, or ftringed instrument, Hypate hath the first and highest place; but in flutes and pipes the lowest and the last : furthermore, the mean in what place soever of the harp or lute you fet it, you shall finde it foundeth always the same note still, to wit, smaller than Hypate, and bigger than Nete; for the very eye it felf hath not the fame fituation in all creatures, but in any creature, and in what place foever it is fet according to nature, always it is ordained and made for to fee. Like as therefore the Padagogue or Governour of youth, who ordinarily cometh behinde, and goeth not before his children, is not with standing faid to lead and guide them: And the Captain of the Trojans in Homer:

Who with the formost in the front. sometimes appear'd in fight, And in the reerward otherwhiles. bis men stir'd up to fight.

As well in the one part as the other, was always the chief, and had the principal power: even so we ought not to force the parts of the foul to any places or names, but to examine and fearch the power and proportion of them; for that the Discourse of reason in situation should be set in the first and principal place of mans body, falleth out accidentally : but the first and principal power it hath, as being McE or the mean, in regard of Hypate, the concupifcible part; and Nete the irafcible, by letting down and fetting up, by making confonance and accord, by taking from the one and the other that which is exceffive; and again, by not fuffering them either to be let loofe and flack alsogether, or to lie affeep; for mediocrity and a competent temperature, is limited by a mean; or rather to speak more properly, a principal piece of work this is, and a fingular gift and puiffance of reason, to make and imprint in passions, means and medicerities, if we may so say, which are called holy and sacred, consist-ing in a temperature of two extremities with reason, yea and between them both by the means of reafon : for the teem of two fleeds hath not for the mean and in the midft, that of two which is better : neither are we to imagine, that the government of them is one of the extremities; but rather we ought to think, that it is the mids and mediocrity betwint the immoderate celerity or flowness of the two flieds; like as the power of reason which holdeth in the passions when they fir without measure and reason, and by composing and framing them unto her in measurable proportion, setteth down a mediocrity and mean between too much, and over little, between excefs (I fay) and defect.

What is the reason that Plato Saith: Our speech is tempered and composed of nowns and of verbs? for he feemeth to make ne account of all other parts of speech besides these two: and to think that Homes in a gallant youthfull humor to shew his fresh wit assetted to thrust them all eight into this one werse:

and Verbs. And no man will fay that either Euripides or Thucydides wrote a fille confifting of Articles that were honely and base, or otherwise elegant and Artick.

that were noncey and date, or otherwise despite as to no purpole in our speech? Yes Iwis, say I, even How then (may some one say) serve these parts to no purpole in our speech? Yes Iwis, say I, even smuch as sakt in our meats, or water for our bread and gruel. Euenus was wont to say that fire also was an excellent kinde of sauce: and even so be these parts of speech the scanning of our language, like as fire and satt of our broths and viands, without the which we cannot well do: and yet our speech doth not always of necessity stand in need of them: for some thinks I may very well assime the Roman language, that all the world I see in manner useth at this day: for the Roman stake away all Perpositions, except a very sew; and, as for those that be called Articles, they admit not so much as one, but use their Nowns plain, and as one would say, without skirts and borders. Wherear we may wonder the left, considering that Homer, who for trim and beautiful verses surposted all other Poets, set to very sew Nowns any Articles, as cars unto Cups and other Vessels, for to take hold by, or as pennaches and cressupon morions: and thressels look in what verses he either so do, be sure they were of special mark, or else suppositions and suspected to be none of his making. As for example:

He might escape the VY bale that was in chace.

And a few others beliefes thefe. But in the reft which are innumerable, although there be no Article, yet the phrase of speech is thereby nothing diminished or hurt either in beauty or perspicuity. And thus we see, that neither living creature, if it be maimed or dissembred, nor instrument, nor armour, nor any thing in the world what soever, by the wann and defect of any proper part belonging thereto, is the more beautiful or active thereby, neither more pleasant than it was therefore: whereas a speech or sentence, when all the Conjunctions be taken quite away, is many times more emphatical, yea, and earlieth a power and efficacy more pathetical and apter to move and affect, as this.

One found, unburt, the catching fast, another wounded new,

Also this place of Demothere this Oration againft Midias: For many things may he do who striketh, whereof, fome the party who sufferecth, cannot declare unto another, in jesture, in port; by the regard of his eye, in his voice: when he wrongeth infolendly in a bravery, when he offereth injury as an enemy, when with the clutched fift, when upon the cheeks, when upon theear: this moveth, that transporteth men betide themselves, who are not acquainted with out-rages, who have not been used to bear such abuses. And again another place afterwards. But it is one this star is the transported to bear such abuses. And again another place afterwards. But it is not Midias. He from this day is a Speaker, he maketh Orations, he raileth, exclaimeth, he passed is omen that by his voice: Is there any election? Midias the Anagyrrhassan is propounded, he is not minated. Midias entertaineth Plutarch in the name of the City, he knoweth all secrets; the City is praise Agination: whereas those who are so precise, so religious, and too observant of Grammar, that they dare not leave out one Conjunction otherwise than they were accustomed to do, The faid Rhetoricians think blameworthy and to he reproved, as making the fille dull, encrease, without affection, tedition, teditions, and irksom, by reason that it runs always after one fore, without change and variety.

Now whereas Logicians have more need than any other Profession Learning of Conjunctions copulatives, for to knit and connex their propositions, or disjunctives, to disjoyn and distinguish them; like as Wain-men or Carters have need of yokes or geers; or as Ulyffes had of Oliers in Cyclops his Cave to bind his theep together: This doth not argue, nor prove that the Conjunction is a substantial member or part of speech; but a pretty inftrument and means to binde and conjoyn according as the very name of it doth import, and to keep and hold together not all words or fentences indifferently, but such alone as are not simply spoken : unless men will say, that the cord or girt wherewith a pack or fardel is bound, is a part of the faid pack, or the paste and glue a part of the Book; or Donatives and Largeffer, a part of politick Government; like as Demades was wont to fay: That the dole of money distributed by the Poll to the Citizens in the Theaters for to see the Plays, was the very glew of the popular State. And tell me what Conjunction is that which will make of many Propositions one, by couching and knitting them together, as the Marble doth unite the Iron that is cast and melced with it by the fire; and yet I trow no man will say, that the Marble, for all that, is part of the Iron, or so to be called. Howbeit, such things verily as enter into a Composition, and which be liquified together with the Drugs mingled therewith, are wont after a fore to do and fuffer reciprocally from the Ingredients. But as for these Conjunctions, there be who deny that they do unite any one thing, faying: That this manner of speaking with Conjunctions is no other but a certain enumeration, as if a man should reckon in order all our Massignates, or count the days of a

Moreover, of all other parts of speech, it is very evident, that the Pronoun is a kinde of Noun, not onely in this respect, that it is declined with cases, as the Noun is; but also for that some of them being pronounced and uttered of things and persons determinate, do make a most proper demonstration of them accordant to their nature: neither carl see how he who hath expressly named Scerates, hath declared his per more, then he who said, This man here.

A Commentary of the Creation of the Soul, which Plate describeth in his Book Timeur.

The Summary.

A stong those Discourses which may exercise the wiss, and busie the brains of most curious spirits, those A of Plato may be ranged, which in divers places of his Dislagues, but especially in his Timzun he had delivered, and namely, where he treated of nature manaphisally, intermining mith a circular deep and prosound maner of dollrine (as a man may perceive by his writings) this resolutions, as I may say, irrelates, proceeding all from the ignorance of the latried story, and true sense of Moles. As for example the which he saith as tenching the food of the world: a sain abstract and santafficial opinious, if the not handled and expounded aright. Our Author being minded in this Treatist to dispute Philosphically upon, its traitin of the said of and runnieth thorow Numbers, Innie, Times and Harmony, as well Interprival as Chiffiel, for to declare the manning of Plato: hu with such the twinty in many places, that a man had need that with both bic eyes, and to have his minde wholly intentive and immiged upon his words, for the underpacking of him. Mean while, this would be considered, being that in such maters, when we shale God by thanhill, lifetient to resolve us in the Word of God, and the good book! of the Doltors of the Church, all this mysen Discourse should be read, at comming out of the bands of a man walking in darkness, and to spece to the new word, of one binde binself, and assigning absolute in the besides of the darkness and to speak mow may of one binde binself, and assigning absolute to the chief the darkness and to speak darwing helphinities of Plato, as sometim these days do, whose heads are not said and well stitled, we might know that he higher that man in his wisdom mounters with his pen, far from God School, the less he is to be recitted and accepted of.

A Commentary of the Creation of the Soul, which Plato describeth in his Book Timaus:

The Father to his two Sons Auto Bulus and Plutarch Greeting.

Orasinuch as ye are of this minde, that whatsoever I have here and there said and written in divers places by way of exposition, touching that which I supposed in mine opinion Plate held, thought and understood concerning the soul, ought to be reduced and brought together into one; and that I should do well to declare the same at large in a special, Treatise apart by it fell, because it is not a matter which otherwise is casie to be handled and managed; as also for that feeming as it doth, somewhat contrary to most of the Platonique Philosophers themselves: in which regard it had need to be well mollified. I will therefore in the first place fet down the very Text of Pleto in his own proper terms, word for word, as I finde them written in his Book, entituled,

To begin withal, if I should discourse unto you at this present what a number of disputations and contentions debates, these words have ministred unto those who took upon them to expound the same, it were for my felf a piece of work endless, and for you who have read the most part of them together with use a labor needles Burseeing that of the most peincipal and excellent Professor, Moneratis that drawn fome unto his opinion, in defining the subflance of the foul to be a number moving it felf: and others have ranged themselves to Cranton of Soll, who affirmed the foul to be tempered of the nature intellectual, and of the other which is opinionative about objects featible; I suppose that these two feateness being well displayed and opened, will make the way, and give you an easiern these two feateness being well displayed and opened, will make the way, and give you an easiern trance to the understanding and finding of that which we feet for, and is in question. And wrily trance to the understanding and finding of that which we feet for, and is in question. And wrily the control of the one fort of them think that the control of the open the open that the control of the open that test and his Plato meaneth, nothing elfe, but the generation of number, by the faid mixture of indivifible with fectures divifible; for that unity is indivifible, and plurality divifible; of which twain is engendred and divifible for that unity is indivifible, and plurality divifible; of which twain is engendred and produced number, whiles unity doth determine plurality, and limit our an end to that which is infinite, to wit, the binary or two indeterminate: which is the reason that Zaratas the Mafter of Pyplas. goras, called two the Mother, and one the Father of number : as also, for that the better number be those which resembled unity : and yet for all that, this number is not the foul, because that both the motor and the moveable is wanting; but when the same and the other were mingled together, of which the one is the beginning of motion and mutation, the other of rest and station then cometh the foul to have a being, which is as well the principal, to flay and to be flayed, as it is to move and to be

But Crantor and his followers supposing that the proper and principal operation of the soul was to judge things intelligible and fenible, together with the fimilitudes and diffinilitudes which they have, as well themfelves, as one in respect of another, affirm, that the foul is composed of All, we the end that the may judge of all. The which All aforefaid flandeth upon four principal kinders, the fifts a nature intelligible, which is always one, and evermore after the same fex: the scoond a support of the property of the property of the same fex: the fame fex the fame fex to the fex to t nature passible and mutable concerning bodies: the third the nature of the same, and the fourth the nature of the other; for the two first participate in some fort both of the fame, and also of the other. But all thefe do joyntly and equally hold, that the foul was never after a certain time, nor ever engendred, but hath many powers and faculties, into which Plato refolving for speculative disputation fake, the substance of her, supposeth in word onely, that she was engended, mixed and tempered, saying moreover, that he thought as much of the world; for full well he knew, that eternal it was and ingenerable, but seeing it was not casie to comprehend how, and in what order it was found, composed, governed and administred, for those who at the first presupposed not the Creation and Generalion either of it felf, or of fuch things as concurred thereto, he therefore took the course to speak in

This much you fee in fum what they both do fay : which when Endorns well confidered, he thought there was good probability both in the one and the other of their opinions, but for mine own part, perswaded verily I am, that neither of them swain hath touched the point, or come neer unto the minde and meaning of Plato.

If we will use the rule of probability and verifimilitude indeed, not fully building our own proper ophions, but be willing for to fay fomething agreeable and accordant thereto; for that mix ure of the fubflance intelligible and fentible which they speak of giveth not us to understand thereby, that it is the Generation of the Soul, more then of any other thing what soever that a man may name. For the very world, and every part thereof, is compounded of a substance intelligible or spiritual, and of a fibliance fentible or corporal: whereof the one hath furnished the thing that is made and engendeed with form and shape. the other with subject nature. And as much of the matter as as form, by particination or refemblance of the intelligible, becometh incontently palpable and visible; but the foul is not pation of retember of the incidence was it ever found, that Plato called the foul number, but always amount moving of it felf, yea, the very fountain and beginning of motion. True it is, I confers, that ambellished he hath and adorned the subflance thereof with number, proportion, accord and humony, which he hath bestowed therein, as in a subject capable and susceptible of the most beautiful form that can be imprinted therein, by those qualities beforefaid. And I suppose it is not all one to any that the foul is composed by number, and that the substance thereof is number: for certain it is, that it hath the subsistance and composition by harmony, but harmony it is none, according as him-Cliftath flewed in his Treatife of the Soul. Moreover, altogether ignorant they are; what Plato meanthe by the same, and the other: for they say, that the same conferreth to the generation of the soul, the nower or faculty of flation and reft : the other, of motion; whereas Plate himself, in his Book, entimiled. The Sophister, putteth down, that which is, the fame, the other, motion and ftation, as five diffin & things differing the one from the other, fevering them apart, as having nothing to do in common one with another; which they all with one accord, yea, and many more even of those who lived and con-writed with Plate, fearing, and being mightily troubled with, do device and imagine all that they can, befit themselves, whresting forcibly, heaving and shoving, and turning every way, as in case of some abominable thing, and not to be named, supposing that they ought either altogether, for his honor and credit to deny, or at leastwife to cover and conceal that which he had delivered, as touching the emeration or creation of the world, and of the foul thereof, as if the same had not been from all nemity, nor had time out of minde their effence: whereof we have particularly fooken a part elfe where : and for this prefent fuffice it shall to say by the way, that the arguing and contestation, which Plate consessed himself to have used with more venemency then his age would bear, against Atheiss: the lame, I say, they confound and shuffle up, or to speak more truly, abolish altogether. For if it be for that the world be eternal, and was never created, the reason of Plato falleth to the ground, namely, that the foul being more ancient then the body, and the cause and principal author of all motion and mutation, the chief Governor also and head Architect, as he himself hath said, is placed and beflowed therein. But what, and whereof the foul is, and how it is faid, and to be underflood, that is ismore ancient then the body, and before it in time, the progrefs of our discourse hereaster shall declare: for this point being either unknown, or not well understood, brings great difficulty, as I think, in the well conceiving, and hinderence in believing the opinion of the truth? In the first place therefore, I will shew what mine own conceit is, proving and fortifying my sentence, and withal, mollifying the same (because at the first fight it seemeth a strange Paradox) with sprobable reasons as I can devise: which done, both this interpretation and proof also of mine, I will lay unto the words of the Text out of Plato, and reconcile the one unto the other. For thus (in mine opinion) stands the case.

This world (quoth Heraclitus) there was never any god or man that made: as if in so saying he stand, that if we disavow God for Creator, we must of necessity confess, that a man was the architect and maker thereof. But much better it were therefore, that we subscribe unto Plate, and both fav and fing aloud, that the world was created by God: for as the one is the goodlieft piece of work that ever was made, so the other the most excellent workman, and greatest cause that is. Now the subflance and matter whereof it was caeated, was never made or engendred, but was for ever, time out of minde, and from all eternity, subject unto the workman for to dispose and order it, yea, and to make as like as possible was to himself. For of nothing, and that which had no being, there could not polible be made ought: but of that which was not well made, nor as it ought to be there may be made formwhat that is good; to wit, anhoufe, a garment, or an image or flatue. But before the creation of the world, there was nothing but a Chao; that is to fay, all things in confusion and disorder: and yet was not the same without a body, without motion, or without foul: howbeit, that body which is had, was without form and confiftence; and that moving that it had, was altogether rath, without reason and understanding: which was no other but a disorder of soul not guided by reason. For God trated not that body which was incorporal, nor a foul which was inanimate; like as we say that the Musician maketh not a voyce, nor the Dancer motion; but the one maketh the voyce sweet, accordant and hasmonious; and the other, the motion to keep measure, time, and compass, with a good grace. And even so, God created not that palpable folidity of a body, nor that moving and inaginative puissance of the soul; but finding these wo principles, the one dark and obscure, the other turbulent, soolish and senseless: both imperfect, disordered, and indeterminate, he so digested and disposed them, that he composed of them the most goodly, beautiful and absolute litting creature that is. The substance then of the body, which is a certain nature that he calleth susceptible creature that it. Incluments that of the state of all things agendred, is no other thing then this. But of all things, the very feat, the nouricallo of all things agendred, is no other thing the nine that the folly he tearment it in his Book, entituled, Philoban, Infinity, that at touching the fubflance of the folly he tearment it in his Book, entituled, Philoban, Infinity, that as touching the touristic of the lower and proportion, having in it neither end, limit, nor mediure, is to fay, the privation of all number and proportion, having in it neither end, limit, nor mediure, seek nor defect, neither fimilitude nor diffimilitude. And that which he delivereth in Timen, namely, that it is mingled with the indivifible nature, and is become indivifible in bodies, we must namely, that it is simple to be either multitude in unities, or length and breadth in points or pricks, which not understand this to oc eitner mattaue in annues or engage and stant in points or pricks, which things agree unto bodies, and belong rather to bodies then to fouls; but that moving principle, dif-ordinate, indefinite, and moving of it fell, which he calleth in many places, Necessity, the fame in ordinate, indefinite, and moving of it fell, which he calleth in many places, Necessity, the fame in books of Laws, he termeth directly, a difforderly foul, wicked and evil doing. This is the foul fimply, and of it felf it is fo called; which afterwards was made to participate understanding, and discourse of reason, yea, and wise proportion, to the end that it might become the soul of the world Semblably, this material principle, capable of all, had in it a certain magnitude, diffance, and place : beauty, form, proportionate figure, and measure it had none; but all these it gat afterwards, to the end that being thus digested and brought into decent order, it might afford the bowards, to the chu that being that being the day, the heavens, the flars, the plants and living creature, of dies and organs of the carth, the fea, the heavens, the flars, the plants and living creature, of all forts. But as for them who attribute and give that which he calleth in Timeus, Necessity; and in his Treatife Philebus, Infinity and Immensity of excess and defect of too much and too little; unto matter, and not unto the foul: how are they able to maintain that it is the cause of evil, considering that he supposeth always, that the faid matter is without form and figure whatsover, defitute of all qualities and faculties proper unto it, comparing it unto those oyle, which having no fmell of their own, Perfumers use in the composition of their odors and precious syntments: for imnment then own terminated in the most of the things, which of it felf is idle, without active quality, without moving and inclination to any thing, to be the cause and beginning of evil, or name it an infinity, wicked and evil doing; nor likewife a necessity, which in many things repugneth against God, as being rebellious, and refusing to obey him: for as touching that necessity, which overthroweth heaven, as he faith in his Politiques, and turneth it clean contrary; that inbred concupifcence and confusion of the first and ancient nature, wherein there was no order at all, before it was ranged to that beautiful disposition of the world, as now it is; how came it among things, if the subject, which is matter, was without all qualities, and void of that efficacy which is in causes? and confidering that the Creator himself being of his own nature all good, defired as much as might be, to make all things like unto himfelf? for a third, besides these two principles, there is none. And if we will bring evil into the world, without a precedent cause and principle to beget it, we shall run and fall into the difficult perplexities of the Stoicks; for of those two principles which are, it cannot be that either the good, or that which is altogether withous form and quality whatsoever, should give being or beginning to that which is naught. Neither hath Plate done, as some that came after him, who for want of seeing and understanding a third principle and cause, between God and matter, have run on end, and tumbled into the most absurd and falsest reasons that is, deviling, forsooth, I wot not how, that the nature of evil should come without forth casually, and by accident, or rather of the own accord: forasmuch as they will not grant unto Episurus that the least Atome that is, should turn never fo little, or decline afide, faying, that he bringeth in a rafh and inconfiderate motion, without any cause precedent: whereas they themselves the mean while affirm, that fin, vice, wickednels, and ten thousand other deformities and imperfections of the body, come by consequence without any cause efficient in the principles. But Plato saith not so, for he ridding matter from all different quality, and removing far from God all cause of evil, thus hath he written as touching the world in his Politiques: The world (quoth he) received all good things from the first author who created it; but what evil thing (oever there is, what wickedness, what injustice in heaven, the same it self hath from the exterior habitude, which was before, and the same it doth transmit, and give to the creatures beneath. And a little after he proceedeth thus: In tract of time (quoth he) as oblivion took hold, and fet fure footing, the passion and impersection of the old disorder came in place, and got the upperhand more and more; and great danger there is, left growing to diffolution, it be plunged again into the valt gulf, and bottomless pit of confused dissimilitude.

But diffimilitude there can be none in matter, by reason that it is without quality, and void of all difference: whereof Eudemus, among others, being ignorant, mocked Plato for not putting that to be the cauce, Gource, and first original of evil things, which in many places he callet mother and nurse: For Plato indeed termeth matter, mother and nurse; but he saith likewise, That the cause of evil is the motive putssance resiant in the said matter, which is in bodies become divisible, to wit, a reasonless and disorderly motion: howbeit, for all that, not without soul, which plashly and expressly in his books of Laws, he termeth a soul, contrary and repugnant to that which is the cause of all good; for that the soul may well be the cause and principle of motion; but understanding is the cause of order and harmony in motion: for God made not the matter idle, but hath kept is from being any more disquieted and troubled with a solid and and cause: neither hath he given unto nature the beginnings and principles of mutations and passions, but being, as it were, enwapped and enfolded with all sorts of passions and inordinate mutations, he cleared it of all enormities, disorders, and errors whatsoever, using as proper instruments to bring about all this, numbers, measures, and proportions; the effect whereof, is not io give unto things, by moving and mutation the paffions and differences of the other and of diversity, but rather to make them infallible, firm, and flable, yea, and like unto those things which are always of one fort, and evermore resemble themselves.

This is in my judgement the minde and fentence of Plato, whereof my principal proof and argument is this, That by this interpretation is falved that contrariety which men fay, and feemeth is deed to be in his writings: for a man would not attribute unto a drunken Sophister, much less then unto Plate, fo great unconstance and repugnance of words, as to affirm one and the same name to created, and uncreated: and namely in his book entituled Phedrus, that the soul is eternal, and uncreated; but in Timeus, that it was created and engendred. Now as touching those words of his the Treatise Phadrus, they are all well near in every mans mouth very rife, whereby he proveth, that the foul cannot periff, because it was never engendred and semblably he proveth, that generation it had none, because it moveth it self. Again, in the book entituled Timeus, God (quoth het) hath not made the foul to be yonger then the body, according as now in this place we purpose to say, that it cometh after it, for never would he have permitted that the elder being courled and linked with the yonger, should be commanded by it. But we standing much (I wot not how) upon inconfiderate rashness ann vanity, use to speak in some fort accordingly: for certain it is, that God hath with the body joyned the foul, as precedent both in creation, and also in power and vertue, like as the Dame or Mistress with her subject, for to rule and command. Again, when he had faid that the foul being surned upon herfelf, began to live a wife and eternal life: The body of the heaven (quoth he) was made vifible, but the foul invisible, participating the difcourse of reason, and of harmony, engendred by the best of things intellectual and eternal, being likewise it self the best of things angendred and temporal. Where it is to be noted, that in this place expresly calling God the best of all eternal things, and the foul the best of things created and temporal, by this most evident antithefis and contrariety, he taketh from the foul that eternity which is without beginning and pro-

And what other folution or reconciliation is there, of these contradictions, but that which himfelf givetheo those who are willing to receive it; for he pronounceth that foul to be ingenerable and procreated, which moved all things rashly and disorderly before the constitution of the world; but contrariwise he calleth that, procreated and engendred, which God framed and composed of the fift, and of a permanent, eternal, and perfect good substance, namely, by creating it wife and well ordered, and by putting and conferring even from himfelf unto fense, understanding, and order unto motion: which when he had thus made, he ordained and appointed it to be the Governor and Regent of the whole world. And even after the fame manner he pronounceth, that the body of the world is in one fort eternal, to wit, not created, nor engendred; and after another fort both created and engendred. For when he faith, that whatfoever is visible, was never at rest, but moved rashly and without all order: and that God took the same, disposed and ranged it in good order; stalfo when he faith, that the four general elements, fire, water, earth, and air, before the whole world was of them framed and ordered decently made a wonderful trouble and trembling, as it were, in the matter, and were mightily shaken by it, such was their deformity and inequality. It appeareth plainly that he maketh these bodies in some fort to have a being and sublistence before the creation of the world. Contrariwise, when he saith, that the body is yonger then the soul, and that the world was made and created in as much as the fame is visible and palpable, as having a body, and that all things appear to as they are, when they were once made and created, manifest it is, and every man may fee, that he attributeth a kinde of nativity to the nature of the body; and yet for all that, far is he off, from being contradictory and repugnant to himself so notoriously, and that in the most main points. For it is not the same body nor of the same fort, which he saith was created by God, and to have been before it was; for that were directly the case of some Mountebank or jugling Enchanter; buthimfelf the weth unto us, what we are to understand by this, generation or creation: For before time (quoth he) all that is in the world, was without order, measure and proportion; but after that the univerfal world began to be fashioned, and brought into some decent form, whereas he found the fire first, the water, the earth, and the ayr pell mell in the same places, and yet having some shew and token whatchey were, but confusedly hudled every where (as a man may well think that every thing must needs be fo, where God is absent) in this case as they were then, God, I say, finding them, fust brought the same into frame and fashion, by the means of forms and numbers. Furthermore, having said before that it was not work not of one onely proportion, but of twain, to joyn and frame together the fabrick of the world, a folid mais, as it was, and carrying a depth and thickness with it : and declared moreover, that God after he had bestowed water and ayr, between fire and earth, conjoyned withal and framed the heaven, together with them. Of these things (quoth he) such as they were, and sour in number, the body of the world was engendred, agreeable in proportion, and entertaining amity by that means: Infomuch as being once thus united and compact, there is nothing that can make difunion or diffolution, but he alone who first limitted and brought altogether; teaching us hereby most plainly that God was the Father and Author, not of the body simply, nor of the frame, fabrick and matter onely of the world, but also of that proportion, measure, beauty and similitude which is in the body thereof : semblably thus much we are to think of the foul, as if one were not created by God, northe foul of the world, but a certain power of motion, fantastical, turbulent, subject unto opinion, fliring and moving of it felf, and always, but without any order, measure, or reason whatsover. EZ:

The other, when God had adorned it with numbers and propositions convenients, he ordained to be the Regent and Governess of the world, created like as it clif was also created. Now that this is the tru: sentence and meaning of Plato, and not by a santastical maner of speculation and inquisition, as reuching the Creation or Generation, as well of the world as of the soul: this, besides many others, may be an argument, that of the soul, he saith it was exeared and not created: of the world always, that it was engendred and created, but never eternal and not created. To prove this, we need not for to cite testimonies out of the Book Timeus, considering that the said Book throughout, from the one end to the other, treated of nothing else, but of the Centration or creation of the world. And of other books, in his Aslantick Timeus making his prayers, nameth him who beforetime was by his work, and now by his word, God. And in his Politique, his Paramentian guest saith, that the world being framed and made by God, became partaker or many good things: and in east three beany evil thing in it, the same is a remnant mingled within the first habitude and estate wherein it was at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his Books of twas at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his Books of twas at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his Books of twas at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his Books of twas at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his Books of twas at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his Books of twas at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and engendred, but the world.

The first copulation is of one and two, the second of three and four, the third of sive and fix; of which there is not one that maketh a quadrate number either by it felly or by others: the forthis of seven and eight, which being joyned to the first, make in all the square quadrat number six and thirty.

But of those numbers which Plate hath set down the quaternary, hath a more perset and absolute generation; namely, when even numbers are multiplied by even intervals, and ineven numbers likewise by odde intervals : for first it containeth unity as the very common flock of all numbers as well even as odde, and of those under it; two and three be the first flat and plain numbers, and after them four and nine are the first squares, then follow eight and seven and twenty, the first cubique numbers, putting the unity out of this account. By which is appeared that his will was not, that these subsers should be all set one above another directly in a right line; but apart, one after another alternatively, the even of the one side, and the odd of the other, according to the description above made. Thus shall the siles or conjugations also be of like with like, and make the notable numbers, as well by composition or addition, as by multiplication of one with another: by composition, thus, Two and there make five; so or and nine make thirteen; eight and seven and twenty arise to seven and therey arise to five and thirty. For of these numbers the Pythagorean call size, repire, as much to say, as a sound, supposing that of the spaces and intervals of Tone, the firs, was the first that space or sounded thirteen they sentent was proceeding from even and odder of the four numbers, to wis, fix, sight, nine and twelve, containing an Arithmetical and Harmonical proportion. But this wil appear more evidently by this figure here described and represented to the eyes. Suppose them there be a figure set down in form of or a tile, called Paraulesgrammon, with right angles, A.B.C.D.

Whereof the one fide (to wie, the left) A. B. is of five; the biller, and maniely, the longer, A. D. isof the leven parts: let the lefs fi le be divided into unequal fections, to wit, two and three, three and E. and the greater into other two unequal fections, there and four to F; then draw lines from the fections, crofting directly one another, by E. G. H. and F. G. I. So'A. E. G. F. Mall being, A. B. I. G. nin: G. H. D. F. eight, and G. I. C. H. twelve. This tile form figure called Paralleling rammins, being more long then broad, compaffed of five and thirty parts, containeth in it all the proportion of the first accords and confonances of Musick in the number of the spaces lifte which It is divided. For fix and eight have the proportion Epitritos, to wit, the whole and one third part; wherein confifteill the frynchosty Distriture, that is to fay, a fourth. Six and nine carry the proportion Hemiolion; to wit, the wisle and hill; and therein conflicts Dispone, that is to fay, a fifth. Between the and twelve there is the double proportion, and therein conflicts Dispolo, that it to fay, are eighth. There is allowed proportion of Tone feeq nioctave, in nine and eight, which is the reason that the number five and thirty containing the proportions of Tones, the confonances also and accorde; they call Harmony, which being multiplied by fix, arifeth to two hundred and ten, the very just number of days wherein feren moneth children have their perfection in the womb, and are ready to be born. Item, go to work afformer way, and begin by multiplication in this wife, Twice three make fix, and four times nine come toux and thirty, and leven and twenty multiplied by eight, arifeth to two hundred and fixeen. Now theperfect number is fix, for that it ftandeth of equal parts, and in regated of the copulation of even and odde it is called the Murslage. Again, that which is more, it conflicts of the beginning and fried it is not of number, to wit, Unity or O te, of the first even number which is two, and of the first and odden unber that is three. Moreover, six and thirty is the first number both sour square and also thingular. Four-fquare, if it arife from the bufis, fix, and triangular, from eight: for it arifeth by multiplication of two quidrate numbers, to wit, of four, multiplying mine; and by addition of the cubes, one, eight, and leven and twenty, which being out together, make up fix and thirty the number before delectibed. Furthermore, it may be drawn out in form of a tile, more one way then adoute from the two fides, and article by multiplying twelve by three, or nine by four. Now if a minake the numbers of the fides in those figures before described, to wit, fix of the four-furare, and eight of thetriangle; nine of one of Perallelograms, and twelve of the other; he shall finde that they will make the proportions of all the lymphonies or accords in Mulick. For twelve compared with nine, will b. Diatefficon, or the fourth, which is the proportion that Nete hatheto Meles but compared with eight, it is a Diapente, or a fifth, the proportion of Mele or the Mean to Hypates with twelve, it will be Diapalon, or a just eighth, which is the proportion between Nete and Hypate. As for the number of two itundeed and fixteen, it is a cubique, arifing from fix, as the bails, and is equal to the own compute or circuit. These numbers proposed, having such vertues and properties, yet the the feven and twenty hath this peculiar quality by it felf, that it is equal unto all the other before it, being that consider in untilly, one, two, three, four, eight, and nine. Moreover, it contained the just make the days of the Moons revolution. The Pythagoreans also do place the Tone of distances and intervals of founds in this very number, which is the reason that they call 13 λώμμα, as one would fay, the default, for that it wanteth one of being the half of twenty feven. Moreover, that these numbers contain the proportions of all the consonances and accords in Mulick, it is easie to be migritud; for there is the proportion double of two to one, and therein conflicts Diapaton; the Hadiolion or one and half of three to two, wherein is Diapate: likewife Epitritos, of four to three, and therein confisteth Diatesfiron : also the triple of nine and three, wherein you shall finde Diapafor an ID apince, to wit, a fift above a duple. Item, the quadruple of eight and two wherein is Dis diapsion. There is belides, the fesquioctive, of eight to nine, wherein is Tonizon, If then a man count the unity which is common unto the numbers as well even as odde unto four, the whole yieldeth ten: and the even numbers between it and ten, with the unity being put together make fricen, a number triangular, arising from the basis five: as for the odde numbers, to wit, one, three, nine, and twenty seven arise to forty, if they be summed together, and this number of forty is composed of thirteen and twenty feven by which the Mathematicians do precifely measure the intervals of musick & malody in fong, calling the one Diche, and the other Tonos: and the faid number of forty arifeth by way multiplication, by the vertue of quaternity; for if you multiply four times every one of the four first, whereas by themselves to wit, one, two, three, four, there will arise tour, eight, twelve, and fixteen, which being all summed together, make forty; which number containeth besides, all the proteen, which deing all tummed together; make totally which industry contained befores, all the proportions of confonances and accords: for compare fixitien with twelve, you find flut have the proportion Epitritos, that is to fay, one and the third part, with eight duple, with four quadruple; allo twelve compared to eight, hath the proportion Hemiolion, that is to fay, one and a half, to four triple, which comprehend the proportions just of Diateflaron, Diapente, Diapadon, and Dia-diapadon; Over and besides, the foresaid numbes of forty, is equal to the first two quadrats, and the two first cubick numbers taken together, for the two first squares or quadrats be one and four, the cubicks eight and twenty feven, which if they be put together, amount to forty: So that the quaternity of Plato is in the disposition thereof more ample, of greater variety and perfection then that quaternity of

But forasmuch as the numbers proposed, afford not places for the medicties which are inserted, neceffary it was to extend the numbers to larger tearms and bonds, retaining fill the fame preportions: in regard whereof, we must say somewhat what they be, and treat first of these medicties. The former then, is that which both furmounting, and being also surmounted in equal number, is called in these days Arithmetical: the other which surmounteth, and is surmounted by the same part of their extremities, is named Hypenania, that is to fay, subcontrary; as for example, The two limits or extremities, and the midst of the arithmetical, be fix, nine, and twelve: for nine, which is in the midft, furmounteth fix just as much in number as it is furmounted of twelve, that is to fay, by three: but of the subcontrary, these be the extremities and the mids, six, eight, and twelve, for eight, which is the mide, furmounteth fix by two, and is furmounted of twelve by four, which four is the chird part of twelve, like as two is the third part of fix. Thus it falleth out in the mediety Arithmetical, the mids furmounteth the one of these extremities, and is surmounted of the other, equally by the same part of the own; but in the subcontrary by the same part, not of the own, but of the extremities out gone of the one, and outgoing the other: and hereupon it is called subcontrary, and the same they likewise call harmonical, because it affordeth to she extremities the first resonances, to wit, between the greatest and the least Diapason, that is to say, an eight; between the greatest and the mids, Diapente, that is to fay, a five; and between the mids and the leaft, Diatefferon, that is to fay, a fourth: for the greatest tearm or extremity being set upon the note or string Nete, and the least upon Hypate, the mids will be found just upon Mcle, that is to fay, the mean, which maketh in regard of the greatest Diapente, and of the leaft Diateffaron : so that by this reason, eight shall be upon the mean, twelve upon Nete, and fix upon Hypate: but how to know eafily and readily these medicities aforesaid, Endorus hash shewed the maner plainly and simply. And first and formost in the Arithmetical, consider thus much: for if you take the two extremities, and put them together, and then the moyetic of the entire fum, the fame will fall out to be the mediety Arithmetical: or take the moyetic of each one of the extremities, and adde them one to the other, that which arifeth thereof shall be mediaty Arithmetical, in duples and triples alike: but in the subcontrary, or harmonical, if the two extremities be one to the other in proportion duple, take the half of the greater, and the third part of the left, and the number ariling of those two shall be the medicty Harmonical: but in case the two extremities be in proportion triple, then contrariwise a man ought to take the moyetie of the less, and the third part of the greater, for then the sum will be the mediety that he looketh for : as for example, let the less extremity be in triple proportion fix, and the greater eighteen, if you take the half of fix, which is three, and the third part of eighteen, which is fix, you shall come to nine, for the mediety which doth furmount, and is furmounted by the fame part of the two extremities, that is to fay, the one half. Thus you fee how the medicties are taken: now the same must be interjected and placed between, for to fill and make up the places or intervals double and triple; but of the number proposed, some have no place of the middle, others, not sufficient; and therefore the maner is to augment and set them out, in retaining always still the same proportion, and so by that means make places and receptacle sufficients for to receive the faid medicties or mediocrities : First therefore, for the less end or extremity, in stead of onelthey put fix, because of all numbers it is the first that hath a half and a third, and multiply all the numbers und r by fix, as it is written underneath, for to receive both the medicties in duple in-

12. 2. 3. 18. 27. 16 2.

And as for that Plato hath faid, the intervals being made (efquialteral, fefquitertis, and fefquioctaves, out of these links in the precedent distances, he filled all the epitrites, with the interval of fequioctaves, leaving one part of each, and this diffance of this part being left number to number, having for the tearms and extremities, two hundred fifty fix, and two hundred forty three, &c. Upon these words of the text, forced they were to reduce these numbers, and make them greater, for by order two ought to have fefquioctave proportion, seeing that fix of it self could not have proportion sefquioctave, and if it were divided by cutting the units piece-meal, the intelligence and doctrene thereof would be very intricate and hard to be conceived, therefore he called this operation in some fore multiplication, like as in the harmonical mutation, where if you extend and augment the first number, necessarily the description of all the other notes must be stretched out and enlarged likewise. And therefore Endorus following herein Crantor, taketh for the first number three hundred four score and fourwhich arifeth by multiplying threefcore and four, by fix : and thefe were induced fo to do by the number three core and four, having for the felquioctave, eight, which is the proportion between threefore and four, and three-score and twelve, But it agreeth better with the Text, and the words of Plate, to suppose a moyety. For the default which they call Aspure, will have the sesquioctave proportion in the numbers which Plate hath fet down, two hundred fix and fifty, and two hundred three and forty, having put for the first one hundred fourscore and twelve : and it the double of it be suppoled for the first, the Annua shall be of the same proportion, but in number double, which five hundred and twelve hath to four hundred eighty four : for two hundred fifty and fix are in epitrite or felquitertial proportion to one hundred fourfcore and twelve, and five hundred and twelve to four hund dred four core and four. And verily, the reduction to this number was not without reason and proportion, but yielded a propable reason to Crantor: for the number of threescore and four is a cube; proceeding from the first quadrate, and a quadrate likewise, arising from the first cube, and being multiplied by three, the first odde number : the first triangular number, the first perfect number and fefquialter, make one hundred fourfcore and twelve, which number also (as we will shew) hath his terquioctave. But first of all you shall understand better what is he meaning of Plato, if you call to minde a little, that which is usually taught and delivered in the Pythagoreans Schools: for Diaftema, that is to fay, intervals or space in matter of song, is whatsoever is between two founde different in Tenor or Tenfion. Of these intervals, one is called Tomes, to wit, that whereof the harmony Diapente surmounteth Diatessaron. Of this entire Tone, as Musicians do hold, cut in twain, by the movety are made two intervals, and both of them, the one as well as the other, go under the name Hemitonium. But the Pythagoreans do not think that it can be equally divided : whereas therefore the two fexions be unequal, they call the lefs Alfippea, that is to fay, the default, because it is somewhat lefsthen the one half. And therefore some Masters of Musick there be, who make the accord Diatesfieron, of two Tones and a Demi-tone or Hamitonion ; others again of two Tones and a higher. So as it fremeth that the testimony of hearing accordeth with the harmonical Musicians; and of demonstration with the Mathematicians : and their proof of demonstration goeth in this manner. This is put down by them for certain, and approved by their influments, that Diapason bath a double proportion, Diapente a sesquialteral, Diatessaron a sesquitertial, and a Tone a sesquioctave. And the truth hercof, a man may try presently by an experiment, namely, by hanging two weights double, unto two fittings that be equal, or by making two concavities in pipes, the one twice as long as the other, otherwife equal: for the Shawme or Hautboys, which is the longer, will found more base and loud, as Hypate in regard of Nete: and of the two strings, that which was stretched by the heavier weight will found higher and smaller, as Nete in comparison of Hypate: and this is the very consonance Diapafon. Semblably, three compared unto twain, be it in length or in weight, will make Diapente; and four to three, Diateffaron : for the one hath the proportion epitrite, and the other hemiolion. And if the unequality of the forefaid lengths or weights be in proportion hemioclave, that isto fay, of feven to eight, it will make the interval Toniaon, not altogether an harmonical accord. howbeit (as one would fay) fomewhat muficul and melodious; for that thefe founds, if one firike, touch or found one after another, make a pleasant noise, and delectable to the ears; but if altogether, the noise will be troublesome and offensive: whereas contrariwise, in consonances and accords, howfoever one touch them, either together, or one after another, the ear receiveth the confent, and accord with great delight. And yet this may moreover be shewed by reason, for the harmony Diapafon is composed of Diapente, and of Diatessaron, like as in number the double is composed of Hemiolion and Epitritos; for twelve is in proportion of Epitritos to nine, and Hemiolion to eight, and double to fix: fo that the double proportion is compounded of the sesquialteral and the sesquitertion, like as Diapason of Diapente and Diatessaron: but as there Diapente is greater then Diatessaron; by a Tone, so here in numbers, Hemiolion is greater then Epitritos by a fefquioctave. This being thus proved by demonstration, let us seenow, whether our sesquioctave may be divided into two equal fections; for if it cannot, no more then, can the Tone; and for that eight and nine make the first proportion sesquioctave, and have no interval between; both the one and the other being doubled, the number falling out between, maketh two intervals; so that it appeareth, shat if the two intervals be equal, the lefquioctave may be equally divided in twain. Now the double of nine is eighteen, and of eight, fixteen, which admit between them, seventeen. So it falleth out, that one of the intervals is greater, and the other less; for the former is of eighteen to seventeen, and the other of seventeen to fixteen. Then the sesquioctave proportion is divided into portions and sections unequal, and so consequently the tone also; and therefore this division being made, none of the sections is properly a D.mytone, but one of them by good right hath been termed by the Mathematicians λώμμα: and this is it that Plato faid : God when he filled the epitrites with sesquioctaves, left a portion of each: whereof there is the same reason and proportion, that two hundred fifty fix, have unto two hundred forty three; for take a Diateffaron in two numbers, which have between them a pro-Portion Epitrites, as two hundred fifty and fix, to one hundred ninety two; of which let, the lefs number, one hundred ninety two befor upon the base note of a tetracord, & the greater, to wit, two hundred fifty and fix upon the highest note : It must be showed, that if this be filled with two sesquioctaves, there remaineth an interval as great as is between two hundred fifty fix and two hundred forty three. For if the pater found be treetched one tone; which is the proportion fesquioctave, it maketh two hundred and fixteen : andagain, it it be ftretched another tone, it becometh two hundred forty three, which furmounteth two hundred and fixteen, by twenty and feven, and two hundred and fixteen furmounteth one hundred fourfcore and twelve by four and twenty, of which, the feven and twenty is the fefquioclave of two hundred and fixteen, and four and twenty, of one hundred feurscore and twelve: and therefore of these three numbers, the greatest sesquioctave is of the middle, and the middle of the least; and the diffance or interval, from the leaft to the greatest, to wit, from one hundred fourscore and ewelve, unto two hundred forty and three, two tones filled with two fefquioctaves : which interval being taken away, there remaineth the interval of the whole, which is between two hundred forty and three, and two hundred fifty and fix, and that is thirteen: and that is the reason why they called that number Augus, marino 149, a cream of For mine own part, I think verify that the fenfe of Plato is most clearly expounded and declared in these numbers. Others having put down the ends and tearms of Diatesferon, for the treeble two hundred eighty eight, and for the base, two hundred fixteen; go through with the rest proportionably, fave onely that they take the two defaults or remnants, between the two extremities: for the bale being fet up one tone or note, maketh, swo hundred forty three: and the treeble being let down another note, becometh two hundred fifty fix: for thefe be fesquioctaves, two hundred forty threes and two hundred fixten; likewife two hundred eighty eight, and two hundred fifty fix; fo that either of the intervals is Tonizon; and there remaineth that which is between two hundred forty three, and two hundred fifty fix, which is not a Demytone, but less: for two hundred eighty eight, is more then two hundred fifty fix. by thirty two; and two hundred forty three, more then two hundred fixteen, by twenty feven; and two hundred fifty fix, more then two hundred forty three, by thirteen; and both these are lesser then the advantages or surplussages by half: and therefore Diatessaron is sound to be of two tones and a safepas, and not of two and a half. And thus you fee the demonstration of this: and so it is no hard matter to understand by that which we have delivered, what is the reason why Plate having faid, that intervals sesquialteral, sesquitertian and sesquioctaves are made by filling the sesquitertians with sesquioctaver; made no mention of the sesquialterons, but hath left them behinde, namely, for that the fesquialter is filled, when one patteth a sesquioctave to a sesquitertial, or rather a sesquiterce to a sesquioctave.

These things thus shewed in some fort by way of demonstration; now to fill the intervals, and to interject the medicties, if none before had shewed the means and manner how, I would leave you to do it for your exercise; but the same having been done already by many worthy personages, and principally by Crantor Clearchus, and Theodorus, all born in the City Seli: It will not be impertinent to deliver somewhat as touching the difference between them; for Theodorus maketh not two files of numbers as the other do, but rangeth them all in the same line directly one after another, to wit, the duple and the triple : and principally he groundeth and fortifieth himself by this polition (which they fo call) of the substance drawn out in length, making two branches, as it were from one trunk, and not four of twain : Then he faith, that the interpolitions of the medicties ought fo to take place; for otherwise there would be a trouble and confusion: and anon passifich immediately from the first duple to the first triple, when they should be that which ought to fulfil the one and the other. On the other fide, there maketh for Cranton, the position and situation of plain numbers with plain, squares with squares, and cubet with cubes, which are set one against another in opposite files, not according to

Here is a breach in which is of one fort as Idea or form; but that which is divided by bodies, is the subject and the matter; and the mixture of them both in common, is that which is compleat and perfect.

As touching then the substance indivisible, which is always one, and of the same fort; we are not shus to think, that it admitteth no division for the fmalness thereof, like to those little bodies called Atomi: but that of it which is simple, pure, and most subject to any passion or alteration whatsoever, always like it felf, and after one manner, is faid to be indivifible, and to have no parts; by which fimplicity, when it cometh to touch in some fort, such things as be compounded, divisible, and carried to and fro, it caufeth that diverfity to cease, restraineth that multitude, and by means of similitude, reduceth them to one and the same habitude. And if a man be disposed to call that which is divisible by bodies, matter, as subject unto it, and participating the nature thereof, using a certain homonymie or equivocation, it mattereth not much, neither skilleth it as touching the thing in question: but those who would have the corporal matter to be mixed with the indivisible substance, be in a great errour: first, because Plato hith not now used any names thereof, for that he hath evermore used to call it a receptacle to receive all; and a nurse, not divisible by bodies, but rather a body divided into individual particulars. Again, what difference would there be, between the generation of the world, and of the foul, if the conflitution of the one and the other, did confift of matter and things intelligible?

Certes, Plato him felf, as one who would in no wife admit the foul to be engendred of the body, faith, That God put all that which was corporal within her; and then, that without forth the fame was enclosed round about with it: In sum, when he had framed and finished the soul according to proportion, he inferreth and annexeth afterwards a Treatife of Matter, which before when he handled the creation of the foul, he never required nor called for, because created it was without the help of

The like to this may be faid by way of confutation against Posidonius and his Sectaries; for very far they went not from matter, but imagining that the substance of terms and extremities, was that which he called divifible by bodies, and joyning with the intelligible, they affirmed and pronounced, that the foul is the Idea of that which is diffant every way, and in all the dimensions, according to the number which containeth harmony, which is very erronious: For the Mathematicks (quoth he) are fituate between the first intelligible and fenfible things: but the foul having of intelligible things an eternal effence, and of fenfible objects, a passible nature : therefore meet it is that it should have amiddle substance between both. But he was not ware, that God after he had made and finished the foul, used the bounds and terms of the body, for to give a form to the matter, determining the subflance thereof dispersed, and not linked or contained within any limits, by environing it with superheies, composed of triangles, all joyned together. And yet more absurd then that it is, to make the foul an Idea, for that the foul is always in motion; but the Idea is immoveable, neither can the Idea be mixed with that which is sensible, but the soul is always linked fast with the body: besides, God did imitate Idea as one who followed his patern; but he wrought the foul as his piece of work: And that Plato held the foul not to be a number, but rather a thing ordained by number, we have already shewed and declared before.

But against both these opinions and their patrons, this may be opposed in common: That neither in numbers nor in terms and limits of bodies, is there any apparence or flew of that puissance, whereby the foul judgeth of that which is sensible; for the intelligence and faculty that it hath, was drawn from the participation and fociety of the intelligible principle : But opinions, beliefs, affents, imaginations, also to be passive and sensitive of qualities inherent in bodies, there is no man will think that they can proceed from unities, pricks, lines, or superficies : and yet not onely the fouls of mortal m:n have the power to judge of all the exterior qualities perceptible by the senses; but also the very soul of the world, as Plate saith, when it returnesh circularly into hersels, and soucheth any thing that bath a substance dissipable and apt to be dispersed; as also when it meeteth with ought that is indivisible, by moving herself totally, she telleth in what respect any thing is the same, and in what regard divers and different; whereto principally each thing is meet, either to do or to fuff r. where, when, and how it is affected, as well in such as are engendred, as in those that are always the fame. Moreover, making a certain description with all of the ten predicaments, he declareth the fame more clearly afterwards: True reason (quoth he) when it meeteth with that which is sensible, and if therewith the circle of the other goeth directly to report the same, throughout the whole soul thereof, then there be engendred opinions and beliefs that befirm and true : but when it is converfant about that which is intelligible and discoursing by reason, and the Circle likewise of the same, turning roundly with facility, doth flew the same, then of necessiry there is bred perfect and accomplished Science : and in what foever these swo things be infused , if a man call is otherwise then foul, he saith any thing rather then the stuth: whence cometh it then that the foul had this motion opinative, which comprehendeth that which is sensible, divers and different from the other intellective that endeth in Science? Hard it were to fee this down, unless a man firmly prefuppose that in this place, and at this prefen, he composets not the soul samples but the soul of the world, with the parts above mentioned, of a better substance, which is indivisible; and of a worse, that he calleth divisible by bodies; which is nothing elfe, but an imaginative and opinionative motion, affected and accordant to that which is fentible, not engendred, but as the other, of an eternal substitutes for nature having the intellectual vertue, had also the faculty opinionative: but the intellective power is unmoveable, impassible, founded and fer upon that substance, which abideth always in one fort: whereas the other is divibble and wandring, in as much as it toucheth a matter that is always floting, carried to and fro, and diffigable. For the matter sensible had before time no order at all, but was without all form, bound or limitation what foever, and the faculty therein had neither express opinions, articulate and diffinet, nor her motious all certain and composed in order: but for the most pare resembling turbulent and vain dreams, troubling that which was corporal, unless haply they fell upon any thing that was bet-ter. For between two it was, having anature conformable, and accordant to the one and the other: challer ging matter by that which is sensitive, and by the judicial part those things which are intelligible. And this declareth he himfelf in these proper terms: By my reckoning (quoth he) let this be the sum of the whole account, that these three things had their being three ways before the heaven was, to wit, effence, space, and generation. As for space or place, he calleth matter by that name, as it were the feat, and otherwhiles a receptacle: the effence, that which is intelligible; and the generation of the world as yet not made, can be no other thing but a substance subject to motions and alterations, situate between that which imprinteth a form, and which is imprinted, dispensing and distributing the images from thence hither; which is the reason it was called divibble, for that of necession ty both the fenfitive must be divided, and go with the fenfible, and also the imaginative with the imaginable. For the sensitive motion being proper unto the soul, moveth toward the sensitive motion being proper unto the soul, moveth toward the sensitive mittelingence and understanding was of it self, stable, firm and immoveable: howbit being insufect; once unto the foul, and become mafter and lord thereof, e rolleth and surneth upon it felf, and accomplisheth a round and circular motion, about that which is always permanent, and touching that principally which is, and hath being. And therefore hard was the nux ion and affociation which mingled the divisible with the indivisible, that which is every way moveable, with that which never moveth, and forcing in one word the other to meet and joyn with the same. So the other was not motion.

no more then the same was station; but the beginning both of Diversity, and also of Identity, or the samenss : For the one and the other descend from divers principles, to wit; the same from unity, and the other, from binary, and were at the first similated consuledly here in the soul; a styed by number, proportions and medicates harmonical: and the other being imprinced into the same, maketh difference; but the same insuled into the other, causeth order; as it appeareth maniscally in the sint powers of the foul, to wit, the faculties of moving and of judging. As so motion, it showeth incontinently about the heaven, diversity in identity by the revolution of the Planets, and identity in diversity by the set-tled order and situation of the fixed stars: for in these, the same beareth sway, and is more predominant; but contrarivingle, the other, in those that be nearer to the earth. But judgement hath two principles, to wit, understanding, from the same, for judging of things universal; and sense, from the other, to judge of particulars. Now reason is mingled of them both, being intelligence in things general and intelligible; but opinion onely in matters sensible, using for instruments, both the sames and imaginations between, and also the memories; whereof the former make the other in the same, but the states, the same in the other. For intelligence is the motion of the intelligent about that which is shalle and permanent; but opinion is the mansion of the sense, placeth it in memory; and contrarivale, the other stirred it in the difference and distinction of that which is pass, and contrarivale, the other stirred it in the difference and distinction of that which is pass, and one other and the other stores and distinction of that which is pass, and contrarivale, the other stirred it in the difference and distinction of that which is pass, and other which is present, touching both identity and diversity together.

Now the better to understand the proportion wherewith he made the foul; we must take a patern and example, from the conflicution of the body of the world : for whereas the two extreams, to wit, pure fire and earth, were by nature hard to be tempered one with another; or with another; or, to fay more truly, impossible to be mixed and incorporate together; he placed in the midst between, ayr before fire, and water before earth : and to consempered first thefe two mean elements, and afterwards by their help, the other extreams also, which he fitted and framed together, both with the faid means, and also with themselves one with another. And here again, the same and the other, being contrary puiffances and extremities, fighting one against the other as meer enemies, he brought together, not immediately by themselves, but by putting between other substances, to wit, the indivisible, before the starm, and the divisible before the other, according as in some fort the one had affinity and congruency with the other: afteewards when these were mixed together, he contempered likewise the extreams, and so warped and wove, as one would say, the whole form of the soul, making as sae as is was possible, of things unlike, semblable, and of many one. But some there be who give out, that it was not well faid of Plato, That the nature of the other, was hard to be mixed and tempered considering (say they) that it is not altogether insusceptible of mutation, but a friend to it, and rather the nature of the same, being firm and hard to be turned and removed, admitteth not easily any mixture, but flieth and rejecteth it, to the end that it may remain fimple, pure, and without a fearation but they who reprove this, are ignorant that the some, is the Idea of such things as be always of one fort; and the other, the Idea of those that change. Also that the effect of this, is evertmore to divide, separate, and alter that which it toucheth; and in a word, to make many of one : but the effect of that is, to conjoyn and unite by fimilitude, many things thereby into one form and pulliance. Thus you fee what be the powers and faculties of the foul of this univerlality, which entring into the frail, mortal, and passible instruments of bodies, however they be in themselves incorruptible, impatible and the same; yet in them now appeareth more the form of an indeterminate duality: but that form of the finely unity, heweth it felf more obfcurely, as deeply fettled within; howbeit for all that, hardly shall one fee and perceive in a man, either passion altogether void of reason, or motion without understanding, wherein there is no last, no ambition, no joy or grief: and therefore some Philosophers there be, who would have the perturbations of the minde to be reasons; as if for sooth, all defire, forrow, and anger, were judgements. Others also do hold, that all vertues be passions: for in valor (say they) there is four, intemperance, pleasure, injustice, lucre. Howbelt, the soul being both contemplative, and also active at once, as it doth contemplate universal thing; so it practiseth particulars, seeming to conceive the one by intelligence, and to perceive the other by sense: common reason tacceting always the same, in the other, and likewise, the other, in the same, endeavoreth verily to fever by divers bonds and partitions, one from many; and the indivisible from the divisible, but it cannot bring it fo about, as to be purely in the one or the other, for that the principles be so enterlaced one within another, and hudled pell-mell together.

In which regard. God hath appointed a certain receptacle for the fame, and the other, of a divifible and indivisible substance, to the end, that in diversity there should be order; for this was as much as to be engendeed. Seeing that without this, the fame should have had no diversity, and consequently no notion nor generation; neither should the other have had order, and so by consequence also, neither consistence nor generation; for if it should happen to the same, to be divers from the other, and again, to the other, to be all one with the same; such a communion and participation, would bring forth of it self nothing generative, but require some third matter to receive them, and to be digested and disposed by them. And this is that which God ordained and composed first, in defining and limiting the insinity of nature, moving about bodies, by the sirm steadines of things intellectual. And like as there is one kinde of brutish voyce, not articulate not distinct, and therefore not significant; whereas speech consistent in voyce, that givesh to understand what is in the minde; and as harmony doth consist of many founds and intervals; the sound being simple and the same, but the interval a difference and diversity of sounds, which when they be mixed and tempered together, make song and melody: Even so the passible part of the soul, was infinite, unstable, and disordinate; but afterwards became determinate, when tearms and limits were set to it, and a certain form expelled to that divisible and variable diversity of motion. Thus having conceived and compized the same, and the other, by the similitudes and dissimilitudes of numbers, making accord of difference: thereof the life of the universal world became wise and prudent, the harmony consonant, and reason drawing with her necessary, tempered with grace and pertuasion, which the common for call stat defining; Empedastes named concord and discord together: Heraclitus the opposite tension and harmony of the world, as of a bow or harp, wherein both ends bend one against another: Paramides, light and darkness: Anaxagoras, understanding and infinity: Zorosjies, God, and the Devily terming the one Oromasses, and the Oren's Arimanius: But Euripides did not well to use the disjunctive for the copulative, in this verse,

For in truth, that puissance which pierceth and reacheth through all things, is both necessity, and alto aminde. And this is it which the Egyptians would covertly give us to understand, under the vail of their mystical fables, that when Horus was condemned and dismembred, his spirit and blood was given and awarded to his father, but his fielh and grease to his mother : But of the foul there is nothing that remaineth pure and fincere, nothing unmixt and apart from others : for as Heraclitus was wont to fay: Hiddenharmony, is better then the apparent : for that therein, God who tempered it, hath beflowed secretly and concealed, differences and diversities: and yet there appeareth in the unreasonable part, turbulent perturbations, in the reasonable settled order : in senses necessity and constraint; in the understanding full power and entire liberty: but the terminant and defining power, loveth the universal and indivisible, by reason of their conjunctions and consanguinity. Contrariwise, the dividing puissance, inclineth and cleaveth to particulars by the divisible. The total universality joyethin a fettled order, by the means of the same, and again, so far forth as need is, in a mutation by the meanes of the other: but but the difference of inclinations to honefty or dishonefty, topleasure, or displeasure; the ravishments and transportations of the spirit in amorous persons, the combates in them, of honor against voluptuous wantonness; do evidently shew, and nothing so much, the commixion of the nature divines, and impassible with the mortal, and passible part in bodily things: of which himself calleth the one the concupifornce of pleasure ingenerate and inbred in us the other an opinion induced from without, desirous of the soveraign good: for the soul of it self produceth and yieldeth paffibility; but the participation of understanding cometh to it without forth, infused by the best principle and cause, which is God: so the very nature of heaven is not exempt from this double fociety and communion; but that a man may fee how otherwhiles it doth encline and bend another way, by the revolution of the same which is more predominant, and so doth govern the world; and a portion of time will come, like as it hath been often heretofore, when as the wifdom thereof faillbe dulled and dazelled, yea, and laid afleep, being filled with the oblivion of that which is meet and decens for it : and that which from the beginning is familiar and conformable to the body, shall draw, weigh down, and turn back the way and course of the whole universality on the right hand : butbreak and undo the form thereof quite it shall not be able, but reduce it again to the better, and have a regard unto the first patern of God, who helpeth the endeavors thereof, and is ready to reform and direct the fame.

Thus it is shewed unto us in many places, that the foul is not altogether the work of God; but having aportion of evil inbred in her, the hath been brought into order and good dispose by him, who hath limitted infinity by unity; to the end that it should become a substance bounded with the own terms : and hath fet by the means of the same and the other, order, change, difference, and fimilitude : and hath contracted and wrought a fociety, alliance and amity of all things one with another, as far as possible it was, by the means of numbers and proportions. Of which point, albeit you have heard much speech, and read many books and writings; yet I shall not do amise, but greatly to the purpose, if briefly I discourse thereof. First setting down the words of Plato. "God (quoth he) deducted first from "the universal world, one part: and then double so much; afterwards a third portion, to wit; the "one, and half of the fecond, and the triple of the first: Soon after a fourth, to wit, the double of "the fecond : and anon a fift, namely the triple of the third : after that a fixt, to wit, the octuple of "the first, and a seventh, which was the first seven twenty fold. This done, he filled the double and "tiple intervals; cutting from them also certain parcels from thence, which he interjected between "there; in fuch fort as in every interval there were two medicties: the one furmounting, and furmount-"edby the same portion of the extremities; the other, surmounting by equal number, one of the exstremities, and furmounted of another by the like. But seeing the intervals carry the proportions sesquialteral, (esquitertian, and sesquioctave : of these ligaments in the first precedent distances, he filled up all the sesquiterces with the interval of the sesquioctave, leaving of each of them one part: And this "diffance of the part or number being left of number to number, it had for the terms and bonds there-"of in proportion to that is between, two hundred fifty fix, and two hundred forty three. Here first and formost, a question is moved as touching the quantity of these numbers : and secondly, concerning the order: and thirdly, of their power. For the quantity and fun; what they be which he taketh in the duple intervals? For the order, to wit, whether they ought to be fet and disposed all in one range, as Theodome tild? or rather as Granter, in the figure of the letter Landa, A. fetting upon the point as accounts the first, and then in one file apart, the duples, and the triples in another, or top thereof Unity, or the first, and then in one file apart, the duples, and the triples in another, for the use and power, namely, what they confer to the confitution and composition of the foul. tor the me and power, namely, what it shole who fay, that it sufficient in these proportions to consider As concerning the first, we will reject those who fay, that it sufficient in these proportions to consider As concerning the nate, we want reject whose who key, the middle its which fill them up, in what numbers foever of what nature be the intervals, and of what the middle its which fill them up, in what numbers foever a man may suppose that they have places capable between of the proportions aforesaid: for that the doftrine goeth after the fame manner. And albeit that which they fay, were true, yet the proof and demonstation thereof is but flender without examples, and hindereth another speculation, wherein there is contained a pleasant kinde of Learning and Philosophy. If then, beginning at Unity, we put apart by themselves the numbers deple, and the triple, as he himself teacheth us, there will be of the one fide two, four, eight, on the other, three, nine, and twenty leven; which are in all feven, taking the Unity as common, and proceeding forward in multiplication unto four. For it is not in place onely, but also in many others, where the consent and agreement is very evident, that is between the quaternary and the feptenary. And as for that quaternity of the Pythagoreans so much voyced, and so highly by them celebrated, it is of thirty six, which hath this admirable matter in it above all others, that it is compounded of the four first even numbers, and of the four first odde above all others, that it is to the fourth couple or conjugation of number, ranged in order one after numbers: and itarifeth by the fourth couple or conjugation of number, ranged in order one after numbers: the other.

For the first is of one and two, the second of one and three, which be odde. For setting one in the first place, as indifferent and common to both; then taketh he eight, and twenty seven, shewing, and as it were, pointing with the singer, what place he give the to the one and the other kinde.

But to treat hereof after a more exact and exquitite manner, apperraineth unto others: But that which remaineth is proper to the subject matter in hand. For it was not upon any often ation of skill and fufficiency in the Mathematical Arts that Plate hath inferted within a Treatife of Natural Philo-Coply, this Arethmetical and Harmonical medicities, but as a Discourse very meet and fit to serve for the composition and constitution of the foul; howsoever there be some who seek for these prepartions in the swiftness more or less of the wandring Spheres; others rather in their diffances; some in the magnitudes of the stars; and others again, after a more curious manner, in the Diamiters of the Epicycles, as if that Creator had in regard thereof, and for this cause applied and fitted the soul, distributed into seven parts, unto the celestial bodies. Many there be moreover, who bring hither and accommodate to this matter the Pythagoreans inventions, tripling the diffauces of bodies from the midft : which they do after this manner, fetting upon fire Unity ; and upon the earth, opposite unto oure, three; upon the earth, nine; upon the Moon, twenty feven; upon Mercury, four score and one; upon Venus, two hundred forty three; and upon the Sun himself, 729. for that it is both quadrate and cube: which is the reason that they call the Sun also one while quadrate, and another while cube : and after the fame fort they reduce the other stars by way of tripalation. But these Philosophers do miscount greatly, and stray far from reason and proportion indeed, if so be that Geometrical demonstrations do avail ought: yet in comparison of them, well fair they who go to work another way; and albeit they prove not their positions exactly, yet (say) they come neerer to the mark, who give out, that the Diameter of the Sun, compared to the Diameter of the earth, is in the same proportion that twelve is to one: that the Diameter or Dimetient line of the earth is triple to that of the Moon: and the least fixed flar that is to be feen, hath no less a Diameter, then the third part of the Diameter of the certh: alfo, that the total Globe of the earth, compared with the Sphere of the Moon, carrieth the propolition of twenty feven to one: The Diameters of Venus and the carth, are in double proportion, but their Globes or Spheres bear octuple proportion, to wit, eight for one. Semblably, the interval of the Ecliptick, and the shadow which causeth the Eclipse, istriple to the Diameter of the Moon. Also the latitude of the Moons declination from the Zodiaque on either fide, is one twelfth part : likewise that the habitudes and aspects of her to the Sun, in diffances triqueter, or quadrangular, take the forms and figurations either of the Half-moon, at the first quarter, or elle when the (welleth and beareth out on both fides : but after the hath paffed fix Signs of the Zodiaque, the maketha full compats, and retembleth a certain Harmonical Symphony of Diapaton in Hexatonor. And forasmuch as the Sun about the Solstices or Tropicks, as well of Summer as Winter, moveth leaft, and most flowly; but contrariwise, about the two Equinoxes in Spring and Autumn, most (wifely, and exceeding much: the proportion of that which he taketh from the day, and putteth to the night; or contrariwife, is after this manner in the first thirty daye; for in that space after the Solitice in Winter, he addeth to the day the fix part of that exuperance, whereby the longest night surmounteth the shortest day : and in another thirty days following after that, a third part, and so forward in the rest of the days one half, until you come to the Equinox, in sextuple and triple intervals, to make even the inequality of the times. But the Chaldeans fay, that Spring in regard of Autumn carrieth proportion Diatessaron, in respect of Winter Diapente, and in comparison of Summer Diapason: But if Euripides hath well limitted the four quarters of the year when he For Summer hot, four moneths ordained be, For Winter cold likewise are other four: Shorter is rich Autumn by one moyetie, And pleasant Spring whiles it remain in soir.

Then the feafons do change after the porportion Diapafon: Some attribute to the earth, the place of the mufical note Proflambanomenos: unto the Moon Hypate: unto Mercury and Lucifer D atonos and Lichanos: the Sun they fet upon Mese (they say) containing Diapason in the midds, distant from the earth one fifth or Diapente, and from the sphere of the fixed stars a fourth, or Diatesferon. But neither the pretty conceited imagination of these toucheth the truth any way, nor the reckoning and account of those other, cometh precisely to the point. Well, those who affirm that these deand account of the minde of Plato, are yet of opinion, that those other agree very well to the propolitions described in the Tablature of Musicians, which consisteth of five Tetrachords, to wit, the hell Hypaton, as one would fay, of Bale-notes; the second, Meson, that is to say, of Means: the third, Synemmenon, that is to fay, of Conjuncts; the fourth, Diezeugmernon, that is to fay, of Difinners; and the fifth, Hyperbolæon, to wit, of the high and excellent Notes: semblably, fay they, The Planets be fet in five diffances, whereof the one is from the Moon unto the Sun, and those which have the fame revolution with him, as Mercury and Venus; a fecond, from these three unto the fiery Planet Mars ; the third, from thence to Jupiter ; the fourth, from him to Saturn ; and the fifth reacheth runte the flarry sky; to that the founds and notes, which determine the five Terachords, after to left proportion of the Planets or wandring flars. Moreover, we know very well, that the ancient Musiciant, did set down no more notes but two Hypates, three Netes, one Mese, and one Paramete: Muscans dia see down in more notes and the Plants: but our modern Mafters of Musck; have defed that which is called Proflambanomenos, namely, lower by one note then Hypate, and enclining to the bale : and to the whole composition they made Disdiapason; nor keeping and observing tening to the confonances according to nature, for Diapente is before Diatesferon, by adding one note or tone to Hypate toward the Bale; whereas it is certain that Plate took one note to it toward the Treble; for he faith in his Books of Commonwealth, That every one of the eight Spheres hath a spread fitting upon it, caufing the fame to turn about, and that each of them hath a leveral and proper spread fitter own: but of altogether there is contempered a certain harmony: these Syrenes being difoofed to folace themselves, sing for their pleasure divine and heavenly tunes, dancing withal a facred dance, under the melodious confent of eight ftrings: as also there were eight principal terms as first of proportions double and triple; counting for one of these terms or limits unity to either part: butthe more ancient fort have given unto us nine Muses, to wit, eight, as Plate himself faith, about diecelestial bodies, and the ninth about the terrestrial, called forth from the rest to dulce, and fer them in report, inflead of error, trouble, and inequality. Confider, now I pray you, whether the fall being become most just and most wife, doth not manage the heaven and celestial things by the acordising motions therein? And thus endured the by proportions harmonical; he images whereofare imrified upon the bodies and vifible parts of the world which are feen but the first and principal power is using interied in the foul, which the weth her felf accordanc and obey sang to the better and more disine part, all the reft confenting likewife thereto. For the Soveraign Creator, finding a diforder and confusion in the motions of this difordinate and foolish foul, being evermore at diford with herfelf, divided and separated some; reconciled and re-united others, using thereto numbers and proportions; by means wheteof, the molt deaf bodies, as blocks and flones, wood, barks of trees, and vay remets and maws of beafts, their guts, their galls and finews, being framed, contempered, and mixed together in proportion, exhibite into us the figures of statues wonderful to see to, and droguerand medicines most effectual, yea, and founds of musical instruments right admirable. And therefore Zeno the Citican, called forth yong men to fee and behold minfirils playing upon Flutes and Huttboys: That they might hear (quoth he) and learn, what fweet founds and melodious noises, homs, pieces of wood, canes and reeds do yield, yea, and whatloever matters elle mufical inftrumans, speces or wood, cancer and created years years and accords. As for that which the Pytha-girans were wont to fay and affirm, namely, that all things refembled number, it would ask a long dicourse for to declares it. But that all the gods who were before at discord and debate, by reason of their diffimilitude, and whatfoever else jarred, grew to accord and confonance one with another, whiteof the cause was the contemperature, moderation and order of number and harmony, the veny Poets were not ignorant of, who use to call such things as be friendly, amiable and pleasing, affect : but adversaries and enemies they term analyse, as if discord and enmity were nothing else but disproportion: and verily that Poet, who foever he was, that made a Funeral Ditty for Pindarus, when he faid thus of him,

"Audo G. Li geiroren dehp ile, gi pia G. deres.

To strangers kinde ke was and affable, To citizens friendly and pliable.

biwed very well, that he held it for a fingular vertue to be fociable, and to know how to fort and gree with others: like as the fame Pindarus himfelf,

When God did call, be gave attendance,

meaning and lignifying Cadmus. The old Theologians and Divines, who of all Philosophers are meaning and rightlying the mands of the Images of the gods, mufical infiruments, minding nothing montanerers, mare put into make this god, or that a minstrel, either to play on Lute, or to found the Flute, but because they thought there was no greater piece of work then Accord and Harmonical Symphonic could befeen the gods. Like as therefore, he that would feek for fesquitertian, sesquialteral or double could detect the good.

Musick, in the neck or bridge, in the belly or back of a Lute, or in the pegs and pipe proportions of Musick, in the neck or bridge, in the belly or back of a Lute, or in the pegs and proportion of the pegs and pe on one to another in regard of length and thickness; yet the harmony whereof we speak, is to be conon one to another in the bull by Even to, probable it is, and flandeth with great reason, that the bodies of the stars, the distances and intervals of Spheres, the celerity also of their courses and revolutions, should be proportionate one unto another, yea, and unto the whole world, as instruments of mulick well fet and tuned, albeit the just quantity of the measure be unknown unto us. But this we are to think. weil fer and times alone the just quantity of the invariance or innovation to some time weare to think, that the principal effect and efficacy of these numbers and proportions, which that great and foveraign that the principal effect and foveraign and agreement of the soul in it self; with which she being endowed, she hath replenished both the heaven it self; when the was settled thereupon, with an instance of the soul in the self. endowed, the nature premium a value of the first and ordained all things upon the carch, by featons, by changes and mutations, tempered and m-afured most excellently well, and with furpalling wildom, as well for the production and generation of all things, as for the prefervation and fatety of them, when they were created and made.

An Epitome or Breviary of a Treatife as touching the Creation of the Soul, according to Plato in Timaus.

"His Treatife, entituled, Of the Greation of the Soul, asit is described in the Book of Plato named Timens, declareth all that Plato, and the Platoniques have written of that Argument; and inferreth certain Propositions and similitudes Geometrical, which he supposeth pertinent to the speculation and intelligence of the nature of the soul : as also certain Musical and Arithmetical Theoremes. His meaning and faying is, that the first matter was brought into form and shape by the soul. He attributes to the universal world a soul; and likewise to every living creature a soul of the own by it felf, which ruleth and governeth it. He bringeth in the faid foul in some fort not engendred, and yet after a fort subject to generation. Buthe affirmeth, that eternal matter to have been formed by God; that evil and vice is an Imp springing from the said matter, To the end (quoth he) that it might never come into mans thought, That God was the author or cause of evil.

All the rest of this Breviary, is word for word in the Treatise it self, therefore may be well spared in this place, and not rehearsed a second time.

Of Fatal Necessity.

This little Treatise is so pitiously torn, maimed, and dismembred throughout, that a man may sooner divine and guess thereat (as I have done) then translate it. I beseech the Readers therefore, to hold me excused, in case I neither please my self, nor content them, in that which I have written.

Ndeavor I will, and address my felf to write unto you (most dear and loving friend Pife, as plainly and compendiously as possible I can) mine opinion as touching Fatal destiny, for to fatisfie your request: albeit you know full well how wary and precise I am in my writing. First and formost therefore, thus much you must understand, That this term of Fatal definy is spoken and underftood two manner of ways : the one, as it is an action, and the other, as it is a substance. In the first place, Plato hath figuratively drawn it forth, and under a type described it as an action, both in his Dialogue, entituled, Phredrus, in these words: It is an Adrastian Law or inevitable Ordinance, which always followeth and accompanieth God. And also in his Treatise called Tineus, after this manner, The Laws which Cod hath pronounced and published to the immortal fool, in the procreation of the universal world. Likewise, in his Books of Commonwealth, he faith, That Fatal Needlity is the reason and speech of Lachesis the daughter of Needlity. By which places Instruction to understand, not tragically, but after a Theological manner, what his minde and opinion is. Now if a man (caking the said places already cited and quoted) would expound the same nonnion in Phedrins after this fort, name-more familiarly in other words, he may declare the former defcription in Phedrins after this fort, name-ly, that Fual Deftiny is a divine reason or fentence intransfersible and inevitable, proceeding from a ly, man according to that which he delivered nor impeached. And according to that which he delivereth in Timeus, it ha Law confequently enjuing upon the nature and creation of the world, by the rule whereof all things pass and are dispenced, that be done. For this is it that Lackesis worketh and effecteth, who is in pair and all distributes of Necessity, as we have both already faid, and also shall better understand, by that which we are to deliver hereafter in this and other Treatifes at our leifure. Thus you fee what Deffiny is, as it goeth for an action; but being taken for a substance, it seemeth to be the universal foul of the whole world, and admitteth a tripartite division. The first Destiny is that which erreth not; the second femeth to err; and the third is under heaven, and convertant about the earth: of which three, the thishell is called Clistos; the next under it, is named An opos; and the loweft, Lackeft's: and the receiveth the influences of her two celeftial fifters, transmitting and fastning the same upon terrestrial things, which are under her government. Thus have we showed summarily, what is to be thought and said stouching Deftiny, being taken as a substance; namely, What it is, what parts it hath, after what attoucomes. Little of the control of gau on Plato, which coverely in tome fore giveth us intelligence thereof; and the fame have we affigue to Plato, which coverely in tome fore giveth us intelligence thereof; and the fame have we affigued to explain and unfold unto you, as well as possible we can: But to return unto our D.ftiny as it is an action, let un discourse thereos, forassimuch as many questions, natural, moral and rational depend thereupon. Now for that we have in some sort sufficiently defined already, what it is, we are to consider confequently in order, the quality and manner thereof; howfoever, there be many that think it very frange and abfurd to learch thereinto, I fay therefore, that Deftiny is not infinite, but finite and determinate, however it comprehend, as it were, within a circle, the infinity of all things that are, and have ben time out of minde, yea, and shall be world without end : for, neither law, nor reason, nor any divine thing what foever, can be infinite. And this shall you the better learn and understand, if you consider the total revolution, and the universal time, when as the eight Spheres, as Timeus faith, having performed their fwift courses, shall return to the same head and point again, being measured by the circleof the same, which goeth always after one manner: for in this definite and determinate reason, all things, as well in heaven as in earth, the which do confift by the necessity of that above, be reduced onthe fame fituation, and brought again to their first head and beginning. The onely habitude there-forcof heaven, which standerh ordained in all points, as well in regard of it self, as of the earth, and all terrestrial matters, after cerrain long revolutions, shall one day return, yes, and that which consequally followeth after, and those which are linked in a continuity together, bring each one by consequestitat which it hath by necessity. For to make this matter more plain, let us supose that all mole things which are in and about us, be wrought and brought ro pass by the course of the heavens and celefial influences, all being the very efficient cause both of that which I write now, and also of that which you are doing at this present, yea, and in that fort as you do the same : so that hereafter, when the same cause shall turn about and come again, we shall do the very same that now we do, yea, andaster the same manner; yea, we shall become again the very same men. And even so it shall be with all other men: and look what soever shall follow in a course or train, shall likewise happen by a confequent and dependent cause : and in one word, whatsoever shall befal in any of the universal revolutions, final become the same again. Thus apparent it is, as hath already been said, That Defliny being in some sort infinite, is nevertheless determinate and not infinite; as also, that according as we have the wed before, it is evident that it is in manner of a circle; for like as the motion of a circle in acircle, and the time that measureth it is also a circle; even so the reason of those things which are don: and happen in a circle, by good right may be effected and faid to be a circle.

This therefore, if nought elfe there were, the weth unto us, in a manner, fufficiently, what is Defliny in generality, but not in particular, nor in each several respect: What then is it? It is the general, in the same kinde of reason, so as a man may compare it with Civil Law: For first and formost, it commandeth the most part of things, if not all, at least wife by way of supposition, and then it com-Prizeth as much as is possible all matters appertaing to a City or Publike State, generally : And that we my better understand both the one and the other, let us exemplifie and consider the same in specialty: The Civil or Politick Law speaketh and ordaineth generally of a valiant man, as also of a run-away oward, and so consequently of others; howbeit, this is not to to make a Law of this or that particuby person; but to provide in general principally, and then of particulars by consequence, as comprized under the faid general; for we may very well fay, that to remunerate and recompence this or that man for his valor is lawful; as also to punish a particular person for his cowardize, and for saking his colours; for that the Law potentially and in effect, hath comprized as much, although not in express words: like as the Law (if I may to fay) of Phylicians, and of Masters of bodily exercises, comprehendeth special and particular points within the general: and even so doth the Law of nature, which first and principally doth determine general matters; and then particulars secondarily and by consequence.

Semblably, may particular and individual things in some fort be faid to be deflined, for that they be Sembladly, may particular and man-than the sembladly forms one of those who seatthers, for that they be so by consequence with the general's. But haply some one of those who seatch and enquire more entirely and exactly into these matters will hold the contrary, and say, that of particular and individual things, proceed the composition of the generals, and that the general is ordained and gathered than the seatth of the for the particular. Now that for which another thing is, goeth always before that which is forit; but this is not the proper place to speak of these quiddities; for we are to refer them to some other; howbeit, that defliny doth not comprehend all things purely and exprefly, but onely such as beuninowhere, that defining doct in the conference and ferveth for that which we have to fay hereafter, yea, and agreeth alfo to that which hath been delivered somewhat before; for that which is finite and deyea, and agreed and general things, than terminate, properly agreeable to Divine Providence, is more feen in universal and general things, than in particular; of this nature is the Law of God, and such is likewise the Civil Law, whereas infinity canfifteth in particulars.

After this we are to declare, what meaneth this term, By supposition: for furely destiny is tobe thought fuch a thing. We have then called, By supposition, that which is not set down of it self, but supposed and joyned asset another; and this signifiest a fuit and consequence: This is the Law or our imposes and joyane are in the state of t lution, and be exempt from all evil; which if it may be able always to do, it shall neither sustain any damage, nor do harm. Thus you fee what it is that we call, By supposition in general. Now any commerce and this kinds, evidently appeareth, as well by the substance as the name thereof that Fatal Destiny is of this kinds, evidently appeareth, as well by the substance as the name thereof for it is called in Greek, with the substance as the name thereof for it is called in Greek, with the substance as the name thereof that Fatal Destination is the substance of the substance and the substance are substanced in the substance of the substance and the substance of the sub linked, and a Law it is and Ordinance, for that things therein be ordained and disposed consequently, and in manner of those which are done civilly.

Hereunto is to be annexed a Treatne of Relation, that is to fay, what reference and respect hath Fatal Deffiny unto Divine Providence, as also unto Fortune : Likewise, what is that which is inus : what is configent, and fuch like things. Moreover, we are to decide, wherein and how it is falle; wherein also, and how it is true; that all things happen and come to pass by Fatal Definy, for if it import and imply thus much, That all things are comprized and contained in Fatal Deftiny, we must grant this Proposition to be true: and sav one put thereto all things done among men, upon the earth, and in the very heaven, and place them within Faral Deftiny, let us grant as much for the present. But if we understand that this word Fatal (as it rather seemeth) doth import not all things, but that onely which followeth and is dependant, then we may not grant and fay, that all things be comprehended in Fatal Deftiny; confidering all that which the Law doth comprehend, and whereof is speaketh, is not lawful, nor according to law: for why? it comprizes treason, it treases of cowardize, of running away from ones colours and place in battel, of adultery, and many things (emblable : of which we cannot fay, any one is lawful : for a fmuch, as even to perform valorous fervice in the wars, to kill Tyrants, or to exploit any vertuous deed, I would not term lawful, because properly that is lawful, which is commanded by the Law; and if the Law did command those things, how can they avoid to be rebellious and transgressors of the Law, who have not done valiant exploits in arms, have not killed Tyrants, nor performed any other notable acts of vertue? and in cafe they be offenders of the Law, why are they not punished accordingly? But if to punish such, be neither just nor reasonable, then confess we must, that these matters be not legal, nor according to Law; for legal and according to law is that, which is namely prescribed, set down, and expressly commanded by the Law, in any action whatsoever. Semblably, those things onely be Fatal and according to Destiny, which are done by a Divine disposition proceeding, so that Fatal Destiny may well comprize all things: how-beit many of those which be comprized therein, and in manner all that went before, to speak properly, cannot be pronounced Fatal, nor according to Fatal Deftiny, which being fo, we ought to declare now in order consequently, how that which is in our own power, to wit, free will, how foreune, possible, contingent, and other fuch like things, which be ranged and placed among the premites, may fubfilf falely with Fatal D:fliny, and how Fatal Deftiny may fland with them: for Fatal Deftiny comprehendethall, as it feem thand yet thefe things happen not by any necessity but every of them according to their own nature. The nature of Possible, is to have a presubsistence as the gender, and to go before the contingent, and the contingent as the fubject matter ought to be prefuppofed before the things which are no or power: for that which is in us, as a Lord and Mafter ufeth the contingent: And Fortune is of this nature, to intercur between our free will, and what is in us, by the property of contingency enclining to the one fide, and to the other, which you may more eafily apprehend and understand, if you confider, how every thing that is produced forth, yea, and the production it felf and generation, is not without a certain puissance: and no puissance or power there is without a substance: as for example, the generation of man, and that which is produced and engendred, is not without a power, and the fame is about the man, but man himself is the substance. Of the puissance or power being between, cometh the substance which is the puissant: but the production, and that which is produced, beboth things possible. There being therefore these three, Puissance, Puissant, and Possible: Before Puissance can be, of necessity there must be presupposed a puissant, as the subject thereof: and even so it must needs be that puissance also subsist before that which is possible. By this deduction then, in some sort is declared, what is that which we call possible; so as we may after a gross manner define it to be, that which puiffance is able to produce : and to fpeak more properly of the fame, by adjoyning thereto thus much, provided always, that nothing without forth do impeach or hinder it. But among possible things, some there be that never can be hindred, as namely in heaven, the rifing and fetting of the stare, and such like: others may be impeached, as the most part of humane affairs, and tracting or any Meteors in the Ayr. As for the former, as things hapning by necessity, they be called necessary; the other for that they fall out fometime contrariwise, we term contingent; and in this foremay they be deferibed. Necessary is that possible thing, which is opposite to impossible: con-tingent is that possible, whereof possible also is the contrary. For that the Sun should go down, is a thing both necessary and possible, as being contrary unto this impossibility, namely, that the Sun should not fet at all : but that when the Sun is fet, there should come rain, or not rain, are both of them possible and contingent. Again, of things contingent, fome there be which happen oftentimes, and for the most part, others rare and seldome, some fall out indifferently, as well one way as another, even as is hapneth. And plain it is, that these be opposite and repugnant to themselves : as for those which happen usually, and very often, contrary they be to such things as chance but seldom; and these indeed for the most part, are subject to nature: but that which chanceth equally, one way as well as another, lieth in us and our will : for example fake, that under the Dog-flar it should be hot and cold ; the one commonly, and for the most part, the other very seldom, are things both, submitted to nature but to walk, or not to walk, and such things whereof the one and the other be subject to the free will of man, are said to be in us, and in our choice and election; but rather and more generally, they be faid to be in us. For as touching this term, To be in lus, it is to be understood two manner of ways, and therefore are two kindes, the one proceedeth from passion, as namely, from anger or concupifence; the other, from discourse of reason, or judgement and understanding, which a man may properly fay, to be in our election. And some reason there is, that this possible contingent which is named to be in us, and to proceed from our appetite and will, should be called so, not in the same regard, but for divers: for in respect of suure time, it is called possible and contingent; but in regard of the present, it is named, in us, and in our free will: so as a man may thus define and destinguish of these things; Contingent is that which both it felf and the contrary whereof is possible : that which in us, is the one part of contingent, to wit, that which prefently is in doing according to our appetite. Thus have we in manner declared, that by nature possible goeth before contingent, and contingent subsisterh before that which in us; alfo, what each of them is, and whereupon they are fo called, yea, and what be the qualities adjoyning thereto: it remaineth now, that we should treat of Fortune, and casual adventure, and of whatfoever befides, that requireth discourse and consideration. First, this is certain, that Fortune is a kinde of cause: but among causes, some are of themselves, others by accident: as for example, of an house or ship, the proper causes and of themselves, be the Mason, Carpenter or Shipwright, but by accident, the Musician and Geometrician, yea, and whatsoever incident to the Mason, Carpenter, or Shipwright, either in regard of body or minde, or outward things: whereby is appeareth, that the effential cause which is by it felf, must needs be determinate, certain and one; whereas the accidental causes are not always one and the same, but infinite and indeterminate; for many accidents in number infinite, and in nature different one from another, may be together in one and the same subject. This cause then by accident, when it is found not onely in such things which are done for some end, but also in those wherein our election and will taketh place, is called Fortune : as namely, to finde treasure when a man diggeth a hole or grave to plant a tree in, or to do and suffer any extraordinary thing, in flying, pursuing, or otherwise going and marching, or onely in retiring: provided always, that he doth it not to that end which ensueth thereupon, but upon some other intention. And hereuponicis, that some of the ancient Philosophers have defined Fortune, to be a cause unknown, and not forfeen by mans reason: But according to the Platoniques, who come neerer unto it in reason, it indefined thus, Fortune is an accidental cause in those things that are done for some end, and which are in our election; and afterwards they adjoyn moreover, not foreseen nor known by the discourse of humane reason: although that which is rare and strange, by the same means, appeareth also in this kinde of cause by accident. But what this is, if it appear not manifestly by that opposition and contradictory disputations, yet at leastwife it will be declared most evidently, by that which is written in a Treatise of Plato, entituled, Phedon, where these words are found. What? Have you not heard how, and in what manner the judgement passed? Yes, I wis, For one there was, who came and told us fore, the dread a good while after. And what might be the cause thereof, O Phedon? Surely, there hapned unto him, O Ethecratos, a certain fortune : For it chanced that the day before the judgement, the prow of the Galley which the Athenians fent to Isle Delos was crowned : In which words it is to be noted, that by this term, There hapned, you must not understand, There was; but rather, it so befel, upon a concourse and meeting of many causes together, one after another. For the Priest adorned the ship with Coroners for another end and intention, and not for the love of Socrates; yea, and the Judges had condemned him also for some other cause: but the event it self was so strange and admirable, as if it had hapned by some providence, or by an humane creature, or rather indeed by some superior nature. And thus much may fuffice as touching Fortune, and the definition thereof: as also, that necessarily it ought to fibbilt together with some one contingent thing of those which are meant to some end; whereupon it took the *name: yea, and there must be some subject before of such things which are in us and in *ruzil ins But cafual adventure reacheth and extendeth farther then Fortune: for it comprized both is, and also many other things which may chance as well one way as another: and according as the very Eymomany other things which word a vibrales, fleweth it is that which hapneth for and instead of anology and derivation of the word a vibrales, sheweth it is that which hapneth for and instead of anology and derivation of the word a vibrales. ther, namely, when that which was ordinary fell not out, but another thing in lieu thereof; as namely, when it chanceth to be cold weather in the Dog days; for sometimes it falleth out to be then cold; and not without cause. In suns, like as that which is in us and arbitrary, is part of contingent; even fo is fortune a part of casual or accidental adventure: and both these events are conjunct and dependent one of another; to wit, casual adventure hangeth upon contingent, and fortune upon that which is in us and arbitrary; and yet not fimply and in general, but of that onely which is in our election, according as hath been before faid. And hereupon it is, that this cafual adventure is common as well to things which have no life, as to those which are animate; whereas fortune is proper to man onely, who is able to perform voluntary actions. An argument whereof is this, that to be fortunate, happy and bleffed, are thought to be all one; for bleffed happiness is a kinde of well doing; and to do well, properly belongeth to a man, and him that is perlect. Thus you fee what things are comprized within Fatal Deftiny, namely, Contingent, Possible, Election, that which is within us, fortune, casual accident, or chance and adventure, together with their circumstant adjuncte, fignified by these words, haply, peradventure or perchance: howbeit, we are not to inser, that because they be contained within destiny, therefore they be fatal. by the contained within a comprehended Fatal le remaineth now to discourse of Divine Providence, considering that it self comprehended Fatal Defity. This fupreme and first providence therefore, is the intelligence and will of the Soveraign God, doing good unto all that is in the world; whereby all divine things universally aud throughout, have been most excellently and wifely ordained and disposed. The second providence, is the inout, have been more according of the fecond gods, who have their course through the heaven; by which, temporal and mortal things are engendred regularly and in order; as also, whatsoever pertaineth to the rai and mortal tunings are digitally as a many season, and any measurement of the prefervation and continuance of every kinde of thing. The third, by all probability and likelihood, may well be called the providence and profpicience of the Damons or Angels, as many as be placed and ordained about the earth as superintendents, for to observe, mark and govern mens actions. Now albeit there be feen this threefold providence, yet properly and principally that first and supreme is named Providence: fo as we may be bold, and never doubt to fay, howfoever herein we feem to contradict some Philosophers, That all things are done by Fatal Destiny, and by Providence, but not likewise by nature: howbeit some by providence; and that after divers sorts, these by one, and those by mother; yea, and some also by Fatal Desliny. As for Fatal Desliny, it is altogether by prodence; but providence in no wife by Fatal Deftiny: where, by the way, this is to be noted, that in this prefent place I understand the principal and soveraign providence. Now what soever is done by another (be it what it will) is evermore after that which causeth or maketh it; even as that which is erected by Law is after the Law; like as what is done by nature, must needs succeed and come after nature. Semblably, what is done by Fatal Deftiny, is after Fatal Deftiny, and of necessity must be more new and modern: and therefore the supreme Providence is the ancientest of all, excepting him alone, whose intelligence it is or will, or both twain together, to wit, the soveraign Author, Creator, maker and father of all things.

"And for what cause is it, saith Timeus, that he hath made and framed this Fabrick of the world?"

"For that he is all good, and in him being all good, there cannot be imprinted or engendred any engety but feeling he is altogether void and free from it, his will was, that as much as possibly night be, all things should refemble himself. He then who shall receive and adoin this for the most principal and proper original of the Generation and Creation of the world, such as wisemen have described in the good, and nothing as all (tohis power) evil, took all that was visible, restless as it was, and moving still rashly, confusedly, irregularly, and without order, which he brought out of confusion, and ranged into order, judging this to be every way far better than the other: for neither it was, nor is convenient and meet, for him who is himself right good, to make any thing that should all not be most excellent and beautiful. Thus therefore we are to eftern that providence (I mean "that which is principal and foveraign) his honditured and ordained these things fish, and then in "ordet such as ensue and depend thereof, even as far as to the souls of men. Afterwards having "thus created the uniterfal world, he ordained eight Spheres, answering in number to so many "principal Stats; and distributed to every one of them a several soul; all which he see, cach one "(as it were) within a Charico over the nature of the whole, shewing unto them the Laws and Ordi-mances of Fatal Destiny * * *

What is he then who will not believe, that by these words he plainly sheweth and declareth Faral Definy, and the same to be (as one would say) a Tribuual, and a Politick Constitution of Civil Laws, meet and agreeable to the souls of men? whereof afterwards he rendreth a reason. And as touching the second Providence, he doth after a sore expresly significe the same in these words, saying, saving therefore prescribed all these Laws unto them, to the end that if afterwards there should be any default, he might be exempted from all cause of evil: he spread and sowed some upon the earth, others about the Moon, and some again upon other organs and instruments of time: after which distribution, he gave commandment and charge to the yong gods, for to frame and create mortal bodies, as also to make up and finish that which remained, and was wanting in mans soul; and when they had made perfect all that was adherent and consequent thereto, then to rule and govern after the

the best and wifest manner possible, this mortal creature, to the end that it felf should not be the cause of the ownevils and miseries: for in these words where it is said, That he might be exempt, and not the cause of any evil ensuing afterwards, he sheweth clearly and evidently to every one the cause of any Fatal destiny. The order also and office of these petty gods declareth unto usthe second providence, para defaulty.

yea, and it fermeth that in some forr it toucheth by the ways, the third providence, in case it one to the for this purpose these Laws and Ordinances were established, because he might not be shamed or accused as the author of any evil in any one afterwards: for God himself being clear and exempt from all evil, neither hath need of Laws, nor requireth any Fatal destiny: but each one of the petty-gods, led and haled by the providence of him who hath engendred them, doth there own devoir and office, belonging unto them. That this is true, and the very minde and opinion of Plate, appeareth manifestly in my conceit, by the testimony of those words which are reported by the Law-giver in his Books of Laws in this manner: If therewere any man (quoth he) fo by nature fufficient, or by divine fortune so happily born, that he could be able to comprehend this, he should require no Laws to command him: for no Law there is, nor Ordinance of more worth and puissance, then is Knowledge and Science: neither can he possibly be a service slave or subject to any, who is truly and indeed free by nature, but he ought to command all. For mine own part, thus I underfland and interpret the sentence of Plato: For whereas there is a triple providence: the first, as that which hath engendred Fatal defliny, in some fore comprehendeth it: the second being engendred with it, is likewise wholly comprized in it: the third engendred after Fatal deftiny, is comprized under it, in that manner, as, That which is in us, and fortune, as we have already faid : for those whom the affiltance of the power of our Dzmon doth aid (according as Socrates faith) expounding whom the animance of the power of our beamon donatal (according as socrats tain) expounding unto Theage; what is the inevitable Ordinance of Adraftia, these (I say) are those whom you understand well enough: for they grow and come forward quickly with greed, so as, where it is faid, that a Demon or an Angel doth savor any, it must be referred to the third providence; but that suddealy they grow and come to proof, it is by the power of Faral destiny : and to be short, it is very plain and evident, that even this also is a kinde of destiny. And peradventure it may seem wuch more probable, that even the fecond providence is comprehended under defliny; yea, and in fum, all things whatforver be made or done, confidering that defliny, according to the substance thereof, hath been rightly divided by us into three parts. And verily that speech, as touching the chain and concatenation, comprehendeth the revolutions of the heavens, in the number and range of those things which happen by supposition: but verily of these points, I will not debate much, to wit, whether we are to call them, Happing by supposition, or rather conjunct unto destiny: considering that the precedent cause and commander of destiny it self, is also fatal. And thus to speak summarily, and by way of abridgement, is our opinion : but the contrary fentence unto this, ordaineth all things to be not onely under deftiny, but also according to deftiny, and by it. Now all things accord unto the other, and that which accordeth to another, the fame must be granted to be the other: accorde ing then to this opinion, contingent is faid to be the first; that which is in us the second; fortune the third; accident or casual chance and adventure the fourth, together with all that dependeth thereupons to wit, praise, blame, and those of the same kinde; the fifth and last of all, may be said to be the prayers unto the gods, together with their fervices and ceremonies. Moreover, as touching those which are called idle, and harvest arguments, as also that which is named beside, or against destiny, they are no better then cavils and fophiltries according to this opinion ; but according to the contrary fentence, the first and principal conclusion is, that nothing is done without cause, but all things dependupon precedent causes: the second, that the world is governed by nature, which conspired and is compatible with it felf; the third may feem rather to be testimonies unto these; whereof the first is divination, approved by all Nations, as being really and truly in God; the frond the equanimity and patience of wife men, taking and bearing well all accidents and occurrents whatfoever, as coming by divine ordinance; the third, which is fo common a foech, and divulged in every mans mouth, namely, that every Proposition is either true or false. Thus have we drawn this discourse into a small number of short Articles, to the end that we might remember and comprize in few words. the whole matter and argument of Destiny. All which points, both of the one and the other opinion, are to be discussed and examined with more diligent inquisition, whereof particularly we will treat afterwards.

A Compendious Review and Discourse, That the Stoicks Deliver more strange Opinions then do the Poets.

The Summary.

A Petty Declaration this is againft the felt of the Stocks, which briefly and in a word it maketh odious; touching out in plain terms, that such persons be the loadest tyers in the world: and that their opinion as touching the change and alteration of that party who rangel b himself unto them, is so wonstrous and ridenture, that the discoursy onely thereof is a sufficient resultation.

A Compendious Review and Discourse, That the Stoicks deliver more strange Opinions, then do the Poets.

Pilndarus was reproved, for that after a firange manner, and without all fenfe and probability, he feigned Geneus one of the Lapithe, to have had a body so hard, as ircould not be pierced by any weepons of iron and iteel, but that he remained unhurt; and so afterproved.

Went under earth withouten wound,
When with stiff foot be cleft the ground.

But this Lapib of the Stoicks, to wis, their imagined wife man, being forged by them of impalfibility, as of a metal harder then the Diamond, is not fuch an one as is not otherwhiles wounded, difeated and affailed with pain: howbeit, as they fay, he abideth fillifearlefts, and without forrow and heavineft; he continuent invincible, he fulfalneth no force nor violence, howfever he be wounded, what pain foever he fuffereth, be he put to all tortures, or see his native Countrey sacked and driftong ed before his face, or what calamities else beside be presented to his eyes. And verily, that Count whom Pindarus describeth, notwithstanding he were smitten, and bare many strokes, yet was un-wounded for all that: butthe wise man whom the Stoicks imagine, although he be kept enclosed in prison, yet is not restrained of liberty: say he be pitched down from the top of a rock, yet suffained no violence; is he put to the strappado, to the weak or wheel, yet for all that, is he not commented; and albeits he fry in the fire, yet he hath no harm; nay, if in whrestling he be foiled and sake a fall, yet he perfect the content of the strappado, to the weak or wheel, yet for all that, is he not commented; such the sit is not besieged; and being sold in port-sale by the enemies, yet is he no captive, but remaineth impregnable; resembling most properly for all the world, those ships which have these goodly infectipations in their poups, Happy pouges, Lukie Navigation, Saving Pravidence, and Remedy against all dangers: and yet the same evertheless be tossed in the Seas, split upon the Rocks, calt away and drowned. Islant, as the Poet Euripides hath seigned, by a certain prayer that he made unto the goods, of a sceble and deripted dange, became all of a sudden ayong and lusty gallant, ready for to sight a battel: but the Scoicks wise man, who longer ago then yetherday, was most hateful, weeched and wicked, all at once to day is changed into a good and vertuous person: he is of a rivelled, pale, lean and poor filly aged man, and such P

become, a lovely, fair, beautiful, and personable youth, pleasant both to God and man. Minerva in Homer rid Ulyse: from his wrinkles, his baldness, and ill-favored deformity, that he might appear full of savor and amiable: but this wise man of their making, albeit withered old age leave not his body, but contrariwise increase fill and grow more and more with all the discommodicies that follow it, continuing still for example-sake, bunch backts, if he were so before, one eyed, and conthess, yet forsoth is not for all this, soul, deformed and ill-favored. For like, as by report, the Bettils fly from good and sweetodors, feeking after shinking sents, even to the Stoicks love (conversing with the most soul ill-favored and deformed, after that by their sapience and wisdom they be turned into all beauty and favor) departed and gent from them. With these Stoicks, he who in the morning haply was nost wicked, will prove in the evening a right honest man: and who went to bed sooils, ignorant, injurious, outragious, intemperate, yea a very slave, a poor and needy begger, will rise the morrow morning, a King, rich, happy, chaffe, just, firm and constant, nothing at all subject to variety of opinions: not for that he hash all on a sudden put forth a beard, or become under grown, as in yong and tender body: but rather engendred in a weak, soft, effeminate and inconstant soul, a perset minde, perfect understanding, soversign prudence, a divine disposition, comparable to the gods, a feetled fettled and affured Science, not wandring in opinions and an immutable and fledfall habitude: neither went that lewd wick: dnefs of his away by little and little, but all at once (I may well near fay) he was transmuted from a most vile beast into a demy-god, a Dzemon, or a very god indeed. For so some once as a man hath learned verue in the Stoicks School, he may say thus unto himself:

Wish what then wilt, and what thou list to crave, All shall be done; do thou but ask and have.

This vertue brings riches, this carrieth with it royalty, this giveth good fortune, this makes men happy, flanding in need of nothing, contented in themselves, although they have not in all the world so much as a single drachime of silver, or one grey great. Yet are the fables of Poass devised with more probability and likelihood of reason: for never do they leave Hercules altogether destitute of necessaries: but it seemeth that he bath with him always one living source or other, out of which there cunneth etermore foison and plenty for himself and the company about him. But he who hath once gotten the Goat Amalbie aby the head, and that plentiful horn of abundance which the Scoicks talk of, he is rich incontinently, and yet begged his bread and vistuals of others; he is a King, although for a piece of money he teacheth how to resolve Syllogisms: he onely possesse as King, although for a piece of money he putch his meal and meet with the silver that many times he taketh up of the Usurer, or else craveth at their hends who have just nothing of their own to give. True it is indeed, that The filver the could be known; counterseiting all that he could

To make himself a Begger poor, Like one that went from doot to door.

Whereas he that is come out of the Stoicks School, crying aloud with open mouth, I onely am a King, I am rich, and none but I, is feen oftentimes at other mens doors flanding with this note,

Give Hipponax a cloak, his naked corps to fold,

For that I quake and shiver much for cold.

The Contradictions of Stoick Philosophers.

The Summary.

Detearch leing of the Academick Sell, direlly centrary to the Stoicks, examineth in this Treatife the opinions of those his adversaries, and sowed by proper testimonies out of their own writings, and name-by of Chrylippus their principal Dolar, that there is nothing sirm and certain in all their Dolarine; perwing and ssir to this end the chief points of all the parts of Philosophy, not binding himself precisely to may special order, but proposing matters according as they come into his remembrance, or were presented to his yet. Moreover, in the recital of their repugnances and contraditions, be intermingled certain expositions, to aggravate the absurding of this Sell of his adversaries, and to withdraw the Keader from them: which is a very proper and singular maner of declaiming and disputing against invertate errors, and such is bave a great name in the world: for in soening that those who are reputed most able and sufficient to teach and maintain them, show now what they say, and do consound themselves; is as much sit or repractively man who dash adhere amolbom, with this imputation, that his is deprived of common sinse, in receiving that so herwise them twenty, wherein their very masters are not well resolved, or admitting that which they praisis, otherwise them twey so:

Inflabove all things, I would have to be seen a conformity and accord between the opinions of men and their lives: for it is not so necessary, that the Orator, according as Lysias saith, and the Law, should sound the same note, as requisite that the life of a Philosopher should be conformable and consonant to his words and Doctriue; for the speech of a Philosopher should be contary and particular Law which he imposeth upon himself, if it be so as men esteen, that Philosopher is a voluntary and particular Law which he imposeth upon himself, if it be so as men esteen, that Philosopher is (at no doubtit is) the prosession of that which is serious, grave and of weighty importance, and not a gamessome foort, or vain and toyish prating, devided onely for to gain glory. Now we see, that Zeno himself bath written much by way of disputation and discourse; Cleanter likevise, and Chrysspips most of all, concerning the Politique Government of Commonster likevise, and Chrysspips most of all, concerning the Politique Government of Commonster likevise, and constituent all on the pleading at the bar: and yet look into all their lives throughout, you shall not sinde that ever any of them were Captains and Commanders, neither Law-givers nor Senators, and Counsellors of State, neyet Orators or Adversaries pleading judicially in Court before the Judges; nay, they were not so much as employed in any War, bearing Arms, and performing Martial Service for the desence of they Countrey; you shall not finde (1 say) that any of them was ever sent in embassage, or bestowed any publick larges or donative to the people;

people but remained all the time of their life (and that was not short, but very long) in a strange and people out remained and the control of the herb Lotus in Homer, and torreign Country, feeding upon reft and repole, as if they had talked of the herb Lotus in Homer, and forgotten their native foil, where they spent their time in writing Books, in holding Discourses, and in walking up and down. Hereby it manifefly appeareth, that they lived rather according the fayings and writings of other, then answerable to that which themselves judge and confest to be their mgs and writings of other, the whole course of their life in that quiet repose, which Epicurus and Hieronymus fo highly praise and recommend. And verily to prove this be a truth, Chrysippus himself in his fourth book entituled, Of Lives, is of opinion, and so hath put down in writing, that a Scholastical life, to wit, that of idle Students, differeth not from the life of voluptuous persons. And to this purposel think it not amis to alledge the mans speech word for word: They (quoth he) who think that this Scholastical and idle life of Students even from the first beginning, is most of all beseeming and agreeable to Philosophers, in my conceit, seem much deceived weening as they do, that they are to Philosophers fophize for their passine or recreation, and so to draw out in length the whole course of their life at their book in their fludies, which is as much as to fay in plain terms, as to live at cafe and in pleasure.

Neither is this opinion of theirs to be hindred and dissembled 5 for many of them give our as much openly, howfoever others, and those not a few deliver the same more obscurely; and yet where is he who grew old and aged more in this idle Scholastical life, then Chrysippus, Cleanthes, Diogenes, Zen, and Antipater? who forfook and abandoned even their native Countreys, having no cause or occasion in the world to complain of or to b: discontent; onely to this end, that they might lead their live more sweetly at their pleasure, studying and disputing with ease, and letting out their girdle flack as they lift themselves. To approve this this that I say, Aristocrean the Disciple of Chrysippus, and one of his familiar friends, having caused a Statue of brass to be erected for him, set over it these elegant Verses in manner of an Epigram:

Lo, what maner of person was Chrysppus, an aged man, a Philosopher, one who praised the life of Kings, and of those who are convertant in weal publike, and he who thought there was nodifference between the idle Scholassical life, and the voluptuous. And yet others among them, as many linean, as deal in State affairs, are found to be more repugnant and contradictory to the resolutions of their own Sect: for they bear rule as chief Magistrates, they are Judges, they be Senators, and set in Counsel, they ordain and publish Laws, they punish Malefactors, they honor and reward those that do well: as if they were Cities indeed wherein they govern and manage the State; as if those were Senators, Counsellors, and Judges, who yeerly always are by sort created, or otherwise, to such places; Captains and Commanders who are elected by the suffrages and voyces of Citizens; and as if those were to be held good Laws which Califbenes; Lycurgus and Solm made: and yet the same men they avow and maintain to have been witless tools, and lewd persons. Thus you see, show albeit they administer the common-weal, yet they be repugnant to their own Dactine.

Letriuc.

I la like manner Antipater, in his Book of the difficution between Cleambes and Chryfippus, reporteth, that Zeno and Cleambes would never be made Citizens of Albens, for fear for foot held they might be thought to offer injury to their own Countrey. Now if they herein did well, let Chryfippus go, and fay we nothing of him that he did amifs, in causing laimelft to be enrolled and immatriculated in the number of Athenian Citizms: for I will not frand much upon this point, onely this I hold, that there is a strange and wonderful repugnancy in their deeds and actions, who refere still the bare names of their narive Countreys, and yet bereave the same of their very persons and their lives, conversing so far off in forreign Lands: much like as if a man who hash cast off and put away his lawful wedded wife, should dwell, live and lie ordinary with another as his Concubine, yea, and beget children of her body, and yet will in no wise espouse her, and contract marriage with her, lest, for sooth, he might seem to do wrong and injury to the sormer. Furthermore, Chrysippus in his Treatife that he made of Rhetorick, writing thus, that a wise man will in such for plead, make Orations to the people, and deal in State-matters, as it riches, reputation and health were simply good things, testifieth hereby and consessed that he is precepts and resolutions inducemen not to go forth of doors, nor to intermeddle in Politick and Civil affairs, and so by consequence that their Dostriae and Precepts cannot fort well with practice, nor be agreeable unto the actions of this life.

Moreover, this is one of Zew's Quodibets or Positions, That we ought not to build Temples to the honor of the gods; for that a Temple is no such holy thing, nor so highly to be esteemed, considering it is the workmanship of Masons, Carpenters, and other Artificers: neither can any work of such Artizans be prize at any worth. And yet even they who avow and approve this as a wise speech of his, are themselves probested in the religious mysteries of those Churches; they mount up to the Castle, and frequent there the sacred Temple of Muerwa; they adore the sines and images of the gods; they adore the Temple with Chaplets and Garlands, notwithstanding they be the works of Masons, Carpenters, and such like Mechanical persons. And will these men seen indeed to reprove the Epicureans, as contrary to themselves, who denying that the gods be occupied or imployed in the Government of the world, yet offer sacrifice unto them, when as they check and refute themselves much more in facrificing unto the gods, within their temples and upon their alters, which they maintain that they ought not to ftand at all, nor once to have been built?

Zons putteth down and admitteth many vertues according to their feverall differences, like as Plato doth, to wit, prudence, fortitude, temperance and juffice; faying that they be all in very deed, and in nature infeperable nor diffined admider: howbeit in reason divers and different one from another. And again when he would seem to define them severally one after another, he faith, That fortitude is prudence in the extention of matters: justice is prudence in the distribution of things, &c. as if there were no more but one sole vertue, which according to divers relations, unto affairs and actions, see-th to differ and admit distinction. So you see, that not Zono alone seemeth to be repugnant unto him-self in these matters, but Chrisppus also, who reproveth Ariston for saying, that all vertues are nothing else but the divers habitudes and relations of one and the same, and yet defendeth Zono when he define the action in this wise by it self.

As for Cleambes in his commentaries of nature, having fet this down, that the vigour and firminds of things, is the illifion, and finding of fire, which if it be in the foul fo fufficient, that if is able to perform the duties prefenced unto it, is called firength and power, he annexthe afterwards the ferwords: And this very power and firength (quoth he) when as it is imployed in fuch objects wherein amm its to perfift, and which he ought to contain, is called Continency; if in things to be endured and supported, then it is named Fortiude; if in elimation of worthiness and firength of which the demonstration of Justice; if in choices or refusal, it carrieth the name of Temperance. Against him who was the authour of this fentence.

Forbear thy sentence for to pass, and judgement see thou stay, Untill such time as thou hast heard what parties both can say.

Zeno alledged such a reason as this on the contrary side. Whether the Plaintife, who spake in the sint place bath plainty proved his cause or no, there is no need at all to hear the second, for the materias an end already, and the question determined: or whether he hath not proved it, all is one; for it is even the same case, whether he that is cited be so subborn as not to appear for to be heard, or sibrappear, do nothing else but cavill and wrangle: so that prove he, or prove he not his cause, needlest its to hear the second plead. And yet even he who made this Dilemma, and wrote against the Books of Policy and common wealth that Plato composed, taught his scholars how to associate avoid such Sophisticall arguments, yea, and exhorted them to learn Logick with all diligence, subling the art which showeth them how to perform the same. Howbeit amain might come upon himby way of objection in this manner: Cettes, Plato hath either proved or else not proved those point which he handled in his Policicks: but whether he did or no, there was no necessity at all to write against him as you did; for it was alrogether vain, needless, and superfluour. And even the same may be said of Sophisticall arguments and cavillations.

Chriftppu is of opinion, that yong Scholars and fludents should first learn those arts which concern speech, as Grammar, Logick, and Rhetorick; in the second place Morall Sciences; in the third Natural Philosophy; and after all their, in the last place, to hear the doctrine as rouching Religion and the Gods: which being delivered by him in many passages of his writings, it shall be sufficient to alledge that only which he hath written thus word for word in the third book of his Lives. First and formost (quoth he) it seemeth unto me, according to the doctrine of our ancients, that of Philosophicall speculations there be three kinds; Logicall, as souching spech; Ethicall, concerning manners; and Physicall, belonging to the nature of things. of which, that which is respective muo speech ought to precede and be ranged sirft; secondly, that which treateth of manners; thirdly that which handleth naturall causes. Now of these Physicks and naturall arguments, the last is that which treateth of God: and this is the reason that the Precepts and Traditions of divine matters and of religion, they called marmes, as one would say, the very last and coming in the end. Howbert, this treatise of the Gods, which by his faying ought to be fet last, himself in the very same book, rangeth above manners, and setteth before all other morall questions. For neither seemeth he to speak of the ends, nor of Juffice, nor of good and evill things, nor of Marriage, nor of the nouriture and education of Children, ne yet of law nor of the government of the Common-wealth, in any fore; burar they who propose and publish decrees unto Cities and States, make some preamble before of good luck, or happy fortune; so he useth the preface of Hapites; of fatall destiny, of Divine providence: also, that there being but one world, the same doth conflit and is maintained by one mighty power. Which points no man doth simily believe, nor can be resolutely perswaded in, might be made to the conflict and the same an unleffe he wade deeply, into the profoundest secrets and discourses of all natural Philosophy. But heack, on loctects you a little, to that which he faith of these maters, in his third book of the Gods: It is not possible (quoth he) to find our any other fountain, and original beginning of Justice, than stoin Justice and common nature: for from thence it must need be, that every such thing is derived, if that we mean to diffeourse of good things and evill. Again, in his treatise of natural positions, there ino other way, or at leastwife not a better, of proceeding to the discourse of good things and bad, nor of vertues, nor of foveraign felicity, then from common nature, and administration of the world.

Moreover, as he goeth forward in another place, We are to annex and adjoyn hercunto (quothhr) Moreover, as ne goeth forward and an artestife of good and evil things, confidering there is not a better beginning thereof, nor yet a reference a treatife of good and evil things, confidering there is not a better beginning thereof, nor yet a reference and relation more proper: neither is the fpeculation and feience of nature in any other respect requiand relation more proper: fite or necessary to be learned, but only for to know the difference of good and evil. And therefore accornte or necessary to be scattled, out only to to another the fore, and also followeth after moral things; or to ding to Chrysippus, this natural science both goeth before, and also followeth after moral things; or to fay a truth at once in more express terms, it were a strange and difficult inversion of order, to hold. that it is to be placed after them, confidering that without it were impossible to comprehend any of the other: and a very manifest repugnance it were to affirm, that science natural is the beginning of moral, which treateth of good and evil, and yet ordain nevertheless, that it should be taught not before, but after it. Now if any man fay unto me, that Chrysippus in his book entituled, Theuse of speech, hath written, that he who first learneth Logick, I mean the knowledge and Philosophyconcerning words, ought not altogether for to forbear the learning of other parts, but that he ought to take a talte of them, according as he the means thereto, well may he speak a truth, but withal, confirm he shall my accusation still of hisfault: for he fighteth with himself, in ordering one while that a man should learn in the last place and after all, the science that treateth of God, as if that were the reason why it was called 72477, which is as much as 7706 7749, that is to fay, Final; another while teaching clean contrary, that the same is to be learned even with the very first, and at the beginning! for then farewel all order for ever, and welcome confusion, if we must learn all things hudled together at all times. But yet this is not the worft, for having fet this down for a resolution : That the doctrine as touching good things and evil, ought to begin and proceed from the knowledge of God; yet, he will not have them who fettle themselves and enter into the study of moral Philosophy, to take their beginning there: but that in learning this, to catch fomewhat of that by the way, even as much as they have easie means to come by; and asterwards to repass from morall Philosophy unto Theologie, without which (he faith) there can be neither entrance nor progress in the knowledge

Moreover (he faith) that, To dispute of one and the same question, pro contra, to and fro, he disalloweth not simply and in generality: but his advise is, to use the same so warily and with such discretion, as otherwhiles oratours do in pleading, when they alledge the reasons of their adversaries, not to uphold and maintain the fame, but only for to refute & disprove that liklihood and probability which they pretend: For otherwife (quoth he) thus to do, is the manner of those Skepticks, who be alwaies doubtful, and withhold their confent in every thing : a meer shift that serveth their turn for whatsoever they hold : but as for those who would work and establish in mens hearts, a certain fcience, according to which they might undoubtedly guide and conduct themfelves, they ought to found and fearch the contrary, and from point to point by stepmeal, to direct their novices newly entred, even from the beginning to the very end : wherein there falleth out otherwhiles fit opportunity to make mention of contrary fentences and opinions, for to refute and resolve that which might feem to have apparence of truth; as the manner is in pleading before Judges: for these bethe very words and proper terms that he useth. Now what an absurd and impertinent a thing it is, that Philosophers should think they were to put down the contrary opinions of other Philosophers, and not withal, their reasons and arguments, but only as advocates pleading at the bar to disable and weaken their proofs, and so to weary their adversaries; as if disputation were only to win the honour of victory, and not to find out a truth: we have elsewhere discoursed against him sufficiently. But that himself not here and there in his disputations, but oftentimes and in many places hath confirmed with might and main, yea, and with fo great affeveration and contention, contrary refolutions, unto his own opinions, that it were a right hard matter for any man to difcern, which of them he approveth moft, they themselves in some fort do say, who admire the subtility of the man, and thevivacity of his spirit, who also both think and stick not to affirm, that Carneades spake nothing of his own invention, but by the help and means of which argum:nts Chrysppus uled to provehis own affertions, he returned the same contrariwise upon himself to consute his precepu, insomuch as estsoons in disputation he would, alluding to a verse in Homer, cry out aloud in the manner.

> Unhappy man, thus for to do: Thine own pure strength will work, thy wo-

as if he lay open and minifred great advantages and means againft himfelf, to those who wentabout for to infringe and calumniate his opinions. But as touching those Treatifes and discourse which he hath put forth; and fet out againft ordinary custome, his followers do of gloriaully boast and joy, that they give out, if all the books of the Academiques that ever lived, were laid together, they deserved not to be compared with that which Chrysppus wrote in calumniation of the fines: an evident sign either of their ignorance who fay soor else of their own blind felt-love. Howheit, certain it is, that afterwards being desirous to defend euthome and the sentences, he was found much inferiour to himself, and the latter Treatife came far short of the former, and was nothing at all so pithys; in such fort as he is contradictory and repugnant to himself: while he alwales prescribeth and willeth to confer and oppose contrary sentences, not as one patronizing any but making an oftentation that they be false: and afterwards she weeth himself to be a more vehement accuser, then a defender of his own proper sentences; and counselling others to take head of repugnant.

nant and contrary disputations, as those which distract and impeach their preception, himself is nant and Control of the state o ofhis lives, where he writeth thus: We are not rashly nor without good respect and advisement to damit and allow repugnant disputations and contrary opinions to be proposed, nor to answer those probable arguments which are brought against true sentences; but herein we must warily go to work, and carry our felves fo, as fearing alwaics least the hearers being thereby distracted and diverted, let go this apprehention and conception, and be not of fufficient capacity to comprehend their folintions, but after fuch a feeble fort, as that their comprehensions be ready to falter and shake, considering that even they who customably comprehend sensible objects, and other things which depend of senses, quickly forgo the fame, being diffracted as well by Megarian interrogatories, as by others more forcible, and in greater number. Now would I gladly demand of these Stoicks, whether they think these Megarian interrogatories more puissant than those which Chrysppus hath written in fix books; or rather Chrysppus himself would be asked the question. For mark I pray you, what he hath written of the Megarian disputation in his book intituled; The use of speech, after this manner. Such a thing as befell in the disputation between Stilpo and Menedemus, both renowned personages for their learning and wildom, and yet the whole manner of their arguing is now turned to their reproach and plain mockery, as if their arguments were either very groffe, or elfe too captious and fophifficall: and yet good Sir these arguments which it pleaseth you to scorn and tearm the reproach of those who make such interrogatories, as containing in them notorious lewdnesse, you fear lest they should divert any from preception. And even your own self writing so many books as you do against custome whereunto you have adjoyned whatfoever you could devife and invent, labouring to furmount and surpasse Arcesilaus; did you never expect and look to scare and terrific any of the Readers that should light upon them? For Chrysippus verily useth not onely slender and naked arguments in disputing against custome, but as if he were an advocate pleading at the bar, moveth affections being passionate himself, breaking out estsoons into these tearmes of giving the fool, and imputing vanity and sottilinesse; and to the endthat he might leave no place for contradiction at all, but that he delivereth repugnances and speaketh contraries, thus bath he written in his Positions Naturall. A man may very well, when he hath once perfectly comprised athing, argue alittle on the contrary fide, and apply that defence which the matter it felf doth afford: yea and otherwhiles, when he doth comprehend neither the one nor the other, difcourse of either of them pro & contra, as much as the cause will yeeld. Alfoin that treatife of his concerning the use of speech, after he had faid, we ought not to use the power and faculty of disputation, no more then arms or weapons, in things that tend to no purpose, and when the case requireth it not, he addeth soon after these words; For we ought to imploy the gift of reason and speech to the finding out of truth, and such things as resemble it and not contrariwise; howfoever many there be that are wont fo to do. And peradventure by these Many, he meaneth those Academicks, who ever doubt and give no affent to any thing: and they verily, for that they comprehend neither the one nor the other, do argue on both parts to and fro, that it is perceptible : as if by this only or speciall meaner the truth yeelded a certain comprehension of it self, if there were nothing in the world comprehensible. But you who excuse and blame them, writing the contrary to that which you conceive as touching custom, and exhorting others to do the same, & that with an affectionate defence, do plainly confest, that you use the force of speech and eloquence, in things not only unprofitable, but also hurtfull, upon a vain ambitious humour of shewing your ready wit, like to some young

These Stoicks affirm, that a good deed, is the Commandement of the Law, and Sin the prohibition of the Law: and therefore it is that the Law forbiddeth Fools and lewd Folk to do many things, but prescribeth them nothing; for that indeed they are not able to do ought well. And who feeth not that impossible it is for him who can do no vertuous act, to keep himself from Sin and Transgression? Therefore they make the Law repugnant to it self, if it command that which to perform is impossible, and forbid that which men as not able to avoid. For he that is not able to live honeftly, cannot chuse but bear himself dishoneftly; and whosoever he be, that cannot be Wise, must of necessity become a Fool: and even them selves do hold that hole Lawes which are prohibitive, say the same thing, when they forbid one, and command likewise another. For that which saith, thou shalt not steal, saith verily the same, to wit, Seal not, but it forbiddeth withall to fteal; and therefore the Law forbiddeth Fools and lewd Persons nothing, for otherwise it should command them somewhat. And thus they say that the Physician biddeth his Apprentile or Chyrurgion to cut or to cauterize, without adding thereto these words, handsomely, moderately, and in good time. The Musician likewise commanderh his scholar to fing or play upon the Harp a leffon, without putting thereto, in tune, accord and good measure. Howbeit, they punish and chastice those that do amisse and contrary to the rules of art, for that they were willed and enjoyed to do the thing well, but they did it ill. And even so a wife min commanding his fervant to fay or do a thing, if he punish him for doing it untowardly, out of season, and not as he ought, certain it is that he commanded him to perform a good duty, and not a mean and indifferent action. Now if wife men command fools and lewd persons to do things indifferent, what should hinder them but that the commandements of the lawes may be sembla-

Moreover, that inftint or naturall motion which is called open, according to him, is nothing else but the reason of man, inciting him do a thing, as himself hath written in his treatife of the Law, Ergo, that Diversion, contrariwise called Assess, can be nothing else bus reason withdrawing a man from the doing of a thing: and therefore that inclination is a reasonable inclination; and this wary caution, is as much as the reason of a wise man, forbidding him to do a thing; for to beware, and to take heed, is the part and property of wife men and not fooler. If then the reason of a wife man be one thing, and the Law another, wife men have this vary caution repugnant unto the Law: but in case Law, and the reason of a wise man be both one, it will be found that the Law forbiddeth wisemen to do those things, which they doubt and be affraid of. To foolish and wicked persons (quoth Chrysippus) there is nothing profitable, neither hath such an one, use or need of ought, Having delivered this fentence in his first book of perfect duties or offices, he commeth afterwards and faith, that utility or commodiouspesse and grace pertain and reach unto mean and indifferent things, whereof according to the Stoicks doctrine there is not one profitable : and more then that, he faith there is nothing proper, nothing meet and convenient for a foolish lewd man: and so by consequence it followeth upon these words; there is nothing strange, nothing unfitting for a wife and honest man, like as nothing fit and familiar for a lewd fool: for as goodnesse is proper to one, so is lewdnesse to the other. How commeth it then to pass that he maketh our heads to ask again, with telling us so often in all his books as well of naturall Philosophy as morall, that presently from our nativity and birth, we be affectionate to our felves, to our proper members, and to the iffue descending from us? and in the first book of Justice he faith, that even wild beasts are propence and affected unto their young, according as their need and necessity requires, all fave fishes: for their yound fry are nourified by themselves. But there is no sense, where is no sensible object, nor appropriation, where bothing is proper and familiar: for surely this appropriation seemeth to be the sense and perception of the middle in the sense of the se

tion of that which is familiar. And this opinion is comformable to their principles. Moreover, Chrysppus, albeit in divers places he write many things contrarily, yet he accorde the this fentence manifeftly, that there is no one vice greater, nor fin more grievous than another; as also reciprocally, there is not one vertue more excellent, nor one vertuous deed which (they call perfect duty) better than another, confidering that he hath this in the first book of Nature : that like as it befermeth Jupiter well, to magnific and glorific himfelf and his life, as alfo if we may fo fay, to bear his head a lott, highly to effeem his own greatneffe, and to speak big, considering he leadeth a life worthy of grand eloquence and hauty speech : even so it besiteth and becommeth all honest men to do the like, confidering that in no respect they beinferiour to Jupiter. And yet himself again in the third book of Justice saith, that those who affirm pleasure to be the end and soveraign good of man, overthrow Jattice; but who foever fay it is simply good, do not destroy Justice. And the very words which he uleth, be thefe : Peradventure (quoth he) it may be, that if we leave unto Pleasure this attribute, To be simply and onely good, although it be not the end of all good things, and that honefty and vertue is of the kind of those things which be eligible for themselves: haply, by this meanes we may save Justice, in esteming Honesty and Justice to be a more perfect and absolute good thing than is Pleasure: but in case it be fo, that the thing only which is honest is good, he erreth much who affirmeth that pleasureis good; howbeit, leffe then he who should fay, that it is the end of all good things; for that as the one doth abolith and destroy utterly all Justice, the other doth so preserve and maintain it: for according to the latter of the twain, all human fociety perisheth, whereas the former reserveth yet some place for bonnty and civill humanity. I let pass to relate what he saith in the booke entituled, Of Jupiter, namely, that vertues grow, that they also pass, because I would not be thought to lie at vantage, and to catch at words; howfoever Chryfippus himfelf in this kind of reprehension dealeth biterly with Plate and other Philosophers, for taking hold of words: but whereas he forbiddeth to praise all that is done vertuously, he giveth us to understand, that there is some difference in duties and offices. Now this is the very tox in his treatife of Jupiter. For albeit vertuous acts be commendable, yet we are not to infer thereupon and fay, that we ought to commend all that feemeth to proceed from vertue, as namely, to praise for a valliant act, the stiffe stretching out of the finger; or for temperance and continency, the abstinence from an old trot, who hath one toot already in her grave; or for prudence, to understand aright and without errour, that there will not make four : for he that went in hand to praise and commend a man for fact things as the fe, should shew himself to be very bald and absurd even in the highest degree. And as much as this in a manner writteh he in the third book of the gods: For I think verily (quoth he) that the praises of such matters be impercinent and absurd, although they seem to depend of vertue, as namely, to torbear an old trot now at the pits briok, or to abide a flie-biting. What other accufer flould he bok for then of his opinions, but himself: for if it be fo, that he is abfurd who commendeth these things, then must he be thought much more absurd, who supposeth each one of these vertuous deeds to be not only great, but also most magnificent. For it be a valliant act to endure the biting of a flie; & likewise the part of a chaft & continent person, to abstain from carnal dealing with an old woman ready to drop unto her grave; then it makes no matter, but it is all one, to praise an honest man as well for one thing as another. Moreover, in his second book of Friendship, when as he giveth a precept, that we ought not to dissolve amities for every fault or defect, he useth these very tearnes : For there be faults (quoth he) which we must overpass quite, & make no stay at them ; other there be again, whereat we should a little stand, and take offince; and others besides, which require more chastisement; but some there are which we must think sufficient to break friendship for ever. And more then all this, in the same book he saith, that we ought to converse and be acquainted with some more, and with others less according as they be our friends more or less, which difference and diversity extendeth very far, insomuch as some are worthy of such an amitty, others of a greater; some deserve thus much trust and considence, others more than it: and so it is in other matters semblable. And what other is his drift in all these places, but to put a great difference between those things, for which friendships are engendred? And yet in his Book of Honeshy, to shew that there is nothing good, but that which is honest, he delivereth these words: a good thing is elligible and to be desired: that which is commendable, is shortly with a good with the same of the summed the summed that the summed the summed the summed that the summed the summed that the summed to the summed to the summed the summed to the s

Thus you see how he sheweth himself in most part of his writings; and yet in his disputations which he holdeth against others, he is much more carelesse to be contrary and repugnant to himself: for in his Treatise which he made, as touching exhortation, reproving Plato for sayings, that it was not expedient for him to live at all, who is not taught, nor knoweth not how to live, he writeth in these very, Terms: This speech of his (quoth he) is both contradictory and repugnant to it self; and besides, had no force one or efficacy at all to exhort: for first and foremed in thewing as that it were expedient or the practice or study of philosophy, because it is not possible for a mun to philosophize, unselfe he live: neither can he become wise, survive he never so longist he lead an evil and ignorant life. And a little after he saith further: That it is as meet and convenient also even for lewd and wicked persons to remain alive. But I care not much to set down his very words: First of all, like as vertue barely in its solution of the survive his set of the survive has been sufficiently and to the survive his life. What need we now turn over other books of Chrysspus, and drip leaf by leaf, to prove how contrary and repugnant he is to himself-for even in these which we now cite and alledge, he cometh out otherwhiles with this saying of Ansistents, for which he commendeth him, namely, that a man is to be provided either of wit to understand, or else of a with to under-hang h me solution.

The bounds of vertue first come nigh, Or else make choise before to die.

And what other meaning is there of these words, but this, that it is more expedient for soolish and lewd persons to be out of the world, than to live: and in one passage, seeming to correct Theogenis: He should not (quoth he) have said up writer specialty. See

A man from poverty to flie, (O Cyrus) ought himfelf to cast Fleadlong from rocks most steep and high, Or into sea as deep and vast.

But rather thus, xell xanias piuporra, &cc.

A man from fin and vice to flie, &c. What other things elfe feemeth he to do, than to condemn and scrape out of other mens writings, the same things, propositions and sentences, which himself hath inserted in his own books? For he reprove the Plate when he proveth and sheweth, that it is better not to live at all, than to lead a life in wickedness or ignorance: and in one breath he giveth counfell to Theeguis to fee down in his Poefie, that a man ought tofling himfelf dow headlong into the deep fea, or to break his neck from fome high rock for to avoid in and wickedness. And praising as he did Antifibenes for sending sools and witless folk to an halter wherewith to hang'themselves; heblamed him nevertheleffe who said, that vice was a sufficient cause, wherefore we should shorten our lives. Moreover in these books against Plato himself, concerning Juflice, he leapeth directly at the very first into a discourse as touching the gods: and faith: That Cephalus did not divert menwell from evil doing, by the fear of the gods: affirming moreover, that the discourse which he made as touching divine vengeance, might easily be infringed and refuted, for that of it selfe is ministreth many arguments and probable reasons on the contrary fide; as if the same resembled for all the world the fabuloustales of Acce and Alphito, wherewith women are wont to fcare their little children, and to keepethem from doing shrewd turns. Thus deriding, and traducing, backbiting Plate, he praiseth elsewhere, and in many places else alledgeth these verses out of Euripides :

Well, well, though some this dottrine de deride, Be sure, in heaven with other gods besides, Sits Jupiter, the deeds of men who see. And will in time revenged surely be.

femblably, in the first booke of Justice, when he had alledged these verses here out of Hesiodus, then Saturnes sonne, god Jupiter, great plagues from beaven did send, Even dearth and death, both which, of all the people made an end. Dd 3 he faith, that the gods proceed in this wife, to the end that when the wicked be thus punished, others also advertised and taught by their example, might beware how they commit the like, or at leastwise for LG.

What should I say moreover, how in this Treatise of justice, having affirmed, that those who hold pleafure to be good, but not the foveraign end of good, may in fome fort withal preferve and mainpleasure to be good, but not the towerage end of good, may intend to the waters preserve and maintain justice, for, so much be hath put down in these very terms: For haply, admitting pleasure to be good, although not the supremary good or the end: and honesty to be of the kind of those things, which good, although not the supremary good to the end; and honesty to be of the kind of those things, which good good the supremary good that which is honest and justice, we may by that means save justice, while we permit and allow that which is honest and justice to be greater good than pleasure. Having (1 say) delivered and allow that which is honettand jut; to nea greater good man pressure. rraving (1 lay) delivered the fame allo in his books of pleafure: yet in his Treatife against Plato, reproving him for rauging health in the number of good things, he affirmeth, that not only juffice, but also magnanimity, temperance, and all other vertues are abolithed and perish, in case we hold that either pleasure, or health, or any other thing whatsforeers, can be numbered and reputed among good things, unless the same behouses. Now as touching the apologic or answer that may be made in defence of Plato, I have elsewhere the platon of the same behouse it was included to the form of the same behavior in was included. nonent. Now as concuring the aponogue of animal man by the man in the second of the second of the where written against Chrysppas: but even in this very place there is manifelly to be seen, a regugnative or and contradiction against himself; confidering that one while he saith, that justice may stand well enough, if a man suppose pleasure joyned with honesty to be good; and another while contrariwife, enouge, it aman impose preame poster any thing elle to be good, but only that which is hough, he finded fault with all those, who repute any thing elle to be good, but only that which is hough, as if thereby they abolished and overthrew all vertues. And because he would leave no means at all to falve and fave his contradictions, writing of justice against Aristotle, he challengeth him for untruth in that he affirment, that if pleafure were granted to be the foveraign good, both juffice were over-thrown, and therewith also every vertue beindes, for this is certain (quoth he) that those who are of this opinion, do indeed abolift juffice; howbeit I see no let why other vertues may not fand, if not those which be of themselves expetible, yet such at leastwise as be good and verteous really. And thereupon he proceedeth prefently to name them every one feverally. But it were not amile to recitchis own words, as he delivered them : For suppose (quoth he) that by this discourse and reason, Pleafure feem the very end of all good things, yet we are not to infer hereupon, that all is compiled under it: and therefore we must fay, that neither any wersue is to be defired, nor vice to be eschewed for it fell, but all these things are to be referred unto a scope and mark proposed: and yet in the mean time what should hinder, but that Fortitude, Prudence, Continence, Patience, and other such vertues, may be good and expetible, like as their contraries bad and to be avoided. What man tues, may be good and expectible, like as their collections but and to be avoided. What man therefore was there ever, in his speeches and disputations more rafth and audacious, than he? Confidering that he charged the two Princes of Phylosophers with imputations: the one for abolishing all vertues, in that he confested not that only to be good which is hopeft: and the other, in that if pleafure were supposed, and set down to be the end of good things; the thought not that all vertues except only judice, might substitute the maintained? what a wonderful liberty, and monstrous licentions are supposed to the configuration of the configurations. nels rather is this, in discoursing of one and the same subject matter, to ton and reprove that in Ariflote, which he fetteth down himself : and afterwards in accusing Plato, to subvert and undo the very fame? And yet in his demonstrations, at touching Justice, he affirmeth express that every perfect duty, is a lawful deed and a just action. Now, whatsoever in performed by Continence, by Patience, by prudence, or by Fortitude, is a perfett dusy, erge, it followeth, that it is likewife a lawful action. How chanceth it then that he leaveth not judice for them, in whom he admitteeth Prudence, Continence, and valour, confidering that all the acts which they perform according to these vertues, be perfect

Whereas Plate, in a certain place help writtens, that injustice being a certain intestine Edicion and corruption of the foul, never casteit off and loseth her power, even in those who have it within them: for the cause the average with the second of the foul, never casteit off and loseth her power, even in those who have it within them: for the cause the average with the second of the cause the average of the cause the average of the cause the average must need be to another: but do wrong or injury to himself? For (quoth he) all injury and outrage must need be to another: but asserting himself and what he had said, in that Treasse of his entituled, The demonstrations of Justice, he affirment, that who lovere doth injustice, wrongeth himself, and in offering nipury to another, doth himself wrong, in that he is the vary cause why himself strangessible the laws: where in unworthly he hurtest and wounded his own person. Lo what he said against Plate, disconting that injustice out of not be against a mans self, but against another: For to be particularly and privately injust, there must quoth he) be many such as speak contrary one unto another: another-wise this word injustice is taken as it is twee amongs many that are, in such for injusticing shate injustices in whereas no such makes can properly and firly agree to one alone, but in as much as his to another: whereas no such the himself with an ado the wrong and injury to himself: The law (quoth he) followed expressly, to be the author or cause of transgression; but to commit injustice is a transgression; but to the against and one, doth him wrong and injury: he therefore who wrongeth any other response to the such as the sum of wrong nimfelf. Furthermore, thus also he reasoneth: He that suffereth hurt and damage by another, woundeth and offendeth himself withal unworthily: and what is that else but to do wrong and nipury he therefore that received himself withal unworthily: and what is that else but to do wrong and ripury he therefore that received himself which and approve the health is most accordant not omas life, yea, and connexed as much as any thing else with those prenotions and anticipations, which by nature are inbred and ingenerate in us. for, so much hat he delivered in his third book of Exhorations: but in the first book he affirment quite contrary, that this dostrine doth divert and withdraw a man from all things else, as if they were of no moment, nor helpful and effectual any jot to the attaining of happines and soveraigne selicity. See how he accordeth herein with himself, when he affirment hat doctrine of his which plucketh us away from life, from health, from indolence and integrity of sense 3 and seachesh besides that whatsever we crave in our prayers at Gods hands, concern us not at all nor appertain unto us, to be most accordant unto humane life, and the common prenotions and inbred anticipations of knowledge abovefaid. But to the end that no man might denice that he is repugnant and contrary to himself, soe what he saith in his third book of justice. This is is (quoth he) that by reason of the surpassing grandure and beauty of our sentences, those matters which we deliver, seem since tales and devised sabets, exceeding mans power, and sare beyond humane nature. How can it be that any man should more plainly confess, that he is at war with himself, than he doth, who saith that his propositions and opinions, are so extravagant and transcendent, that they resemble counterfeit tales, and for their excellency furmount the condition and nature of man: and yet forfooth for all this, that they accord and agree passing well with humane life, yea and come nearest unto the fail shored prenotions and anticipations that are i

He affirmenth that the very effence and substance of felicity, is vice; writing and firmly maintaining in all his books of moral and natural phylosophy, that to live in vice, is as much as to live in mifery and wretchedness: but in the third book of Nature, having faid before that it were better and more expedient to live a senseless fool, yea though there were no hope that ever he should become wife, than not to live at all, he addeth afterwards thus much, For there be fuch good things in men, that in some fort the very evil things go before, and are better than the indifferent in the mids between. As for this, how he hath written elfewhere, that there is nothing expedient and profitable in fools, and yet in this place fetteth down in plain terms, that it is expedient to live foolith and fenfeleft, I am content to overpas; but seeing he saith now that evil things go before, and are better than the indifferent or mean (which with them of his fect are neither good nor ill) furely it is as much as if he affirmed that evil things are better than things not evil: and all one, as to fay that to be wretched, is more expedient than not to be wretched: and so by that means, he is of opinion, that not to be miterable is more emprofitable than to be miserable; and if it be more unprofitable, than also it must bemore hurtful and damageable. But being desirous in some fort to mollise this absurdity, and to falve this fore, be full metalthing evil things, these words: My meaning is not (quoth he) that they should go before and be preserved, but reason is the thing wherewith it is better to live, although a man should ever be a fool, than not to live at all.

First and formost then, he callett vice an evilthing, as also whatsoever doth participate of vice and nothing else. Now is vice reasonable, or rather to speak more properly, reason delinquent: so that to live with reason, if we be fools and void of wisedome, what is it els, but to live with vice? now to live as fools, is all one as to live wretched. Wherein is it then, and how commeth it about, that this should go before mean and indifferent things? Wherein is it then, and now comment acrooms, that this mound go determine and maintener tampes for it was not admitted that happy life flould go before mifery: neither was it ever any part (lay they) of Chryfippus his meaning to range and count among good things. To remain allus; no more than about bad. To depart this life: but he thought that these things were of themselves indifferent, and of a middle nature 3 in which regard otherwhiles it is meet for happy men to leave this life, and for wretches to continue alive. And what greater contrariety can there be, as touching things eligible orecuiable, than to fay that for them who are happy in the highest degree, it is fit and befeeming to lorgo and forfake the good things that be prefere, for want of fome one thing that is indifferent? And yet Chryfippus is of this mind, that no indifferent thing is of the own nature to be desired or rejedica; but that we ought to chuse that only which is good, and to shun that alone which is bad : loss according to their opinion, it comes to pals, that they never divers their deflignments or actions tothe pursuit of things desirable, nor the avoidance of things resusable; but another mark it is that they shoot and aim at, namely, arthosothings which they neither either nor chuse, and according thereto; they live and die. Christopus avoweth and confession, there is a great difference between good things and bad, as possibly may be; as needs there mosts, in case it be true, that as the one fort of them cause those in whom they are, to be exceeding happy, so the other, excream wretched and miserable. Now in the first book of the end of good things, he saith that as well good things as bad, be sensible; for these be his very words. That good and evil things be perceptable by sense, we most of necessity acknowledge upon these arguments : for not only the very passions indeed of the mind, together with their parts and feveral kinds, to wit, fadnefs, fear, and fuch like, be fenible; but also aman may have a fenfe of thest, adultery, and semblable sins; yea and of folly, of cowardile, and in one word, of all other vices, which are in number not a few: and not only joy, beneficence, and other dependances of vertuous offices, but also prudence, valour, and the rest of the vertuces, are object to the lenfe. But to let pass all other absurdities contained in these words, who will not confess, but that there is a meer contradiction in that which they delivered, as touching one that becomes a wife man, and knows not thereof? for, confidering that the prefent good is fentible, and much different from that which is evil, that one possibly should of a wicked person prove to be vertuous, and not know thereof, and not have sente of vertue being present, but to think that vice is still within him; how can this or the present the present and our of doubt, whether the present a and not have tense or vertue oning pretent, out to think that vice is all wathin thin; now can this otherwise be, but most abfurd? for either no man can be ignorant and out of doubt, whether he had all vertues together; or els he must confess, that shere is small difference and the same hard to be difan vertues together; or en ne mun comen, that there a since the state in a fact to be differented, between vice and vertue, felicity and infelicity, a right honeft life, and a most differented, between vice and vertue, felicity and infelicity, a right honeft life, and a most differented between vice and vertue, felicity and infelicity, and possess one for the other, without ever nest, in case a man should passifrom the one to the other, and possess one for the other, without ever

One work he wrote, entituled, Of lives, and the same divided into sour Books: in the sourch whereof, he saith, That a wife man medleth not with great affairs, but is occupied in his own business. witereor, ne tates, a nar a wite man incurrent not water great and the words to this purpose, nels only, without being curious to look into other mens occasions: his very words to this purpose, be thefe; For min own part, of this opinion I am, that a prudent man gladly avoideth affiring life, intermediath little, and in his own matters only; for to deal fimply in a mant own affairs, and to enjoy the control of the control ter into little bufiness in the world, be both alike commendable parts, and the properties of civil and ter into little bufiness in the world, be both alike commendable parts, and the properties of civil and ter into little bufiness in the world, be fame speeches or very like thereto, he hath delivered in the laudable persons. And in a manner the same speeches or very like thereto, he hath delivered in the taudance persons. And in a manner the same specials or very machiner, in some universed in the third Book of such things as be expetible, and to be chosen for themselues, in these terms: For in truth (quoth he) it seemeth, that the quite life should be without danger, and in perfect security, which frum (quom ne) it reemets, that the quiet me monator and understand. Wherein first and formost, it is evident, that he cometh very neer to the error of Epicarus, who in the government of the world is evident, that he cometh very neer to the error of Epicurus, who in the government of the wolld disavoweth divine Providence: for that he would have God to reft in repote, idle, and not luployed in any thing. And yet Chryfippus himfelf, in his first book of Lives faith: That a wise man willing, will take a kingdom upon him, yea, and think to make his gain and profit thereby: and if he not able to reign himfelf, yet he will at leastwise converse and live with a king, yea, go forth with him to war, like such as Hydanthribus the Scythian was, and Laucon of Pontus. But I will fet down him to war, like such as Hydanthribus the Scythian was, and Laucon of Pontus. But I will fet down him to war, like such as Hydanthribus the Scythian was, and Laucon of Pontus. But I will fet down him to war, like such as the such that we may see whether, like as of the treble and base strings, there arises the such as the such nance of an eight: fotherebe an accord in the life of a man, who hath chofen to live quietly without doing ought, or at leastwife to intermedle in few affairs, yea, and yes afterwards accompanieth the Scythians riding on horseback, and manageth the affairs of the kings of Bolphorus upon any occasion of need that may be preferred? For as touching this poynt (quoth he) that a wife man will go into warlike expeditions with princes, live, and converse with them, we will consider again thereof hereafter; being asit it, a thing that as fome upon the like argument imagine not, to we forthe femb-lable reasons admit and allow. And a little after: Not only with those who have proceeded well in the knowledg of vertue, and been (ufficiently inflitted and trained up in good manners, as were Hydanthyribus and Laucon abovefaid. Some there be who blame Califibenes for that he passed over respansive and Laucon adoverated. Some there be who diame Caustiness for that he paties over the seas to king Alexander into his camp, in hope to recdifie the city Olymbus, as Aristotle canted the city Stagyrs to be repaired, who highly commend Ephorus Xenocrates and Menedemus, who rejected Alexander: But Chryspeus drivet his wiseman by the head sorward, for his gain and profit, as far as to the city I anticapeum, and the deserts of Scyibia. And that this is (1 say) for his gain and profit he hand the season of the city of the season thewed before, by fetting down three principal means, befeeming a wife man for to practife and feek his gain by: the first by a kingdome, and the beneficence of kings; the second by this friends; and the third belies these, by teaching literature: and yet in many places he wearleth us with citing this

Only for things in number * twain.

But in his books of Nature he faith: That a wife man if he have loft the greatest riches that may be, often his poors of Nature he taith: I hat a white man is he have for the greater riches that may be, effected the loss no more than if it were but a fingle denier of filter, or one grey groat. Howbeit, him whom he hath there so highly extolled and puffed up with glory, here he taketh down and abafeth as much, even to make him a meer mercenary pediante, and one that is fain to teach a school: for he would have him to demand and exact his falary, formetime before hand of his scholar, when he enter the blockhool, and externally affect extends the first of the control of the school of th into his chool; and otherwhile after a certain prefixed time of his fehooling is come and gone: And this (quoth he) is the honester and more civil way of the swain; but the other is the surer, namely, to make him pay his money aforehand; for that delay and giving attendance, is fuble to oricine wrong and furian lofs; and thus much he uttereth in the every terms. Those teachers that be of the wifer fortscall for their schoolage and minervals of their scholar, not all after one manner, but diversly: a number of them, according as the prefent occasion requireth, who promise not to make them wife men, and that within a yeer; but undertake to do what lies in them, within a fet time agreed upon between them. And foon after, speaking of his wise man: He will (quoth he) know the best time: when to demand his penfion, to wit, whether incontinently lapon the entrance of his scholar, as the most part do; or to give day, and set down a certain time; which manner of dealing is more subject to receive injury, how foever it may feem more honest and civil. And how can a wife man, tell me now, be a despiser of money, in case he make a contract and bargain at a price to r. c.ive money for delivering vertue; or if he do not deliver it, yet require his falary nevertheles, as if he had performed his part fully? Either how can he be greater than to fuffein a loss and damage, if it be lo that he fland fo strictly upon this point, and be so wary, that he receive no wrong by the payment of his wages? For furely no man is faid to be injured, who is not hurr and endamaged: and therefore how ever otherwise he hath flatly denied, that a wise man could receive wrong ; yet in this book he faith, that this menner of dealing, is exposed to loss and damage.

In his book of Common-wealth, he affirmeth, that his citizens will never do any thing for pleasure, no nor address and prepare themselves therefore, praising highly Euripides for these

We need not mensbut for two things, only swink? Bread for to eat, and water shere to drink

And foon after, he proceedeth forward, and praifeth Diegenes, for abusing himself, by forcing his And foon atter, no proceeded notwards and prainten Diagram, for abuting himsels, by sorcing his anture to pals from him in the open freets, and faying withal to thos: that should be 'Oh, that I could him for rejecting pleasure, and withal for defiling his own body as he did, so beastly in the fight of the whole world, and that for a little filthy pleasure? In his books of Nature, having written that nature had produced and brought forth many living creatures, for beauty only, as delighting and taking pleasure in such lovely variety, and therewith having adjoined moreover, a most strange and abstudent that the Dearcok was made for his value for and in regard of the beauty where the speech, namely, that the Peacock was made for his tailes sake, and in regard of the beauty thereof: clean contrary to himfelf, in his books of Common-wealth, he reprove th very sharply those who keep Peacocks and Nightingales,, as if he would makes laws quite contrary to the foveraign law-giver of the world, deriding nature for raking delight, and imploying as it were her fludy in bringing forth fuch creatures; unto which a wife man will give no place in his City and Common-wealth. For how can it otherwise be but monstrous and absurd, for to find fault with those who nourish such creatures, as if it were wantonness so to do, in case he praise the divine providence for creating them? In his fit book of Nature, after he had shewed that wal-lice or punaises serve in good stead to awaken us out offleep, as also that mice advertise us to beware and take head where we lay up, and bestow every thing; and that it is probable that nature taketh pleasure in producing fair creatures, and joyeth in diversity, he commeth out with this sentence word for word: This appeareth most evidently in the Peacocks tail: for here he fignifieth that this bird was made for the tails fake, and not contrariwife; and fo when the cock was once created, the hen followed after.

In his book of Common-wealth when he had faid, that we are come almost to the painting of dunghils, a little after : There be fome (quoth he) who adorn and embelish their Cornfields, with vines climbing and growing upon trees, ranged directly in order, as also with migrele rows; who nourish also Peacocks and Doves, yea and Partriges, for to hear them call and record unto them, as also Nighallo Peacons and Dovery year and a straight for the straight for their pleafant fong. But I would gladly know of him, what he thinkerh, and what his conceit is of Bees and of Honey; for it would by good confequence follow, that he who had faid, that Punaises and Wal-lice were profitably created; should also infer that Bees were made for no profit. Now if he allowed these a place in his Commonwealth, how is it that he forbiddeth his Citizens to entertain those things which delight the care. To be brief, like as he were very absurd who should find fault with those gueffs at a feast, who fell to ear Comfitt, and sweet banquetting conceits, to drink wine also, and to feed of delicate viands; and in the mean while commend the man who invited them to fuch dainties, and provided the fame for them: even fo, he who praising the divine Providence for creating delicate Pishes, deixty Birds, sweet Honey, and pleasant Wine, should reprove those who reject not thefe gifts, nor be content to eat bare bread, and drink theer water, things that be ever at hand, and which are fufficient for our food, were as far out of reason, and makes no reckoning at all

Moreover, having in his Treatife of Extiorcations faid, that it was no reason, that folk should be befamed or blamed, for having to do carnally with their own mothers, daughters, or lifters ; for eato any kind of meats what loever, for going directly out of the bed from a woman, or from a dead body and mortuary, unto attemple or facrifice: And herein (quoth he) we ought to have a regard and speumo brute beafts, and taking example by them, to collect and conclude, that in all this, there is no abfurdity at all, nor any thing against nature; for fitly, and to the purpose very well a man may alledge this, & compare the usage of other creatures, to shew that they meither being coupled together nor en-gendring, no nor dying in temples, do pollute and defile the divinity. Contrary to all this, in the fift book of Nature he faith: That the poet Heffodus did very well to admonish and forbid us, not to piss into fountains, nor running rivers yea, and much rather to forbear to make water against an alter, or any statue of the gods: neither mattereth, or skilleth it all, if dogs, affes, and young children, do so, keing they have no discretion, nor consideration in such things; and therefore it is very absurd to say in one place: That it is meet to consider the savage example of wild beasts; and in another, as absurd to alledge the fame.

Some Philosophers there be, who imagine a certain accessary motion from without, in the principalpart of our foul; for that a man feemeth, to give the head and liberty unto divers inclinations, when he is forced to a thing by outward causes: which motion appeareth principally in doubtful and variable things; for when of two objects equal in power, and every way semblable, we are of necessity to chuse one, and there is no cause at all to incline us more to the one than to the other, this aforesaid acoffary and adventitious puissance, comming in otherwise, and seazing upon the inclination of the foul, decideth all the doubt. Against these philosophers, Chrysippus disputing, as if they did violence to nature by the contrary, and by deviling an effect without a cause; among fundry other examples, alledgeth the cockal bone, the ballance, & many fuch like things which cannot fall, incline & bend now on the one fide, & then on another, without fome cause and difference, which is entirely in them, or else cometh from without forth : for this is generally held; that what foever is without cause can have no sub-fiftence, no more than meer hazard and chance; but in thefe adventitious & accessary motions, which they suppose, there be certain hidden irriptitious causes which secretly move and induce our appetite & inclination even without our knowledge to one part or other . and this is that which he often repeateth in the mation even without our knowledge to one part of the most notable works that he hath put forth; but that which himself afterward delivereth clean contrary, because it is not exposed so openly to the view of the whole world, I will alledge verbatim as he hath debecause it is not exposed to openly to the view of the whole which is not example fake, that two Curlivered it: For in his Treatile concerning the office of a Judge, supposing for example fake, that two Curliers, who ran a course, were come both together unto the Goale, he demandeth what the Judge should do in this case; namely, whether it were lawfull for him, to give unto whether of them he pleased, the victorious branch of the Date tree? this being supposed with all, that they were both so inward and familiar with him, that he should at the gratifie them both, even out of his own in some fort, than seem to defraud either of them of the victorious Garland; which feemeth to be common to them both; Whether I fay, it be lawfull for him to encline unto the one or to the other, and so award the victory, whether I say, it be sawfull for min to encline (I say) cashally, and without any reasons, like as when two groats are presented unto us, every way semblable one to the other, we incline rather to that when two groats are presented unto us, every way semblable one to the other, we incline rather to that which we take. And in the fixth book of Duties, having said, that there be certain things that require no great ado, nor intentive consideration, he isof opinion, that in such cases we are to yield the choise into the casuall propension of the mind, even as to the adventurous hazard of a lot: as for example; if the question be to make triall of the said two groats, one saith this is the better, and another that : but for that we are to take one of the twain without more ado and farther triall of their bitterneffe, we take that which comes first; and in another place he faith: in putting this to the adventure of a lot, it falleth out otherwhiles, that we hit upon the worfe: in these places, the casuall inclination of the mind to the first object, and the putting of the matter to the hazard of a lot, is nothing else, but to bring in a choise of things indifferent without any cause.

In the third book of Logick, having premifed thus much, that Plato, Arifioile, and their succession and disciples, even as far as to Polemon and Straton, had bestowed great fludy, and travelled much therein: but above all others, Secrates, with this addition, that a man would wish with so many and such noble personages to erre for company: he cometh in afterwards with these words: if they had (quoth he) treated and discoursed hereof cursorily or by the way, a man haply might laugh at this place well enough: but fince they have fo ferioully and exactly difforted of Logick, as if it were one of the greateft faculties, and most necessary sciences, it is not like that were so grossely deceived, being men throughcit taculties, and most necessiary iciences, it is not like that were so groutely acceived, seeing men through-out all the parts of Philosophy, so singular as we repute them to be: How is it then may a man reply and shy, that you never rest baying and barking at these so worthy and excellent personages, and con-vincing them as you suppose to have erred? for there is no likelyhood, that they writing so diligen-ly and exactly as they have done of Logick, should of the Principles, and Elementy, of the end of good things, of Justice and the gods, write carelely and after a loose manner, howsforey you are disposed to tearm their Treatiles, and Discourse, blind, repugnant to themselves, and stuffed with an infinite fore of source and expours. In one place, he denieth that the vice Envenezation, that is to say a infinite fort of faults and errours. In one place he denieth that the vice engagnessis, that is to fay a joy to fee evill happen unto another, hath any being or reall subsifience: for that (quoth he) no good man was ever known to rejoyce at the harm of another: but in his fecond book as touching Good, having declared what Envy is, namely a grief for another mans welfare: because men are defirous to detract and debate their neighbours, to the end they might be superiours themselves; he addeth afterwards the joy for another mans harm, and that in thefe words : Annexed thereunto (quoth he) is the joy for another mans harm, because men are desirous that their neighbours about them should be brought low for the like causes: but when they decline and turn to other naturall affections, there is engendred Pity and Mercy: In which words is appeareth that he ordaineth странация to be a thing really subsistent as well as envy and Pity, which notwithstanding elsewhere he said had no being at all in the world, no more than the hatred of wickednesse, or the defire of filthy lucre.

Having in many places affirmed, that men are never a whit more happy, for long continuance of felicity, but that they be fill as happy who enjoy felicity but one minute of an hour: in as many other places again he avouched the contrary, faying, that a man should not so much a sput forth his singer for a transitory and momentany prudence, which endureth but a while, and passeth away like unto the state of defired, as that which is perpetuall: and to hold, that the felicity of one moment is worth nought. He affirment that vertues do follow and accompany one another not onely in this selped, that he who hath one, hath likewife all the reft, but also in this that he who worketh by one, worken with

with all according to the other: neither (faith he) is any man perfect, unless he be possessed at vertues. Howbeit in the sixth Book of Morall questions, Surpsippus saith, that neither a good and tonessed moth alwayes bear himself valiantly, soor a naughty man behave himself cowardly, for thai a secretain objects be presented into mens santasies, it behoveth one man to persevere and persist in his Judgements, and another to forsake and relinquish the same, for probable he saith, it is, that even the wickedman is not alwayes sascivous. Now in case it be so, that to be a valiant man, is as much as to she walour, and to be a coward, the same char to use cowardise, they speak contraries who affirm, that a naughty person practising one vice, worketh by all together, and that a valiant man useth not alwayes valour, nor a dastard cowardise.

He denieth Rhetorick to be an art, as touching the ornement, dispose and order of an ornament pronounced: and besides in the sirst book he hath thus written: And in mine opinion requisite it is to have not onely a regard of an honest, decent and simple adorning of words, but also a care of proper gestures, actions, pauses and stayes of the voice, as also a meet construction of the countenance and the hands. Being as you see thus exquisite and curious in this passage: yet in the same book clear contrary, having spoken of the collision of vowels, and hitting one of them upon another: We are not onely (quoth he) to neglect this, and to thing of that which is of greater moment and importance, but also to let passe certain obscurities and descens feeting also and incongruities of which many others would be assumed. Now one while to permit and allow such exquisite curcositie in the orthogon of a mans tongue, even as far as to the decent setting of the countenance and gesture of the hands: and another while not to bashat the committing of gross incongruities, descens, and obscurities, is the property of a man who cares not what he faith, but speaks whatsover comes in his basic.

Over and besides in his natural Positions, treating of those things which require the view of the eve and experience, after he had given warning that we should go warily to work, and not rashly yield our affent thereto, he faith let us not therefore, be of Platoes opinion, to think that our liquid food, to wit, our drink paffeth directly to the lungs, and our dry nourifhment, that is, our meat, into the flomach; neither let us fall into fuch like errours as thefe. For mine own part, thus I think, that for a man to reprehend others, and afterwards to incur the fam: faults and errours which he reproved, is the greatest repugnancy, and contrariety that may be, and the foulest and most shamefull fault of all others. And verily himself saith, that the connexions which are made by the ten principall Axiomes, that is to fay Propositions, exceed in number ten hundred thousand; when as neither he had by himfelf diligently enough enquired and fearched into the thing, nor by other men well exercised in that artof Arithmetick, attained to the truth. And yet Plato had to tellifie on his fide, the most renowned Physicians that were, namely, Hippocrates, Philistion and Dioxippus, the disciple of Hippocrates: also of Pocts, Euripides, Alceus, Eupolis and Eratoftbenes, who all with one voice affirm, that the drink paffeth by the lungs. And as for all the Arithmeticians well practited in the knowledge of numbers, they reprove Chrysippus: and Hipparchus among the relt, proving, and shewing that in the foresaid speech of his, he erred most grossy in his computation, if it be true, that the affirmative maketh of the faid ten Axiomes to the number of 103049 connexions, and the negative 952, over and above three hundreds and ten thousand. Some of the Ancients said of Zeno that it befell unto him as unto one who had fowr wine of his own, which he could not fell, and make away, either for vineger or wine: for that precedent of his which they call ejonyuhrer, he could not put off, neither for a thing that is good, nor so much as is indifferent. But Chrysippus hath made the matter far more intricate and different: for in some passages of his he saith, that they are stark mad who make no account of riches, health, voidnesse of pain and integrity of the body, nor care how to attain thereto; and having alledged this Verse out of Hesiodus,

O Perfee, born of noble race,
Thy bufinesse ply, and work apace, be addeth thereto and faith, it were madnesse codvise the contrary; and say, OPerses,
Ply not thy work in any case.

And in his Treatife of Lives he writeth, that a wifeman will court it with Kings and Princes, if he may raife his commodity and gain thereby; yes, he will keep a School, and teach for money, taking of fome Scholars his Minervals aforehand, and bargaining with others for a certain time. All on the frenth Book of his Offices he faith, that he will not flick to tumble down upon his head, and that threetines, so he may be fare to have a talent for his labour. In his first Book of good things, he permitteth and granteth unto a hosfoever will, to call those a roopyning, or precedents aforefaid, Good, and the contray thereto, Bad, lin these very terms: If a man list (quoth he) according to such premutations at the she may call one thing good unto himself; and another thing ill; so as he have an eye and regard unto the things, and wander not inconsiderately, nor fail in the understanding of things signified, but otherwise accommodate himself to the Life and Custome of the Denomination. Having thus in its place set his Precedent so near and linked it with Good; in other passages he faith clean contrary, that none of all this concerneth us at all, but Reason doth divert and pluck us quite away from all such things: for so much hath he set down in his first Book of Exhortations. But in the third Book of Maure, he saith that some Kings and rich persons are reputed blessed and happy; which is a much, as if they were to be accounted happy, who made water in Golden Chamber-port, or sweps

th: flower with the golden trains of their coftly robes. But a good man, if he lose his whole patrimony and all his effate, weigheth it no more than the lofs of a groat or fingle denier, and maketh no greater matter of fickness, than of flumbling, or tripping a little with his foor. And therefore, filled he hath with such contrariettes, not vertue only, but also providence. For vertue will appear exceeding base, mechanical and soolish, if it be imployed in things so vile and contemptible, commanding a man to fail for them as far as to Bosporus, yea, and to throw himself upon his head. And Jupiter is very ridiculous, delighting to be called either Ciefius, that is to say, The enricher and donor of possessions, or Epicarpius, that is to fay, The giver of fruits, or Charidotes, that is to fay, The gratifier and author of favours: for that unto lewd and wicked persons he affordeth golden chamber pots, and robes garded and bordered round about the skirts with gold; but vouchfafeth unto good men, trash hardly worth a groate, when they are become rich through the providence of Jupiner. And yet Appollo is much more ridiculous, if it be so, that he sits, giving answers and oracles as touching golden chamber-pots, gards and fringes of gold, yea and the tripping and flumbling of the foot. This repugnance and contrariety they make more evident and apparent fill by their demonstration: For that (quoth they) which may be well or ill used, is neither good nor bad. Now, certain it is, that all evil and foolish persons use riches, health and strength of the body, amis: and therefore none of these may be called Good. If then, God give not vertue unto men, but Honesty commeth of it felf, and yet bestoweth riches and health withous vertue, surely it is upon them who will not use the same well but ill, that is to say, unprofitably, shamefully, and mischievoully. And verily if the gods can give vertue, they are not good if they do not: and again, if they cannot make good men, neither are they able to help them any ways confidering, that without it, there is nothing good nor profitable. For, to fay that the gods judgethofe to be good by vertue, and by firength, who are otherwise good than by them, is to no purpose, but a vain conceit : for even so good men do judge the evil by vertue and by strength: fo that by this reckoning, they profit men no more, than they be profited by men. And verily Chrysippus judgeth neither himself to be a good man, nor any either of his scholars or reachers. What is their opinion then, think you, of others, if it be not that which themselves say, namely, that they are mad and sensels sools, that they be miscreants and infidels, lawless, and in one word, come to the very heighth and pitch of all infilicity and milery? And yet for footh they hold, that men fo wretched and unhappy as they be, are notwishfranding governed and ruled by divine providence. Now, if the gods, changing their mind, should determine to hurt, afflict, plague, defroy, and crush us quite, they could not bring us to a worse state and condition, than wherein we are already; according as Chrysippus faith, That mans life cannot be brought to a lower cbb, nor be in worse plight and case than now it is, insomuch as if it had a tongue and voice to speak, it would pronounce these words of Hercules .

Ofmiseries (to say I dare be bold) So full I am, that more I cannot bold.

And what affertions or fentences, may a man possibly find more contrary, and repugnant one against another, than those of Chrysippus, as touching both gods and men, when he saith, That the gods are most provident over men, and careful for their best; and men notwithstanding are in as wolul state.

as they may be, Certain Pythagoreans there are, who blame him much, for that in his book of Juffice he hath written of dunghil Cocks, that they were made and created profitable for mans use: For (quoth he) they awaken us out of our fleep, and raise us to our work; they hunt, kill and devour Scorpions; with their fighting they animate us to battel, imprinting in our hearts an ardent defire to flew valour: and yet eat them we mult, for fear that there grow upon us more pullain, than we know what otherwifeto do withal. And fo far forth mocketh he and fcometh those who find fault with him for delivering such sentences, that he writeth thus in his third Book of the gods, as touching Jupiter the Saviour, Creator and Father of Juftier, Law, Equity and Peace: And like as cities (quoth he) and great towns, when they be over full of people, deduct and fend from thence certain colonies, and begin to make war upon some other nations; even so God sendesh the causes, that breed plague and mortality: to which purpose he citeth the testimony of Euripides and other authors, who write that the Trojan war was raifed by the gods, for to discharge and disburthen the world of so great a multidude of men wherewith it was replenished. As for all other evident absurdicts delivered in these species, I let pals, for my purpose is not to search into all that which they have said or written amis, but only into their contradictions and contrarieties to themselves. But consider, I pray you, how Chrysppus hath alwaies attributed unto the gods the goodlieft namer, and most plausible terms that can be devited; but contrariwise, most savage, cruel, inhumane, barbarous and Galatian deeds. For such general mortalities and carnages of men, as the Trojan war first brought, and afterward the Median and Pelopon-nesiacke wars, are nothing like unto colonies that cities fend forth to people, and inhabit other places; unless haply one would fay, That such multidudes of men that die by war and pettilence, know of some cities founded for them in hell and under the ground to be inhabited. But Chryfippus maketh God like unto Deiotarus the king of Galatia, who having many fone, and minding to leave his realm and royal estate unto one of them and no more, made away and killed all the rest besides him, to the end that he being left alone, might be great and mighty: like as if one flould prune and cus away all the branches of a vine, that the main flook might thrive and profeer the better: and yet the cutter of the vine disbrancheth it when the shoots be yong, finall and tender: and we also take away from a bitch many other whelps when they be so young as that they cannot yet see, for to spare the damme: whereas Japiter who hath not onely suffered and permitted men to grow unto their perfect age, but also given them himself their nativity and growth, punished them, and plagueth them afterwards, deviling sundry means, and preparing many occasions of their death and destruction, when as indeed he should rather have not given unto them the causes and principles of their generation and birth. Howbeit this isbut a small matter in comparison; and more grievous is that which I will now say: for there are no wars bred among men, but by occasion of some notable vice; seeing the cause of one is stelly pleasure; of another, avarice; and of a third ambittion and desire of rule. And therefore, if God be the authour of wars, he is by consequence the cause of wickedness; and doth provoke, excite and pervert men; and yet himself in his Treatise of Judgement, yea and his second Book of the gods, writeth that is stands to no sense and reason that God should be the cause of any wicked and dissoness that when the state is no likelyhood at all that they should move and cause men to commit any soul and dissoness the Lawes are never the cause of breaking and violating the Laws, no more are gods of impleying that there is no likelyhood at all that they should move and cause men to commit any soul and dissoness there is no likelyhood at all that they should move and cause men to commit any soul and dissoness thereof. Yea but the contrarvisite (will one say) commendeth Euripides, for saying thus

If gods do ought that lemd and filiby is, They are no more accounted gods imis. And again, as if for footh we did any thing elfe now, but compare his words and fentences together, that be opposse and meere contrary one unto lanother. And yet this sentence which now is here commended, in wit.

wemay alledge against Chrysippus, not once, nor twice, nor thrice, but ten thousand times. For first, in his Treatise of Nature, having likened the eternity of motion to a drench er potion made confidely of many herbs and spices, troubling and turning all things that be engendered, some after one fort, and some after another, thus he saith, Seeing it is so, that the government and administration of the universall world proceedeth in this fort, necessary it is, that according to it we be disposed in that manner as we are; whether it be that we are diseased against our own nature, mainted, or disimembred, Grammarians or Musicians. And again, soon after, according to this reason, we may say the like of our vertue or vice, and generally of the knowledge or ignorance of arts, as I have already said. Also within a little after, cutting off all doubt and ambiguity: There is no particular thing, not the very least that is, which can otherwise happen than according to common nature, and the reason thereof: now that common nature, and the reason of it is farall destiny, Divine Providence and Jupiter, there is not one, search even as sar as to the Antipodes, but he knoweth: for this sentence is very riso lather mouths: And as for this verse of Homer, he faith that well and rightly he referred all to deftiny, and the univerfall nature of the world, whereby all things are governed. How is it possible then, that these two Positions' should subsist together, namely, that God is in no wise the cause of any dishonest thing; and that there is nothing in the world, beitnever so little, that is done, but by common nature, and according to the reason thereof? for surely, among all those things that are done, necessarily there must be things dishonest: and yet Epicurus umeth and winderth himself on every fide, imagining and devising all the substill shifts that he can to wloofe, set free, and deliver our voluntary free will from this motion eternall, because he would not leave vice excusable and without just reprehension; whereas in the mean while he openeth a wide window unto it, and giveth it liberty to plead: That committed it is not onely by the necessity of destiny, but also by the reason of God, and according to the best nature that is. And thus much also more-overisto be seen written word for word: For considering, that common nature reachests unto all causes, it cannot otherwise be, but all that is done, howsoever, and in what part soever of the world, mult be according to this common nature, and the reason thereof, by a certain stint of consequence without impeachment; for that there is nothing without, that can impeach the administration thereof, neither moveth any part, or is disposed in habitude otherwise, than according to that common nature. But what habitudes and motions of the parts are these? Certain it is, that the habitudes be thevices, and maladies of the minds, as coverousnels, lechery, ambition, cowardise and injustice? atfor the motions, they be the acts proceeding from thence, as Adulteries, Thefes, Treafons Manlaughters, Murders, and Particides. Chrysppus now is of opinion. That none of all these, be they little or grear, is done without the reason of Jupiter, or against Law, Justice, and Providence: insomuch as to break Law, is not against Law; to wrong another, is not against Justice, nor to commit fin against Providence. And yet he affirmeth that God punisheth vice, and doth many things for the punishment of the wicked. As for example, in the second Book of the gods: Otherwhiles there hippen (quothhe) unto good men grievous calamities, not by way of punishment, as to the wicked, by another kind of economy, and Disposition, like as it falleth out usually unto Cities. Again, in these words: First, we are to understand, evill things and calamities as we have said theretofore; then to think, that destributed they are according to the reason and dispose of Jupiter, either by way of punishment, or else by some other occonomic of the whole world. Now surely, this is a Doctrine hard to be digetted, namely, that vice being wrought by the disposition and reason of God, is also punished thereby : howbeit, this contradiction he doth fill aggravate and extend in the second book of Nature, writing thus: But vice in regard of grievous accidents, hath a certain peculiar reason by it felf: for after a fort it is committed by the common reason of nature, and as I may so say, not unprofitably in respect of the universall world; for otherwise then so, there were no good things at all: and then proceeding to reprove those who dispute pro & contra, and discourse indifferently on both parts, he (I mean) who upon an ardent defire to broach alwaies and in every matter some novelties and exquifite fingularities above all other, faith, It is not unprofitable, to cut Purfes, to play the Sycophants, or commit loofe, dissolute, and mad parts: no more than it is incommodious, that there should be unprofitable members, hurtfull and wretched persons: which if it be so, what manner of god is Jupiter , I mean him, of whom Chrysippus speaketh, in case (I say) he punish a thing, which neither cometh of it fell, nor unprofitably : for vice according to the reason of Chrysppus were altogether irreprehensible, and Jupiter to be blamed, if either he caused vice, as a thing unprofitable, or qualifed it when he had made it not unprofitably. Moreover, in the first book of Justice, speaking of the gods that they oppose themselves against the iniquities of some : But wholly (quoth he) to cut off all vice, is neither pollible nor expedient, is, if it were possible, to take away all injustice, all transgression of lawes, and all folly. But how true this is, it pertaineth not to this present treatise for to enquire and discourse. But himself taking away and rooting up all vice as much as lay in him, by the meanes of Philosophy, which to extirp, was neither good nor expedient, doth herein that which is repugnant both to reason and also to God. Furthermore, in faying, that there be certain fins and iniquities, against which the gods do oppose themselves, he giveth coverely to understand, that there is some odds and inequality in fins. Over and besides, having written in many places, that there is nothing in the world to be blamed, nor that can be complained of, for that all things are made and finished by a most singular and excellent nature: there be contrariwise, standry places wherein he leaverh and alloweth unto us certain negligences reproveable, and those not in small and tristing mat-ters. That this is true, it may appear in his third book of Substance; where having made mention that such like negligences might befall unto good and honest men; Cometh this to pass (quoth he) because there be some things whereof there is no reckoning made, like as in great houses, there must need be scattered and lost by the way some bran, yea and some sew granes of wheat, although in generality the whole befides, is well enough ruled and governed? or is it because there be some evilland malignant spirits, as superintendants over such things, wherein certainly such negligencies are committed, and the same reprehensible? and he faith moreover, that there is much necessity intermingled among. But I mean not hereupon to stand, nor to discourse at large, but to let pals what vanity there was in him, to compare the accidents which befell to some good and vertuous persons; as for example, the condemnation of Socrates, the burning of Pythagoras quick by the Cylonians, the dolorous torments that Zeno indured under the tyrant Demylus, or those which Antiphon Suffred at the hands of Dionyfius, when they were by them but to death, unto the barns that be spilt and flost in great mens houses. But that there should be such wicked spirits deputed by the divine providence, to have the charge of such things, must needs redound to the great reproach of God, as if he were some unwise King who committed the government of his provinces unto evil! Captaines, and rash headed Leiutenants, fuffering them to abufe and wrong hie best affected Subjects, and winking at their wretchleffe negligence, having no care or regard at all of them. Again, if it be fo, that there is much neceffity and constraint mingled among the affaires of this world, then is not God the foveraign Lord and omnipotent mafter of all neither be all things absolutely governed & ruled by his reason & countel.

And as each thing thus came to passe, ... The will of Jove fulfilled was.

Moreover, he mightily opposeth himself against Epicurus and those who take from the administration of the world divine providence, confuting them, principally, by the common notions and conceptions inbred in us as touching the gods, by which perfwaded we are that they be gracious benefactors unto men. And for that this is fo vulgar and common a thing with them, needleffic it is to cite any express: places to prove the same : And yet by his leave, all Nations do not believe that the gods be bountifull and good unto us. For do but consider what opinion the Jewes and Syrians, have of the gods: look into the writings of Poets, with how many superfittions they be Ruffed. There is no man in maner to speak of who imagineth or conceiveth in his mind, that God is either mortall and corruptible, or hath been begotten: And Antipater of Tarfis (to paffe others over in filence) in his book of gods, hath written thus much word for word. But to the end (quoth he) that this diffourfe may be more perspicuous and clear, we will reduce into sew words the opinion which we have of God. We understand therefore by God a living nature or substance happy, incorruptible, and a benefactour unto men: and afterwards in expounding each of these tearmes and attributes, thus he saith. And verily all men do acknowledge the gods to be immortall. It must needs be then, that by Anipaters faying, Chrysippus of all those, is none. For he doth not think any of all the gods to be incorruptible fave Jupiter only: but supposeth that they were all engendred a like, and that one day. they shall all likewise perish. This generally throughout all his books doth he deliver: howbeit one expresse passage will I alledge out of his third book of the gods. After a divers fort (quoth be) for some of them are engendred and mortall : others not engendred at all. But the proof and demonstration hereof, if it should be fetched from the head indeed, appertaineth more properly anto

the science of Natural Philosophy. For the Sun and Moon, and other gods of like nature, were begotten: but Jupiter is semptiernal. And again somewhas after: The like shall be failed of Jupiter and other gods, as touching their corruption and generation: for some of them do perish; but as son his parts they be incorruptible. With this I would have you to compare, a little of that which Antipater hath written: Those (quoth he) who deprive the gods of beneficence and well doing, touch but in some part the prenotion and anticipation in the knowledge of them: and by the same reason they also who think they participate of generation and corruption. If then he be as much deceived and as absurd, who chinket that the gods be mortal and corruptible, as he who is of opinion, that they bear no bountiful and loving affection toward men, Chrysppus is as far from the truth as Epicarus, for that as the one bereaveth God of immortality and incorruption, so the other taketh from him bonnty and liberality.

Moreover Chrysippus in his third Book of the gods speaking of this point, and namely how other gods are nourished, faith thus: Other gods (quoth he) use a certain nourishment, whereby they are maintained equally: but Jupiter and the world after another fort, then those who are engendred and be confumed by the fire. In which place, he holdeth, that all other gods be nourished, except Jupiter and the world. And in the first Book of Providence, he faith that Jupiter growth continually untill fuch a time, as all things be confumed in him. For Death being the separation of the Body and Soul, feeing that the Soul of the world never departeth at all, but augmenteth continually, untill it have confumed all the matter within it, we cannot fay that the world dieth. Who could speak more contrary to himfelf, then he who faith that one and the fame god is nourished and not nourished? And this we need not to infer and conclude by necessary consequence considering that himself in the same place hath written it plainly. The world only (quoth he) is faid to be of it self sufficient: because it alone hath all in it selt whereof it standeth in need, of it self it is nourished and augmented, whereas other parts are transmuted and converted one into another. Not only then is he contradi-Bory and repugnant to himself in that he saith, other gods be nourished, all except the world and Jupiter, but also here in much more, when he saith that the world groweth by nourishing it felf: whereas contariwife there had been more reason to say, the world only is not augmented, having for food the destruction thereof: but on the contrary side, other gods do grow and increase, in as much athey have their nourishment from without : and rather should the world be consumed into them. if it be true that the world taketh alwaies from it felf, and other gods from it. The second point conmined in that common notion and opinion imprinted in us as touching the gods, is that they be bleffed, happy and perfect. And therefore men highly praise Euripides for faying thus.

> If God be God indeed and really, He needs none of this poets verily, His praife in bymnes and verfes for to write: Such ditties wretched are which they endne.

Howbeit our Chrysppus here, in those places by me alledged saith, that the world alone is of it saif sufficient, as comprehending within it all that it hath need of. What then ariseth upon this proposition, that the world is sole sufficient in its sligh but this, that neither the Sun nor the Moore, nor any other of the gods whatsoever is sufficient of it self, and being thus insufficient, they cannot be bleffed and being thus insufficient, they cannot be bleffed

Ghryfippus is of opinion, that the Infant in the Mothers Wombe, is nourilled naturally, no otherwise than a plant within the earth; but when it is born, and by the air cooled and hardned (as it were) like fleele, it moveth the spirit, and becommeth an animall or living Creature; & therefore it is not with outgood reason, that the Soul was called 40%, in regard of 40%, that is to say, refrigeration. But not forgetting to be contrary unto himfel , he supposeth that the Soul is the more subtile, rare, and fine spirit of nature: For how is it possible that a subtile thing should be made of that which is groffe, and that a spirit should be rarefied by refrigeration and astriction or condensation? Nay, that which more is how cometh it about, that affirming as he doth the foul of an Infant to be engendred by the meanes of refrigeration, he should think the sun to become animate, being as it is of aftery nature, and ingendred of an exhalation transmuted into fire ? For thus he faith in his third Book of Nature : The mutation (quoth he) of fire is in this manner; by the air it is turned into water, and out of water having earth under it. there exhaleth air, which air coming to be subtilized, the fire is produced and environeth it round about and as for the flars, they are fet on fire out of thefe, together with the Sanswhat is more contrary, then to be fet on fire and to be cooled? what more opposite to subtilization and rarefraction, than inspission and condensation? the one maketh water and earth, of fire and air; the other turneth that which is moist and terrestriall, into fire and aire. And yet in one place he maketh kindling of fire, and in another refrigration, to be the cause of quickning and giving soul unto a thing: for when the said firing and inflammation comes general throughout, then it liveth and is become an animal Creature; but after it cometh to be quenched & thickned, it turneth into water and earth, and so into a corporeal substance. In the first Book of Providence, he writeththus: For the world being throughout on fire, presently it is withall, the Soul and governour of it felf; but when it is turned into moisture and the foul left within it, & is after a fort converted into a Soul and Body, to as it feemeth compounded of them both, then the case is altered: In which text he affirmeth plainly, that the very in inanimate parts of the world by exustion and inflammation, turn and change into the soul thereof; and contrariwise ty exemetion, the foul is relaxed and moistened again, and so return eth into a corporeall nature. Hereupon I inferre that he is very abfurd, one while to make of fenteleffe things, animate and living, by way of refrigeration; and another while to transmute the most part of the soul of the world into insensible and inanimate things.

Bit over and above all this, the Discourse which he maketh as touching the generation of the soul. containeth a proof and demonstration contrary to his own opinion; for he faith that the foul in engendred efter that the Infant is gone out of the mothers womb; for that the spirit then is transformed by refrigeration; even as the temper is gotten of Steel. Now to prove that the foul is engendred, and that after the birth of the Infant, he bringeth this for a principall Argument; Because children become like unto their Parente in behaviour and naturall inclination; wherein the contrariety that he delivereth is fo evident, as that a man may fee it by the very eye; for it is not possible that the foul which is engendred after birth, should be framed to the manners and disposition of the Parents before nativity; or else wen uit say (and fallout it will) that the soul before it was in effe, was already like unto a soulwhich is all One, as that it was by finulitude and resemblance, and yet was not, because as yet it had not a reall substance: Now if any one do say, that it ariseth from the temperature and complexion of the bodies, that this similitude is imprinted in them, howbeir, when the souls are once engendred, they become changed, he shall overthrow the argument and proof whereby it is shewed that the foul was engendred; for hereupon it would follow, that the foul, although it were ingenerable, when it entreth from without into the body, is changed by the temperature of the like.

Chrysppus sometime saith, that the air is light, that it mounteth upward on high; and other whiles for it again : that it is neither heavy nor light. To prove this, fee what he faith in his fecond Book of Mation, namely, that fire having in it no ponderolity at all ascendeth alost: semblably the air; and as the water is more conformable to the earth, fo the air doth rather resemble the fire. But in his Book entituled Naturall arts, he bendeth to the contrary opinion, to wit, that the air hath neither ponderofity nor lightneff: of it felf: He affirmeth that the air by nature is dark, and for that cause by consequence it is also the Primitive cold; and that tenebrofity or darkness, is directly opposite unto light and clearness, and the coldness thereof to the heat of fire. Moving this Discourse in the first Book of his Naturall Questions, contrary to all this in his Treatise of Habitudes, he faith: That these Habitudes be nothing elfe but airs: for that bodies (quoth he) be contained by them, and the cause why every body contained by any habitude is such as it is is the Continent air which in iron is called hardness, inflone spilltude or thicknessin Silver whitenessin which words there is great contrariety, & as much falle absurdity: for if this air remain the same still as it is in the own nature, how cometh black in that which is not white, to be called whiteness, fofmes in that which is not hard, to be named hardness, or rare in that which is not folid and maffie, to be called folidity? But in case it be faid, that by mixture therein it is altered, and so becometh semblable, how then can it be an habitude, a faculty, power or cause of these estads whereby it felf is brought under and subdued for that were to suffer rather than to do; and this alteration is not of a nature containing, but of a languishing impotency, whereby it loseth all the properties, and qualities of the own: and yet in every place they hold, that matter of it felf idle and without motion, is subject and exposed to the receipt of qualities, which qualities are spirits, and those powers of the air, which into what parts foever of the matter they get and infinuate themselves, do give a form and imprint a figure into them. But how can they maintain this, supposing as they do, the air to be fuch as they fay it is; for if it be an habitude and power, it will conform and shape unto it felf, every body, so as it will make the same both black and soft: but if by being mixed and contempered with them, it take forms contrary unto those which it hath by nature, it followeth then, that it is the matter of matter, and neither the habitude, cause, nor power thereof.

Chrysippus hath written oftentimes, that without the world, there is an infinite worldness; and that this infinity hath neither beginning, middle, nor end. And this is the principall reason, whereby they refute that motion downward of the Atoms by themselves, which Epicurus hath brought in: For in that which is infinite, there are no locall differences, whereby a man may understand or specific either high or low. But in the fourth Book of Things possible, he supposeth a cettain middle space and mean place between : wherein he faith the world is founded. The very Text where he affirmeth this, runneth in these words. And therefore we must say of the world that it is corruptible: and although it be very hard to prove it, yet me thinks rather it should be so then otherwise. Neverthelesse, this maketh much to the inducing of us to believe that it hath a certain incorruptibility, if I may fo fay, namely the occupation or taking up of the middle place, wherein it standeth, because it isin the mids: for if it were thought otherwise to be founded, it were altogether necessary, that some corruption should take hold of it. And again, a little after : for even so in some fort hath that effence been ordained from all eternity, to occupy the middle Region, being prefently at the very first such as if not by another manner, yet by attaining this place, it is eternall and subject to no corruption. These words contain one manifest repugnance and visible contrariety, considering that in them he admitteth and alloweth in that which is infinite a middle place. But there is a second also, which as it is more dark and obscure, so it implieth also a more monstrous absurdity than the other: for supposing that the world cannot continue incorruptible, if it were seated and founded in any other place of the infinity, than in the mids, it appeareth manifefly that he feared, if the parts of the subflance did not move and tend toward the mids, there would enfue a diffolution & corruption of the world. But this would be never have feared, if he had not thought that bodies naturally from all fides tend to the

mids, not of the substance, but of the place that conteineth the substance; whereor he had spoken in many places, that it was a thing impossible and against nature, for that within voidness there is no difference, by which bodies can be faid to move more one way than another : and that the confirmation of the world, is cause of the motion to the center, as also that all things from every fide do bend to the mids. worte, worth and the second Book of Motion for when he had delivered thus much. That the World is a perfect body, and the parts of the World not perfect, because they are respective to the whole, and not of themselves. Having also discoursed as touching the motion thereof: for that it was apt and fitted by nature to move it felf in all parts, for to contain and preferve, and not to break, diffolve and burn it felf, he faith afterwards, But the univerfal World tending and moving to the same point, and the parts thereof having the same motion from the nature of the body; like it is, that this first motion is naturally proper to all bodies, namely, to incline toward the mids of the World, confidering that the World moveth fo in regard of it felf; and the parts likewife, in that they be the parts of the whole. How now my good friend, may fome one fay, what accident is befallen unto you, that you fhould forget to pronounce these words with all, That the World, in case it had not fortuned for to settle in the mids, must needs have been subject to corruption and diffolution? For if it be proper and natural to the World to tend alwaies to the middle, as also to address the parts thereof from all sides thereto, into what places over of the voidness it be carried and transported, certes, thus containing and embracing (as it were) it fell' as it doth, it must needs continue Incorruptible, Immortall, and past all danger of fracture or dissolution : for to fuch things as be broken, bruised, dissipated and dissolved, this is incident, by the division and diffolution of their parts, when each one runneth and retireth into their proper and natural place, our of that which is against their own nature. But you sir, supposing that if the World were seated in any other place of voidness, but in the mids, there would follow a totall ruin and corruption thereof; giving out also as much, and therefore imagining a middle in that where naturally there can be none, towit, in that which is infinite, have verily quit clean and fled from these tensions, coherences and inclinations, as having in them no assured means for to maintain and hold the World together, and attributed all the cause of the eternall maintenance and preservation thereof, unto the occupation of a place. And yet, as if you took pleasure to argue and convince your felf, you adjoyn to the premiles, thus much. In what fort every feverall part moveth, as it is contar nt to the reft of the body, it stands with good reason, that after the same manner it should move by it self alone; yea, iffor disputation sake we imagine and suppose it to be in some void part of this world: and like asbeing kept in and enclosed on every lide, it would move toward the mids, so it would continue in in this same motion, although by way of disputation we should admit, that all on a suddenthere should appear some vacuity, and void place round about it. And is it so indeed, that every part what ever it be, compassed about with voidness, forgoeth not hernatural inclination to move and tend to the mids; and should the world it self, unless some fortune and blind chance had not prepared for it a place in the mids, have lost that vigor and power which containeth and holdeth all together, and so some parts of the substance of it move one way, and some another? Now surely herein there be many other main contrarieties repugnant even to natural reason; but this particularly among the reft, encountreth the doctrine of God, and divine providence, to wit, that in attributing unto them the least and smallest causes that be, he taketh from them the most principal and greatest of all other-For what greater power can there be, than the maintenance and prefervation of this universal world, or to cause the substance united together in all parts to cohere unto it self? But this according to the opinion of Chrysippus, hapneth by meer hazard and chance: for if the occupation of a place, is the cause of worlds incorruption and eternity, and the same chanced by fortune, we must infer thereupon, that the fafty of all things dependeth upon hezard and adventure, and not upon fatal defliny, and divine providence. As for his doctrine and disputation and Surdener, that is to say of things possible, which Chrysippus hath delivered directly against that of fatall destiny, how can it chuse but be repugmant to it felt; for if that be not possible, according to the opinion of Diodorus, which either is or shall be true, but what foever is susceptible naturally of a power to be, although the same never come into an act or effe, isto be counted possible; there will be a number of things possible, which never full have being, by deftiny invincible, inexpugnable, and furmounting all things. And therefore either this doctrine overthroweth all the force and puissance of destiny : or if it be admitted, as Chrysipus would have it, that which potentially may be, will fall out often times to be impossible; and whatfoever is true, shall be also necessary, as being comprised and contained by the greatest, and most powerful necessity of all others; and whatsoever is false, impossible, as having the greatest and most pullant caue, with standing and impeaching it ever for being true. For look whose deftiny it is to die in the Seashow can it possible be, that he should be susceptible of death upon the Land? And how is it possible, that he who is at Megara should come to Athens, being hindred and prohibited by fatall

Moreover, his refolutions as touching Fantafies and imaginations, regugne mainly against fatal defliny: For intending to prove that Fantasse is not an entire and absolute cause of assent, he saith, that sessand wife men will prejudice and hurt us much, by imprinting in our minds false imaginations, ifit be fo that such Fantasies do absolutely cause affent. For many times wise men use that which is falle, unto lewed and wicked persons, representing unto them a Fantasie that is but only probable, and, yethe same is not the cause of affent: for so also should it be the cause of false opinion, and of deception. If then a man would transfer this reason and argument from the said wise men unto stall defining, saying that destiny is not the cause of assents (for so he should ocosses that by destiny were occasioned sale assents of some doctrine and reason which exempteth a wise man from doing hurt at any time, sheweth with all same doctrine and reason which exempteth a wise man from doing hurt at any time, sheweth with all stated shiny is not the cause of all things. For if they neither opine nor receive detriment by destiny is that destiny is not the cause of all things. For if they neither opine nor receive detriment by destiny is the cause of all things. It is a supposed and profit by destiny: so that this conclusion which they hold for most assured shallow they any good and profit by destiny: so that this conclusion which they hold for most assured things, but only a procatarctical and anaectedent occasion, here again will be discover how he is contradictory to himself, whereas he praiseth Homse excessively for saying thus of Jupiter:

Take well in worth therefore what he to each of you shall send;
And whether good to had it be,
do not with him contend.
As also where he highly extollets Euripides for these verses:
O suppire what cause have to say,
I hat mortal werether we should prudent be?
Depend we do of thee, and nothing may Brings office, but that which pleasely thee.

Himfelf also writeth many sentences accordant hereunto, and finally concludeth, that nothing doth r. ft and ftay, nothing fir and move, be it never so little, otherwise than by the counsel and mind of Jupiter, whom he faith to be all one with fatal defliny. Moreover the antecedent caufe is more feeble and Jupiner, who made land is perfect and absolute, neither attaineth it to any effect, as being subdued & kept weak, than that which is perfect and absolute, neither attaineth it to any effect, as being subdued & kept weak, than that which is perfect and absolute, up and making, head against it. And as for fatal definy down, by others mightier than it self, riling up and making, head against it. And as for fatal definy Chrysippus himself pronouncing it to be a cause invincible, inflexible, and that which cannot be inpeached, calleth it Arropos and Adraffia, as one would fay, a cause that cannot be averted, avoided or undone. Likewise necessity and Prepomene, which is as much to say as setting down ment, that is to fay, an end and limit unto all things. How then? whether do we not fay, that neither affents, vertues, vices, nor well or ill doing, lie in out free will and power: if we affirm fatall defling is to be maimed or unperfect and acceptain, that is to fay, a fatality determining all things, to be actions manned or unperfect and actions and the strength of the motions and habitudes of Jupiters will to remain imperfect and unaccomplished? for of these conclusions the one will follow, if we say that destiny is an absolute and perfect cause: and the other, in case we hold that it is onely a procatardical or antecedent occasion. For being an absolute and all sufficient cause, it overthoweth that which is in us, to wit, our free will : and again, if we admit it to be only antecedent it is marred for being effectual and without the danger of impeachment. For not in one or two places onely but every where in manner throughout all his commentaries of natural Philosophyhe hath written, that in particular natures and motions there be many obstacles and impediments, but in the motion of the Universal World there is none at all. And how is it possible that the motion of the Universal World should not be hindred and disturbed, reaching as it doth unto particulars, in case it be fo, that they likewife be flopped and impeached. For furely the nature in general of the whole manis not at liberty and without impediment, if neither that of the foot nor of the hand, be void of obliacles: no more can the motion or course of a ship be void of let and hinderance, if there be some slay about the fails, and oares, or their works. Over and belides all this, if the famalies and imaginations, are not imprinted in us by fatal defliny, how be they the cause of affents? Or if because it imprinteth fantalies that lead unto affent, thereupon all affents are faid to be by fatal defliny, how is it possible that deftiny should not be repugnant to it self? considering that in matters of greatest importance, it mini-freth many times different fantasses, and those which distract the mind into contrary opinions! whereas they affirm that those who settle unto one of the said phantalies, and hold not off their affent and approbation do erre and fin : For if they yeeld (lay they) unto uncertain fantafics they flumble and fall: if unto falle, they are deceived: if to such as commonly are not conceived and understood, they opine. For of necessity it must be one of these three: either that every fantalise is not the work nor effect of destiny; or that every receit and affention of fantalise is not void of errour; or else that destinated the state of destiny; or that every receit and affention of fantalise is not void of errour; or else that destinated the state of destiny; or that every receit and affention of fantalise is not void of errour; or else that destinated the state of the state it self is not irreprehensible. Neither can I see how it should be blamelesse, objecting such fancies and imaginations as it doth; which to withstand and ressist were not blamable, but rather to give place and follow them: and verily in the disputations of the Stoicks against the Academicks, the prace and follow them: and vertify in thinkify and Antipater also contended and flood upon, main point about which both Christipus simicify and Antipater also contended and flood upon, was this: That we do nothing at all, nor be inclined to any action, without a precedent consent but that these be but vaine Fictions and devised Fables and suppositions, that when any proper but that thele be but vame rictions and device rapies and suppositions, that when any proper fantasic is presented, incontinently we are disposed, yea, and incited thereto, whishout yeelding or giving consent. Again, Shrysspan faith: That both God and the wise man do imprint false imaginations, not because they would have us to yeeld or give our consent unto them, but that we should do the thing onely, and incite our selves to that which appeareth: As forus, if we be evill by reason of our infirmitie, we condefeend to fuch fancies and imaginations. Now the repugnance and contrariety in these words is easily seen; for he who would not have us to consent unto the fantasies which he presenteth unto us, but only to work and do them, be he God or wise man, know the well enough that such fantasies are sufficient to cause us to fall to operation, and that those assented along ther fuerfluous: and so if he knowing that the fantasic imprintent no infilind into operation without confent, ministreth unto us false or probable fantasies: wilfull and voluntary is the cause that we summed the analysis are not perfectly understood and competented.

Of Common Conceptions against the Stoicks.

The Summary.

Having shewed in my somer discourse, that the Stoicke are contraditory to themselves, in all the principal pall articles of their dollrine, and so consequently that he needed no more but their own wards to condemn them: In this dialogue he joyneto more colosy to them, disputing against their russ, and precepts, which he examinate and refineth; whereas before he was content to oppugue them by their own selves. For to make enterance into this dialogue, he bringst in Lumprias, requesting Disdumentur in ribbin of those scrupples that certain Stoicke had put into his head: Whereunto the other accordeth, and so they enter into the matter. The summ of whose whole discourse throughout is this: That the Stoicke would by their principles abolish mainties, fingle, and the common conceptions proceeding from thouse, thereby more easily to eliablish their own paradexes: whom he refuteth, dividing his dialogue unto three principall parts: in the first whereof is coussed, the matural; in the third, the metaphysical or supernaturall Psylogery of the Stoicke: Howbeit he observet how exact order nor method, in the disposition of his matters, but entrets out of one discourse into another, according as things were presented unto him, and came soft into his mind, it is superior as there is sufficient to concent the Reader, who is destroate to what was the self and destrine of the Stoicky, and the manner of the ancient Academicke in their disputations: which being referred to the tree marke and sope indeed, of all that which we may learn in the world, teached be every man to bumble bimself before the Majsity of him who is only wise, and out of whose facred word we ought to stock the resolution of the questions debated here in this dialogue, but of those above the rest, who is treat of manners, religion, and divinity.

Of common conceptions against the Steicks.

Thould feem verily that you Diadumenus pass not much what any man, either thinks or saies of you and other Academicks, such as your self, in that you do Philosophize clean contrary to the common notions and conceptions, confelling as you do, that you make no great account of the five natural fenfes, from whence proceed the most part of the faid common conceptions, having for their foundation and feat, the belief and affurance of the imaginations which appear unto us. But I pray you for to affay and go in hand to cure me, either by some words, or charmes and enchantments, or by what other means and kinds of physick that you know, comming as I do unto you, full in mine own conceit of great trouble and strong perturbation, so exceedingly troubled I have been, and held in perplexed fuspence, I may tell you, by certain Stoicks; men otherwise the best in the world, and I may fay to you, my inward and familiar friends: howbeit, over bitterly bent, and in hostile manner set against the Academie, who for very small matters uttered by me, modestly and in good fort, withal refoct and reverence, have (I will not lie unto you) reproved, checked, and taken me up very unkindly, with some hard words, and breaking forth in heat of choler, called our ancient Philosophers, Sophisters, corrupters, and perverters of good sentences in Philosophy, yea, and seducers of those who otherwise walked in the true path, and train of doctrine surely established; with many other most strange terms, both speaking and thinking of them very basely; until in the end as if they had been driven with a tem-pest, they fell upon the Common conceptions, reproching those of the Academie, as if they brought in some great confusion and perturbations in the said notions: and one among them there was, who fluck not to fay; That it was not by fortune, but by some divine Providence, that Chrysippus was born and came into the world, after Arcefilaus, and before Carneades: of which twain, the one was the great author and promoter of the injury and outrage done unto custome; and the other flourished in name and renown above all other Academicks. Now Chrysppus comming as he did between them, by his writings contrary to the doctrine of Arcesilans, stopped up the way also against the powerful Eloquence of Carneades, and as he left unto the senses many aids and succours, as it were to hold out a long Siege; so he removed out of the way, and fully cleared all the trouble and confusion about anticipations and common conceptions, correcting each one, and reducing them into their proper place; informuch, as who foever afterwards would feem to make new troubles, and violently, difquiet matters by him fettled, should not pravail nor gain ought, but incur the obloquie of the world, and be convinced for malicious persons, and deceitsul Sophisters. Having thus (I say) by these words been chafed and set on fire this morning among them, I had need of some means to quench the heat as it were of an inflamation, and to rid me of these doubts, which are risen in my mind.

Diadumenus.

It fareth haply with you, as with many of the vulgar fort; but if you believe the Poets who give cut, that the ancient City Sipples in Magresia, was in old time destroyed and overthrown by the providence of the gods, when they chaftifed and punished Tantalus; you may as well be perswaded by our old friends the Stoicks to believe, that nature hath brought forth into the world, not by chance and forrune, but by Come speciall divine providence, Chrysippus, when she was minded to pervert and overturn the life of man and course of the world, turning all things up side down, and contrariwise down side up for never was there man better made and framed for such a matter than he. And as Gaso said of that Julius Cefar dictator, that before him there was never known any to come fober & confiderate to manage affairs of state with a purpose to work the ruine of the Common-weal; even so this man in mine opinion, with on tall white e., greatest eloquence, and highest conceit of spirit seemeth as much as lieth in him to de-froy and abolish custome. And there witnesse against him no lesse even they who magnific the manotherwife: namely, when they dispute against him as touching that sophisme or Syllegisme, which is called Pseudomenos; for to say my good sciend, that the argumentation composed of contrary Positions is not notoriously false, and again to affirm, that Syllogismes having their premises true, yea and true inductions, may yet have the contrary to their conclusions true, what conception of demonstrations. or what anticipation of belief is there, which it is not able to overthrow.

pendant hairy feet, but the Logick of Christopus, which taketh away and cutteth off the principall parts of it, what other conception leaveth it behind, but that which well may be suspected? For how can that be imagined fleady and fure which is built upon foundations that abide not firm, but wherein there be so many doubts and troubles? But like as they who have either dust or durt upon their bodies, if they touch another therewith or rub against him, do not so much trouble and molest him, as they do begrime and beray themselves so much the more, and seem to exasperate that ordure which pricketh and is offensive unto them ; even so, some there be who blame and accuse the Academicks, thinking to charge upon them those imputations, wherewith themselves are found to be more burdened: For who be they that pervert the common conceptions of the fenfes more, than to the Storicks? But if you think fo good, leaving off to accuse them, let us answer to those calumnation and slanders which they would seem to fasten upon us.

Methinks Diadumenus that I am this day much changed, and become full of variety: me thinks I am a man greatly altered from that I was ere while : For even now I came hither much difmayed & abished, as being depressed, beaten down and amazed; as one having need of some advocate or other to speak for me in my behalf: whereas, now I am clean turned to an humour of accusation, and difposed to enjoy the pleasure of revenge, to see all the pack of them detected and convinced, in that they argue and dispute themselves against common conceptions and anticipations, in defence whereof they seem principally to magnific their own sect,  saying that it alone doth agree and accord

Diadumenus.

Begin we then first, with their most renowned propositions, which they themselves call Paradoxes, that is to fay, strange and admirable opinions: avowing as it were by that name, and gently admitting such exorbitant absurdaties; as for example, that such Sages as themselves are only kings, only rich and fair, only Citizens, and only Judges: or pleaseth it you that we send all this stuff to the Market of old and stale marchandise, and go in hand with the examination of these matters, which consist most in action and practife, whereof also they dispute most seriously?

Lamprias.

For mine own part I take this to be the better. For as touching the reputation of those paradoxes, who is not full thereof, and hath not heard it a thonfand times?

Diadumenus.

Consider then in the first place this, whether according to common notions, they can possibly accord with nature, who think natural things to be indifferent : and that neither health, nor good plight and habitude of body norbeauty, nor clean strength be either expetible, profitable, expedient, or serving in any flead to the accomplishment of that perfection which is according to nature : nor that the contraries hereunto are to be avoided, as hurtful, to wit, maimes and mutilations of members, deformities of body, paines, shameful disgraces and diseases. Of which things rehearled, they themselves acknowledge that nature estrangeth us from some, and acquainteth us with other. The which verily is quite contrary to common intelligence, that nature thould acquaint us with those things which be neither expedient nor good, and alienate us from such as be not hurtful nor ill: and that which more is, that the thould either train us to them, or withdraw us from them fo far forth, as if men mils in obtaining the one, or fall into the other, they should with good reason abandon this life, and for just cause depart out of the world. I suppose that this also, is by them affirmed against common sence, namely, that nature her self is a thing indifferent: and that to accord and consent, with nature, hath in it some part of soveraign good. For neither to follow the rule of the Law nor to obey reason, is good and honest, unless both law and reason be good and honest. But this verily is one of the least of their errours. For if Chry sippus in his first Book of Exhortations hath written thus: A bleffed and happy life confifteth onely in living according to vertue; and as for all other accessizes (quoth he) they neither touch nor concern us at all, neither make they any whit to beatitude : he cannot avoid, but he must avow, that not onely nature is indifferent, but also which is more, senseless; and foolish, to affociate and draw us into a League with that which in no respect concerneth us, and we our selves likewise are no better than sools, to think that the soveraign selicity, is to consent and accord with nature, which leadeth and conducteth us to that which serveth nothing at all to happiness. And yet what agreeth and forreth sooner to common fense, than this, that as things eligible are to be chosen and defired for the profit and help of this life; so natural things serve for to live answerable to nature? but these men say otherwise: for although this be their supposition, that to live according to nature is the utmost end of mans good, yet they hold, that things according to nature be of themselves indifferent. Neither is this also leffe repugnant to common sense and conception, that a well affected, sensible and prudent man, is not equally enclined and affectionate to good things that be equall and alike: but as fome of them he weigheth not nor maketh any account of, so for others again he is prest to abide and endure all things, athough I fay the same be not greater or leffe one than another. For these things they hold to be equall, namely, for a man to fight valiantly in the defence of his Countrey, and chaftly to turn away from an old trot, when for very age the is at the point of death : for both the one and the other do that alike which their duty requireth. And yet for the one, as being a worthy and glorious thing, they would be prest and ready to losetheir lives, whereas to boast and vaunt of the other were a shamefull and ridiculous part. And even Chryfippus himfelf, in the Treatife which he composed of Tupiter, and in the third Book of the gods, faith that it were a poore, abfurd and foolish thing to praise such acts, as proceeding from vertue, namely to bear valiantly the biting of a flie, or fling of a Wasp, and chastly to abstain from a crooked old woman, stooping forward and ready to tumble into her grave. Do not these Philosophers then teach and preach even against common sense and notion, when those actions which they are ashamed to commend, they avow and confesse to be excellent, and nothing in the world better? For where is that expetible, or how can that be approvable, which deserveth not that a man fhould praise and admire it, but is such as who soever do commend and admire the same, they are reputed no better than fots and abfurd fools? And yet I suppose you will think it more against common sense and reason, that a wife and prudent man should not care nor regard a jot whether he enjoy or enjoy not the greatest goods in the world, but carry himfelf after one and the same manner in things indifferent, as he would in the management and administration of those good things which are so singular. For we all, As many as on fruits do feed, are of this judgement, that the thing which being present bringeth us help and profit, and if it be away, we defire to have, and find a miffe of it, is good, expetible and profitable: but that which a man paffeth not for, neither in earnest nor in game, and whereof he maketh no account either for his sport, pallime or commodity and case, the same is indifferent; for by no other mark do we diffing us tha diligent; painfull and industrious man indeed, from a vain busie body, and a curious medler in many matters, than by this. That as the one travelleth and troubleth himfelf in unprofitable trifles or things indifferent, for the other laboureth for such as be commodious and expedient. But these Philosophers do quite contráry: for according to their doctrine, a wife and prudent man, although he meet with many conceptions and the memories of the faid comprehensions, yea and remember divers things whereof he hath a certain and perfect knowledge, thinketh fome few of them to concern him; and as for the reft, making no reckoning of them, he supposeth that he neither loseth nor winneth, by remembring that he had the other day the comprehension, that is to say, the certain knowledge either of Dion sneesing, or Theon playing at tennis. And yet every comprehension in a wise man, and all memory that is firm and furely fettled, is prefently science, yea and a great good thing, nay the greatest that is. How then? for I would gladly know, whether a wife man were fecure and careless alike, when his health faileth, when some one of his senses decaieth, or is amils, and when he loseth his goods, thinking none of all thisto touch him; or whether when he feeleth himself fick, giveth unto Physicians their fees when they come unto him; and for to gam riches, faileth to Leucon a great Prince and potentate about Bosphorus, or travelleth as far as to Indathyrsus the Scythian king, as Chrysippus faith; and of his senses, ishe lose some, he will not endure to live any longer? How is it then, that these men do not acknow. ledge and confess that they deliver doctrine even against common notions, who about things indiff:rent, cark, care, and travell fo much; and yet take the matter indifferently, and reak not much whether they enjoy or be without great good things.

Moreover, this also is an opinion of theirs, even against common Conceptions, That he who is a man, feel-th no joy, when out of the greatest evills and most grievous calamities, he entreth into a world of good things and a most bleffed and happy state. And yet thus doth their wife man: for paffing from extream vice, unto exceeding great vertue; escaping also out of a most miserable life, and attaining unto the happiest condition that is, he sheweth no sign or token at all of joy: neither doth fo great a change lift up his heart, or once move him, feeing himfelf how he is delivered out of the greatest misery and wickednesse that may be, and arrived now to a most firm assured accomplishment of all felicity and goodnesse. Again contrary it is to common sense, That this should be the greatest good of a man, namely, a constant Judgement, and immutable Resolution; and yet that he who is mounted up to the height and pitch of all, hath no need hereof, neither careth for it when it is come; in fo much as many times he will not once put forth his finger for this affurance and stability, notwithstanding they esteem is to be the soveraign and perfect good. Neither do these Stoicks flay here, but fill broach more paradoxes and firange opinions, namely, that continuance of time be it never folong, augmenteth not any good thing : but if a man chance to be wife and prudent but the minute only of an hour, he is nothing inferiour in felicity to him, who all his time hath lived in worms. and led his whole life bleffedly therein. Howbeit, as bravely and as floutly as they deliver these positions, yet in the other side, they slick not to say, that transitory vertue which continueth but a while, is worth nothing: for what would it avail or benefit him who incontinently is 10 fuffer hitowrack and to perish in the Sea, or otherwise to be thrown headlong down from some steeprock, if he were possessed of wisedome a while before? And what would it have booted Lychas being flung by Hercules, as it were out of a fling into the mids of the Sea, if fuddenly he had been changed from verue to vice? These positions therefore savour of these men, who not only Philosophiz: against sinse and common notions, of the whole world, but also confusedly huddle their own conceins, making a mish mash of them, and contradicting themselves, if it be so that they think, that the holding and possessing of vertue a short time, wanteth nothing of soveraign selicity, and withal, make no account of to thore a vertue, as it in deed it were nothing worth. And yet this is not it that a man no ild wonder most at in their strange dodirine, but this rather, that they estsoons, give out and say: That when this foveraign vertue and felicity is present, he that is possessed of it, hath no sense nor feeling thereof; neither perceiveth he how being erewhile most miserable and foolish, he is now all at once become both wife and happy: for not only it were a prety jeft, and ridiculous conceit to fay; That a wife and prudent man is ignorant even of this one point, that he is wife, and knoweth not that he is now puff ignorance, and want of knowledge: but also to speak all in a word; they make goodness to be of no ignorance, and want of anometics and police with it, they make it I fay very obscure, energies and feeble, in case when it commeth, a man is not able to feel and perceive it: for according to them, it is not by nature imperceptible; and even Chrysippus himself hath exprelly written in his books entituled, Of the end, That good is perceptible by fenfe; and as he thinketh, fo he maketh proof and demonstration thereof It remaineth therefore that it is long either of weakness or smalness, that it is not perceived, when they who have it present, feel it not, nor have any knowledge thereof. Moreover, it were very absurd to say, that the eye fight should perceive and discern things that be but whitish a littlesor middle colours between, and not be able to fee those that be exceeding white in the highest degree; or that the fense of feeling should apprehend that which is meanly hot or warm, and yet have no sense stall of fuch things, as be exceeding hot. But there is more absurdity in this, that a manshould comprehend that which meanly and commonly is according to nature, to wir, health, or the good plight of the body; and beignorant again of vertue, when it is present, considering withall, that they holdie to be principally, and in the highest degree accordant to nature; for how can it otherwise be, butagainst common fense, to conceive well enough the difference between health and fickness, and to be ignorant of that diffinction which is between wifedome and folly; but to think the one to be prefent when it is gone, and when a man hath the other, not to know so much, that he hath it? Now forafmuch as after that one advanced and proceeded forward as far as may be, he is changed into felicity and vertue, one of thefe two must of necessity follow; that either this estate of progress and profit, is neither vice nor infelicity; or elfe that there is no great difference and distance between vice and vertue; but that the divertity of good things and evill is very small, and unperceptible by the sense, for otherwife men could not be ignorant when they had the one or the other, or think they had the one for the other : fo long then as they depart not from any contrariety of fintences, but will allow, affirm, and put down all things what foever, to wit, That they who profit and proceed are fill fools and wicked; that they who are become wife and good, know not fo much themselves, but are ignorant thereof ; that there is a great difference between wisedome and folly: Think you, that they shew a wonderful constancie and uniformity in the maintenance of their sentences and doctrines?

Well, if in their doctrine they go against common sense, and are repugnant to themselves; certes, in their life, in their negotiations and affairs, they do much more: for pronouncing flatly, that those who be not wife, are all indifferently and alike, wicked, unjust, distoiall, faithless, and foolish; and yet forfooth, some of them they abhor and will not abide, but be ready to spit at them; others, they will not vouchfale to much as to falute, if they meet with them upon the way; and some againthey will credit with their monics, nominate and elect by their voices to be magistrates, yea and bestow their daughters upon them in marriage. Now in case they hold such strange and extravagant positions in sport and game, let them pluck down their brows, and not make so many surrows as they do in their forcheads: but if in earneft, and as grave Philosophers, surely, I must needs tell them, that it is against common notions, to reprove, blame, and rail upon all men alike in words, and yet to use some of them in deeds, as honest persons, and others hardly to intreat as racel wicked; and for example, to admire Chrysippus in the highest degree, and make a god of him; but to mock and scorn Alexinus, although they think the men to be fools alike, and not one more or less foolish than the other. True it is fay they; and needs it must be fo. But like as he who is but a cubit under the top of the water, is no less strangled and drowned, than he who lies five hundred fathom deep in the bottom of the Sea: even so they that be come within a little of vertue, are no less in vice still than those who are a great way off: and as blind folk be blind fill, although haply they shall recover their eye-fight shortly afafter; even so they that have well proceeded and gone forward, continue fools still and sintul, until such time as they have fully attained to vertue; but contrary to all this, that they who profit in the school of vertue; steemble not those who are stark blind, but such rather as see not clearly; nor are like unto those who be drowned, but unto them that swim, yea, and approach neer unto the Haven; they themselves do bear winness by their deeds, and in the whole practice of their life; for otherwise they would not have used them for their Councillors, Captains, and Law-givers, as blind men do guides for to lead them by the hands, neither would they have praised and imitated their deeds, act, sayings and lives of some as they did, if they had seen them all drowned alike, and suffocated with folly and wickedness.

But letting that go by, confider these Stoicks, that you may wonder the more at them in this behalf, that by their own examples they are not taught to quit and abandon these wise men who are ignorant of themselves, and who neither know nor perceive, that they cease to be stifled and strangled any longer, and begin to see the light, and being risen alost, and gotten above vice and sin, take their winde and breath again. Also it is against common sense, that for a man furnished with all good higgs, and who wanteth nothing of perfect bilis and happines, it should be meet and bestrings, to make himself away and depart voluntarily out of this life; yea, and more than so; that he who neither presently hath, nor ever shall have any good ching; but contrariwise, is continually haunted and convenient for himself, to leave and for sake this life, unless some of those things which they hold be indifferent, be presented, and do befall unto him. Well, these be the goodly rules and trim laws in the Stoicks school; and verily many of their wise men they cause induced to go out of this life, barring them in hand, that they shall be more blessed and secured from all danger: contrariwise, a sool and lewd man is able to say of himself,

Of wicked parts (to fay Idare be bold) So full I am, that unneth I can hold.

And yet for footh, they think it meet and feemly for fuch as thee to remain alive, but for those to forgo this life. And good cause why, quoth Chryspppus, for we are not to measure out life by good things or evil, but by such as are according to nature. Seehow these Philosophers maintain ordinary custome, and teach according to common notions. Say, you so (good sir) ought nor he who maketh probable into the estate of life and death, to search also and consider.

What rule at home in house, what work there is 3 How things do stand; what goes well, what amiss.

Should not he (1 say) ponder and examin as it were by the ballance, what things incline and bend more to felicity and what to inclicity, and thereby to chuse that which is proliable? but to lay his ground and make his reckoning to live happily or no by things indifferent, which nichter do good nor hurt? According to such presuppositions and principles as these, were it not convenient for him who wanteth nothing of all that is to be avoided, to chuse for to live: and contrariwise, for him to leave this life; who enjoyeth all that is to be wilhed for and defired? And albeit (my good friend Lawpriae) it be a senseled absurdity, to say that those who taste of no evill, should forsake this life; yet is it more absurd & besided all reaso; what for the not having of some indifferent things, aman should cast away and abandon that which is simply good; like as these men do, leaving selicity and vertue, which they presently enjoy, for default of riches and health, which they have not. And to this puepose we may well and fitly alledge these verse out of Homer:

And thu from Glaicus, Jupiter
all wit and fonfe did take,
When he with Diomedes would a foolifh bargain make;
For brafen armour to exchange
his own of gold most fine,
An hundred  exen richly worth,
for that which went for mine,

Or pie-

And yet those armes made of Brass, were of no less the in battell, than the other of Gold: whiteress coyn hatthe decent feature of the body and health, according to the Scoicks, yeeld no profit at all, nor make vige the open for the felicity. Howbeit, these men for all that; are content to exchange wiscdome for bealth, form of an inasmuch as they hold that it would have become Herassitus well enough and Pheresydes, to have cast the standing of their wiscdome and vertues, had it been in their power for to de; an cast chereby they might have them, been rid of their maladies, the one of the lowlie diseate, and the other of the Dropsie. And if Girce had filled two cups with several medicines and potions, the one making fools of wise men, and the other, wise men of fools, Vissie ought to have drunk that of folly, rather than to change his humane shape into the form of a beath, having in it wisedome withal, and by confequence felicity also. And they say, that even wisedome and prudence is self-teacheth as much, and commandeth in this wise: Let me alone, and suffer me to persish, in casted must be earried to and froin the form and shape of an Asse. But this wisedome and prudence will some man say, which prescribeth such things, sinche wisedome of an asse; if to be wise and happy stof its less good, and to be are the face of an asse in different. There is (they say) a nation of the Aethiopisms where a dog is their king; he is saluted by the fille and name ot aking, and hath all honours done unto him, and Temples dedicated, as are done unto king. But or aking, and man an include a strong those functions, and offices which appertain unto Governous men they be that bear rule and perform those functions, and offices which appertain unto Governous of Cities and magistrates. Is not this the very case of the Stoicks? for vertue with them hath the name of Cities and magnitrates. Is not this the very case of the soloness. For the wind that mattition name and carrieth the flew and apparence of good, it alone they fay, is expetible, profitable, and expedient; but they frame all their actions, they Philosophies, they live and die, according to the will, preferip, and commandement as it were of things indifferent. And yet there is not an Aethiopian fo hardy as to and communication as a west of times and a Throne under a cloth of cliate, and is adored of them kill that dog their king; but he litteth upon a Throne under a cloth of cliate, and is adored of them in all reverence : but the e Stoicks deftroy this vertue of theirs, and cause it to perish whiles they are wholly possess of health and riches. But the corollarie which Chapsippus himself, hath for a final fet unto these their doctrines, easeth me of farther pains, that I need not to stand more upon this point: fet unto thele their doctrines, catetime of interest pains, their there have their more dama more apon this point: For whereas (quoth he) there be in nature things good, things bad, and things mean or indifferent; there is no man, but he would chuse rather to have that which is ghod, then the indifferent there is no man, but he would chuse rather to have that which is ghod, then the indifferent or that which is bad. and to prove the truth hereof, let us take witness of the very gods, when as we do crave of them in our prayers and orisons, principally the possession and fruition of good things; if not, yet at leastwife the power and grace to avoid evills; but that which is neither good nor evill. we never defire for to have in stead of good; mary we can be content and wish to enjoy it, in lieu of we never define for to have in head of good 3, many are to contact of nature, tansposethand trans-evill. But this Chrysippus here inverting and perverting clean the order of nature, tansposethand trans-ferreth out of the middle place between, the mean and indifferent into the last, and reducing the last bringeth it back into the mids; giving as tyrants do to wicked persons, the preeminence of superior place, with authority and credit unto evill things; enjoying us by order of law, first to feek for that which is good; fecondly, for that which is evil; and last of all to repute that worst, which is neither good nor evil: as if a wan fhould next unto heaven fet hell, and reject the earth and all the elements about it into the pit of Tartarus beneath :

The gulf that lies, no man can found. Having then faid in his third book of Nature. That it is better for a man to live in the state of a fool, yea though he never should become wife, than not to live at all; he addeth thus much moreover word for word : For fuch are the good things of men, that even the evil things after a fort are preferred before those which are mean, and in the mids between; not that these go before, but reason, with which joyntly to live availeth more, although we should continue fools all the daies of our life : yea and to be plain, albeit we should be wicked, unjust, breakers of the laws, ennemies to the gods, and in one word, wretched and unhappy; for all these concur in those that live fools. Is it better then to be unhappy, than not unhappy ; to luffer harm, rather than not to luffer harm ; to commit injuffice, than not to commit injuftice; to transgress the laws, than not to transgress the laws; which is as much to fay, as is it fit and expedient to do those things which are not fit and expedient; and beferneth it to live otherwise than it beseemeth? Yea for sooth: For worse it is to be without reason and sensels, than to be foolish. What aile they then, and what takes them in the head, that they will not avow and confesthat to be evill, which is worfe than evill? And why do they affirm that we are to avoid folly alone, if it be meet to fly no lefs, nay rather much more, that disposition which is not capable nor fusceptable of folly? But wherefore should any man be offended and scandalized hereat, if he call to mind that which this Philosopher wrote in his second Book of Nature, where he avoucheth: That vice was not made without some good use and profit, for the whole world? But it will be betterto recite this doctrine, even in his own words, to the end that you may know in what place they range vice, and what speech they make thereof, who accuse Xenocrates and Speusippus, for that they reputed not health to be an indifferent thing, nor riches unprofitable. As for vice (quoth he) it is limited in regard of other accidents befide; for it is also in some fort according to nature; and if I may fo fay, it is not altogether unprofitable in respect of the whole, for otherwise there would not be any good; and therefore it may be inferred, that there is no good among the gods, in as much as they can have none evill: neither when at any time Jupiter having refolved the whole matter into himself, shall become one, and shall take away all other differences, will there be any more good, confidering there will be no evill to be found. But true it is that in a daunce or quier, there will be an accord and measure, although there be none in it that singeth out of tune and maketh a discord. as also health in mans body, albeit no part thereof were pained or diseased; but vertue without vice can have no generation. And like as in some medicinable consessions, there is required the poylon of a viper or flith like ferpent, and the gall: of the beaft Hyznai, even fo there is another kind of necessary conveniency between the wickedness of Melitus, and the justice of Socrates 3 between the dif-Solute demeanor of Cleon, and the honest carriage of Pericles. And what means could Jupiter have made, to bring forth Hercules and Lycurgus into the world, if he had not withall made Sardanapalus made, to oring total retails and a possing a mount worth, it is the state of the st those that alledge these dotting fooleries or rave to abfordly; and such as say that loofness of life and whoredome were not un profitable for continence, and injuffice for juffice? So that we had need to pray unto the gods that there might be alwaies fin and wickednels; Falseleasing smooth and glosing snegger

in case when these be gone, vertue depart and perish withall. But will you see now and behold the most elegant devise and pleasancest invention of his? For like as Comcedies (quothhe) carry otherwhiles ridiculous Epigrams or inscriptors, which considered by themselves, are nothing worth, howwhite required certain grace to the whole Poeme: even fo, a man may well blame and dereft vice in itelf, but in regard of others it is not unprofitable. And first to fay that vice was made by the divine Providence, even as a lewd Epigram composed by the express will of the Poet, surpassed imagina-Provinces to the first state of the first state of the givers of good things, rather than of evill? or how can wickednesse any more be chemy to the gods, or hated by them? or what shall we have to fay and answer to such blasphemous sentences of the Poets, sounding so ill in religious God once dispos'd some bouse to overthrow, Twixt men some cause and seeds of strife do som. Again :

Which of the gods twixt them did kindle fire,

Thus to contli interms of wrath and ire?

Moreover, a foolish and lewd Epigram doth embelsish and adorn the Contecdies, serving to that end for which it was composed by the Poet, namely, to please the spectators, and to make them laugh. But Jupiter whom we furnamed, Paternall, Fatherly, Supream, Soveralgo, Juft, Righteous, and according of Pindarus, desoft grees, that is to day, the best and most person Artisan, making this world as he battledoe, not like unto some great Correctie or Enterlude, full of variety, skill, and witty devices, but sir manner of a City common to gods and men, for to inhabit together with judice and vertue, in one accord and happily, what need trad he, to this most holy and venerable end of Theeves, Robbers, Min deres, Homicides, Paracides, and Tirants? for furely vice and wickedness was not the entry of some Morisque-dance or ridiculous Ear-sport, carrying a delectable grace with it and pleasing to God; neither was it fet unto the affairs of men, for recreation and pastime, to make them fport, or to move laughter, being a thing that carrieth not fo much as a shadow, nor representeth the dream, of that concord and convenience with Nature, which is so highly celebrated and commended. Furthermore, the faid lewd Epigram, is but a smal part of the Poem, and occupieth a verry little room in a Comcedie: neither do fuch ridiculous compositions abound overmuch in a play, nor corrupt and marre the pleasant grace of such matters as seem to have been well and pretily devised: whereas all humane affairs are full thorowous of vice: and mans life even from the very first beginning and entrie, as it were of the Prologue unto the finall conclusion of all and Epilogue, yes and to the very plaudite, being disordinate, degenerate, full of perturbation and confusion, and having no one part thereof pure and unblamable, as these Man day, is the most fischy unpleasant and odious enterlude of all others, that can be exhibited. And therefore gladly would I demand and learn of them, in what respect was vice made prostable to this universall world; for I suppose he will not say it was not for Divine and Comlefiall things: because it were a meer and ridiculous mockery to affirm that unless there were bred and remained among men vice, malice, avarice and leafing, or unleffe we robbed, pilled and spoiled, unleffe we flandred and murdred one another, the Sun would not run his ordinary courfe, nor the Heaven keep the fet feafone, and usuall revolutions of time, ne yet the earth feated in the midft and center of the world, yeeld the causes of winde and rain. It remaineth then, that vice and fin was profitably engendred for us, and for our affairs : and haply this is it which they themselves would feem to (ay. And are we indeed the better in health for being finfull? or have we thereby more plenty and? abundance of things necessary? availeth our wickednesse ought to make us more beautifull and better favoured, or serveth it us in any stead to make us more strong and able of body? They answer No. But isthis a filent name onely, and a certain blind opinion and weening of these night-walking Sophisters, and not like indeed unto vice which is confpicuous enough and exposed to the view of the whole-world, in such series it is not possible that it should bring any detriment or ought that is unprosstable, and least of all, O good God, of vertue, for which we were born. And what abfurdity were itto fay, that the commodious instruments of the husband man, the Mariner or the Carter, should ferves their turns for to attain unto their purpose and intended end : but that which hath been created by God for vertue, should corrupt, mar, and destroy vertue? But peradventure it is more than time now, to pass unto some other point, and to let this go.

Lambrias Nay I befeech you good fir of all loues and for my fake do not fo: For I defire to know and underfind how these men bring in evill things before the good, and vice before vertue.

Diadumenus. You say well, and certes my friend this is a point worth the knowledge: much vain jangling and prittle prattle verily do these men make, but in the end they come to this conclusion, that prudence is the science of good things and evill together: for that otherwise it could not fland but must needs allogether fall to the ground: For like as if we admit that there be truth, it cannot otherwise be but that fallity and untruth should be likewise hardby: so it is meet and stands to good reason, that if there be good things, the evill also must have their being.

Lamprias To grant the one of these not to be amiss faid, yet methinks I fee of my fell, that the other is clean contrary. For I discern very well she difference: because that which is not truth, must immediatly befalls but that which is not evill, is not by and by good: For between true and falle there is no mean: but betwixt good and evill there: to wit, indifferent. Neither followeth it necessarily, that both good and evill things should have their substance together, and that if the one be, the other likewise should enfue. For it may be that nature had good, and required not the evill, so that it might have that which was neither good nor evill. But as touching the former reason, if your Academicks say ought of it. I would gladly hear from your mouth.

Diadumenus.

Yes marry (quoth he) much there is alledged by them, but for this present relate I will, that which is most necessary. First and formost, a meer folly it is to think that good things and evill have their is most necessary. First and formost, a meet sony it is to think that good things and evil have their subfiftence for Prudence sake. For contrastwife, when good and evil was before, then Prudence solloweth as like as Physick ensued upon things holtome and breading diseases, which are supposed to have been before. For furely the good and evill came not up nor were brought forth, to the end that there should be Prudence: but that faculty or power whereby we judge and differen between evill and good is called Prudence: like as the Sight is a fense which serveth to diffinguish black from white, which colours had not their being first, to the end that we should have our Seeing, but contrariwise need we had of our Secing for to difeern the faid colours. Secondly when the world in that generall conflagration, which they hold and talk of, thall be all on a light fire and burnt, there will remain behind nothing that evill is, but all shall then be wife and prudent : And therefore consesse they muft, will they nill they, that there is Prudence although there be no evill, neither is it necessary, that if Wifedom be, evill alfo should have a being. But fay it were absolutely so, that Prudence were the Science of evill and good, what harm or obfurdity would follow, if upon the abollithing and annulling of evill things there were no Prudence any more, but some other vertue in lieu thereos, which were not the science of evill and good together, but onely of good? Like as among colours, if the black were quite perished and gon for ever, who will force us to confesse that the sense of Seeing is likewise loft ? And who would impeach or debar us for saying that sight is not the sense of differning black and white ? Surely if any man would force upon us the contrary, whas inconvenience and absurdity were there to answer him thus, Sir if we have not that sense that you speak of, yet have another sense and naturall power instead of it, whereby we apprehend colours that be white and not white. And verily for my own pare I do not think that if there were no bitter things in the world, our taft should be therefore utterly loft, or the sense of Feeling in case all dolour and pain were gon : no more am I perswaded that Prudence should be abolished, if all evil were rid out of the way. But like as those senses would remain to apprehend sweet savours and pleasantobjcta of feeling, to this Prudence also would continue to be the sciences of things good and not good. As for those who are of another opinion, let them take the name to themselves, so they leave us the thing indeed. But over and befides all this, what should hinder us to fay, that the evill is in cogitation and intilligence; but good in reality and effence; like as, I suppose the gods enjoy the reality prefence of health, where as they have the intilligence of the Fever and Pleurifie : confidering that we also, albeit we were peftred with all the evils in the world, and had no affluence at all of good things as these men say, yet we want not the understanding what is prudence, what is good, and what is good felicity.

And this is a wonderfull thing, if there being no vertue prefent, yet some there are who teach what Vertue is & inform us in the comprehension thereof; whereas if there were no such thing, it is impossible to have the intilligence of it; for do but confider what they would perswade us to, who reason Philosophically against common Conceptions, namely, That by foolishnesse and ignorance, we comprehend Wisedom and Prudence; but Prudence without folly and ignorance, cannot conceive so much, sa ignorance it felf. And if nature had necessarily need of the generation of evill, Certes, one example or two at the most of evill were sufficient; or if you will have it so, requisit it was that there should be brought forth ten wicked persons, or a shouland, or ten thousand, and not such an infinite multiude of vices, as the fands of the fea, the duft, or the feathers of divers plumed birds, could not afford fo great a number : but of Vertue nos fo much as a bare dream or vain vision. They that were the Wardens and Masters at Lacedemon, of those publick halles or dining places called Phiditia, were wont to bring forth and shew openly unto their youth, two or three of their slaves called Helate, full of wine, and flark drunken, that they might know thereby, what a shamefull and foul thing it was to be drunken, and so take heed of that vice, and learn to be fober. But in this life there be many fuch examples of vice in our actions; for there is not fo much as one fober unto vertue, but we all trip and flumble, nay we wander as if our brains turned round about, living shamefully in misery; and so farre forth are we intoxicate with our own reason and Self-conceit, filled with so great perturbation and folly, that we may be well and fitly likened to those Dogs which as Acfor tels the Tale, seeing certain skins floating above the water, gaped so greedily for to have them, that that they would needs drink up all the Sea before them, for to be fure of the faid skins; but ere they could come by them, they drunk so much as they burst again: and even we hoping, by reason to acquire Glory and Reputation, and thereby to attain unto Vertue, are spoiled, marred, and destroyed therewith, before we can reach thereunto, being before hand loaden with a mighty deal of meer heady, and bittervice, if ithe fo, as these men give it out, that even they who have made good progresse and proceeded to the end, seel for all that no Ease, no Alteration, no Remission, or Breathing time at all from Folly and Inselicity. But mark I pray again, how he who saith, that Vice was not produced and brought forth into the world unprofitably, depainted it unto you what manner of thing he described it to be, and what an heritage is it for him who hathit? For in his treatife of Duties or Offices he faith : That the vicious and finfull person, hath no want nor need of any thing; that nothing is profitable, nothing meet and convenient for him. How then is vice comof any times, wherewish neither health it felf is expedient, nor flore of mony, no yet advancement and promotion? And hath a man no need of those things, whereof some are precedent, preeminent, and to be preferred, yea, and beleeve me, very profitable and commodious; others according to nature, as they themselves term them ? And of all these doth no man find need, unlesse he become wife? And so by this reckoning, hath the lewd and foolish man no need to become wise; neither be men thirsty or hungry, before they are made wife? So that if they be dry, have no need of water, nor if hungry, Resembling right those gentle guests, who nought else did require, But under roofe to shrowd their heads, and warm themselves at fire. And so belike he had no need of covert nor of mantle, who said : Give Hipponax a cloke of his corps to fold,

For why, Shake and Shiver hard for cold? Bit will you pronounce a paradox indeed, fuch an one as is extravagant and fingular by it felf? Say hardly then; That a wife man wanteth nought, and hath need of nothing; he is rich, he is full and fortunate, he is of himself sufficient, blessed, happy, and every way absolute. But what a dizzinesse and giddiness; of the brain is this to say; That he who is indigent of nothing, yet hath need of the good things which he hath; and that the lewd and victous person is indigent of many things, and yet needeth nothing? for this is the very affirtion which Chrysippus holdeth: That wicked persons have nonted, and yet are indigent, turling, shifting, and transpoling the common notions, like unto Cockall bones or Cheffe-men upon the boord. For all men deem thus, that to have need, goeth b. fore indigence, supposing him that flandeth in need of things which are not ready at hand, nor easie to be gotten, is indigent. To make this more plain, no man is faid to be indigent of horns or of wings, for that he hath no need of them; but we say truly and properly, that some have need of Armour, of Mony, and of Apparell, when in the penury and want of these things, they neither have them nor can come by them, to supply their necessity. But these Stoicks are so desirous to be thought alwaies for to broach somewhat against common sense and Conception, that many times they forget themselves and slip out of their own proper opinions, so much affected they are and given to new conceits; like as in this place, if you please to cast your eye anto Chrysippus and look somewhat behind, calling to mind what hath heretofore been delivered.

This is one of his Politions, affirmed even against common sense, and vulgar opinion, that no evill and foolish man can find good and profit by any thing; and yet many of them by institution and teaching, proceed forward and profit; many who were flaves, become enfranchifed; beffeged, are delivered; drunken, are guided and led by the hand; fick and diseased, are cured of their maladies but for all this for footh, they are never the better what foever is done unto them : no benefits they receive, no benefactours they have, no nor neglect those who deserve well of them: and so vicious persons are not unthankfull, no more than are good and wise men. And thus ingratitude is not at allnor hath any being; for that the good never intervert, nor miscognize the favour and benefit which they have received; and the wicked are capable of none at all. But fee (I pray you) what shift they make to falve and answer all this: They fay (for footh) that grace, favour, or benefic is ranged in the number of mean things: & that to help or to be helped, appertaineth only to the wife. True it is fay theythat wicked men receive also a grace or benefit. What is that? Those who have part in a benefit, have not they also a part of use and commodity? and whereto a grace or benefit reacheth, doth nothing that is commodious and convenient, extend thither? And is there ought electhat maketh ademerit or pleafure done to be a grace, than that the party who doth the pleafure should in some respect be commo-

But let these matters passe, and tell us what is that weeken, that is to say, utility, which they prise for highly, and whereof they make to great account?

Diadumenus.

This is a thing (I may tell you) which they referve and keep as a great matter and a fingularity for their Sages only, and yet leave them not so much as the name of it. If one wise man, say they, do but put forth his finger prudently, wherefoever it be, all the wife men that are in the whole Continent and habitable world find this contains and utility by it. This is is the only gift and work of the amity that is among them, and in this do determine and end the vertues of wife men, namely the entercourse of common profix and utility, passing to and fro between them. As for Arifolds, he doted, Nanorastes also doted, who taught and affirmed that men had help from the gods, help from their Parente, and help by their Teachers and Schoolmafters: but never underflood they this wonderfull help and commodity, which these wise men receive one from another, when they be moved to verme, although they be not together, no nor so much as know one another. And verily all men do think, that to gather, to lay up, to keep, to dispense, and bestow, is conducible and profitable, when there is received profit and commodity by fuch things. And a good fubstantial housholder buyes himfelt locks and keyes, he keepeth his cellars, his closets and coffers,

Taking great joy bis chamber door with hand for to unlocks Where lies of gold and filver both, his treasure and his stocks

But to gather and lay up, to keep with great care, diligence and pain, those things which are for nothing profitable, is neither honourable, nor yet feemly and honest. If then Uhffis being taught by Circe to make that fast knot, had with it tied fure and sealed up as it were, not the gifts and presents which Alcinous gave him, to wit, trefeets, pots, plate, clothes, apparell, and gold; but some trash, as flickt, ftones, and other pelf raked together, thinking it a great felicity for him to possesse and keep charily such riffe-raff: and trumperie: who would have praised and commended him for it, or imitated this foolish forecast, witlesse providence, and vain dilligence? And yet this is the goodly and beautifull honesty of the Stoicks profession in generall, this is their honourable gravity, this is their beatitude; and nothing else is it, but an heaping up a keeping and preserving of things unprofitable and indifferent. For such be those which they say are acording to nature; and much more those outward matters: forafmuch as fometime they compare the greatest riches, with fringes and Chamberpots of gold, yea and (I affure you) otherwhiles as it falleth out, with oyl Cruets. And afterwards. like as those who think they have most insolently and proudly abused with blasphemous words and polluted the Temples, the facred cerimonies and religious services of some gods or divine powers, prefently change their note, and become penitent persons, and falling down profirate, or fitting humbly below upon the ground, bleffe and magnifie the heavenly power of the God-head; even fo they, as incurring the vengeance and plague of God for their prefumptuous follies, arrogant and vain feeches, are found puddering and raking again in these indifferent things, nothing indeed pertinent unto them; Cetting out a throat and crying as loud as they can, what a gay matter, what a goodly and honourable thing it is to gather and lay up such commodities, and especially the communion and fellowship of enjoying and using them: also that whosever want the same, and cannot come by them, have no reason to live any longer; but either to lay violent hands on themselves, or by long fasting and abstinence from all viands, to shorten their lives, bidding vertue farewell for ever. And these men verily, howsoever they repute Theognis to be a man altogether of abase and abject mind, for saying thus in verfe,

A man from poverty to flie,
O Cyrnus, ought himfelf to caft
Headlong from rocks most steep and bie, Or into sea as deep and vast.

themselves mean while in profe give these exhortations, and say, that to avoid a grievous malady, and escape exceeding pain, a man ought (if he had not a sword or dagger neer at hand, nor a poyloned cup of Hemlock) to cast himself into the Sea, or else fall headlong and break his neck from some steep Rock: yet affirm they, that neither the one nor the other is huttfull, evill or unprofitable; nor maketh those miserable, who fall into such accidents. Whence then shall I begin (quoth he) what ground-work and soundation of duty shall I lay, or what shall I make the subject and matter of vertue, leaving Nature, and abandoning that which is according to Nature? And whereat (I pray you, good fir) begin Aristotle and Theophrassus? What principles take Xenocrates and Polemon? And even Zeno him-felf, hath he not followed them, in supposing Nature and that which is according to Nature, for to be the Elements of felicity? But these great Clerks verily, rested here in these things, as Eligible and Expetible, good and profitable; adjoyning moreover unto them, vertue, which emploieth the fame, and worketh by each of them according to their proper use; thinking in so doing, to accomplish aperfeet and entire life, and to confummate that concord and agreement, which is in truth fortable and consonant unto Nature. For they made no confused mish mash, nor were contrary to themselves, as those who leap and mount on high from the ground, and immediatly fall down upon it again, and in naming the fame things, meet to be chosen, and yet not Expetible; proper and convenient, and withall not good; unprofitable, and yet fit for good uses; nothing at all pertinent to us, and yet forfooth, the very principles, of duties and offices. But look what was the speech of these noble and famous personages, the same also was their life; their deeds (I say) were answerable and conformable to their words. Contrariwife, the Sect of these Soicks, doth according to that crafty woman whom Archilochus describeth, to carry water in the one hand, and fice in the other: for in some of their doctrines and affertions they receive and admit Nature, in another they reject her orto fpeak more plainly, in their acts and deeds they adhere and cleave unto those things which are according to Nature, as being Eligible and fimply good; but in their disputations and discourses, they refuse and condemn the same as things indifferent, and nothing available to vertue, for the acquiring of felicity: nay, that which worfe is, they give her hard and reproachfull tearms. And forafmuch as all men generally are perswaded in their minds, that the soveraign good is a thing joyous, expetible, happy, most honorable, and of greatest dignitie, sufficient of it felf, and wanting nothing. See now this soveraign good of theirs, and examin it according to this common opinion: To put forth ones fingerlikes good of theirs, and examin it according to this common opinion: To put forth ones fingerlikes good? or what exoptable thing I pray you, is a prudent torture? who caffeth himfelf down headlong from an high rock, fo he do it with a colour of reason and honesty, is he happy and fortunate? is that unost honourable and of greatest price and dignity, which reason many times chuseth to reject, for another thing that of it self-is not good? is that all-sufficient in it self-is, accomplished and perfect, which whosever do presently injoy, if hap-lybe cannot obtain withill, some one of these indifferent things, they will not edgen to I.ve any longe? was there ever known any discourse or disputation wherein use and ordinary custome suffered more outrage and abuse, which stealing and plucking from it the true and naturall conceptions, as leading that the sum of the control of the own, putted in the place, Bastards, Changelings, of a monstrous and segitimate children of her own, putted in the place, Bastards, Changelings, of a monstrous and savege kind, and constraintent it colove, cheresting, and keep them in lieu of the other? And time have they done in treating of good things and evil, expetible and to be avoided, proper and strange; which ought to have been more clearly and plainly distinguished, than hor from cold, or white colours from black. For the apprehensions and conceits of these qualities, are from without forth brought in by the sufficient units. Now these men entring into the question, and common place soveraign of felicity, with their Logick subtilities, as if they were to handle the lying sophisme called Psudaments; or that matterfull manner of reasoning, named Kyritten have not solved one of the doubts and questions which there were, but moved, and raised an infinite number of others that were not there before.

Moreover, there is no man who knoweth not that there being two forts of good thing; the one which is the very utmost end, and the other, the means to attain thereto: the one is more excellene and perfect of the twain. And Chryspppus himfelf knoweth well enough this difference, as it may appear by that which he bath written in his third Book of Good things: for he diffagreeth with those who are of opinion, that the end or foveraign good, is science; and putteth this down in his Trea-tife of Juffice: If there be any who supposeth that pleasure is the end of good things, he thinketh not that Justice can be safe; if not the finall end, but simply good and no more, he is of another mind Ido not think that you would hear me at this present to rehearse his own words; for his third Book as touching Justice, is extant and to be had every where. When as they fay therefore (my friend) elsewhere, that no good thing is greater or leff: than another, but that the finall end is equall with that which is not the end, and no better than it, it is evident, that they be contrary and repugnant, not onely to the common notions, but also to their own very words. And again, of two evils, the one makethus worse than we were when is came unto us, and the other hurtethus indeed, but makethus noe worse: that evil in mine opinion is the greater which maketh us worse: neither doth that more burn, which caufeth us not to be the worfe. And Chrysippus verily confesseth, that there be certain fears, forrows, and deceitfull illusions, which well may hurt and offend us, but not make us worse. But read over and peruse the first of those Books which are written against Plato, as concerning Justice: for in respect of other causes, it were very well done and worth your labour, to note the frivoleus babling in that place of this man, where he makes no spare to deliver all matters and Doctrines what sover indifferently, eventhole as well of his own Sect as of other strangers, flat opposite to common sense: as for example, That it is lawfull to propose two ends, and two scopes of our life, and not to referre all that ever we do unto one end. And yet more than that, is this also a common Notion, That the end verily is one, but every thing that is done, ought to have a Relation to another; and yet of needling they must abide the one or the other. For if the first things according to nature be not expetible for themselves and the last end ; but rather, the reasonable cledion and choice of them; and if every man doth what lies in him, to have and obtain those things which are first according to nature, and all actions and operations have their reference thither, namely to acquire and enjoy the principall things according to nature: if (1 fay) they think for it must needs be that without afpiring and aiming for to get and attain those things, they have another end to which they must refer the election and choice of the faid things, and not the things themselves; for thus will be the end, even to know how to chuse them well and to take them wisely, but the things themselves and the enjoying of them, will be of small moment, being as a matter and subject which hath the dignity and estimation : for thus I suppose they use and put down in writing this very word to shew the differ-

But mark I befeech you, how they fare like unto those who will needs strein themselves to leap over and beyond their own shadow; for they leave not behind, but carry evermore with them some absorbing in their speech, and the same far remote alwaies from common sense: for as if one should say. That an archer doth all that lieth in him, not to lit the mark, but to do all that ever he can; she night be justly taken for a man, who spake anigmatically and by dark riddles, and utcered strange and prodigious words: even so do these old doting sooles, who with all their power endeavour on maintain, that to obtain the things according to nature, is not the end of aiming and aspiring to things according to nature; but forsooth to take and chuse them; and that the desire of health and things alter it in any man, endeth not in health of each one, but contrariwise, that health is referred spking after it in any man, endeth not in health of each one, but contrariving, that health is referred to the appetite and seeking after it; saying moreover, that to Walk, to read, or speak aloud, to the specific and seeking after it; saying moreover, that to Walk, to read, or speak aloud, to the appetite and seeking after it; saying moreover, that to Walk, to read, or speak aloud, to the appetite and seeking after it; saying moreover, that to Walk, to read, or speak aloud, to the appetite and seeking after it; saying moreover, that to Walk, to read, or speak aloud, to ends of health, and not it, the end of those meanes. Certes, these men dote, rave, and speak idly, as v 11 as they who should say; let mego to supper, that we may sacrifice, bath, or swear in the stouph, Nay (that which more is) that which these men say, perverteth order and custom, and containeth a confusion, shuffling and turning upside down all our affairs whatsoever : We study not say they, to containon, insting and turning uping cowin an our mass well; but we concook and digeft our means well; but we concook and digeft our means well; but we concook and digeft our means, because we might walk in due season. Why? Hath nature given us health for Ellebore, or rather brought forth Ellebore for health sake? For what could be uttered more strange and absurd, than such propositions as these? and what difference is there between him who saith, that health was made for medicinable drogues, and not drogues medicinable for health, and another who holdeth, that the gathering, the choife, the composition and use of such medicines, is to be preferred before health in self? or rather he thinks that health is not in any respect expecible: but he setted down the very end in the peifing and handling of those medicines, affirming for footh that appetite is the end of fruend in the peting and nanding or tione measures, automing tortion and appetite it the end of fraition, and not fruition of appetite: And why not (quoth he) all while there be added thereto thefe terms; confiderately and with reason.

True will we say again, if a man have regard unto the obtaining and enjoying of the thing which he pursueth; for otherwise that considerate reason is to no purpofe, in case all be done for to obtain that, the fruition whereof is neither honourable nor happy.

And since we are fallen upon this discourse, a man may say, that any thing else whatsoever, is according to common fense rather, than to hold, that without having notice or conception of good, a man may desire and pursue after it; for you see how Chrysippus himselt driveth Ariston into these fireights, as to imagine and dream of a certain indifference in things tending to that which is neither good nor ill, before that the faid good and ill is fufficiently known and understood; for foit might feem that this indifference must needs subsist before it be so, that a man cannot conecive the intelligence of it, unleffe the good were first understood, which is nothing else but the onely and soveraign

But confider I pray you, and mark now this indifference * taken out of the Stoicks schoole, and rar,not which they call ομολογία, after what manner, and whereby it hath given us the mean to imagine and air union and conceive in our mind that good? for if without the faid good, it is not possible to conceive and imagine the indifference respective to that which is not good; much lesse the intelligence of good things yeeldeth any cogitation unto them, who had not before fome prenotion of the good. But like as there is no cogicatton, of the art of things which be wholsome or breeding ficknesse in them who had not a precogitation before of those things: even so it is impossible for them to conceive the seience of good and evill things, who had no fore-conceit what were good and what were evill? Besides, there is another way, whereby a arguing. fland the thing before, which cannot be unustrous a part called Per man may perceive and fee, not the perversion and diffortion, but the very eversion, and destruction of

They hold that the very substance of good, is the reasonable and considerate election of that which doth the is according to nature; now this election is not confiderate which is directed to fome end, as is before turning faid : And what is this? Nothing elfe fay they, but to discourse with reason in the elections of those also of the things, which be according to nature. First and foremost then, the conception of the Soveraign good, is perished and clean gone; for this confiderate discoursing in elections, is an operation depending of the habitude of good Difcourfe, and therefore being compelled to conceive this habitude from the end, and the end not without it, we come short of the intelligence of them both. And again, that which yet is more, by all the reason in the world, it must needs be that the said reasonable and confiderate election, was the election of things good, postable and cooperant to the attaining of the end. For to chuse such things which be neither expedient, nor honourable, nor yet any way eligigible; how can it stand with reason: for suppose it were as they fay, that the end were a reasonable election of things which have fome dignity and worthinesse, making unto felicity, see 1 beseech you how their Discourse and disputation ariseth unto a trim point and goodly conclusion in the end : For the end (fay they) is the good Discourse, in making choise of those things which have dignity, making unto happinesse. Now when you hear these words, think you not my good friend, that this is a very fluange and extravagant opinion?

> Yes verily; but I must willingly know, how this happeneth? Diadumenus,

Then luntit you lay your ear close, and hearken with great attention, for it is not for every one to conceive this anigmaticall Riddle, but hear you Sir, and make me aniwer: is not the end by their faying, the good Discourse in elections according to nature?

Diadumenus.

That is their faying. Lamprias.

And these things which be according to nature, they chuse, (do they not) as good, or having fome dignities and preferences inducing to the end, or to fome other thing elfe.

I think not fo : but furely, to the end.

Lamprias.

Having discovered thus much already, see now to what point they are come, namely, that their end is to discourse well of felicity.

They say directly, that they neither have nor conceive any other thing of felicity, but this precious rectitude of Discourse touching the elections of things, that are of worth. Howbeit some there be who say, that all this refutation is directed against Antipater alone, and not the whole Sect of the Stoicks, who perceiving himself to be urged and hardly pressed by Carneades, fell into these vanities and foolish shifts for his evasion.

Moreover, as touching that which is discoursed and taught in the Stoicks School, Of Love, even against common notions, it concerneth all the Supposts in generall of that Sect, who have every one of them their hand in the absurdity thereof: for they avouch that young youths, are foul and deformed, if they be victous and foolish: but the wise onely are beautifull: and yet of these that are thus fair and beautifull, there was never any one yet either beloved, or levely and amiable. And yet this is not fo absurd : but they say moreover, that such as are in love with those who be foul, cease to love them when they are become fair. And who hath ever feen or known such a kind of love which should kindle and shew it felf presently upon the discovery of the bodies desormity, and the souls vice : and incontinently, be quenched, and vanish away after the knowledge of passing beauty, together with Ju-flice and temperance? And verily, such I suppose do properly resemble these gnats, which love to settleupon Vineger, fowr Wine, or the fome thereof: but the good and pleasant potable Wine they eare not for, but file from it. As for that emphaticall apparence of beauty (for that is the term they give it) which they say is the alluring and attractive bait of love: first and foremost it carrieth no probability with it, nor likelihood of reason. For in those who are most foul and wicked in the highest degree, there can be no such emphaticall apparence of that beauty : in case it be so as they say, that thelewdnesse of manners sheweth in the face, and insecteth the visage: for there be some of them who expound this strange Position as strangely, saying that a foul person is worthy to be loved, because there is some hope and expectance, that one day he will become fair : marry when he hath gotten this beauty once, and is withall become good and honest, then he is beloved of no man. For love fay they is a certain hunting, as it were after a young body, as yet rude and unperfect, howbeit framed by nature unto vertue.

Lamprias.

And what other things do we now, my good friend, but refute the errours of their Sect, who do thus force pervert, and defiroy all our common conceptions with their actions which be fenfeleffe, and their words and terms as unufuall and firange? for there was no perfon to hinder this Love of wife men toward young folk, if Affection were away: although all men and women too, both think and imagine Love to be fuch a passion, as the Woers of Penelope in Homer seem to acknowledge,

Whose heat of Love was such, that in their heart They wisht in bed to lie with ber apart. Like as Jupiter also said to Juno in another place of the said Poet : Come let us now to bed both go, and there with sweet delight Solace our felves : for never earst before remember I, That any Loveto women fair, no nor to goddesse bright

Thus you fee how they expell and drive Morall Philosophic into such matters as these

So intricate and tortuous, So winding quite throughout, That nothing found is therein found, But all turns round about.

And yet they depraye, vilipend, difgrace, and flout all others, as if they were the men alone who reflored nature and cultome into their integrity as it ought to be, infiltenced their Speech accordingly. But nature of it felf doth divert and induce, by appetitions, purfults, inclinations and impulsions, each thing to that which is proper and fit for it. And as for the Cultome of Logick, being fo wrangling and contentious as it is, it receiveth no good at all nor profit: like as the Ear discased by vain founds is filled with thicknesse and hardnesse of hearing. Of which if you think so good we will begin anew and discourse else where another time : But now for this present, let us take in hand to run over their natural! Philosophy, which no leffe troubleth and confoundeth common Anticipatione, and Conceptions in the main Principles, and most important Points, than their Morall Doctrine

And there the gods do alwaies joy In heavenly bliffe, without annoy. In heaven the gods immortall ever be: On earth below, poor mortall men walk me. Again, Exempt from all disease and crasse age, The gods do live in joy, and pain seel nine: They fear no death, nor dread the dark paffage Over the Frith of roaring Acheron.

There may peradventure be found some barbarous and savage Nations, who think of no God at all i but never was there man having a Conception and imagination of God, who effected him not withall to be Immortall and everlatting. For even these vile wretches called Asser that it to say Atheists, such so liegoras, Theedorus, and Hippongodeles though they were, could never finde in their hearts to say and pronounce. That God was corruptible. Only, they could not believe and be perswaded in their mind, that their was any thing in the world not subject to corruption. Thus howsover they admicted not a subsistence of immortality and incorruptibility, yet retained they the common anticipation of the gods: but Chrysippus and Cleanthes, having made the Heaven, the Earth, the Air and Sea to ring again, as a man would fay, with their words, and filled the whole world with their writings of the gods, yet of fo many gods, they make not one immortall, but Jupiter only; and in him they frend and confume all the reft: fo that this property in him, to refolve and kill others, is never a jote better, than to be refolved and defiroyed himfelf. For as it is a kind of infirmity, by being changed into another for to die; fo it is no less imbecility to be maintained and nourished by the resolution of others into it felf. And this is not like to many other abfurdities collected and gathered by confequence out of their fundamentall suppositions, or inferred upon other affertions of theirs; but even they themselves crie out with open mouth exprelly in all their writings, of the gods, of p ovidence, of deltiny and nature, that all the gods had a beginning of their Essence, and shall perish and have an end by fire, melted and refolved, as if they were made of Wax or Tinn. So that to fay that a man is Immortall, and that God is mortall, is all one, and the one as abfurd and against common sense as the other: nay rather I can-not see what difference there will be between a man and God, in case God be defined, a reasonable animall, and corruptible: for if they oppose and come in with this their fine and subtile distinction, that manindeed is mortall, but God not mortall, yet subject to corruption; mark what an inconvenience doth follow and depend thereupon: for of necessity they must, say, either that God is immortall and corruptible withall; or else neither Mortall nor Immortall: then which a man cannot (if he would ofpurpole fludy for it) device a more ftrange and monftrous abfurdity. I speak this by other; for that these men must be allowed to say any thing, neither have there escaped there tongues and pens, the most extravagant opinions in the world,

Moreover Cleanthes minding still to fortific and confirm that burning and conflagration of his faith ; That the Sun will make like unto himfelf, the Moon with all other Stars, and turn them into him. But that which of all others is most monstrous, the Moon and the other Stars, being for footh gods, works together with the Sun, unto their own destruction, and confer somewhat to their own inflammation. Now furely this were a very mockery, and cidiculous thing for us to powre out our prayers and orafors unto them for our own falety, and to repute them the Saviours of men, if it be kind and naturall for them to make half unto their own corruption and diffolution. And yet these men cease not by all the means they can to infult over Epicurus, crying, Fie, he for shame, and redoubling, Out upon him, for that by denying the divine Providence, he troubled and confounded the generall prenotion and Conception in our minds of the gode; for that they are held and reputed by all men, not only line mortall and happy, but also humane and benigne, having a carefull eye, and due regard to the good and welfare of men, as in truth they have. Now if they who take away the Providence of God, do withall abolish the common prenotion of men as touching God; what do they then, who avouch that the gods indeed have care of us; but yet are helpfull to us in nothing, neither give they us any good things, but fuch only as be indifferent; not enduing us with vertue, but befrowing upon us riches, health, procreation of Children, and such like, of which there is not one profitable, expedient, eligible or available. Is it not certain that these overthrow the common Conceptions that are of the gods? neither rest they here, but fall to flouting, stumping, and scottings whiles they give out that there is one god, surnamed Emograms, that is to say, the superintendent over the fruits of the earth; another sursays, that is to say, the Patron of generation; another sursays, that is to say, the Patron of generation; another sursays, that is to say, the Patron of generation; that is to fay, the Protector of Plants; another muer, and warfing, that is to fay, the prefident of Phylick and Divination; mean while neither is health simply good, nor generation, ne yet fertility of the groun d and abundance of fruits, but indifferent, yea and unprofitable to those who

The 3d. point of the comon Conception of the gods is that they differ in nothing to much from men, as in felicity & vertue: but according to Chrysip. they are in this respect nothing superior to men; for he holdeth, that for vertue Jupit. is no better than Dion; also that Jupi. & Dion being both of them wife, do' as trenching the ends of all things First and foremost, this is apparently abfurd, and against all commontenie, to fay that a thing is, and yet hath no being nor effence: and the things which are not, monitente, to lay that a thing is, and yet naturno being nor entiries, and the things which are not, yet have a being: which though it be noft abfurd, they affirm even of the universall world: for putting down this supposition that there is round about the said world a certain infinite voidnesse, they affirm that the universall world is neither body nor bodileffe; whereupon ensueth that the world is, and yethath no existence. For they call bodies onely, existent: for as much as it is the property of a thing exilt net to do and fuffer fomewhat: And feeing this univerfall nature has no exiltence therefore it shall neither do nor fuffer ought; neither shall it be in any place, for that which occupyes place is a body, but that univerfall thing is not a body. Moreover that which occupieth one and the fame place, is faid to remain and rest: and therefore the faid universall nature doth not remain, for that it occupieth no place: and that which more is, it moveth not at all, first because that which moveth, ought to be in a place and room certain. Again, because what foever moveth, either moveth it felf, or else is moved by another: now that which moveth it felf hath certain inclinations either of lightness or ponderosity: which ponderosity and lightnesses, be either certain habitudes, or faculties lightness or ponderosity: and powers, or elfe differences of each body: but that univerfality, is no body: whereupon it must and powers, or che uncertainty, and fo by good confequence hath in it no of necessity follow that the same is neither light nor heavy, and so by good confequence hath in it no of necessity follows that the same is neither same is neither same is neither same and the principle or beginning of motion; neither shall it be moved of another, for without and beyond it there is nothing: fo that they must be forced to fay, as they do indeed, that the faid univerfall nature doth neither reft nor move. In fumme, for that according to their opinion, we must not say in any doth neither reft nor move. In fumme, for that according to their opinion, we must not say in any case that it is a body, and yet the Heaven, the Earth, the living Creatures, Plants, Men, and Stones, case that it is a body, and yet the Heaven, the Earth, the living Creatures, Plants, Men, and Stones, be Bodies: that which is no body is felf shall by these reckonings have parts thereof, which are bodies, and that which is not ponderous, shall have parts weighty, and that which is not light shall have parts lightywhich is as much against common sense and conceptions, as dreams are not more; considering that there is nothing to evident and agreeable to common sense than this diffinction, if any thing be not antimate, the same is inanimate; and again, if a thing be not inanimate, the same is animate. And yet this manifelt evidence they subvert and overthrow, affirming thus as they do, that this universall frame is neither animate, nor inanimate. Over and besides, no man thinketh or imagineth that the same is unperfect, confidering, that there is no part thereof wanting : and yet they hold it to be unperfect : For (fay they) that which is perfect, is finite and determinate; but the whole and univerfall world, for the infinitenesse thereof is indefinite. So by their faying, something there is, that is neither perfect, nor unperfect. Moreover, neither is the faid univerfall frame a part, because there is nothing greater than it; nor yet the whole: for that which is whole must be affirmed likewise to be digested and in order 3 whereas being as it is, infinite, it is indeterminate and out of order. Furthermore, The other, is not the cause of the universall world, for that there is no other beside it; neither is it the cause of The other, nor of it felf, for that is not made to do any thing, and we take a cause to be that which worketh an effect. Now set case we should demand of all the men in the world, what they imagine Nothing to be, and what conceit they have of it, would they not fay (think you) that it is that which is neither a cause it self, nor hath any cause of it; which is neither a part, nor yet the whole; neithereferfect nor unperfect; neither having a foul, nor yet without a foul; neither moving nor fill and quiet, nor fublifing; and neither body, nor without body? For what is all this, but Nothing? yet what all others do affirm and verifie of Nothing, the fame do they alone of the universall world: so what all others do affirm and verifie of Nothing, the fame do they alone of the universall world: so thard feemeth they make All and Nobing, both one. Thus they must be driven to say, that Time is nothing, neither Predicable, nor Propolition, nor Connexion, nor Composition, which be terms of Logick, that they use, no Philosophers so much; and yet they say, that they have no existence nor being. But (that which more is) they hold that truth, although it be, yet it hath no being nor subsistance. ence, but is comprehended onely by intelligence, is perceptible and believed, although it have no jot ence, but is comprehended onely by intelligence, as perceptible and believed, although it have no jot of effence. How can this befalved, and faved, but that it must forpatfe the most monthrous abfirdity that is? But because it may not be thought that all this smelleth overmuch of the quirks and difficulties in Logick, let us treat of those which are more proper unto natural Philosophic Forasmuch therefore, as Jupiter is the first, the mids, the last, oven all in all, equally and reciprocally help one another; for this is the good that the gods do unto men, and men likewise unto the gods, namely, when they prove wise and prudent, and not otherwise. So that if a man be no less vertuous, he is not less happy ; insomuch as he is equall unto Jupiter the Saviour in felicity, though otherwise infortunate, and who for grievous maladies and dolorous difinembring of his body, is forced to make himfelf away, and leave his life, provided alwaies that he be a wife man, Howbeit, fuch an one there neither is, nor ever hath been living upon the earth: whereas contrariwife, infinite thousands and millions there are, and have been of miserable men, and extream informnate under the rule and dominion of Jupiter, the government and administration whereof is most excellent. And what can there be more against common sense, than to say, that Jupiter governing and dispensing all things palling well, yet we should be exceeding miserable? If therefore (which unlawfull is once to speak) Jupiter would no longer be a Saviour, nor a Deliverer, nor a Protector, and surnamed thereupon Soter, Lycius, and Alexicacos, but clean contrary unto these goodly and beautifull denominations, there can not possibly beadded any more goodness to things that be, either in number or magnitude, as they fay; whereas all men live in the extremity of mifery and wickeneffe, confidering that neither vice can admit no augmentation, nor mifery addition: and yet this is not the worft norgreatest absurdity: but mightily angry and offended they are with Menander for speaking as he did thus bravely in open Theater:

I hold, good things exceeding mean degree, The greatest cause of bumane misery.

For this (fay they) is against the common Conception of men; mean while themselves make God, who is good and goodness it fell, to be the author of evills: for matter could not verily produce any evill of it felf, being as it is without all qualities; and all those differences and varieties which it hath, it received of that which moved and formed it, to wit, reason within, which giveth it a form and fhape, for that it is not made to move and shape it felf. And therefore it cannot otherwise be, but that evill if it come by nothing, should proceed and have being from that which is not; or if it come by some moving cause, the same must be God. For if they think that Jupiter hath no power of his own parts, nor useth each one according to his own proper reason; they speak against common fense, and do imagine a certain animal, whereof many parts are not obeisant to his will; but use their own private actions and operations, whereunto the whole, never gave incitation, nor began in them any motion. For among those creatures which have life and foul, there is none fo ill framed and compoled, as that against the will thereof, either the feet should go forward, or the tongue speak, or the horn push and firike, or the teeth bite; whereof God of necessity must endure and abide the most part, if against his will, evil men being parts of himself do lie, do circumvent and beguile others, commit Burglary, break open houses, to rob their neighbors, or kill one another. And if according as Chrysippus faith, it is not possible that the least part should behave it self otherwise than it pleaseth Jupius, and that every living thing doth reft, flay, and move, according as he leadeth, manageth, turneth, flaieth, and disposeth :

Now well I wot, this voice of his Sounds worse and more mischeivous is.

For more tollerable it were by a great deal to fay, that ten thousand parts, through the impotencie, and feeblenesse of Jupiter, committed many absurdities perforce, even against his nature and will than to avouch that there is no intemperance, no deceit and wickednesse, whereof Jupiter is not

Moreover feeing that the world by their faying is a City, and the Sarres Citizens: if it be fo, there muft be also Tribes and Magistracies : yea and plain it is, that the Sun must be a Senatour, yea and the evening Star, some Provost, Major of Governor of the City. And I wot not well whether he who taketh in hand to confute fuch things, can broach and fet abroad other greater absurdities in natural matters than those do, who deliver and pronounce these doctrines. Is not this a Position against common sense to affirm, that the Seed should be greater and more than that which is engendred of it? For weisee verily that nature in all living creatures, and plants, even those that be of a wild and savage kindstaketh very small and slender matters, such as bardly can be seen, for the beginning and the generation of most great and huge bodies. For not only of a grain or corn of Wheat it produceth a stalk with an Ear, and of a little grape flone it bringeth forth a Vine tree, but also of a Pepin, Kernill, Acorn, or Berry, escaped and fallen by chance from a bird, as if of some sparkle it kindled and set on fire generation, it fendeth forth the flock of some bush or thorn, or else a tall and mighty body of any Oak, a Date or Pine-tree. And hereupon it is that genetal feed is called Entique, in Greek, as one would fay wellgass, that is to fay, the unfolding and wrapping together of a great mass into a small quancity : also nature taketh the name of goots, as it were supplement, that is to fay, the inflation and defulfon of proportions and numbers, which are op ned and loofned under it. And again, the fire which they tay is the feed of the world, after that general conflagration, shall change into the own feed, the world, which from a smaller body and little mass, is extended into a great inflation and definion, yea and moreover, occupieth an infinite space of voidness, which it filleth by his augmentation: but as it is engendred, that huge greatness retireth and settleth anon, by reason that the matter is contra-Red and gathered into it self upon the generation. We may hear them dispute, and read many of their books, and discourses, wherein they argue and cry out aloud against the Academieks, for confounding all things with their Aparalaxies, that is to fay, indiftinguible identities friving and forcing to make in two natures, one indued with the like quality. And yet what man living is there who conceiveth and knoweth not as much? or fupposen not the contary, namely, that it were a marvellow frange thing and a very abfurdity, if neither flock-dove to flock-dove, Bee to Bee, Wheaton to Wheat-corn, and as the common proverb goeth, one Fig unto another, hath been at all times the combined to the property of the proventies of the probability.

But this in very deed and truth is clean contrary to all common fenfe, that thefe men hold and affun: how in one substance, there be properly and particularly two qualified, and how the same substance having particularly one qualified, when there commets another to it, receiveth and keepeth them both, the one as well as the other. For if we admit two, I avouch it may as well have three, four, five , and many as one will name, in one and the same substance, I say not in divers parts, but all equally and indifferently, though they were infinit, even in the whole. Now Chryfippus faith, that Jupiter, as also the world resembleth a man and providence the Soul: when as then that conflagration of the world shall be, Jupiter, who only of all the gods is Immortall, shall retire unto providence, and both twain shall remain together in the substance of the skie. But leave we now the gods for this present, and pray we unto them that they would vouchsafe to give unto the Stoicks, a common sense and understanding according with other men, and let us see now what they say as touching the Elements. This first and formost standeth not with the received conceis and opinion of the world, that a body should be the place of a body, and that one body should enter and pierce through another body, confidering that neither the one nor the other containeth vacuity: but that which is full entreth into that which is full, and that which hath no distance receiveth into it self that which is mingled with it, but that which is full and folid, hath no void diffance in it felf by reason of continuity. And thefe men verily not thrusting one into one, nor two nor three, nor ten together, but cast all parts of the world cut piece-meal, into one, which they first meet with, even the least that is by sense perceptible: faying moreover that it will contain the greatest that shall come unto it. Thus in a bravery after their old manner in many other things, make of that which convinceth and refelleth them, one of their fentences and refolutions, as they who take for suppositions, those things which be repugnant to common sense. And thus upon this supposal, there must needs ensue many monstrous and prodi-gious positions, when they once consused ly mingle whole bodies with whole: and among those abfurd Paradoxes this also may go for one, That three be four. For even that which others bring in and alledge for an example of that which cannot fall into mans imagination, they hold for an undoubted truth : faying, that when one cyath of wine is mingled with two of water, it wanteth not but is equall in the whole, and this confounding them together, they bring it so about, that one is made ewain, by the equall mixture of one with two: for that one remaineth, and is fored as much as twain, making that which is equal to duple. Now if by the mixture with two, it taketh the meafure of two in the defution, this must needs be the measure together, both of three and of four : of three, because one is mingled with twain : and of four, for that it being mingled with twain, it hath as much in quantity, as those wherewith it is mingled. This fine device hapneth unto them, because they put bodies within a body, and for that it cannot be imagined how they cause one to contain another. For, of necessity it must be that bodies making a penetration one within another by mixture, that the one should not contain, and the other be contained, nor the one receive and the other be received within. For fo this should not be a commixion, but a contiguity and touching of superficies one close to another, whiles one entreth within forth, and the other encloseth without, when the other parts remain pure and entire without mixture, and so shall be one of many divers and differing asunder. But it cannon otherwise be as they would have it, that when there is a mixture, the things mingled, should not be mixed one within another: and that one felf fame thing being, within, should not withall be contained: and likewife in receiving, contain another: and polibble it is not, that either the one or theother should be: but fall out it will, that the two which be mingled, should pierce one within the other; neither can fo much as one part of the one or the other, remain by it felf apart, but necessarily they be all full one of another. And here ariseth that legg of Arcefilaus, so much talked of in the schools, which infulteen and danceen upon their monstrous absurdities with much laughter; for if these mixtions be through the whole, what should hinder, but that if a legg be cut off, putrified, cast into the Sea, and in process of time all diffused; not only the fleet of Antigonus might fail in and thorow it, as faid Arcesisans, but also the 1200. (ail of Xerxes, yea, and the three hundred Gallies of the Greeks might give a navall battel within the said legge? for fail it never will to be extended and spread mere and more, nor the leffe cease within the greater, ne yet will that mixture ever come to an end, no nor the extremity of it touch where it will end, and so pierce not thorow the whole, but will give over to bemingled: or if it be not mixed thorowout the whole, furely the faid legge will not afford room fo much as for the Greeks to give a navall battel in it, but even the same must needs putrific and be changed. But if a cyath of wine, or no more but one drop, falling into the Aegean or Candios-fea, palledirectly into the Ocean, or main Atlantique-fea, it shall not touch only the superficial part of the water alost, but spread throughout, in breadth, depth, and length. And verily Chrysippus admitwith 6 much in the very beginning of his first book, as touching Naural questions, saying that one drop of wine will not fail, but be mingled throughout the whole sea. And that we should not marvell fo much hereat, he faith moreover, that the faid drop by the means of mixture, will extend throughout the whole world: which is fo abfurd and without all app:arance of reason, as I cannot devile any thing more. And is not this also against common sense, that in the nature of bodies, there is no

supream, nor first or last, to conclude and determine the magnitude of the Body ? but that which is propofed as the subject, runneth on still infinitely without end, so as whatsoever is added, yet somewhat more scemeth may be put thereto? for we cannot conceive or comprehend one magnitude greater or leffe than another, if it be incident to both parts thus to proceed in infinitum, which is as much as to take away the whole nature of inequality. For of two magnitudes that be understood unequall, the one cometh first short of the last parts, and the other goeth beyond and surpasseth, but if there be no inequality of length in them, it followeth that there will be no unevennesse in the upper superficies nor asperity: for this unevennesse is nothing else, but the inequality of the superficies with it fell; but asperity is an inequality of the superficies with hardnesse. Of which qualities they allow none, who determine no body in an extream or utmost part, but draw out all still by a multitude of parts infinitely: and yet who knoweth not evidently, that man is compounded of a greater number of parts, then is his finger, and the world more then a man? for all men know and think as much; unlesse they become Stoicks: but prove they once to be Stoicks, they both say and opine the contrary: namely, that man is not composed of more parts, then is his finger, nor the world of more than is man; for section reduceth bodies into infinitum; and in things infinite there is neither more nor less, neither is there any multitude that surpasseth; neither shall the parts of that which is lest, cease to be alwaiet subdivided fiill, yea and to furnish out a multitude of themselves. How then do they wind out of these difficulties and unty these knots? Certes, with great slight, very subtilly and valiandy: for Gbryfippus faith, that when we be demanded, if we have any parts, and how many there be? also whether there be compounded of other, and of how many ? we are to flie unto this diffinction; fuppoling and fetting down, that the whole entire body confifteth of head, breaft and legs, as if this were all that was demanded and doubted of. But if they should proceed in their interrogatories to the extream parts: then faith he, no tuch antwer is to be made, but we are to fay, neither that they confift of any certain parts, nor likewise of how many; neither of infinite nor determinate. But I think it were better if I alledged his very own words, to the end you may fee how he keepeth and observeth the common Conception, forbidding us as he doth, to think, imagine or fay, of what parts, and how many each body is compounded, and that it confisteth neither of finite or infinite. For if there were a mean between finite and infinite, like as there is between good and bad, to wit, indifferent; he should pronounce what the same was, and so salve the difficulty. But, if as that which is not equal, incontinently becommeth unequall; and that which is not corruptible, prefently is incorruptible; to that which is not finite, is immediatly infinite, I fuppose that to say, A body is composed of para neither finite or infinite, is all one as to fay, that an argument is composed neither of true nor of falle propositions, and a number neither of even nor odd. But after all this, vaunting himself youthfully, he letteth not to say, that whereas a pyramis confifteth of triangles, the fides inclining to the commissure or joynt, are unequall, and yet exceed one another, in that they be bigger. Thus you fee how trimly he kept and observed common Conceptions: for if there be any thing greater, and yet surpaffeth not, there must be also somewhat leffe, and yet the same faileth not, and so there shall be also something unequall, that neither exceedeth nor wanteth, which is as much to say, as it shall be equall and yet unequall, not greater but yet greater, not leffe and yet leffe. Scemoreover I pray you a little, how he answered unto Democritus, disputing and doubting Physically and earnestly, if a cone or round pyramis be cut at the base thereof by the Plumb or Levell, what we ought to conceive and judge as touching the superficies of the sections whether they be equall or unequall: for if they be unequall, they will make the faid cone or pyramis uneven; and admitting many deep rabbotted incifions, and rough afperities in manner of fleps & grees : and if they be equall, then the sections also must be equall, and so it will be found that the round pyramis or cone shall have the fame befallunto it that a cylindar bath , namely, to confift of circles equall and not unequall, which were very absurd. Herein, making Democritus to be an ignorant person and one who knew not what he faid, he commeth in with this, and faith, that the superficies be neither equall nor unequall, but that the bodies be unequall, in that the superficies be neither equall nor unequall. Now to set down by way of ordinance and to affirm, that allowing the superficies to be unequall, it may fall out, that bodies should not be unequall, were the part of a man who permitteth himself to have a wonderfull liberty to write and speak whatsoever comes into his head. For both reason and manisch evidence, giveth us to understand quite contrary, namely, that of unequal bodies the superficies also be unequal, and the bigger that a body is, the greater is the superficies, unless the excess whereby it surpasses the fundamental superficies of greater bodies except the superficies are superficient to the superficient t ceed not those of the leffer, but rather faile before they come to an end, then we mult of neeeffity ky, that a part of that body which hath an end, is without end, and not determinate : for if he alledge and fay that he is driven perforce thereunto, left the inequality of superficies might feem to make unequall incifions, there is no such cause why he should fear : for those rabbotted incision which he suspe-Red in no such cause why he would fear : for rabbotted incisions which he supecteth in a cone or round pyramis, it is the inequality of the bodies, and not of the superficies that causeth them. So that it were a ridiculous folly, by taking away the superficies, for to be convinced to leave an inequality and unevennesse of the bodie. But to persist still in this matter, what can there be more contrary to common Conception, then to fain and devife such stuffe ? for if we admit that one superficies is neiequall nor unequal to another, we may consequently affirm that neither magnitude is equall or unequall, nor number either even or odd ; confidering that we can not fee down nor conceive in our mind , any mean between unequal and unequal, which is neuter. Moreover, if there were any superficies neither equal nor unequal, what should let but that we may imagine circles also neither equal nor unequal? for verily these superficies of the sections of cones or round Pyramides, be circles and it we allow thus much in circles, then we may as well admit so much of the Diameters of circles, namely, that they be neither equal nor unequal. And if this go for good, of angles likewife and triangles, of Parallelograms, and of superficies parallel or equally distant. For if longitudes be neither equal nor unequal one to another, then final not weight, nor percussion, no nor bodies be equal nor unequal. Furthermore, how date they reprove those who bring in vacuities, and certain indivisible bodies maintaining combate one again another-supposing that they neither stir nor stand still; when as they themselves maintain that such propositions as these be salte? If any things be not equal one to the other, the same be unequal one to the other: and these things here be not equal one to the other; neither are they unequal one to the other. But foral much as he faith, that there is something greater, which notwithstanding surpaffeth noisit were good reason therefore to doubt and demand, whether the same be agreeable and fitting one to the other? and if they agree, how then can either of them be the bigger? Now if it be not fortable, how is it possible that the one should not exceed, and the other come shore? for these things canno: hang rogethers to fay, that neither the one nor the other forpaffeth : and it agreeth not with the greater : or iragreeth, and yet the one is greater than the other. For of necessity it must follow, that those who retain not, nor observe common conceptions, be troubled with such perplexities.

Over and besides, it is against all common sense, to say that no one thing toucheth another: as alfor that bodies touch one another, and yet do in no part touch. Now it must needs be, that they admit this, who allow not the least parts of a body, and so they suppose always something before that which feemeth to touch, and never cease to pass on farther fill : which is the thing that they principally object against those, who defend and maintain the indivisible parcels called Atomes; namely, that there is no total touching, but that it is a mixture, confidering that fuch indivisible bodies have no parts. How is it then, that they themselves fall not into the like inconvenience, freing they admit no part to be either firft or laft? for that they fay, bodies do touch one another mutually in the whole by a certain term or excremity, and not by a part, and the faid term or point is no body. Then a body shall touch a body, by a thing which is no body: and contrariwife, shall not touch, the incorporal being between. And if it touch, it shall do likewise, and suffer somewhat, being it self a body, by that which is incorporal and no body. For the propertie of bodies, is to do and fuffer somewhat mutually, yea, and to touch one another: and if the body have a touching in part by the means of that which is incorporal, it shall likewise have a general and total connexion, even a mixion and incoporation. Again, in these connexions and mixtures, necessary it is that terms or extremities of bodies, either continue or not continues but perish : but both the one and the other is against common sense. For even they themselves allow not corruptions and generations of things incorporal: and impossible it is, that there should be a mixion or total couching of bodies recaining still their proper terms and extremities. For it is this term or extremity that determineth and constituteth the nature of a body : and as for mixions (it there were no approaching nor application of parts to parts) they confound all things wholly which are mixed. And as these men say, we must admit the corruption of extremities in mixtures; and likewife again, their generations, in the diltractions and Separations of them. But no man there is able to comprehend this easily for in regard that bodies touch one another, they also are pressed. thrust and crush done by the other. And impossible it is, that a thing incorporal should suffer or do thus; neither can we imagine fo much : yet would they conftrain us to think no lefs. For if a sphere or boul touch a flat or plain body onely by a point, certain it is, that it may be trained and rolled along the faid plain or flat body, by a point. And if the forefaid boul be painted in the superficies thereof with vermillion, it shall imprint a red line onely upon the same plain body; and being yellow, or of a fiery colour, it shall likewise give the same tincture to the superficies of the flat body. Now that a thing iucorporal should either give or take a colour, is against all common sense. And if we imagine a boul of earth, of crystal or glass, to fall from on high upon a smooth body of floar, it were against all reason to think that it would not break the same into pieces, namely, when as it shall light upon that which is solid, hard, and able to make resistance: But more unreafonable it were to fay, that it were broken by a term or point that is incorporal: In such manner, as in every fort, their anticipations and common conceptions as touching things incorporal and bodies, must needs be troubled and confounded, or rather utterly abolished, in supposing thus many things impossible.

Against common sense it is to say, that there is a future time, and a time past, but none at all present a salio, that the time which was crewbile, and not long since, hat he subifience, whereas that which now is hat no being at all. And yet this is an usual and ordinary matter with these Stock Philosophers, who admit not the least time that is between, and will not allow the present to be indivisible; but of all that which a man doth think and imagine as present, they affirm the one part to be of that which is already past, and the other of the stuture; insomuch, as there remaineth and is less in the midst no piece at all of the time present; incase of that which is said to be the very instant, part is attributed more things past, and part to things to come; whereupon of necessity one of these twain must follow, that either in admitting the tense, It is, one part thereof is past, and part is yet substitution in admitting the present time, It is, one part thereof is past, and the other to comeras also to say, that of that which is, part is yet stuture, and part already past: likewise of that which now is present.

one parcel is before, and another behinde; in such fort as present, is that which yet is not present, and not present anymore; for that is not present any longer, which is already past; nor present all. which is yet to come: And thus in dividing the prefent, they must also needs say, that of the year, and of the light, part was of the year past, and part of the year to come; likewise of that which is together and at once, there is some before, and some after . For no less troubled are they, in hudling and confounding after a strange manner these terms, Not yet, Already, No more, Now and not now, as if they were all one; whereas other men do conceive and think, that these tearms, Ere while, or not long fince, and a while after, or anon, are different parts from the prefent time, fetting the one before, and the other after the faid present. And among these, Archidemus who affirmeth, that the prefent Now, is a certain beginning, joynt or commissure of that which is already past, and near at hand to come, feeth now how in fo faying, he utterly abolisheth all sime; for were it true, that Now is no time, but onely a term of extremity of time, and that every part of time is as it were Now, it would feen then, that this prefent Now, hath no part at all, but is refolved wholly into ends and extremities; jonns, commissures, and beginnings. As for Chrysppus, willing to shew himself witty and artificial in hisdivisions, in that Treatife which he composed as touching voidness, and in other places affirmeth, that the Past and the Future of time substitute hot, but hath substitute 3 and that the present onely hath being: But in the third, fourth, and fifth Books of Parts, he avoucheth, that of the instant or present, partis Future, and part Paft; in such fort, as by this means he divideth the substance of time, into those parts of subsistent, which are not subsistent; or to speak more truly, he leaveth no pareat all subsistent, if the instant and present hath no part at all, which is not either past or to come; and therefore the conceit that these men have of time, resembleth properly the holding of water in a mans hand, which runneth and fleddeth the more, by how much harder it is preffed together. Come now unto actions and motions all light and evidence is bythem darkned, troubled, and confounded; for necessarily it ensueth, that if the Inftant or Present is divided into that which is past, & to come, part of that which now moveth at this inflant, should partly be moved already, and in part to remove afterwards, and withal, that the begin. ning and end of motion should be abolished : also, that of no work there should be any thing fift or laft, all actions being distributed and dispersed together with time : for like, as they say, that of the present, some is past, and some to come : even so of every action in doing, some part is already done, and other refleth to be done. When had then beginning, or when shall have end, To dine, to write, and to go, if every man who dineth, hath dined already, and shall dine: and who foever goeth, hath gone, and shall go ? and that which is (as they say) of all absurdation most monstrous, if it be granted, that he who now liveth, hath lived already, and shall live; life had neither beginning, nor ever shall have end : but every one of us as it should feem by this reckoning, was born without beginning of life, and . Shall dye without giving over to live: for if there be no extream part, but ever as one that now liveth. thall have fomewhat of the prefent remaining for the future, it will never be untruly faid, Socrates thall live, so long as it shall be truly said, Socrates liveth; so that as often as it is true, Socrates liveth; so often it is falle, Socrates is dead. And therefore if it be truly said in infinite parts of time, Socrates in thall live; in no part of time shall it ever be truly said, Socrates is dead. And verily what end shall there be of any work? and where shall any action stay and cease, in case as often as it shall be truly faid, a thing is now doing, so often likewise it shall be truly said, It shall be done : for lye he shall who saith, Thie is the end of Plate writing or disputing; for that one day Plate shall cease to write or dispute: if at no time it be a lye to fay, of him that disputeth, He shall dispute; or of him who writeth, He shall write. Moreover, of that which is done, there is no part, which either is not finished already, or shall be instead, and either is past or to come. Besides, of that which is already done, or of that which shall be done, of that which is past or future, there is no sense. And so in one word, and to speak simply there is no fense of any thing in the world; for we neither see nor hear that which is past or to come; ne yet have we any fenfe of things which have been, or which shall be; no, nor although a thing should be present, is it perceptible and subject to sense, in case that which is present, be partly to come, and in part past already; if I fay, one part thereof hath been, and another shall be : and yet they themselves cry out upon Epicurus, as if he committed some great indignity, and did violence to common conceptions, in moving as he doth all bodies with equal celerity, and admitteth no one thing fwifter than another: But far more intolerable it is, and farther remove from common sense to hold, that no one thing can reach or overtake another :

according as we say in our common proverb: which must of necessity fall our, if things move according to Before and Behinde; and in case the intervals which they pass through, be divisible into infinite parts, as these men would have them : for if the Tortoise be but one furlong before the horse, they who divide the faid interval or space between into infinite parts, and move both the one and the other according to Prius and Posterius, shall never bring the swifest close unto the slowest, for that the flower always winneth fome space or interval, before that which is divisible, into other infinite intervals. And to fay, that water which is poured forth out of a cup or boul, shall never be poured all clean out; how can this chuse but be against common sense? and doth not this consequently follow upon those things that these men avouch ? for never shall a man comprehend or conceive that the motion of things infinitely divifible, according to before, thath fully performed the whole interval, but leaving always fome space divisible, it will levermore make all the effusion, all the running forth or divisible. fliedding of the liq ior, all the motion of alfolid body; or the fall of a weighty poile, to be imperice. Het paffe many absurdities delivered in their doctrine; and touch these onely, which are directly against common sense.

As for the question touching augmentation, it is very ancient : For according as Chrysippus laith; it was by Epicharmus put forth. And for that the Academicks thought it to be not very easie and ready all of a sudden to be cleared; these men come with open mouth against them, accusing them for overthrowing all anticipations, whereas they themselves keep not at all the common conceptions: and that which more is, pervert the very fences. For whereas the question is plain and simple; these men grant and allow such suppositions as these, that all particular substances flow and run, partly by yeelding and fending forth somewhat out of themselves, and in part by receiving other things from without; and that by reason of the number and multitude of that which comes in, or goes out, things continue not one and the same, but become altered and divers by the foresaid additions and detractation, so as their substance receiveth a change. Also that contrary to all right and reason, custome hath fo far prevailed, that fuch mutations be called augmentations and diminutions : whereas rather they ought to be termed generations, and corruptions, for that they force an alteration of one prefent flate and being, into another; but to grow and diminish are passions and accidents of a body, and subich that is permanent. Which reasons and affertions being after a fort thus delivered in their Schooles, what is that these defenders of Perspicuity and Evidence, these Canonical reformers (1say) of common notions would have? namely, that every one of us should be double like twinners, or of a twofold nature: not as the Poets feigned the Molionides, to be in force parts conjunct and united, and in other fevered and disjoyned, but two bodies, having the fame colour, the fame shape, the same weight and place : a thing that no man ever faw before : marry these Philosophers onely have perceived this duplicity, this composition and ambiguity; whereby every one of us are two subjects, the one being the one of them runneth and floweth continually, and yet without augmentation and diminution, or remaining in the same state such as it is; the other continueth still, and yet groweth and decreaseth, and yet suffereth all things quite contrary to the other, wherewish it is concorporate, united, and knit, leaving to the exteriour fende no shew of distinct difference. And yet verily it is said of that Lynceus, how in old time he had to quick and piercing and eye-fight, that he was able to fee through stocks and flones. And one there was by report, who fitting in Sicily, could from a watch-tower fenfibly differn the ships failling out of the Haven of Carthage, which was distant a day and a nights a failling with a good forewind. And as for Callicrates and Mymercides, they have the name to have made Chariots so small, as that the wings of a fly might cover them: yea and in a millet grain or sesam seed to have engraven Homers verses. But furely this perpetual fluxion and diversity in us , there was never any yet that could divide and diffinguish: neither could we our selves ever finde that we were double, and that parely we ran out continually, and in part again remained alwaies one and the same, even from our nativity to our end. But I am about to deal with them more simply and plainly; for whereas they devile in every one of us four subjects, or to speak more directly, make each of us to be four, it shall suffice to take but two, for to shew their absurdity. When we do hear Pentheus in a Tragedy saying, that he seeth two Suns, and two Cities of Thebes, we deem of him, that he seeth not two, but that his eyes do daz: I and look amiffe, having his difcourfe troubled, and understanding clean transported. And even these persons, who suppose and set down, not one City alone, but all Men, all Beafts, all Trees, Plants, Tooles, Veffels, Utenfils, and Garments, to be double, and composed of two Natures; reject we not and bid farewel, as men who would force us not to understand any thing aright, but to take every thing wrong? Howbeit, haply herein they might be pradoned and winked at, for feigning and deviling other natures of Subjects, because they have no means else, for all the paines they take, to maintain and preserve their augmentations: But in the Soul, what they should aile, what their meaning might be, and upon what grounds and suppositions, they devised to fram other different forts and forms of bodies, and those in manner innumerable, who is able to say? or what may be the cause, unlesse they ment to displace, or rather to abolish and destroy altogether the common and familiar conceptions, inbred in us, for to bring in and fet up new fangles, and other strange and forreign novolties? For this is wonderful extravangant and abfurd, for to make bodies of vertues and Vices, and befides of Sciences, Arts, Memories, Fanfies, Apprehensions, Passions, Inclinations, and Affents: and to affirm that these neither lye, nor have any place substitting in any subject, but to leave them one little hole like a prick within the heart, wherein they range and draw in, the principalpart of the foul, and the discourse of reason, being choked up as it were with such a number of bodies, that even they are not able to count agreat fort of them, who feem to know best how to distinguish and discern one from another. But to make these not onely bodies, but also living creatures, and those endued with reason, to make (I say) a swarm of them, and the same not gentle, mild, and tame, but a turbulent fore and rable by their malicious shrewdnesse, opposit and repugnant to all evidence, and usual custom, what wanteth this of obsurdity in the highest degree. And these men verily do hold that not onely vertues and vices be animal and living creatures, nor passions alone, as anger, wrath, envy, grief, forrow and malice, nor apprehenfions onely fantafies, imaginations, and ignorances, nor arrand mysteries, as the Shoomakers and Smithscraft: but also over and besides all these things, they make the very operations and actions themselves to be bodies, yea and living creatures: they would have Walking to be an animal dancing likewife, the wing, faluting, & reproachful railing; and to confequently they make laughing and weeping to be animal. And in granting thefe, they admit also, coughing, tney make raugumng, yea, and withal, spitting, reaching, shitting and snutting of the note, and such fineding and groaning, year, and water first And let them not think much, and take it grievously, if they be driven to this point by way of particular reasoning, calling to minde Chrysippus, who in if they be driven to this point by way or justices. What fay you of the night, is it not a body: even-hits third book of Natural Oziethons, faith thus, What fay you of the night, is it not a body: even-ing, morning, midnight, are they not bodies? Is not the day a body? The New-Moon is it not abody? the tenth, the fitteenth, the thirtieth day of the Moon, the moneth it felf, Summer, Autumn. and the whole year, be they not bodies? Certes, all these things by me named they hold with tooth and nail, even against common prenotions: But as for these hereaster, they maintain contrary to their own preper conceptions, when as they would produce the hortest thing that is by refrigeration, and that which is most subtile by inspissation. For the soul is a substance most hot, and consisting of most fubril parts: which they would make by the refrigeration and condensation of the body, which, as it were, by a certain perfulion and tincture it hardeneth and altereth the spirit, from being vegerative to be animate. They say also, that the Sun is become animate, by reason of the moissure turned into an intellectual and spiritual fire. See how they imagine the Sun to be engendred and produced by refrigeration? Xenophanes, when one came upon a time, and told him, that he had feen E lesto live in hot scalding water: Why do we not seethe them then (quoth he) in cold water? If therefore they will cause heat by refrigeration, and lightness by aftriction and condensation: it followeth on the will caute near by confequence, that by keeping a certain proportion and correspondency in absurdity, they make heat by cold, thickning by diffoling, and weighty things by rarefaction. As for the very substance and generation of common conception and sense, do they not determine it even against common sense it sels? For conception is a certain phantalic or apprehension; and this apprehension is an impression in the soul. The nature of the soul is an exhalation, which by reason of the rarity thereof can hardly receive an impression; and say that it did receive any, yet impossible or the tartity there to car that my the first the nutriment and generation of it confifting of moit things holder that continual course of succession and consumption. The commerce also and mixture of respiration with the ayr, engendreth continually some new exhalation turning and changing by the flux of ayr coming in and going forth reciprocally. For a man may imagine rather that a river of running water Keepeth the forms, figures and images imprinted therein, then afpirit carried in vapors and humors, to be mingled with another spirit, or breath from without continually, as if it were idle and strange unto it. But so much forget they, or misunderstand themselves, that having defined common conceptions to be certain intelligences laid up apare: memories to be firm, permanent, and habitual imprefions having fixed Sciences likewife, every way fast and fire, yet within a while after they fe under all this a foundation and base, of a certain flippery substance, easie to be dislipated, carried con-tinually, and ever going and coming to and fro. Moreover, this notion and conception of an element and principle, allmen have imprinted in their minde, that it is pure, fimple, nor mingled nor corposed : for, that which is mixed, cannot be an element nor a principle, but rather that, whereof it is

Howbeir, these men devising God the principle of all things to be a spiritual body, and a minde or intelligence feated in matter, make him neither pure nor fimple, nor uncompound, but affirm that he is composed of another, and by another. As for matter, being of it self without reason, and void of all quality, it carrieth with it simplicity, and the very natural property of a principle, and God, if it be true, that he is not without body and matter, doth participate of matter as of a principle. For if reason and matter, be all one and the same, they have not done well to define matter for to be reasonless: but if they be things different, then doth God consist of both twain, and not of a simple effence, but compounded, as having taken to his intellectual substance, a bodily nature out of matter. Furthermore, confidering they call these four primitive bodies, to wir, carth, water, air, and fire, the first elements, I cannot see how they should make some of them simple, and others mixed or compound; for they hold, that the earth and water cannot contain either themselves or any other, and that it is the participation of spirit and fellowship of fice, whereupon dependeth the preservation of their unity: as for the air and fice by their own power they fortific themselves, which being medled with the other two, give them their force, vigour and firmitude of substance. How is it then, that either earthis an element or the water, seeing neither of them both is simple, first, or sufficient to keep and preserve it felf, but having need of another without to contain them always in their being, and to fave them? for they have not left fo much as any thought that they be a fubftance. But furely this reason of theirs as touching the earth, that it confisteth of it self, containeth much confusion and great uncertainty, for if the earth be of it felf, how cometh it to pass that it hath need of the ayr, to binde and contain it; for foit is no more earth of it felf, nor water; but the air hath by thickning and hardning matter, made thereof the earth; and contrariwife, by diffolving and mollifying it, hath created the water: and therefore we may infer thus much, that neither of these is an element, seeing that some other thing hath given them their effence and generation. Over and befides, they affirm, that substance and matter are subject to qualities, and so in manner do yield their limit and definition : and then on the other fide, they make the said qualities to be bodies; wherein there is a great consusion: for if qualities have a certain proper substance, whereby they are termed and be really bodies indeed, they require no other substance, for that they have one of their own: but if they have this onely under them which is common, and which they call effence or matter, certain is is, that they do but participate of the body; for bodies they are not. For that which is in the nature of the subject, and doth receive, must of necessity differ from those things which it receiveth, and whereof it is the subject. But these men see by the half; for they term the matter answer, that is to say, without qualities: But they will not name the qualities acous, that is to say, void of matter. And yet how is it possible to make a body without quality, but we must imagine a quality without a body? for that reason, which coupleth a body with all manner of qualities, permitteth not the thought to comprehend any body without so may be used in the subject of subject of the subject of t

Against Colores the Epicurean.

The Summary.

WE have in many places before, but principally in two several Treatises of the former Tomes perceived how Plutarch is quite contrary unto the Epicureans; and namely, in one of those Treatises he dealeth with a certain Book (which he now expressly refuteth) where Colotes endeavereth to prove, that a man cannot possibly live well, according to the opinions of other Philosophers, Plutarch spirites that an action perfect that impossible it is to lead a joyful life after the doctrine of Epicurus, and test it is accompanied with overweening, impudency, and standerous calumniation. And not contenting bimiles that to be ave confused them of propse once or trickee, he still upon them in this Discourse, and particularly he copeth with Colores, whose stokes fishiness, and impiety, he here describeth. The sum of all which Declamation, is this, That thele Epicureans are not any way worthy the name of Philosophers, who contrariwise tread and trample under foot all the parts of true Philosophy discovering in their writings, as well as throughout all their lives, meer beaftly brutality. But all that is delivered in this Treatife, may be reduced well to two principal points : The one containeth a defence or excuse of the Dotirine taught by Democritus, Empedocles, Parmenides, Socrates, and other ancient Philesophers, flandered by Colotes, who extolled far above them, the Traditions and Precepts of his Master. The other discovereth divers absurdities and strange opinions of the Epicureans, even by their own testimonies : whom Plutarch refelleth foundly , handling in this Disputation many Articles of Philosophy, Natural, Moral and Supernatural; and particularly, of the Senses, of Nature, of the Atomes, of the Uniwerful World, of the Rowledge of Man, of the Opinion of the Academicks, of the Apprehensions, Faculties, Passions, and Affelions of the Soul: Of the certainty of things sensible, of the falfity and truth of imaginations, of the use of Laws, of the prest of Philosophy, of the Soveraign Good, of Resident gion, and of other such matters, the principles whereof the Epicareans abolished, bringing in Paradoxes wonderful strange, for to suffle things consuledly, and make all uncertain. All which is marked parti-cularly in the train and course of the Authors own words, and therefore needless is is to specific thereof any more, because I would avoid tautologies and unnecessary repetitions. True it is, that in certain refutations Plutarch is not so firm as were to be desired: but that may be imputed to his ignorance of the true God. As for the relt, it may suffice and serve, to know the misery and wretchedness of the Epi-cureums: And that other Philosophers had many good parts, and delivered many beautiful speeches, whereof all vertuous persons may reap and gather great fruit in applying and referring the same to their right use. And for to close up all, he maketh a comparison between true Philosophers, and the Epicureans, proving in very many places, that Colotes, and his fellows like himself, are people not onely unprofitable, but also most pernicious, and so by consequence unworthy to live in the world.

Against Colotes the Epiccurean.

Olotes, whom Epicurus was wont (O Saturninus) to call by way of flattering diminution, Colataras and Colatarius, composed and put forth a little Book, which he entituled, That there could be no life at all according to the opinions of other Philosophers: and dedicated the faid Book unto King Ptolemens. Now what came into my minde to speak against this Colores, I suppose you would take pleasure to read the same in writing; being, as you are, a man who loveth reprote you would take present a specially such as concern the knowledge of antiquity, and beside, asserting the the special s as much as poffibly may be, the Difcourfes of ancient Saget. Whereas therefore of late this book was as much as poffibly may be, the Difcourfes of ancient Saget. Whereas therefore of late this book was as much as poffibly man by name, an Ægian in reading, one of our familiar friends, one whom you know well enough, drijledinus by name, an Ægian in reading, one of our taminar incussions and of all the Academicks a most francick Sectary of Plate, although born, a man exceeding palionate, and of all the Academicks a most francisk Sectary of Plate, although born, a man exceeding palionate, and of all the Academicks a most feature of the section of t ner, was very patient and filent all the while, giving ear most civilly even to the very end. But so foon as the Lecture was done: Go to now my mafters (quothhe) whom were we best to cause for to arise and fight with this fellow, in the quarrel and defence of Philosophers? For I am not of Neffors minde, neither do I greatly praise him, for that when there was to be chosen the most valiant Warrior of those nine hardy Knights who were presented, to enter into combate with Heder hand to hand, committed the election unto Fortune, and put all to the lot : But you fee alfo (quoth 1) that even he referred himfelf to be ordered by the lot, to the end that the choice might pass according to the dispose and ordinance of the wifelt man :

The lot out of the Helmet then did fall,
Of Ajax, whom themselves wish most of all.
And yet if you command meto make election,
How can I ever put out of minde,
Divine Ulyster, a Prince so kinde?

Confider therefore, and be well advised how you may be able to refell this man. Then Aristodemus: But you know full well (quoth h:) what Plato formetime did, who being offended with his Boy that waited upon him, would not himfelf fwindge him, but caufed Spenfippus to do fo much for him, figing withal, That he was in a fit of choler. And even fo, I say as much to you, Take the man to you, I pray, and entreat him at your pleasure; for my self am very angry with him. Now when all the rest of the company were inftant with me, and prayed me to take this charge in hand : Well I fee (quoth 1) that I must speak, seeing you will needs have it so: but I am afraid lest I may seem my felf to be more carnefly bent against this book then it deserveth, in the desence and maintenance of Socrates, against the incivility, rudeness, scurrility, and insolence of this man, who presenteth (as one would (ay) onto him hay, as if he were a beaft, and demandeth how he may put meat into his mouth, and not into his ear: whereas haply the best way were to laugh onely at him for such railing, especially considering the mildeness and gentle grace of Socrates in such cases. Howbert, in regard of the whole hoft, beside of other Greek Philosophere, namely, Democritus, Plato, Empedocles, Parmenides, and Meliffus, who by him are foully reviled, it were not onely a shane to be tongue-tied, and keep silence, but also meer sacriledge and impiety, to remit any jot, or forbear to speak freely to the utmost in their behalf, being such as have advanced Philosophy to that honor and reputation which it hath-And verily our Parents, together with the gods, have given us our life : but to live well, we suppose, and that truly, it cometh from the Philosophers, by the means of that doctrine which we have received from them, as co-opperative with law and justice, and the very bridle that doth chastice and restrain our lusts. Now to live well, is to live sociably, friendly, temperately, and justly of which good qualities and conditions, they leave us not fo much as one, who cry out with open mouth, that the foveraign good of man lieth in his belly, and that all the vertues in the world, if they were put together, they would prize no better worth then one crackt brazen piece of coyn, without pleasare, and in case all manner of delights were quite removed from them. Also, they annex hereto, their different courses, as touching the soul and the goods, wherein they hold that the soul perisheth, when it is once Separate from the body: and that the gods meddle not with our affairs. Moreover the Epicureans rep'o sch other Philosophers, for that by their wildom and sapience, they undo mans life: and they again object unto them, that they teach men to live loosely, basely, and beastly. And verily such matters as there be mingled in all the writings of Epicurus, and spread throughout his whole Philosophy. But this Colores here having made an extract of certain words or voyces void of matter and substance, and drawn some pieces and broken fragments without reasons and arguments for to prove and confirm his doctrines, or to give light for their understanding and credit, bath made his book in manner of a shop full of all fort of wares; or of a table or fiall reprefenting fittings flews and monfters: Which you (I fay) know belt of all others, for that you have continually in your hands, and do read the works of ancien writers. So he feemeth unto me that like to the Lydian, he openeth not one gate, and no more tipon him, but enwrappeth Epicurus in very many doubts and difficulties, and those of all other, the greatest for he begins with Democrisus, who no doubt received at his hands a goodly salary and reward for his apprentiffage, being a thing certainly known, that for a long time Epicurus called teward to the second response to the second r curus honored Democritus, for that he attained before him to the true and found understanding of the truth: and that in general the whole Treatife of natural things, was called Democritian, because he light first upon the principles, and met with the primitive fountains and foundations of nature. And Metrodorus said directly and openly of Philosophy, That if Democritus, had not led the way, Epicurus had never arrived to wisdom and learning. Now if it be true, as this Colores saith, That to live according to Democritus, and other Philosophers opinions, is no life at all, Epicurus was a very sool for following Democritus as he did, leading him to that doctrine whereby a man could not live. And first he reproved him, for that in faying that every thing is no more fuch then fuch, he made a confusion of mans life. But so far off was Democritus from holding the faid opinion, namely, that nothing is raof mans inc. Dut to the forward process and the function that including the rate opinion, namely, true norming is rateful then fuch then fuch then fuch then the oppugned Protagors it is Sophister for faying so, against whom he wrote many elegant Commentaries, full of good arguments, concluding the contrary: which our Colores never seeing, nor so much as dreaming of, was much deceived in the right understanding of the mans words, and namely in one place where he difertly faith and determineth that of ser, is no more then Tipe Ser: in which place he nameth a body ser, and voidness under: meaning thereby, and giving us to understand, that voidness had a proper nature and subsistence of the own, as well as a body. But hewho is of opinion, that nothing is more fuch then fuch, followeth one of the Decrees and Sentences of Epicurus, wherein he delivered, that all apprehensions and imaginations that come by sense, are time. For if when two men give out and fay, the one, that the wine is hard: the other, that it is sweet and pleasant, neither of them is deceived in his sense, but speaketh true, why should the wine berather harsh then sweet. And yet it is seen oftentimes that one and the same bath, some finde to be hot, and others cold: for that, as these command cold water, so those bid hot water to be poured in. It is faid, that a certain Dame or good Wife of Lacedemen, went upon a time to vifit Berronice the wife other: the one, as it should frem, abhorring the smel of rank butter, and the other offended with the perfume of a sweet oyntment or pomander. If then the sense of one, be not more true then the fense of another, probable it is, and very like, that both water is not more cold then hot, and that the oyntment and the butter no more fenting pleafantly, then stinking strongly. For if a man fay, that it feemeth thus to one, and fo to another, he affirmeth before he is aware, that they be both the one and the other. And as for these symmetries, proportions and accords of the pores or passages in the organs of the fenfes, whereof they talk fo much : as also the divers mixtures of feeds, which they say being diffeminate and dispersed throughout all savors, odors and colours, do move the sense; do they not directly drive them to this point, that things are no more one then another? For such as think that the sense is deceived, for that they fee contrary events and passions do proceed from the same objects, they pacific again, and falve this objection, by teaching, that whereas all things be mingled and confounded together, yet nevertheless this is more fortable and fitting to one, and that to another: whereby there is not the contractation and apprehension of one and the same quality, neither doth the object move all indifferently at once and alike in all parts, but every one meeting with those qualities onely, where-unto they have all sense proportionate, they do not well to stand so stilly upon this, that a thing is coloured or not coloured, white or not white, thinking to fortifie and establish their own fenses by defiroying those of others. Whereas it behoveth neither to oppugn the senses, for they all touch and reach one quality or other (each one drawing as out of a lively and large fountuin, from this con-confused mixture, that which is fit and fuitable) nor accuse and blame the whole, in touching onely the parts; ne yet think that all ought to fuffer the fame thing, confidering that one fuffereth by one quality and power of it, and another by another. So that now we are to confider and fearch, what men they be, who bring in this opinion, as touching things that be not such rather then others, rather then these who hold, that whatsoever is sensible is a consused mixture of all qualities together, like unto a wind-instrument composed for all kindes of melodious musick? But they confess that all their rules are loft, and their judgement quite gone, if they admit any object in some fort pute and sincere, and allow not each one thing to be many.

See moreover in this place, what Diffcourfe and Disputation Polyanus held with Epicurus in his Banquer as touching the heat of wine. For when he demanded in this manner, How now Epicurus, say you not that wine doth heat? One made answer, That he affirmed not universally, that wine did cause heat: and a little after, For it seemeth that wine is not universally a heater, but rather, that such a quantity of wine may be faid to enchase and set such as one in heat. And then adjoining the cause, he alledgeth the concurrences, compressions and dispersions of the Atomes; the commissions and conjunctions of others, when the wine cometh to be mingled with the body: & then he added this conclusion, And therefore generally we are not to say, that wine doth heat; but so much wine may well heat such a nature, and so disposed whereas another nature it cooleth in such and such a quainty. For in such a mass, there be those natures and complexions, of which, cold if need were, may be composed, and being joyned with others as occasion ferveth, may cause a vertue refrigerative. And hereupon it is, that some are deceived, saying that wine universally is hot, and others again, affirming it to be universally cold. He then who saith, that the multitude, and most part of men do cree, in holding that to be simply hot, which doth heat, and that likewise to be cold, which doth cool, is deceived

himselt, if he thinketh not, that it followeth by good consequence upon that which heihath said, that one thing is more such then such. And afterwards he inferreth this speech, that many times wine entring into the body, bringeth with it neither a calefactive nor a refrigerative vertue; but that when the mass of the body is moved and firred, to as there is a transposition made of the parts, then the Atoms which are effective of heat, concur together one while into one place, and through their multitude, setthe body into an heat and inflamation; but another while by dispersing and severing themselves afunder, infer coldness.

Moreover, he diffembleth not but that he is proceeded thus far, as to fay, that whereas we take things to be, and do call them bitter, fweet, purgative, foporiferous, and lightfome, none of them all have any entire quality or perfect property to produce such effects, nor to be active more then passive, all while they be in the body, but that they be susceptible of sundry temperatures and differences. For even Epicurus himself, in his second Book against Theophrastus, in saying that colours are not natural unto bodies, but are engendred according to certain fituations and positions, respective to the eye light of man, faith by this reason, that a body is no more destitute of colour, then coloured. And a little before, word for word he writeth thus, But over and befide all this, I know not how a man may fay, that these bodies which be in the dark, have any colour at all : and yet oftentimes, when the air alike dark is forced round about, some there be who can diffinguish the diversity of colours, others perceive nothing at all, by reason of their feeble and dim-fight. [Again, when we go into a dark house, we're not at our first entrance, any colours, but after we have been there a pretty while, we perceive them well enough: And therefore we are to fay, that each body is not rather coloured then not coloured. westenough: And interestive and hat being in regard of some other things, white also is relative, and hat being in regard of some other things, white also is a relative, and blew likewise: if these, then sweet and bitter semblably: so that a man may truly assume of every quality, that it is not more such, then not such. For to those who are so disposed, a thing shall be such, and to them that are not fo affected, not fuch. So that Colores doth all to dash and bewray both himfelf and his Mafter alfo, with the same mire and dirt, wherein he saith those do stick who hold that things are not more such then such. What then? doth this egregious Clerk herein onely shew himfelf, according to the old Proverb:

A Leech professing others for to care, Whiles he himself is full of fores impure?

No verily : but much more yet in his fecond reprehension, he chaseth ere he is aware Epicurus, together with Democritus, out of this life : for he giveth out that Democritus faid, The Atomes are unto the tenses are uncone fenses are uncone fenses by a certain law and ordinance colour, by the said law sweet, and by the same law bitter: Also, that he who useth this reason, and holdeth this opinion, knoweth not himself, if he be a man? nor whether he be dead or alive? To contradict these speeches, I wor not well how: but thus much! fay, that this is as much inseparable from the Sentences and Doctrine of Epicurus, as figure and weight by their faying from the Atomes : for what faith Democritus? That there be substances in number insinite, which are called Atomer, because they cannot be divided : howbeit different, without quality and impassible, which do move and are carried, dispersed to and fro in the infinite voidness, which when they approach one another, or concur and meet together, or elfe beenterlaced and enfolded one about another, then appeareth of these thus heaped and hudled together, one thing water, another fire, another a plant, and another a man : That all these be Atomes fill, termed by him Idea. and nothing elfe. For there can be no generation of that which is not; no more then that which once was can become nothing, by reason that these Atomes are so firm and solid, that they can neither change nor alter, nor suffer. And therefore neither can there be colour made of those things which have no colour, nor nature or foul of such as be without quality, and are impassible. Whereupon Demacritus is to be blamed, in that he confesseth not those things that be accident unto principles, but supposeth those to be principles, whereto these happen: For he should not have put down principles immutable; or at leastwise, when he had supposed them to be such, not to see withal, that therewish the generation and breeding of all qualities perifheth. And to deny an abfurdity, when one feeth it, is impudence in the highest degree. As for Epicurus, he faith verily, that he supposeth the same principles that Democritus doth, but he faith not, that colour fweet, white, and other qualities are by law and ordinance. Now if he confess not that he saith, which nevertheless he said, it is no other but an old custom of his, and that which he is wont to do. For much like it is to this, that he will feem to take away divine providence; and yet he faith, that he alloweth piety and religious devotion toward Gcd: And albeithe giveth out, that for pleasure, he maketh choice of amity and friendship, yet for his friends sake, he willingly endareth most grievous pains: also, for all he suppose the the universal world to be infuite, yet he taketh not away, above and beneath. But this is not like unto the manner of drinking one unto another at a table, where a man may take the cup in hand, and drink what he will, and so give back the reft. But in this Difputation especially, it behove the or remember well the notable Apophthegm or Saying of the wise man. Of what things the beginnings are not necessary, the ends and configurences fall out to be necessary. Necessary it was not therefore to suppose, (or to spake more cruly) to wring from Democritus thus much, Thas Atomes be the principles of the whole and universal world: or when he had supposed and set down this doctrine, and withal made a glorious shew of the first probabilities and fair apparences thereof, he should likewise have swallowed that which was troublesome therein, or shewed how those bodies which have no quality, could give unto others all fores of qualities, onely by meeting and joyning together. As for example, to speak of that which is next to hand, this that we call fire, whence came it, and how groweth it to these indivinible bosdies called Atomi? if they had neither heat when they came, nor became hot after they met together? for the former presupposeth that they had some quality, and the latter, that they were fit to receive the fame, and to fuffer : But neither of them twain, ye fay, fitteth well with the Atomes, in that they beincorruptible. How then? did not Plato, Ariftotle, and X nocrates produce gold, of that which was not gold; and stone, of that which is not stone; yea, and many other things out of the four simple bodies called elements ? Yes, I wis : but together with the faid bodies there concur immediately at the fiff, the principles also, to the generation of every thing, bringing with them great contribution, to wit. the first qualities which be in them: esterwards, when there come to meet in one, and joyn together, dry with moift, cold with hear, folid and firm with that which is gentle and loft; that is to fay, active bodies with fuch as be apt to fuffer, and to receive all change and alteration, then enfueth generation, which is the paffage from one temperature to another; whereas this Atome or indivisible body being of it felf naked and alone, is deflitute of all quality and generative faculty; but when it happeth to run upon others, it can make a found and noise onely, by reason of the hardness and solidity thereof, but no other accident elfe: for firike they do, and are filiken again continually; and fo far be they off from composing and making by this means a living creature, a foul, or a nature, that they are not able to much as to raife a round mass or heap of themselves together: for that as they jur and beat one upon another, so they rebound and fly back again as under. But Colores verily, as if he deale with some King that was ignorant and unlettered, falleth again upon Empedocles, breathing out these

there is no true nature
Of mortal weigh: of grifty death, no seed wor geniture.
A mixture onely first there is of things, then after all,
The Jame grow to distinuin:
and this men Nature call.

For mine own part, I do not fee how this is repugnant and contrary unto life, among them effecially who are of opinion that there is no generation of that which is not at all, nor corruption of that which is and hath being: but the meeting and union of fuch things as be, is called Generation; the diffolution likewise and disunion of the same, is termed death and corruption. For, that he taketh Nature for Generation, and that he meaneth fo, himfelf hath declared, when he fet Nature oppolire unto Death. And if those live not, nor can live, who put generation in union, and death in disunion; what thing elfe do these Epicureans? And yet Empedocles, sodering, as it were, and conjoyning the elements by hears, folinels and humidities, giveth them in some fort a mixion and composition unitive: but they who drive together the Atomes, which they fay to be immutable, flurdy and impullible, composenothing that proceedeth from them, but rather make many, and those continual percultions of them. For their interlacing which impeacheth diffoliation, doth still augment their collition: in fuch fort, as this is no m'xion nor conglutination, but a certain troublesome striving and combate, which according to them is called Generation. And thate Atomes or indivisible bodies which meet together but a moment, if one while they recule and start back for the resistance of the shock which they have given, and another while return again and recharge after the blow past, they are more then twice to long apart one from another, without touching or approaching, to as nothing can be made of them, not to much as the verybody without a foul. But fenfe, foul, understanding and prudence, there is no man able to think and imagine, would be never fo fain, how they can be formed of voidnels, and of these Atomes; which neither of themselves apare have any quality, nor yet passion or alteration whatfoever, when they are met together, confidering that this meeting is no incorporation, nor fuch a coltion as might make a mutual mixture and conglutination, but rather jury and reciprocal conculli ms: in fuch maner, as according to the doctrine of thefe folk, Sippoling as they do, fuch void, impassible, invisible, undibine and unhelpful principles, yea, and such as will not receive any mixture or incorporation whatfoever, To live, and to be a creature animal, falleth to the ground, and comes to nothing. How cometh it then, that they admit or allow Na ure, Soul, and Living creature? Forfooth, even as they do an oath, a vow, prayer, facrifice and adoration of the gods, to wit, in word and mouth onely; pronouncing and naming in femblame and outward appearance, that which by their principles and doctrines they quite abolish and annul. And even foothat which is born they term Nature, and that which is engendred, Generation: like as they who ordinarily call the frame of wood and timber, Wood it felf, and those voyces or instruments that accord together, Symphony. And what should he mean to object such speech against Empedocles? Why trouble we and weary our felves (quoth he) in being so busie about our own selves, in defiring certain things as we do, and evoiding others? for neither are we our felves, neither live we by using others. But be of good cheer, (may one haply fay) my loving and (weet Colotarion: have no fear man': no man hindreth you, but that you may regard your felf, teaching that the nature of Colores, is Colores himself and nothing elfe : neitheir that you need or defire to use certain things. As for these things among you, they be pleasures: shewing withal, that it is not the nature of Tarts, Cakes and Marchpanes, nor of Odors, nor of love (ports that you defire, but Tarts and Marchpanes themselves, sweet perfumes and women they be that you would have. For the Grammarian who faith, the force and strength of Herculei is Hercules, deryeth not thereby that Hercules is : nor those who say that symphonics, accords or opinations are bare prolations or pronounciations, affirm not there withall, that there be no found, nor voices, nor opinions: forasmuch as there be some, who abolishing the soul and prudence, seem not to take away either to live or to be prudent. And when Epicurus faith, the nature of things that have being, are the bodies and the void place of them, do we take his words, as if he meant that nature were somewhat elfe than the things that be? or that things being, do thew their nature and nothing elfe? even what elfe than the things that the ings their, do the where nature and nothing elfe? even as for examples fake, the nature of voidness; he is wont to call voidness is felf; yea, and I affure you, the Universal World it self, the nature of all. Now if a man should demand of him: How now Epickrns, fay you indeed that this is voidnesse, and that is the nature of voidnesse? Yes verily, will he anfwer again, but this communication of names the one for another, is taken up and in use. And in truth, that the law and cultom warranteth this manner of speech, I also avouch.

And what other thing I pray you hath Empedocles done than taught that nature is nought else but that which is bred and engendred, nor death any thing but that which dyeth? But like as Poets otherwhiles by a trope or figurative speech representing as it were the image of things say thus:

Debate, tumult, uproar and stomack fell, With deadly fude and malice there did dwell.

Even to the common fort of men do use the termes of generation and corruption in things that are contracted together and diffolved. And fo far was he from flirring or removing those things that be, or oppoling himself against things of evident appearance, that he would not so much as cast one word out of the accustomed ale : but fo far forth as any figurative fraud might hurt or endamage things, be rejected and took the same away, rendring again the usual and ordinary signification to words, as in

And when the light is mixed thus with aire in heavenly skie. Some man is made or wilde beafts kind or birds aloft that fly : Or elfe the shrabs : and this rightly is cleap'd their geneture, But death, when as diffelved is the forefaid fast joyncture.

And yet I fay my felf, that Colotes having alledged thus much, knew not that Empedocles did not abolifi men, beafts thrubs or birds in as much as he faith, that all thefe are composed and finished of the Elements mixed together: But teaching and shewing them how they were deceived, who finde fault with naming this composition a certain nature or life; and the diffolution unhappy fortune and death tobe avoided, he annulled not the ordinary and usual use of words in that behalf. For mine own part think verily that Empedacles doth not alter in these places the common manner of pronouncing and uting the faid words: but as before it was related, is really of a different minde as couching the genera-tion of things that had no being, which fome call nature. Which he especially declareth in shese wrist

> Fooles as they be of small conceit, for far they cannot fee, Who bope that things which never were, may once engendred be, Or fear that those which are shall dye, and perish utterly.

For these verses are thundred out and do sound aloud in their hearing who have any cares at all, that he doth not abolish generation absolutely, but that alone which is of nothing: nor yet corruption fimply, but that which is a total defiruction, that is to fay, a reduction to nothing. For unto a man who were not willing, after such a favage, rude and brutish manner but more gently to cavil, the verses following after might give a colourable occasion to charge Empedocles with the contrary, when he faith thus:

No man of Sense and judgement sound, would once conceive in minde That whiles we living here on earth, both good and had doe finde, So long onely we being bave : (yet this, men life doe call) And birth before, or after death, we nothing are at all.

Which words verily are not uttered by a man, who denyeth them their being who are borne and live, but rather by him who thinketh that they who are not yet borne, as also those that be already dead have their being. And even fo Colores doth not altogether reprove him for this : but he faith that according to his opinion we shall never be fick nor wounded. And how it is possible that he who faith that men before life and after life; are accompanied with good and bad indifferently, should not leave for them that bealive the power to suffer? What bethose then, good Colors, who are accompanied with this immunity, that they can neither be hurt nor diseased? Even your self, and such as you are, who be alcogether made of an Atome and Voidness, for by your own saying, neither the one nor the other that any sense. But no sorce. For I hear of no harm yet. Marry here is the grief, that by this reafon you have nothing in you to cause delight and pleasure, seeing that an Atome is not capable of such things as move pleasure: and Voidness is unapreof be affected by them. But for as much as Gulotes for this part would needs immediately after Democritus seem to inter and bury Parmenides for ever, and my self in putting off a little, and passing over the defence of Parmendes, have between both taken sin hand the maintenance of that which was delivered by Empedecles, because methoughs they did more properly adhere and hang to those first imputations, let us now come again to Parmenides. And whereas Colotes chargeth him with fetting abroad certain shameful Sophistries, yet hath the man thereby made Friendship nothing less honorable, nor Voluptuousness and Sensuality more audacious and unbridled. He hath not bereft Honefly of that attractive property to draw unto it felf, nor of the gift of being venerable of it felf; neither hath he troubled and confounded the opinions as touching the gods. And in faying that All is One, I fee not how he hath hindred our life. For when Epicarus himigods. And maying that An some i technical town tenant innoted on the Pot when spream min-dell faith, that [All] is infinite, ingenerable and incorruptible, that it cannot be augmented for di-minished, he speaketh and disputeth of All, as of some one thing. And in the beginning of his Treatife concerning this matter, having delivered that the nature of All things being, consident in small indivisible bodies which he termeth Atomes, and in Voidnes: he made a division, as it were, of one thing into two parts: whereof the one in truth is not sublistent, but termed by you impalpable, wold and bodiless: whereby it cometh to pass, that even with you, All cometh to be but One; un-less you will use vain words, and wold of sense, speaking of voldness, and fighting in vain, as with a fhadow, against those ancient Philhsophers.

But these Atomes, you will say, are according to the opinion of Epicarus in number infinite, and every thing that appeareth unto us, ariseth from them. Behold now what principles you put down for generation, to wit, Infinity and Voidness: whereof the one is without action, impallible and bo-diless; the other, namely, Infinity, disorderly, void of reason, incomprehensible, dissolving and confounding it felf, for that by reason of multitude it cannot be circumscribed nor contained within limits. But Parmenides hath not abolished either fire or water, or any rock, no nor the Cities (as Colotes faith) inhabited as well in Europe as Afia, confidering that he hath both * inflituted an orderly * Pidner dispose and digestion : and also tempering the elements together, to wit, light and dark, of them, pormotic dipote and organism and ano temperature that are the world, for written he hath at large of Earth, Jas. Some and by them abfoliately finisheth all things visible in the world, for written he hath at large of Earth, Jas. and by frem autoritery miniett an timing a time and the state of the state of Sun, Moon and Starts; a salfo, spoken much of mans Generation; and being as he was, a very ancient Philosopher, he hath left nothing in Physiologic unfaid, and whereof he both not declarate the state of the state livered both by word and writing his own doctrine, not borrowed ellewhere, palling over the repug- that is to nancy of other received principal opinions. Moreover, he of all others first, and even before Socrates by, hash himfelf, observed and understood, that in nature there is one part subject to opinion, and another sub-made Ingiinfinity contribution of that which is Opinable, inconfiant it is and uncertain, wandring also and ter the jet to intelligence. As for that which is Opinable, inconfiant it is and uncertain, wandring also and ter the world. carried away with fundry paffions and mutations, age to diminish and pair : to increase also and grow, yea, and to be diversly affected, and not ever after one fort disposed to the same in sense alike. As for the Intelligible part, it is of another kinde:

as himfelf faith, always like to it felf, and perdurable in the own nature and effence. But Colotes, like a sycophant, cavilling at him, and catching at his words, without regard of the matter, not argu against his reasons indeed, but in words onely, affirmeth flatly, that Parmenides overthroweth all things in one word, by supposing that All is One. But he verily on the contrary side, abolisheth neither the one nature nor the other, but rendreth to each of them that which is meet, and appearament thereto. For the Intelligible part he rangeth in the Idea of One, and of That which is, faying that it is and hath being, in regard of eternity and incorruption; that it is one, because it always resembleth itself, and receiveth no diversity. As for that part which is Sensible, he placeth it in the rank of that which is uncertain, disorderly, andever moving. Of which two, we may see the distinct judgement in the foul, by thefe verfes :

The one retains to truth which is fincere, Perswasive, breeding Science pure and clear.
For it concerneth that which is intelligible, and evermore alike and in the same fort. The other refts on mens opinions vains

Which breed no true belief but uncertain. For that it is conversant in such things as receive all manner of changes, passions, and mutabilities. And verily how possibly he should admit and leave unto us sense and opinion, and not withal allow that which is sensible and opinable, a man is not able to shew. But forasmuch as to that which is exlifent indeed, it appertaineth to remain in being, and for that things sensible, one while are, and another while are not, but pass continually from one being to another, and alter their effate, infomuch as they deferve rather some other name than this, of being: This speech as touching All, that it should be one, is not to take away the plurality of things sensible, but to shew the difference between them and those that be intelligible, which 'Plato in his Treatile of Idea, minding to declare more plainly, gave

914 Course tome advantage for to take hold of him. And therefore methinks it good reason to take before me all in one train, that also which he hath spoken against him. But first let us consider the diligence, together with the deep and prolound knowledge of this Philosopher Plato, confidering that Arifole. Xenecrates, Theoperatius, and all the Peripateticks have followed his doctrine. For in what blinde corner of the world unhabitable wrote he his Book? that you Colores in heaping up together these criminations upon fuch personages, should never light upon their works, nor take in hand the Books of Auftole, as touching the Heaven and the Soul: Nor those Compessions of Theophrajtus against the Naturalife, nor that Zoroaft es of Herachus, one Book of Hell and Infernal Spirits, another of Doubts and Questions Natural: That also of Dicearchus concerning the Soul. In all which Books they are contradictory and repugnant, in the main and principal points of Natural Philoforby unto Plato? And verily the Prince of all other Per:pateticks, Strato, accordeth not in many things with Aristotle, and maintaineth opinions clean contrary unto those of Plato, as touching Motion, Understanding, the Soul, and Generation. And in conclusion, he holdest, that the very world is not animal; and whatfoever is natural, is confequent unto that which is cafual, and very worth is not animat, and according to fortune. As for the Idee for which As ifinile every where feemeth to courfe Plats, and moveth all manner of doubtt concerning them, in his Enicks or Moral Difecurfes, in his Phyfick, movement an institute of about the state of ness therefore is this, that one having never known nor seen what these learned Clerks had written, and what their opinions were, should coyn and devise out of his own fingers ends, and falsly charge upon them, those things which never came into their heads, and in perswading himself that hereproveth and refuteth others, to bring in a proof and evidence written with his own hand, for to argue and convince himfelf of ignorance, or rathand audacious impudence, faying, that those who contradict Plato, agree with him, and they that repugn against him do follow him? But Plato (quoth he) hash written, That horfes are in vain counted by us horfes, and men likewise. And in what odd corner of Plate's works hath Colites found this hidden? As for us we read in all his books, that horses behorses, and men be men, and that fire even by him is efteemed fire; for he holdeth every one of these things to be sensible and opinable, and so he nameth them. But this our trim man Colotes, asthough he wanted never a jot of the highest pitch of sapience and knowledge, presumeth, forfooth, and taketh it to be all one and the same, to say, A man is not, and A man is that which hath no being. But Plate thinketh that there is a wonderful great difference between these terms Not to be at all, and To be that which is not: for the former importeth a nullity and abolithment of all substance; and the other sheweth the difference of that which is participated, and that which doth participate: which diffinction and diverfity they who came after, have reduced onely unto a different range, of Kinder, Forms, and of certain common and proper qualities or accidents, but higher than fo they mounted not, falling down upon some doubts and difficulties more reasonable: for the same reason and proportion there is between the thing participated and participating, as is between the cause and the matter, the original and the image, the power and the passion, Wherein principally differeth that which is by it felf, and ever the same, from that which is by another, and never keepeth one flate : for that the one never shall be, nor ever was not existent; and for this cause, it is truly and altogether subsistent; whereas the other hath not so much as that being constant, which it hapnesh to participate from another, but doth degenerate and grow out of kinde, through imbecility; in that the matter doth glide and flide about the form, receiving many passions and mutations, bending toward the image of substance, in such fort, as continual ly it moveth and shaketh to and fro. Like as therefore he who faith, that Plate is not the image of Plate, taketh not away the fense and substance of an image, but sheweth the difference between that which is of it felf, and the other which is in regard of it: even so they abolish not the nature, the use nor sinse of nien, who say, that every one of us by participating the Idea of a certain common substance, is become the image of that which giveth similitude and affinity unto our generation. For neither he who faith, that iron red hot is not fire, or the Moon, the Sun, but (to use the very words of Parmenides) doth take away the use of a burning gleed, or the nature of the Moon: But if he should affirm, that is were no body, nor illuminate, then he went against the senses, as one who admitted neither body, nor living animal, nor generation, nor sense. But he that by opinion imagineth these things to have no subsidience but by participation, and withal, how far they are short and distant from that which had always being, and which gave them the power to be, considered nor amis the sensible, but is dimigned in the intelligible: neither doth he annihilate and overthrow the passions which artise and appear in us, but sheweth unto them that are docible and follow him, that there be other more sime and stable things than these, as touching effence, for that they neither are engendred nor perish, nor yet terms and names, calling the one fort existent, and the other breeding or ingendred. The same used by befalleth also to our late Modern Writers, who deprive many great and weighty things of this determination of subsidence, as namely, Voidaes, Time, Place, and generally the whole kinde of those species, wherein are comprised all things true. For these things being, they say are not; and yet they say some are; yea and use the same as well in their life, as their doctrine and Philosophy, as having subsistence and being. But I would gladly demand of this accuser of ours himself, whether he and his sellowes in their affairs perceive not this difference, whereby things be permanent and immutable in their fubstances, like as the yaffirm of their Atomes, that they be at all times and continually after one and the same fort, by reason of their impassibility and fiffe folidity? whereas all things compounded and compact of them, be flexible, pliable, mutable, breeding and perifling: for that an infinite number of images do pass, and flow from them evermore, yea and an innumerable fort of other things, by all likelihood, from out of the ambuent air do reflow and have recourse unto them. for to supply and fill up the heap still, which mass is become much altered, diversified and transversed as it were by this permutation, in that the Atomes which are in the bottom of the faid mass, can never cease or give over flirring, but reciprocally beat one upon another, as they themselves affirm. So there is in things such a difference of fubflance as this: and yet Epicurus is more wife and learned than Plato, in that he termeth all things equally fubfifting, Voidnesse impalpable, the Body solid and resisting, the principles, things composed; and for that he thinkch that the eternall doth not fo much as participate in the common substance with that which is engendred; the immortall with that which doth perish; the natures impassible, perdurable, immutable, which never can fall or be deprived from their being, with those which have their effence in suffering or changing, & never can continue in one and the fame flate. Now were it fo, that Plate had most justly of all men in the world deserved to be condemned for his errour herein, yet my good friend, there should no imputation be charged upon him by these our great matters here, who speak purer or finer Greek and more exquisitly than he, but only for confounding some words and speaking improperly; nor to be blamed for abolishing the matters themselves, or taking out of this life, he termed because them ingendred, and not existent, as these men do.

But feeing we have passed over Socrates, after Parmenides, we must now take his desence in hand. Colotes then began directly at the first (as we say in the common proverb) to remove him from the sacred line or tribe : and having related how Cherephon had brought an answer from the Oracle at Delphos , as touching S. crates , which we all know to be fo, faith thus: As for this discourse & narration (quoth he)of Cherephon, for that it is altogether odious, captious, sophistical, & full of untruth, we will overpass. Then is Plato likewise (to say nothing of others) odious & abfurd, who hath put the faid down in writing. Then are the Lacedemonians more odious and intollerable, who hath kept that Oracle delivered, as touching Lycurgus, among their most ancient writings & authentical records. Simblably, the discourse & narration of Themistocles was a sophistical & counterfeit device, whereby he perswaded the Athenians to abandon their City, and foin a navall battell defeated the barbarous Prince Xerxes. And even so all the noble Lawgivers and founders of Greece are to be counted odious and intolerable, who established the most part of their Temples, their Sacrifices and folemn fealts, by the answer from the Oracle of Apollo. But if in be for that the Oracle brought from Delphi as touching Socrate, a man ravished with a divine and heavenly zeal to verue, whereby he was declared and pronounced wife, were odious, fained and cophisticall: by what name shall we unly and justiy call your cries, your shouts, your bideous notice, your applauses and clapping of hands, your adorations and canonizations wherewith you exalt and celebrate him, who incited and exhorted you to contimuall pleasures one after another, who in one of his letters sent unto Anaxarchus hath written thus: As for me, limite and call you to continual pleasures, and not to these value and unprofitable vertues, such as have nothing butturbulent hopes of uncertain fruits. And yet Metroderus writing unto Timarchy; slith thus unto him, Come (quoth he) let us do some goodly and honest thing for those who are fair and beautifull, so that we we be not plunged in these (emblable and reciprocall affections, but retiring anon out of this base and extential life, let us awares our selves to these true, holy and divine extensions and mysteries of Epicurus. And even Colors; himself hearing Epicurus one day discouring of naturall thiose, "fell downs as his feet immediately, and took bold of his hees, as if he had been a God. And Epicarus likewise taking no small pride and glory herein, writesth thus unto him again . For as if you adored that which then was delivered by me, there came upon you fuddenly a defire and and gain. For as it you adoret, that which their was derivered by insertine came upon you tudgenly a derive and all proceeding from no cause in nature, so come toward me, to profit are your elf upon the ground, to elip and elip my knees, and to use those gestures unto me, which ordinarily they do, who worship the Godd and pray unto then: So that you have (quoth he) made me also recipiocally to destine and adore you. Certist would find in my beart to pardon them, who say they would not spare for any cost, but give they cared not what for a table or pf-ture, wherein they might see lively represented to the eye this flory, depainted, namely, how the one litch profit are at the others feet, and embraceth his knees: who mutually again adores him, and maketh his devotit practication. him. And yet this devotion and fervice of Golotes, how well to ever it was by him ordered and precifely observed. raped not the condign fruit thereof ; for as he was not by him declared a wife man : only this befling he had from him again, Go thy wates and walk immortall, and repute us also semblably immortall. These men knowing full well in their own confeiences that they use such foolish words, ridiculous jeftures, and fond passions, yet forfooth they are fo bold as to call other men odious. And Colores verily having given us a taff of his goodly first fulls, and wife Politions as touching Naturall lendes, namely, That we do eat our viands and cates, nos hay or forage, and that when the rivers be high, we ferry them in boats, but when they be low and pallable, we wade eafily on foot through the foord exclameth & cried out afterwards: you use O Socrates vain speeches you entertain those who come and speak unto you with one thing in the word, and do practise others clean contrary in deed. And say you to Colores / First I would gladly know wherein the words of Socrates were vaine and arrogant, confidening that that he was wont ordinairly to say, that he knew nothing at all, but was a learner continually, and went to fearch and find out the truth? But if haply you should light upon such speeches from Socrates his mouth asthole were which Epicurus wrote unto Idomeneus, fend us then the first fruits, for the furniture of our facred body, for us (I say) and our children: For thus it comes upon me to speak, what more insolent and sottish words could you devise to speak? And yet, that Socrates never said otherwise than he did he hath given us marvellous proofs in the battell of Delium, and in that of Potides: That which he did during the time of the thirty Tyrants proofs in the battern of sainft the people of Athens: his poverty; his death; his carraige and demeanour inall against Accetant, and against the people of Accetance when you to the fayings and dectrines of Secrates? This had these times and occasions, be they not answerable every way to the fayings and dectrines of Secrates? This had been a true proof indeed, to have she was that he lived and did otherwise than he spake and taught, in case he can be sufficiently and the lived as he did. Thus much he case he did. been a true proof indeed, to have newed that and pleasant life, and then lived as he did. Thus much as touching had proposed the cite of main to tach given Socrates. Moreover, he perceiveth not how himself is attaint even in the reproachful terms that he hath given Socrates. Moreover, he perceiveth not how himself is attaint even in the reproaching terms that he are the state of the points which he reproved and objected as touching things evident and apparent. For one of the posithose points which he reproved and objections and decrees of Epicarus, is this, That no person ought in revocably to believe or be persuaded to a thing but only the wise man. Now seeing that Colorer became not one of the Sages, for all that advantion and working the control that the same that complete the control that the contr but only the wife managed unto Epichrus, let him demand first and formost these questions, How it is, that he falleth to cates, and not to hay, when he hath need of victualls? and why he caffeth a Robe about his own botetn to cates, and not upon a Piller? confidering that he is not affuredly perfuaded, that Cates be Cates, or that a Robe dy, and not upon a time of the do fo, namely, seed upon vidands, and wear a Robe : if he venture not to wade through rivers is a Robe : But if he do fo, namely, seed upon vidands, and wear a Robe : if he venture not to wade through rivers is a Robe: Dut if he do to, namely, the flie from Screents and Woolves, being not in a fure beleef that any thing is when they be rifen and high; if he flie from Screents and Woolves, being not in a fure beleef that any thing is when they be riten and night; it is not about some or rooters, they are the opinion as touching Senfer, fuch as it feemeth, but doing every thing according as it appeared unto him; the opinion as touching Senfer, would not hinder Secretars at all, but that he might likewife use that which feemeth not him. For bread seemed would not hinder Secretars at all, but that he might likewife use that which feemeth not him. For bread seemed would not him to Caletes, nor hay to be hay, because he had read those holy Canons and facred rules of Epicarus. not oreast onto occasion out of Jupiters lap; and Socrates upon a vain arrogance of his own, conceived an imagiwhich tell noth hearth was hay, and of hay that it was bread. For these wise men here, have better opinions and rules to goe by than we. But to have sense and to receive an impression in the imagination of things evident, to good by their were little to ignorant persons as to Sages, for that it proceedeth from Causes that need no Discourse of Reason. But that Polition, that our naturall senses are not certain nor sufficient enough to prove athing, and cause belief, is no hinderance, but that every thing may appear unto us: But when we a thing, and caute octies, as no importance, but there exists using may appear unto us: but when we use the Senses in our Actions, according to that which appeareth, it permitteth us not to trust them, as if they were every way true and without errour: for that sufficeth in them, which is necessary and comas it they were there is nothing better. As for Science, Knowledge, and Perketion, which the foul of a Philosopher desires to have of every thing, the Senses have just none. But of these matters which Colores hath charged upon many others, he will give us occasion else where to discourse

Furthermore, that wherein he doth vilipend and mock Socrates most, in that he demandeth the question, What is man? and in a yovthfull bravery, and childifuly as he faith, affirmeth that he knoweth not, it is evident: that even he who derideth him, never came himself where it was, nor attained thereto: whereas Heraelius contrariwife, as one who had done a great and worthy matter, faid thue, I have been feeking out my felf. And of all those sentences which are written over the gates of Appello's temple at Delphos, this was thought to be most heavenly and divine, Know thy felf: which gave unto Socrates occasion first to doubt and enquire thereofiaccording venly and divine, Know thy felt: which gave unto secrete, occasion first to doubt and enquire thereofjaccording as Arifotele bath fet down in his Platonique questions. But this forfooth seemeth unto Goldets to be a foolish and as Arifotele thath fet down in his Platonique questions. But this forfooth seemeth unto Goldets rich as fooling to a folial substitution of the fooling and the beginning of that consisted master: for if that which is discourseth as roughing the substitution of the fooling that consistent which is compounded of both, as they themselves do teach, to wite, of such a body and fool, be man, he who fearchest compounded of the fooling that the folial seements of the fooling the fooling that the folial seements of the fooling that the folial seements of the fooling that the fooling the fooling that the fooling that the fooling the fooling that the fooling the fooling that the fooling the fooling that the fooling that the fooling that the Now that the table is matery by teaton to be comprehensely out by the outward tellic altegement incomprehensibility, let us learn not of Sorrates, a vain-glorious man and sophistical disputer, but rather of these wise men here, who do forge and frame the substance of the soul so far only as to the faculties extending to the sich, whereby the giveth heat, foftnets, and firength to the body, of I wote not what heat and aerious fpiritsnever wading fo far as to that which is the principall, but faint and give over in the way. For that faculty whereby the judgeth, whereby the remembreth, whereby the loveth or hateth, and in one word, that reason which wisely foreseeth and wherevy increases and of a certain quality which is namelesse. Now that this nameless thing is a meet cononcourtetts, as taking a man of them that lay they cannot name that, which indeed they are not able to comprehend and understand, we know well enough. But this also may well deserve pardon, as they are wont to say. prehend and understands we show well singly matter, neither a thing that every one can find out and reach unto, For it seemeth that this is no small and light matter, neither a thing that every one can find out and reach unto, being deeply settled in the bottom of some by-place far remote, and in some obscure and hidden corner, seeing that among so many words and terms which be in use, there is not one fignificant enough, and sufficient to de clare and explain the same . And therefore Socretes was no fool nor lob, for feeking and fearthing what himlest was, but they rather be dolts who go about enquiring after any other thing before this, the knowledge whereof is so necessary and hard to be sound. For hardly may be hope to attain unto the knowledge of any other thing, who is not able to underfland the principall part of himfelf. But fay we flould grant and vield thus much unto him, as to confesse there is nothing so vain so unprofitable, and so odious, as for a man to seek himself? we will be so bold as to demand, what consustion of mans life this should be, or how is to feek numers: we will be to boild as to termand; what comes to discourse and reason thus with himself. Who and what mought I be? Am I after the manner of some Composition, confected and mingled of and what mought 1 ber. Am 1 atter the manner, or some composition, contected and mingigat of Soul and Body? or rather a Soul making tife of the Body, as the Horseman doth of, his Horse? and not a Subject composed of Horse and Man? or whether the principall part of the Soul whereby we understand, we Discourse, we Reason, and Do every Action, is every each one of its? and all the parts britles both of Soul and Body; bee nothing but the Organs and Instruments serving to this single parts britles both of Soul and Body; fance and faculty? Or to conclude, whether there be no fubfiance of the Soul apart, but only a temperature and complexion of the body, fo diffored, that is bath power to understand and to live. But Secrates herein faith he doth not overthrow the life of man, confidering that all naturall philosophers do handle this argument. Marry they be those monfrous questions that trouble the common-wealth, and turn all upstide down, which are in the Dialogue Phedarus, wherein he thinketh that he ought to examine and confider himself, namely whether he be a heast more savage, more subtile, cautelous, and furious than ever weat Typhon: to reather some animall more tame and gende by nature, and endued with a portion more divine, and a consistion nothing proud and insolent. But yet by the discourage of the production of the pr

After he hath done with Socrates and Plate, he falleth in hand with the Philosopher Stilps. As for the true doctrines and good discourses of the man, whereby he ordered and governed himself, his native Country, his Friends, and those Kings and Princes who affected him, and made good account of the blue hath not written a word: neither what Gravity and Magnanimity was in his heart, and the fame accompanied with Mildnesse, Moderation, and Modessy, but of those little sentenes or propolitions which Stilpo was wont to use and cast forth in merriment against the Sophisters, when he was diffood to laugh and play with them, he made mention of one: and without alledging any reason against it or solving the subtilty thereof, he made a Tragedy, and kept a foul stir with him about it, saying that by him the life of man and the whole course of this world was subverted: because he said, that one thing could not be affirmed and verified of another. For how should we live (quoth Galotes) if we may not fay a good man, or a man is a Captain, but to pronouce a part, man is man, good is good, and Captain is a Captain : neither ten thouland Horlemen, nor a fenced City, but Horlemen be Horley. men, ten thouland be ten thouland, & fo of the reft But tell me I pray you, what man ever lived the world for laying thus And who is he who having heard these words and this manner of arguing, did not conceive and understand streight waies that it was the speech of a man, disposed to make some game & disport learnedly, or to propose unto others this Logicall quillet for exercise sake ? It is not Colores, such a grievous scandal and hainous matter as you would make it, to say man is not good, or horsemen be not ten thousand:marry to affirm that god is not god as you & the rest do, who will not confess that there is a Jupiter president over generation, or a Ceres that giveth laws, or a Neptune superintendent over plants, is a dangerous point. This is the seperation of names & words that is pernicious, this filleth our life with contemprious impiety, atheifm, & diffolute audaciousness: For when you pluck from the gods these attributea & appellations that effentially be linked & tyed to them, you abolish therewithal holy facrifices, divine mysteries, sacred processions & solemn seasts; for unto whom shall we perform the nuprial sarcifi cescalled Protoleia; into whom we shall offer the oblations for health named Soteria? How shall we accomplifi the rites of Phopperia, the Bacchanals, & the ceremonies going before mariage, if we leave not any Priests of Bacchus, if we admit not Phosperi Protessis, & the Caving gods Soteres? For I tell you, this. toucheth the main & principal points, this breedeth errour in the things themselves & not about certain. bare voices in the Syntaxes and conftruction of words, or use of tearms. Now if these be matters that trouble & subvert this life of ours, who be they that offend & be delinquent more in their phrase & languagethan your who making prepolitions to be the only substance of speech, abolish altogether all simple voices, & admitting fuch as come next hand, you abolish in the mean while the things by them fignified. whereby all discipline, doctrine, erudition, anticipations, intelligences, inclinations & affents are performed, and hold generally that all these be just nothing. But as for Stilpo thus the case standeth: If we affirm of an horse, to run: he doth not say that the thing affirmed which the logicians cal Predicatum, is all one with the Subjectum, of which it is afficmed; but that the effential definition of a man is one, and that of good is another; as allo, to be an horse is different from to be running: For if we asked the definition of the one & the other, we will not give the same for both, & in that regard, they do amiss who affirm the one of the other. For if a man & good were all one: likewife, an horfe, & to run were both one: how commeth it pass that the tearm good is affirmed of some meat, drougue, or medecine, & to run likewise, of a lion & a dog? But if the Predicatum or thing affirmed be different, then we do not well, to fay, good ma, or the horse runneth. Now if Stilpo in these matters do exorbitate & be fouly deceived, admitting no cocopulation at all nor connexion of fuch things are faid to be in or about the fubject, together with the faid subject it felf: but every one of them if it be not absoutely the very same with that unto weh it hapneth he thinketh not that the same ought to be said & affirmed thereof as an accident: & if therein he be offended with fome tearms, & go against the ordinary custom of speech, he doth not therefore freightwayes subvert and overthrow mans life, nor humane affaires, as all the world may see well enough.

Colotes now having done with the ancient Philosophers, turneth himself to those of his own time, and yet he nameth not one. Howbeit, he should have done better to have argued aswell against these modern as those ancients, by name, or not at all to have named shose of old time. But he who so often hath pricked Socrates, Plato, and Permenides with his pen, showeth plainly, that it was for meer cowardise that he durst not be seen to deal with the living; and not upon any Modesty or Reverence that he spared, their names, considering that he safed them, who were more far excellent than they, in no good fort, and respect. His meaning was as I suspect and guesse, to assail the Circusiques sinst, and then in a second place the Academicks, Sectaries of ARCESILAUS: for as these were the Philosophers who doubted of all things and yeelded their affent innothing at all; so the other reposing passions and imaginations in themselves; thought that the beloef proceeding from thence, was not fufficient to affure and confirm things, but faring like unto thole who are befreged within a was not furnicient to assure and continus things, but staring "into unto those who are betreged within a City; abandoning and for faking all without, they keep themselves that within their pallions, using this word ordinarily, it femcht: and of things without, affirming and pronouncing. It is, and their better (quoth Cabit) they cannot live nor have the use of things. And there, playing his para as it which in a Comedy: The lement (faith the) dony that a Mair; a Micris and Wall are; but a drey far, little that they have been and hen; abasing first and formost cautebously and wickedly the terms, the flander our and foul monthed Specialisms; for furely this is an ordinary cast and using the following the first them to be a flander our and foul monthed Specialisms; for furely this is an ordinary cast and using the following the first the things it felt. according to select the things it felt. the Chief. Batit behoved to declare the thing it felf, according as they treat for they affirm, that things become force, wax bitter, prove lightform; or grow dark, when each of the call the proper discay of these passions in the statement of the call that the proper discay of these passions in the statement of be faid (weet, an olive branch bitter, hall cold, meer wine hot, the air of the night dark; there be many beaft, many things, and many men; that will reflifie the contrary: whiles form are offended with hony and abltor it, others are delighted with the taft of the olive branch; forme are burnt and fingel by hail, others' cooled with wine; fome can not abidethe light of the Sun but their fight therewith is dazled and dimmed, others again fee well enough by night. And therefore opinion perfitting filliand abing in the paffions, keepeth it felf from offence and errour. but going forth once, and builty judging or pronouncing of things exterior, it troubleth many times it felfs, and repugneth with others, who of the fame objects receive contrary passions; and different imaginations. And as for Coloies, he rescribbleth for all the world young Children who newly begin to learn their A. B. C. for being used to pronounce and name the letters which they fee engraven in their own battleders, when they find them written elsewhere, they flick at them, and are much troubled : and even so the very words and sayings written entewnere, they mee at them, and are much trouvier: and even to the very whose and taying which the approverts, praifeth and embraceth in the writings of Epicarus, he will not underfined nor acknowledge, when they are intered by others. For when there is prefented unto us one image round and anothe broken, they who fay that the stense verily is truly informed and hath attrue impression, but will not suffer us to pronounce that the Tower is round, but the Care broken, surely they confirm thereby that their passions be their own fanties and imaginations, but they will not avow and confess, that the things without are so affected. But as they before that are to say, that they be not Horfe or Wall, but become Horfe and Wall; even so of necessity we must say, that the light is in printed With a round figure or triangular with three unequall fides, but not that a Tower is necessarily either triangular in that fort or round : for that the Image wherewith the fight is affected may well be broken, but the Oare from whence proceedeth the Image is not broken. Seeing then there is difference between the paffion and the subject without, either we must say that the belief abidethin the passion, or else that the being, which is affirmed by the appearance is convinced of untruth, and not found to be fo. And whereas they cry out and be offended and angry about the lenfe, they do not say that the thing without is hot, but that the passion in the sense is so is it not all one with that which is spoken as touching the tast, as if one should say, that the thing without is not sweet, but that it is some passion and motion about the sense, that is become such ? And he who saith, that he apprehendeth the imagination of a mans form, but perceiveth not that it is a man, whereupon hath he taken occasion to say so? Came it not from them who say that they receive an imagination and apprehention of a bowing form and figure, but the light doth not affirm that it is bowing and bending, reither that it is round, but some imagination and impression about the sense is become round? True it is will some one say, but as I approach near unto a Tower, or else touch an Oare, I will pronounce and affirm, that the one is fireigh, and the other hath many Angles and many Faces: But he when he fall come near, will confest and fay that it feemeth fo and that it appeareth fuch unto him, but no more. O yes good Sir, and more then fo, when he feeth and observeth the consequence hereupon, namely, that every fantalic and imagination is semblably of it self sufficient to procure beletic, and none at all, in regard of another, but be all of equall condition. But this your opinion is come just to nothing, naticely, that fantalies be all true, and none false and incredible, in case you think that these one by the pronounce affirmitively of that which is without, and believe not the other a far off no farther than in that which they fuffer : for if they be of equal condition and beleeved alike, when they are itear, and when they be far off, meet it is and just, that either all indifferently or elfe not thefe, should have the affirmative Judgement following upon them, to pronounce, that a thing is. But if there te a difference of passion in things that be near, and those which are farther off, than it is false that rieither imagination nor sense is one more expresse and evident than an other : like unto those which they call attestations which are nothing to the sense, but unto the opinion: so that in sollowing them, they would have their followers to affirm and pronounce of exteriour things, attributing to opinion the judgement, that a thing is, and to fente, the passion that appeareth: whereby they transport the judgement from that which is alwaics true, unto that which falleth oftentimes to be fo. But what needs there at this time to flew, the confusion and contradiction that is herein? But it feemeilt that the reputation of Arcefilaus, who of all Philosophers in his time was best beloved and most efeetiled, was no small thorn in Epicurus his eyes, but troubled him beyond all measure: For hegivethour of him, that delivering ashe did nothing of his own invention he imprinted in the minds of ignorant and unlettered men a certain opinion and concele of him, that he was a deep Clerk, and very well feen in all kind of literature. But fo far was Arcefilaus, from affecting any glory and reputadun in the world by broaching novelties or ftrange opinions and derogating from the ancients or afcribing any thing of theirs to himfelf, that the Sophifters in his dayes reproved and charged him for fathering upon Socrates, Plato, Parmenides, and Heraclius the opinions as touching the retention of affint and the incomprehenibility of things who indeed nover fought nor defired to much at his hands, onely becaute he would referre the fame unto fuch famous Personages, the better to be confirmed by the authority of their name. Howbeit for this, thanks be to Colors and every one who saith, that the Academick Doctrine was more ancient than Arcesslaus, and was derived from others before his sime unto him. But as for the retention of affent, and the doubting of all things, not so much as

And verily to speak unto Colotes, as touching inflinet and appetition, is all one as to found the harp before an Affe. But this point of learning would be delivered unto those who can give ear and conceive, that there be in our foul three kinds of motions, Imaginative, Appetive, and Affenting. As for the Imaginative, we cannot take it away, would we never fo fain; for as things approach, and objects be presented, we cannot chuse but be informed and receive as it were an impression and suffer by them. The Appetitive bing stirred up by the Imaginative, moveth a man effectually to those things which are proper and convenient for him, as if in the principall and reasonable part thereof, there were some prepension and inclination. And verily this motion do not they overthrow and anull who hold off, and keep in their Assent, doubting of every thing, but make use of this appetition or instinct, condesting naturally every man to that which is proper and meet for him. What is the onely thing then that the Academicks slie and avoid? even that wherein alone there is engendred leasing, deceit and falshood, to opine, to apply the affent, which is a yieldiding through imbecility to that which appeareth, and hath no true profit. For our action requireth two things, to wit the apprehenfion or imagination of that which is convenient and familiar, and the inflind or appetition driving unto the same : whereof neither the one nor the other is repugnant to the cohibition of affent. For the Discourse of Reason withdraweth us from opinion, and not from Appetition or Imagination. When as therefore that which is pleasant and delectable seemeth unto us to be proper for us, and samiliar, there is no need at all of opinion for to move and carry us to it, but Appetition immediately presentethit felf, which is nothing else but a motion and incitation of the mind. Now for that there must be a sense as it were of these things, and the same consisting of slesh and blood, the same pleasure and delight likewise will appear good. And therefore it will semblably seem good unto him who holdeth off his Affent, for furely he hath senses, and is made of fiesh, blood, and bone, and so foonas he hath apprehended the Imagination of good, he hath an appetite and defire thereto, doing all that ever he can, nor to miffe it, nor lose the fruition thereof: but as much as is possible to cleave. and adhere continually to that which is proper unto him, as being driven and drawn thereto, Naturall and not Geometricall Constraints. For these Goodly, Pleasant, Gentle and tickling Motions of the flesh, be of themselves without any other Teacher attractive enough, as they themselves forget not to fay, and are able to draw and train him who foever he be, that will not confesse nor be known, but foutly denieth that he is made foft and pliable by them. But peradventure you will ask me how it comes to paffe that one of these that are so retentive and dainty of their assent, climbeth not up some hill, but to the bain or hot house : or when he riseth and purposeth to go into the market place, why he runneth not his head against a post or the wall, but taketh his way directly to the door? And ask you me this question indeed, you that hold all senses to be infallible, the apprehensions also and imaginations to be certain and true? For footh it is because the bain seemeth unto him a bain, and not a Mountain, the door also appeareth to be a door, and not the wall: And so is it to be faid likewife of such other things every one: For the Doctrine delivered as touching this cohibition, of affint, doth not pervert the sense, nor work in it by strange passions and motions any such change and alteration as may trouble the Imaginative Faculty. Onely it taketh away and subverteth opinions, but useth all other things, according to their nature. But impossible it is not to yield consent unto apparentevidences. For to deny those things which we are verily perswaded of and do believe, is more absurd, than neither to deny nor affirm any thing at all. Who be they then that deny such things as they believe, and go against things Evident? Even they who overthrow Divination, and deny, that there is any Government by Divine Providence: they who fay, that neither the Sunne is animall, nor the Moon, which all men honour and adore, to which they make their Prayers, and offer Sacrifice. As for you, do ye not apull that which is apparent to the whole World, to wit, that naturally infants and young ones, are contained within their Mothers, and Dammes? and that between pain and pleasure there is no mean, even against the sense and experience of all men? saying that not to be in pain, is to have pleasure ; and not to do, is to suffer; as also not to joy, is to be forrowfull? But to let passe all the rest, what is more evident, and so fully believed generally, than this, that those who have their brains troubled, and their wits diffracted, or otherwise fick of melancholick diseases, ween they fee and hear those things which they neither hear nor fee? namely, when their understanding comes to be in fuch fort affected and transported, as to break out into these speeches?

And all other forts of monftrous shapes and trange natures, mixed together all in one, setched from troublesome dreams, and alienations of the mind. But these men say, that none of all this is any deception or errour of the fight, or vain apparition, but be all true imaginations of bodies and figures, which page to and fro out of the inconstant air about them. Tell me now, what thing is so impossible in nature, that we need to doubt, if it be possible to believe these? For such things as never any conceited make maker, or devifer of vifards, any inventive potter, glaffe-maker or curious painter and drawer of wonderfull shapes, durst joyn together, either to deceive the beholder, or to make them sport for their pastime: these men supposing verily and in good carnest that they be really subsistent; and that which more is, affirming all sem and constant belief, all certifude of judgement and of truth, to be quite gone for ever, if fuch things have not their sublistence, these men I say be they, which involve all in obscurity and darkness, who overthrow all apparence, and bring into our judgement, fear and terroursinto our actions doubtfull suspition; in case our ordinary and usuall actions, and such affairs of ours, which are daily ready at hand, be carried in the same imagination, belief and perswasion, that these enormious, abfurd, and extravagant fanfies: for the equality which they suppose in all, plucketh away more credit from things ordinary, than it addeth unto fuch as be uncouth and unusuall which is the cause that we know Philosophers not a few, more willing to avouch, that no imagination is true, than that all be true without exception, and who diffrust all men whom they had not conversed with all, all things which they had not tried, generally all speeches which they had not heard, rather than believe so much as one of these imaginations and illusions which mad and frantick folk, fanatical persons poffeffed with a furious spirit, or dreamers in their sleeps do apprehend. Seeing then, some imaginatione we may utterly abolish, and others not, lawfull it is to retain our affent and doubt of things whether they be or no, if there were no other cause else but this discordant, which is sufficient to work in us suspicion of things, as having nothing assured and certain, but all incertitude and perturbation. As for the diffensions and differences about the infinite number of worlds, the nature of the Atomes, being indivisible bodies, and their declinations to a side, although they trouble and diffquiet many men, yet this comfort there is and confolation, that in all this there is nothing near at hand to touch us, but rather every one of these questions be far remote and beyond our senses; whereas this diffrust and diffidence, this percurbation and ignorance about sensible things and imaginations, prefented to our eyes, our ears and our hands, this doubs, I fay, whether they be true or falle, what opinion is it that they do not shake and make to waver, what judgement and affent do not they turn upfide down? For if men, being not drunk nor intoxicate, nor otherwise troubled in their brains, but fober, well in thier wite and found of judgement, profelling also to write of the truth, and of the Canons and rules to judge by in the most evident passions and motions of the sense, fet down that for true which cannot poffibly fublift, and for falle that which sublifteth, it is not to be marvelled nor thought incredible, if they give no judgement of fuch things which evidently appear, but rather be of contrary judgement. For a man may leffe wonder at one for affirming neither the one nor the other, and keeping himself in a mean between two opposites, than for putting down things repugnant and meer contrary. For he that neither affirmeth nor denieth, but holds himself quiet, is lesse repugnant both unto him who putteth down his opinion, than he who denieth it; and also to him that denieth it, than he who puts it down. And if it be possible to make doubt, & stick at these things, it is not impossible then ro do fo of others; at least wife according to you who are of opinion, that there is no difference at all between fense and fense, between imagination, and imagination, and therefore this doctrine as touching the retention of bellef and affent, is not as Golores faith, a vain fable, nor a captions toy of raih and light-headed yong men, that love to jungle & prate, but a fettled resolution and habituall disposition of flayed men, who be wary and take heed that they mistake not any thing, and fall into inconvenience, or abandon at a venture their judgement to the senses, so conjecturall and doubtfull, and not suffering them to be deceived and carried away with those, who hold that things uncertain, if they feem and appear, ought to be believed as well as if they were certain, notwithstanding they see so great obscurity and incerritude in imaginations and apparent things: But rather the infinity that you put down, and the Images you dream of be Fables. And as for heady raffness, and a vain humour of much babble, he engendreth in young Students, who writeth of Pythocles being not fully eighteen years of age, that there was not in all Greece, a better or more towardly nature; as being one who with admiration was able most excellently to expresse the Conceptions of his mind; and that his case was much like to the incomparable beauty of women, withing and praying therefore, that all those surpassing gifts, and most rare parts might not work the young man hatred and envy.

But buffe Sophisters they be. and vain fellows, who against so great and excellent Personages, dare write lo impudently and proudly, and yet I confesse, Plato, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Democritus gainfaved and contradicted those who wrote before them: Howbeit there was never man known but himfelf fo bold, as to make a Book against all indifferently, and with such a proud Inscription as he did: And then afterwards for footh like unto those who have offended and displeased the gods: in the end of faid Book, as one confessing his faults, he faith: that they who have established Laws and Ordinances: who have creeted Royall Governments and Politick Rule of Cities, and States, have fee the the Life of manin great Queet, Safety, and Security, yea and delivered it from dangeroustroubles: which if they were abrogated and put down, we should lead a savage life like wild beasts, one would eat another as they met together; for thefe be the very words that heuseth, though unjuffly and un-truly: For say a man did abolish Laws, and yet withall leave behind unrepealed and uncondemned the Doctrines and Books of Parmenides, Socrates, Heraclitus, and Plato, we should be far for all that from devouring one another, or living a favage life; for we should fear and forbear dishonest things, we flould even for vertue and honefly, honour Juftice, believe that the gods, good Magiftrates, and the angels or spirits have the gnarding, keeping, and and superintendance of mans lite, thinking all the Gold that is both above and under the ground, not able to counterpeife vertue, and doing willingly by reason and learning as Xenocrates was wont to say, that which now we do persorce for sear of the Laws. But when still our life become beaftly, favage, and insociable? Mary when, the Laws being taken away, there shall be left remaining, Books, and Discourses, inciting and soliciting men unto pleasure: when it shall be thought and believed, that the world is not ruled and governed by Gods Providence, when they shall be deemed Sages and wife men, who spit against honesty and vertue, unlesse it be joyned with pleasure, and when they shall deride and mock such Sentences as

> In Justice is an eye, Which all things doth efpie. God near doth fand, And fees all at hand.

As also this old said saw; God having in his power the beginning, mide, and end of the whole world paffeth directly throughout all nature, and goeth round about, attended upon by Justice, to punish those who transgress the Law Divine. For they that despite and contenne these instructions as idle Fables, and suppose that the Soveraign good consistent in the belly and other parts, whereby we enjoy pleafure, be those who had need of the Law, they ought to fear the whip, and stand in aw of some King, Prince, and Magistrate, who hath the sword of Justice in his hand, to the end that they might not deyour their neighbour by infatiable gluttony, which upon Atheifme and impiety, would grow to exceffive outrage: For verily such is the life of brute beafts, for that they know nothing better than pleafure, they have no fense of Gods Justice, they neither honour nor regard the beauty of vertue : But if nature hath endued them with any Hardineffe, Craft, and industrious Activity, they employ the same to fatisfie their fl. fhly pleafure, & accomplish their lufts, and therefore Metrodorus is reputed a great wife man, for faying, that all the fine, subtile, witty, and exquisite inventions of the soul, have been devised for to please and delight the flesh, or else for the hope to obtain and enjoy the same; and look what art foever tendeth not thereto, is vain and to no purpole. By fuch discourses & Philosophical reasons as these, down go wholfome Lawes, and in place thereof enter into lions paws, wolves teeth, oxes paunches, and camels necks and throats: and for want of writings and speech, the very beasts do preach and teach such dofuines and opinions as thefe, with their bleating, bellowing, neighing, and braying. For all the voice that they have, is nothing but belly chear, and the pleasure of the flesh, which they either embrace presently, or joy in the expectation thereof; unlesse haply there be some kind of them that delighteth uaturally in gagling, cackling, and garrulity, So that no man is able to praise those sufficient haply a ently, and to their full defert, who to represse such furious and beastly affections, have set down Law, rather athly and other influences who coreprese the functions are examined and country affections, that all the great Empires and Dominions in the world are nothing comparable to the Crown confidence. and Garland of * fearleffe Tranquility and Repole. cherishing and keeping warm thy poor body ? As for me lee them argue and expostulate with me about these points, who have lived ecconomically or politickly. And such are they all whom Coltes hath reviled and railed upon. Among whom Democritus verily in his writings admonithath and exhorteth, both to learn Military Science, as being of all others the greatest, and also to take pains, and endure travells. Whereby men attain to much Renown and Honour. As for Parmentaes he beautified and adorned his own Native Countrey with most excellent Laws which he ordained: in 6 much as the Magiftrates every year when they newly enter into their Offices, bind the Citzens by an Outh, to observe the Scatttes, and Laws of Parmender. And Empedocles not onely judicially convented and condemned the principall persons of the City wherein he dwele, for their insolant behavior our and for difftracting or embez: lling the publick Treasure, but also delivered all the Territory 1bout it from flerility and Postilence, whereunto before time it was subject, by emuring and stopping up the open paffages of a certain Mountain, through which the Southern wind blew and overfpread all the plain Countrey underneath. Socrates after he was condemned to death, when his friends had made means for him to escape, refused to take the benefit thereof, because he would maintain and confirm the authority of the Laws; chufing rather to die unjuftly, than to fave his life by difobeying the Laws of his Countrey. Meliffus being Pretor or Captain Generall of the City wherein he dwelly defeated the Athenians in a Battel at Sea. Plato left behind him in writing many good Difcourfes of the Laws, and of Civill Government: but much better imprinted he in the hearts and minds of his Difciples and familiars, which were the caufe that Dion freed Sieily from the tyranny of Dyonyfius; and Trace likewife was delivered by the means of Python and Heracledes, who killed King Coys. Chabrias and Photion, worthy Commanders of the Athenians Army, came both out of the School Academia, As for Epicurus he fent as far as into Afia certain persons of purpose to taunt and revile Timecrates, Yea, for Epicurus he sent as far as into Asia certain persons of purpose to taunt and revile Timecrates, Yea, and caused the man to be banished out of the Kings Court, onely for that he had offended Maradons. his brother. And this you may read written in their own books. But Plate fent of those friends which were brought up under him Ariftstimus to the Arcadiant, for to ordain their Commonwhich were brought up under him Ariftstimus to the Arcadiant, for to ordain their Commonwell Wealth, Phormio to the Elians, Menedemus to those of Pyrrba, Endoxus to the Chidians, and Ariftstians tle to those of Stagira, who being all his Disciples, and familiars, did pen and set down Laws. Alexander the Great requefted to have from Xenecrates rules and precepts, as touching the Government of a Kingdom. And he who was fent unto Alexander from the Greeks dwelling in Afia, and who most of all other fet him on a light fire and whetted him to enterprise the war against the barbarous King of Possis, was Delius an Ephelian, one of Platoes familiars. Zeno also a Schollar of Parmenides undertook to kill the Tyrant Demylus, , and having no good successe therein, but missing of his purpose, maintained the doctrine of Parmentales to be pure and sing gold tried in the fire from all base metall , shewing by the effect, that a magnanimous man is to fear nothing, but Turpitude and Dishonour, and that they be Children and Women, or else effeminate and beartlesse men like Women, who are affraid of dolor and pain? for having bitten off his Tongue with his own teeth, he spit it in the Tyrants face. But ont of the School of Epicurus, and of those who follow his rules and doctrines, I do not ask what tyrant off of the control of flice: but only which of all the fe Sages did ever fo much as imbark and make a votage by fea in his Countries fervice and for the good thereo? which of them went in embaffage or diputifed any mony thereabout? or where is there extant upon record any civill action of yours in matter of government. And yet because that Metrodorus went down one day from the City, as far as to the Haven Pyreaum, and rook a journey of five or fix miles to aid Mithra the Syrian one of the King of Perfias train and court, who had been arrefled and taken Prisoner, he wrote unto all, the friends that he had in the world, of this exploit of his, and this doubty votage Epicarus hath magnified and exalted in many of his Letters. What a do would they have made then, if they had done such an act as Arifoile did who reedified the City of his nativity Stagira, which had been destroyed by King Philip? or as Theophrafius, who water delivered and freed his native City being held and oppreffed by Lyranta? Should not think you the river Nilus have foon given over to bear the paper reed, than they been weary of discribing their brave deeds. And is not this a grievous matter and a great indignity, that of so many sets of Philosophers that have been, they only in manner enjoy the good things and benefits that are in Cities, without contributing any thing of their own to them? There are not any Posts. Tragedians, or Comedians, but they have endeavoured to do or fay alwaies fome good thing or other for the detence of Lawes and Policy: but these here, if peradventure they write ought, write of Policy, that we should not intermedle at all in the civill government of state : of Rhetorick, that we should, not plead any cause eloquently at the bar : of Roialty, that we should avoid the conversing and living in Kinga courts: neither do they name at any time those great persons who manage affairs of common-weale, but by way of mockery for to debase and abolish their glory. As for example of Epaminoudas they say that he had indeed some good thing only in name and word, but the same was but where, that is to fay, as little as might be, for that is the very term that it pleaseth them to use. Moreover they name him heart of Iron demanding why he marched up and down through out all Peloponne us with his army as he did, and fat not rather quiet at home in his own house with a dainty Chaplet upon his head given wholly to make in good cheer, and to fleep with his belly ful in a whole skin But methinks I should not for any thing, omit in this place to rehearse, what Metrodorus hath written in his book of Philosophy, wherein abjuring all dealing in government of state, he faith thus; Some there be of these wife men (quoth he) who being full of vanity and arrogancy, had to deep an inlight into the buliness thereof, that in treating of the rules of good life and of vertue they fuffer themselves to be carried away with the very same defires that Lycurgus and Solon fell into. What ? was this vanity indeed and the abundance of vanicy and pride, to fet the City of Athens free, to reduce Sparta to good policy, and the government of holefome Lawes, that young men should do nothing sicenciously nor get childrenupon Curti-sand Harlots? and that Riches, wanton Delicacy, Intemperance, Loofenesse, and Dissolution, flould beare no sway nor have the command in Citie, but Law only and Juffice; for these were the defires of Solen. And thus Metrodorus by way of foorn and contumelious reproach addeth thus much more for a conlusion to the rest. And therefore (quoth he) it is well befeeming a Gentleman , to laugh a good and right heartly at all other men, but especially at these Solones and Lycurgi. But verify such an one were not a Gentleman Metrodorus, nor well born, but servile, base, unruly and dissolute, and who deferred to be feourged not with the whip which is for free born persons, but with that whip Altragalore, where with the manner was to whip and chastice those gelded facrificers called Gatb, when they did amiff in the ceremonies and facrifices of Crbele, the great mother of the gods. Now that they warred not against the Lawgivers, but the very Lawes themselves, a man may hear & learn of Epicarus, for in his questions he demandeth of himself, whether a wife man being affured that no man ever should know, would and do commit any thing that the Law forbiddeth? and he maketh an answer which is not full nor an open, plain and simple affirmation, saying, do it I will, marry confesse it and be known thereof I will not. Again, writing as I suppose unto Idomenen, head monisset him not to be subject and enthrall his life unto Lawes and the Opinions and Reputation, of Men: unlesse it be in this regard only that otherwise there is prepared odious whipping cheere and that near at hand. If then it be fo, that they who abolish Lawer, Governments, and Policies, do withall subvert and overthrow mans life: if Metrodorus and Epicarus do no leffe, with drawing and averting their friends and followers from dealing in publick affaires and spitefully hating those who do meddle therein, miscalling and railing at the cheif and wisest Lawgivers that ever were, yea and willing them to contemn the Lawes, fo that they keep themselves out of the sear of the whip and danger of punishment, 1 cannot fee that Golores hath in any thing fo much belied others, and raifed falle imputations against them, as he hath indeed and truly accused the dostrine and opinion of Epicurus.

Of Love.

The Summary.

→His Dialogue is more dangerous to be read by young than men any other Treatife of Plutarch, for that there be certain glaunces here and there against honest Mariage, to uphold indirectly and underhand, the curfed and detellable filithingse coverly conched under the name of the Love of young boye: But minds guarded and armed with the Chaptiy and the fear of God, may see evidently in this Discourse the miserable estate of the world, in that there be found patrons and advocates of so detestable a cause ; such I mean as in this book are brought in under the persons of Protogenes and Pisias. Mean while they may perceive likewise in the combat of matrimoniall love against unnaturall Padality not to be named, that honesty hath alwaies meants sufficient to defend it self from being vanquished, yea and in the end to go away with the villory. Now this Treatise may be comprised in sour principall points: of which, the first (after a brief Preface wherein Aucobulus being requested to rehearse unto his companions certain reports which before time he had heard Plutarch his Falker to deliver as touching Love, entreth into the discourse semantic the History of Ismenodora, enamoured upon a young man named Bacchon; whereupon arose some difference and dispute: of white Plutarch and those of his company were chosen Arbitratours. Thereupon Protogenes seconded by Pifias, (and this is the second Point) setting himself against Ismenodora, disgraceth and discrediteth the whole fex of woman kinde, and praifeth openly enough the love of males. But Daphnæus answereth them so fully kome and pertinently to the purpose, that be discovereth and detester all their filthinesse, and consutet them as behovefull it was, shewing the commodities and true pleasure of conjugal love. In this desence, assisted beis by Plutarch, who proveth that neither the great wealth, nor the forward affedion of a Woman to a Man, causetb the marriage with her to be culpable or worthy to be blamed, by divers examples declaring that meny Women even of base condition, have been the occasion of great evils and calamities. But as be was minded to continue this Discourse, newes came how Bacchon was caught up and brought up into the house of limenodora, which made Protogenes and Pifias to difloge ; insomuch as their departure gave intrie into the third and principall point concerning Love what it is? what he the parts, the causes, the fundry effects and fruits thereof, admirable in all forts of person, in altering them so as they become quite changed and others then they were before: Which is construed by many notable examples and similardet. In the last point Plutach disconfeth upon this argument, and that by the Philosophy of Plato and the Egiptians, conferring the suits the delivine of order Philosophers and Poets. Then having expressy and flatty condenned Pederasty, as a most vile and abominable thing, and adjoined certain excellent advertisements for the entertaining of Love in Wedlock, between Husband and Wife, of which be relateth one proper example, bis speech endeth by occa-fion of a Messenger who came in place, and drew them all away to the wedding of Ismenodora and Bacchoo, Flavianus.

T was at Helicon (& Autobulus) was it not , that those discourses were held as touching Love, which you purpose to relate unto us at this present, upon our Request and Intreaty, whether it be that you have put them down in writing, or bear them well in remembrance, considering that you have so often required and demanded them of your father? Aurobulus.

Yes verily, in Helicon it was (o Flavianus) among the Muses, at what time as the Thespians solemnized the feaft of Cupid, for they celebrate certain games of prize every five yeers, in the honour of Lore, as well as of the Muses, and that with great pomp and magnificence-

Flavianus. And wot you what it is that we all hear that are come to hear you, will request at your hands? Autobulus.

No verily, but I shall know it when you have told me. Flavianus.

Marry this it is: That you would now in this rehearfal of yours, lay afide all by matters and readless preambles, as touching the description of fair Medowes, Pleasant Shades; of the crawling and winding Ivie; of rils iffuing from Fountaines running round about; and fuch like common places, that many love to infert, defirous to counterfeit and imitate the description of the river Hiffus, of the Chast-tree, and the fine green grass and prety herbs growing daintily upon the ground, rising up a little with a gentle affent, and all after the example of Plato in the beginning of his Dialogue Pheatrus, with more curiofity iwis and affectation, than grace and elegancy. Autobulus.

What needs this narration of ours (my good friend Flavianus) any fuch Procene or Preface? for the occasion from whence arose and proceeded these discourses, requireth only an affectionate audience. and calleth for a convenient place as it were a flage and scaffold, for to relate the action: for otherwile, of all things else requisite in a Comedie or Enterlude, there wanteth nothing: only let us make our prayers unto the Mules Mother, Lady Memory, for to be propice unto us, and to vouchfafe her affiftance, that we may not miffe, but deliver the whole narration. My father long time before I was born, having newly espouled my mother, by occasion of a certain difference and variance that fell out between his parents and hers, took a journey to Thespie, with a full purpose to sacrifise unto Cupid the god of Love; and to the feaft he had up with him my mother also, for that it principally appertained unto her to perform both the prayer and the facrifice. So there accompanied him from his house, certain of his most familiar friends. Now when he was come to The pia, he found Daphneus the sonne of Archidamus, and Lyfander who was in love with Simons daughter, a man who of all her woers was best welcome unto her and most accepted : Sociarus also the sonne of Aristion, who was come from Tithora: there was besides, Protogenes of Tarsos, and Zeuxippus the Lacedemonian, both of them his old friends and good Hosts, who had given him kind entertainment: and my father faid moreover, that there were many of the best men in Baotia there, who were of his acquaintance. Thus as it should seem, they abode for two or three days in the City, entertaining one another gently at their leafure with discourses of Learning, one while in the common empaled Park of exercise, where the youth used to wreftle, and other whiles in the Theaters and Shew-places, keeping company together. But afterwards, for to avoid the troublesome contentions of Minstrels and Musicians, where it appeared, that all would go by favour, such labouring there was before-hand for voices, they dislodged from thence for the most part of them, as out of an enemies Countrey, and retired themselves to Helicon, and there fojourned and lodged among the Muses: where, the morrow morning after they were thither come, arrived and repaired unto them Anthemion and Pifias, two noble Gentlemen, allied both and affectionate unto Barchon, furnamed the Fair, and at some variance one with another by reafon of I wot not what jealousie, in regard of the affection they bare unto him. For there was in the City of Thelpie, a certain Dame named Ismenodora, descended of a noble house, and rich withall: yea and of wife and honest carriage besides in all her life: for continued she had no small time in widowhood without blame, reproach or touch, notwithstanding she was young, and therewithall beau-

This fresh widow whiles the treated of a Marriage to be made between Bacchon a young Gentleman. a neighbours child, whose mother was a very familiar friend of hers, and a certain young maiden a a heighbors that, who the most was a visit and a treat of height a vertain young matterns with firm one fancy with the young man: Thus both hearing and fpeaking much good and many kind speeches of him, and seeing besides a number of other Gentlemen, and persons of good worth to be enamoured upon him; by little and little she also fell to be in hot Love with the youth; howbeit, with a full Intention and Resolution to do nothing that should be dishonest, or unbesceming her place, parentage, and reputation, but to be wedded unto Bacchon lawfully in the open fight of the world, and so to live with him in the estate of Wedlock. As the thing it self seemed at the first very firange, so the mother of the young man of one fide doubted and suspected the greatness of her State, and the Nobility and Magnificence of her House and Linage, as not meet and correspondent to his Condition, for to be a Lover or to be matched there; and on the other fide, some of his Companions, who used to ride forth a hunting with him, considering that the young age of Bacebon was not answerable to the years of Ismenodora, buzzed many doubts in his head, and frighted him from her what they could, faying, That the might be his mother, and that one of her age was not for him; and thus by their jeffing and fooffing, they hindered the Mariage more than they who laboured in good earnest to break it : for he began to enter into himself, and considering that he was yet a beardless youth, and searcely undergrown, he was abashed and ashamed to marry a Widow. Howbeit in the end, : shaking off all others, he referred himself to Anthemion, and Pifiat, for, to tell him their minds upon the point, and to advise him for his best: Now was Anthemion his coulen german, one of good yeers, and elder than himselffar; and Pifia; of all those that made love unto him, most austere : and therefore he both withstood the marriage, and also checked Ambenium as one who abandoned and betraied the young man unto I/menodora. Contrariwife, Anthemion charged Pifiar and faid he did not well, who being otherwife an honeft man, yet herein imitated lewd lovers, for that he went about to put his friend befide a good bargain, who now might be sped with so great. a marriage, out of fo worshipfull an house, and wealthy besides ; to the end that he might have the pleasure to see him a long time stripped naked in the wrestling place, fresh still, and smooth, and not having touched a woman. But because they should not by arguing thus one against another, grow by little and little into heat of choler, they chose for umpiers and judges of this their controversie, my Father, and those who were of his company ; and thither they came : aliftant also there were unto them, other of their friends, Dapbneus to the one, and Protegenes to the other, as if they had been provided of fet purpose to plead a cause: As for Protogenes who fided with Pifias, he inveighed verily with open mouth against dame Ismenodora: whereupon Daphnaus; O Hercules (quoth he) what are we not to expect, and what thing in the world may not happen; in case it be so that Progress; is ready here to give defiance and make war against love, who all his life both in carnest and in game, hath been wholy in love, and all for love, which hath caused him to forget his book, and to forget his naturall countrey, not as Laius did, who was but five daies journey diffant? for that love of his was flow and heavy, and kept still upon the land : whereas your Cupid, Protogenes,

from out of Cilicia to Athens, to fee fair boyes, and to go up and down with them (forto fay a truth, the cheif cause why Protogenes made a Voyage out of his own Countrey, and became a traveller, was at the first this and no other) Hereat the Company took up a Laughter, and Protogenes: Think you (quoth he) that I war not against Love, and not rather stand in the defence of Love against lascivious wantonneffe, and violent intemperance, which by most shamefull acts and filthy Passions, would perforce challenge, and break into the faireft, most honest, and venerable names that be. Why (quoth Daphneus then) do you term marriage and the feeret of marriage, to wit the lawfull conjunction of man and wife, most vile and dishonest actions, than which there can be no knot nor link in the world more facred and holy? This bond in truth of wedlock (quoth Protogenes) as it is necessary for generation, is by good right praised by Politicians and Law-givers, who recommend the same highly unto the people and common multitude:but to fpeak of true love indeed, there is no jot or part thereof in the fociety and fellowship of women : neither do I think that you and fuch as your selves, whose affe-Etions fland to wives or maidens, do love them no more than a flie loveth milk, or a Bee the Honvcombl; as Caters and Cooks who keep fowls in mue, and feed Calves and other such Beasts fat in dark places, and yet for all that they love them not. But like as nature leadeth and conducteth our Appetite moderately, and asmuch as is sufficient to bread and other viands; but the excesse thereof, which maketh the naturall! Appetite to be a victous passion, is called Gormandise, and pampering of the flesh: even so there is naturally in meu and women both a desire to enjoy the mutuall pleasure one of another: whereas the impetuous luft which cometh with a kind of force and violence, fo as it hardly can be held in, is not fitly called love, neither deserveth it that name : For Love if it feile upon a young, kind, and gentle heart, endeth by amity in vertue: whereas of these affections and lusts aster women, if they have successe and speed never so well, there followeth in the end the fruit of some pleasure, the fruition and enjoying of youth and a beautifull body, and that is all. And thus much teftified Ariftippus, who when one went about to make him have a distaste and mislike of Lais the Curtifian, faying, that the loved him not, made this answer. I suppose (quoth he) that neither good wine not delicate Fish loved him, but yet (quoth he) I take pleasure and delighe in drinking the one and eating the other. For surely theend of desire and appetite pleasure and the fruition of it. But Love if it have once lost the hope and expectation of amity and kindnesses, will not continue nor cherish and make much for beauty sake, that which is irksome and odious, be it never so gallant, and in flower and prime of age, unleffe it bring forth and yield fuch fruit which is familiar unto it, even a nature disposed to amiry and vertue. And therefore it is, that you may hear some husband ina Comedie, speaking tragically thus unto his wife:

Thou batest me : and I again, Thine barred and disdain Will eas'ly bear, and this abuse turn to my proper gain. For furely, more amorous than this man is not he, who not for lucre and profit, but for the fieldly pleasure of Venus, endureth a curst, shrewd and froward wife, in whom there is no good nature nor kind affedion. After which manner Philippides the Comicall Poet Scoffed at the Oratour Stratrocks and mocked him in these Verses:

She winds from thee, she turns away unkind Hardly thou canft once kiffe ber bead behind.

But if we must needs call this passion Love, yet surely it shall be but an effeminate and Bastard Love, fending us into viomens Chambers and Cabinets as it were to Gynofarges at Albens, where no other youths do exercise but misbegotten bastards : or rather like as they say, there is one kind of gentle Falcons, or Royall Eagles bred in the mountains, which Homer calleth the Black Eagle for game: whereas other kinds there be of baftard Hawks, which about Pools and Meres catch fill, or felle upon heavy winged birds, and flow of flight; which many times wanting their prey, make a pitcous noise and lamentable cry for very hunger and famine, even for the true and naturall love of is that young boyes, which sparkleth not with the ardent heat of concupiscence, as Anacrem saith the other of maident and Virgins doah: it is not besseared with sweet ointments, nor tricked up and trimmed, but plain and fimple alwayes a man shall see it, without any intifing afturements in the Philosophers Schools, or about publick Parks of Exercise and wreftling places, where it hunteth kindly, and with a very quick and piercing eye after none but young firiplings and fpringals, exciting and encouraging earneftly unto vertue, as many as are meet and worthy to have pains taken with them: whereas the other delicate and effeminate Love, shat keepeth home, and firreth not out of doores, but keepeth continually in womens laps, under Canopiet or within Gurtains in womens beds and foft [Pallets, feeking always after dainty delights, and pampered up with unmanly pleafures, wherein there is no reciprocall amity, nor heavenly ravillment of the foirit, is worthy to be rejected and chafad far away: like as Soloto banished it out of his Common Wealth, when he expressly forbad all slaves and those of service conditions. on to love boyes or to be anomitted in the open air without the bains, but he debarred them not from the company of women. For Amity is an Honest, Civill, and Laudable thing, but fleshly pleasure, base vile, and illiberall. And therefore that a servile flave should make Love to a sweet youth, it is neither Decent, Civill, nor Commendable: for this is no carnall Love, nor huttfull any way, as that other is of Women. Protogenes would have continued his speech and said more, but Daphneus interrupting him: Now furely, you have done it very well (quoth he) and alledged Solon trimly for the purpole; & we must belike, take him for the judge of a true lover, & the rule to go by, especially when he fai.h

Adjoyn alfo unto Solon (if you think good) the Poet Efchylut, whereas he faith :

Unthankefull, man unkinde thou art For kiffes freet which thou haft found, Regarding not of thy dear heart,

The thighs so streight and busecks round.

Here are proper Judges indeed of Love. Others I wot well there be, who laugh at them, because they would have Lovers like to Sacrificers, Bowel priers, and Southfayers, to cast an eye to the hanches and the loynes: but I for my part, gather from hence a very good and forcible argument in the behalf of Women: for if the company with males that is against kind, neither taketh away nor doth prejudice the amity and good will of lovers, far more probable it is that the love to Women which is according to nature, is performed by akind of obsequious favour, and endeth in amity: for the voluntary Commission of the Female to the Male, was by our ancestours, in old time, O Protogenes, termed, naer, that is to fay, Grace or Favour: which is the reason that Pindarus faith Vulcane was born of Tuns a" no saei Tun, that is to fay, without the Graces. And Sappho the Poetreffe Speaking to a young Girle not as yet for her tender years marriageable ;

Too young (my child) you feem to me, Withouten Grace also to be.

And Hercules was asked the question of one in these tearmes : VV hat did you force the maiden by compulfion,

Or win ber grace and favour with persons of whereas the submission in this kinds of Males to Males, if it be against their will, is named violence and plein rape : but if it be voluntary, and that upon an effeminate weaknesse they be so far beside their right wits as to yeeld themselves to be ridden as it were and covered, for those be Platoes words, in manner of foure footed beafts; I say such Love is altogether without Grace, without Decency, most Unfeemly, Filthy, and Abominable. And therefore I suppose verily, that Solon poured out these Verfe, when he was a lufty youngster, rank of blood and full of naturall feed, as Plato faith: for when he was well stept in years he sung in another tune, and wrote thus; when he had retired and withdrawn his life as it were out of a troublefome sea and tempessuous storm of Paderaftie, into the quiet calm of lawfull Marriage and study of Philosophy.

The sports of Venus Lady bright, And Bacchus now are my delight : In Mufick cke I pleasure take : For why? these three men joyes do make.

Now if we will confider better, and look nearer into the truth, the passion of Love (O Protogenes) beit in one fex or another, is all one and the fame : but if upon a froward and contentious humour you will needs divide and distinguish them , you shall find that this Love of Boies doth not contain it felf within compile, but as one late born and out of the scasonable time of age and course of this life, a very bistard, and begotten secretly in darknesse, it would wrongfully drive out the true legitimate naturall Love, weh is more ancient. For it was but yesterday or two daies ago as one would fay my good Friend, andnam:ly, fince young lads began in Greece to difrobe and turn themselves naked out of their clothes for the exercise of their bodies , that it crept into these impaled places, where youths prepared themfelves for to wreftle; and there closely setling it self, lodged and was enstalled; where by little and little when the wings were full growen, it became fo infolent, that it could not be held in, but offer injury & outrage to that Nuptial Love, which is a coadjutreff: with nature, to immortalize mankind, in kindling it immediately again by generation according as the fame is extinguished and put out by death. But this Protogenes here would feem to deny that the faid Love tendeth to any pleasure: The truth is this, he is ashamed to confesse, and affraid to avow so much. But there must needs be devised some pretty reason, and cleanly excuse, for the Touching, Feeling, and Handling of these faire young Boyes: Well the pretence and colour to cover all, is Amity and Vertue. He bestreweth himself with dust agunt he should wrefile, he doth bath and wash in cold water, he knitteth and bendeth his browes full gravely, he giveth it out and maketh his boaft that he studieth Philosophy, that he is chast and continents and all this is abroad and before folke, for fear of the Lawes; but when the night comes, and that every man is retyred to his reft, Sweet is the fruit that foll'n is fecretly, And gather'd close, while Keeper is not by.

And if, as Protogenes faith, this Pederastium aimeth not at carnall Conjunction, how then can it be Love, il Venus be not there? confidering that of all other gods & goddeffes, ther alone Cupid is deffined and devoted to serve and attend upon, having neither Honour, Power, nor Authority, no farther than she will impart and bestow upon him. And if you say unto me, that there may be some Love without Venus, like as there is drunkenn: sie without wine, for a man may drink of a certain decoction of figs, or batley made into male, and be drunk therewith ! I answer you, that as this is but a flatulent exagitation, so the motion of fuve is fruitlesse; unperfect, bringing loathfome saiety, and wearisme shuffle from. Whiles Daphneus thus spake, it appeared evidently, that Pissas found himself galled, and was enchassed against him. Therefore so soon as he had made an end of his speech, after soune little pause: O Herculus (quoth he) what intollerable impudency and inconsiderate rashnesse is this, that menshould conselfed and avows, that like dogs they be tied to women by their natural parts, and so chase and basish this god Cupsa, out of the publick places of exercise, out of the open galleries and walks; from the putconversation in open aire, sun-shine, and before the whole world for to be ranged and brought, to slite Spades, Hatchets, Drogues, Medicines, Charms and Sorceries of these wanton and lascivious womens for to speak of chaste and honest dames, I say, it is not beforeming that they should either love or beloved. And hereat verily my father said, that himself took Prosegenes by the hand, execting this verse out of the Poet:

Such words as these no doubt will make

The Argives, armes anon to take.

For furely Pifias through his infolency, caufeth us to fide with Daphnaus, and undertake to maintain his part, seeing he so far exceedeth the bonds of all reason, as to bring into Marriage and Wedlock, a fociety without love, and void of that divine inflinct of amity, and infpired from heaven abore; which we fee how we have enough to do for to maintain and hold with all the Yokes, Bittes and Bridles, of fear and shame, if this hearty affection and grace be away. Then Pifias, I passe little (quothhe) for all these words : and as for Daphnens me thinks I fee how it fareth with him, as it doth with a piece of braffe, which melteth not fo much by force of fire, as it doth by another piece of braffe melted, if a man pour the same upon it, for then anon it will be liquefied and run together with it. And even so, the beauty of Lysandra doth not so greatly affect and trouble him, as this, that conversing along time with one that is enflamed and full of fire, by couching her he is himself all fire; and evident it is, that unlesse heretire with speed unto us, he will melt and ron all to liquor. But I perceive (quoti he) that I do that which Authemion should most desire and wish, namely, that I am offensive both to the Judges and to my felf; wherefore I will hold my peace and fay no more: You fay true indeed (quoth Anthemion) you do me a great pleasure, for you should at the very first have said somwhat to the point, and upon the particular matter now in question : I say therefore (quoth Pisias but I protest beforehand, and that aloud, that for mine own part I will be no hinderance, but that every woman may have her lover) that this young man Bacchon had need to take heed and beware of the riches and wealth of Ismenodera; otherwise if we match him with such an house of so great flare and magnificence, we shall ere we be aware consume him to nothing, like a piece of Tinne among Braffe. For a great matter I may tell you it were, if being fo young as he is, and espousing a wife of mean and simple degree, he should in such a mixture hold his own, and keep the predominance as wine over water. But we may fee that this gentlewoman here feemeth already to look for to command and be his Mafter: otherwife the would never have refused and rejected to many husbands as the hath done, of such reputation, so nobly descended, and so wealthy withall, for to woo and solicitat she doth a very boy new crept out of the (hell, no better than a Page but the other day, one iwis that he had more need to go to schoole fill, and be under a Tutour and Governour. And hereupon it is, that those bufbands who are of the wifer fort, do of themselves cast away, or else clip and cut the wings of their wives, that is to fay, their goods and riches, which cause them to be proud and insolent, sumptious and wasteful, full of shrewdnesse, vaine, light, and soolish; and with these wings they mount many times, take their flight and away; or if they flay at home, better it were for a man to be bound with fetters of gold, as the manner is to enchain prisoners in Ethiopia, than to be tied with the wealth and riches of his wife: But he hath faid nothing as yet (quoth Protegnes) hereof, nor once touched this firing, namely, how in admitting this Marriage, we shall in manner invertand that ridiculously and with abfurdity enough the sentence of Hefiodus who giveth counsel in these words:

At thirty years (not much above nor under) of thins age, Wed thou a wife: this is the time, most meet for marriage:
At surven years a danosel doth signs of ripenelse how, At fifteen would she married be, and her bedsellow know.

And we here clean contrary almost, will match a young man before he be ready for Marriage, unto a woman as old again well neer as himself, as if one should fer Dates or Figges upon old stocks, to make them ripe. And why not? some one will haply say; for the is enamoroured upon him; the burnes and is ready to die for love of him, I marrel much who hinders her that she goeth not to his house in Maske, that she sings not lamentable ditties at his door, and amorous plaints, that she adometh not his langes with Garlands and Chaplets of flowers, and that the entreth not into combat with her corrivals, and win him from them all by sight and seate of activity? for these be the casts of lovers; lether knit her browers; let her sorbear to live bravely and daintily, putting on the countenance and habit meet for this passion: but if she be modest, shamefaced, sober, and honest, as that she is abstituded to to do; les her six womanly decently as its becomments, at home in her house, stocked.

expeding her Lovers and Woers, to come and court her there. For fuch a Woman as doth not diffemble, but bewraieth openly that the is in Love, a man would avoid and detell, so far would he be from taking her to be his Wife, or laying for the ground of his Marriage fuch shamlesse incontinence. Now when Protogenes had madean end of his speech, and paused a while : See you not, O Anthemion (quoth Daphnehow they make this a common cause again and matter of dispuration, enforcing us to speak still of Nuntiall Love, who deny not our felves to be the Maintainers thereof, nor avoid to enter into the daunce, as they fay , and to shew our selves to be the Champions of it ? Yes marry do I (quoth Anthemion) and I pray you take upon you to defend at large this love: and withall let us have your helping hand about this point, as touching Riches, which Pifias urgeth especially, and wherewith he seemeth to affeight us more than with auy thing elfe : What can we do leffe quoth my Father then; for were is not a reproach effered unto Woman kind, & would it not greatly redound to their diferedit and blame, in case we would reject and cast off Ifmenodora, for her Love and her Wealth fake? But she is brave, she is fumptuous, coffly, and bearing a great port: What matters that, so long as the is fair, beautifull, and young. But she is come of a noble house and highly descended? What harm of that if she live in good name , and be of good reputation? for it is not necessary that Wives to approve their honelly and wifdom, should be sower, austere, curst and shrewd: for chast Dames and sober Matrons, do indeed detest bitternesse, as an odious thing and intollerable. And yet some there be that call them furies, and fay they be be curft fhrewes unto their Hufbands, when they be modelt, wife, diferet, and honest. Were it not therefore best to espoule some odd Abrotonon out of Thracia, bought in open Market: or some Bacchis, a Melesian * passing in exchange for raw hides, and prized no dearer: And * $ 37000 yet we know there be many men, whom fuch Women as these hold most shamefully under their signs ka-Girdles, and rule as they lift: For even Minstrell Wenches of Samos, and such as professed Dancing as Arijionica, Oenanthe, with her Tabour and Pipe, and Agathecleia, have over-topped Kings and youthat is Princes, yea trodden their Crownes and Diadems under foot: As for Semiramis, a Syrian, to fay, the was at first no better than a poor Wench, Servant, and Concubine, to one of the great King whose Ninus Slaves: but after that the King himself had set his eye and fancy upon her, he was so devoted to a name of the server of the was so devoted to a name of the server of the was so devoted to a name of the was so devoted to a name of the was so devoted to the was so dev unto her, and the again to imperiously ruled over him, and with tome contempt, that the was to for affubold to require at his hands, that he would permit her to fit one day upon her royall Throne, under rance, that the Cloth of Estate, with the Diadem about her head and so to give audience and dispatch the affaires she will be of the Kingdom in flead of him; which when Ninus had granted, and given expresse charge true and withall? that all his Subjects whatfoever should yeeld their loyall obedience to her as to his own to her husperson, yea and persorn whatsoever she ordained and decreed : she carried her self with great Mode-band, as ration in her first Commandements, to make tryall of the Pensioners and Guard about her; and some interwhen the faw that they gainfaid her in nothing, but were very diligent and ferviceable; the pretit.

Commanded them to Artest and Apprehend the Body of Ninus the King then to bind him fast, and finally to put him to death. All which when they had fully executed, the raigned indeed, and for a long time in great State and Magnificence ruled all Afia. And was not Belefty I pray you a Barbarian Woman, brought up even in the very Market among other flaves? and yet those of Alexandria have certain Temples, Chappels, and Altars, which King Prolomens, who was enamoured upon her, canfed to be initialled by the name of Venus Belefty? And Phryne the famous Courtefan, who both here and also at Delphos is shrined in the same Temple and Chappell with Cupid, whose statue all of beaten Gold, standeth among those of Kings and Queens; by what great dowry was it that fhe had all her Lovers in fuch subjection under her? But like as these persons through their effeminate fofinesse and pufillanimity, became ere they were aware a very Prey & Pillage to fuch Women : fo on the other fide, we find others of bale degree and poor condition, who being iovned in Marriage to Noble and Rich Wives, were not utterly overthrown with fuch matches, nor ftruck faile or abated ought of their Generosity and high Spirit , but lived alwaies loved and honoured by those Wives, yea and were Masters over them to their dying day. But he that rangeth and reduceth his Wife into a narrow compais and low efface, as if one bent a Ring to the flenderneffs of his finger, for fear it fhould drop off, resembleth those for all the world, who clip and shave the maines of their Marcs, and pluck the haire off their tailes, and then drive them to water, into some River or Poole : for it is faid, that when they see themselves in the water fo ill favouredly shorne and curtailed, they let fall their Courage, Stomack, and hauty Spirit, oa stey fuffer themselves afterward to be covered by Asses. And therefore like as to prefer the Riches of a Woman above her vertue, or to make choise thereof before nobility of birth were base. and illiberall: fo to reject wealth joyned with vertue and noble parentage is meer folly. King Antigonus writing unto a Captain of his whom he put with a Garifon into a Fortreffe Munichia in Alberts, the which he fortified with all dilligence possible, commanded him not only to make the Collar and Chein strong, but the Dogg also weak and lean: giving him thereby to understand, that he should impoverish the Athenians, and take from them all meanes whereby they might rebell or rife against him. But a man who hath taken to Wife a rich and beautifull Woman, ought not tomake her either poor, or foul and ill-favoured; but rather by his discretion, good government and wisdom, by making semblance that he is ravished with no admiration of any thing that

and carriage a counterpetife to the ballance for to hold her firm, or a weight rather to make her incline and bend that way which is good for them both. Now to return unto Ismenodora, her years are meet for Marriage, and her person fie for breeding and bearing children, and I here sayithe woman is in the very flour and best of her time; for elder the is not (and with that he smiled upon Pifics) than any of her Suters and Corrivals, neither hath the any gray haires, as fome of those that be al-fedionate to Bacchon and follow him. Now if they think themselves of a meet age to converse familiarly with him, what should hinder her but she should affect and fansie the young mans person as well (if not better) as any young maidenw hatfoever. And verily thefe young folk are other whiles hard to be matched, united and concorporated together, and much a doe there is but by long continuance of time, to cast aside and shake off wantonnesse and wildnesse: for at the first there is many a foul day and blustring tempeft, and unneth will they abide the yoke and draw together : but especially if there be any inkling or jealouss: of other loves abroad, which like unto winds, when the Pilot is away, do trouble and difquiet the wedlock of fuch young persons as neither be willing to obey, nor have the skill to command. If it be so then, that a Nource can rule her little Babe sucking at her pap; a Schoolmaster the By that is his scholar; a Master of exercises, the young Springal; a lover, the youth whom he loveth; the Law and the Captain, a Man growen and him that is able to bear Armes; infomuch as there is no person of what age foever without government, and at his own liberty to do what he list: what abfurdity is it if a wife that hath wit and discretion, and is besides the elder, govern and direct the life of a young man her husband? being as the is profitable unto him in regard the is the wifer, and besides milde and genule in her government, for that she loveth him? Over and besides, to conclude, we all that are Bootians (quoth he) ought both to honour Hercules, and also not to be offended with the Marriage of those who are in years unequal, knowing as we do that he gave his own wife Megera being thirty three years old, in Marriage to Iolaus being then but fixten years of age. As these words paffed to and fro, there came (as my Father made report) one of Pifias companions galloping hardon hoi cback from out of the City bringing news of a very frang and wonderful occurrent. For I franctiona, perfunding her felf (as probable it was) that Bacchen milliked not this marriage in his heat but that he held off, for the respect and reverence that he carried unto those who seemed to diverthim from it, refolved, not to give over her fuit, nor to cast off young men. Whereupon she fent for such of her friends, as were lufty young and adventurous Gallants, and withall her Favourits those that wished well to her love : certain women also who were inward with her and most trusty : and when she had affembled them all together in her house and communicated her mind unto them, she waited the very hour, when as Bacchen was wont ordinarily to paffe by her doors, going well and orderly appointed forth to the publick place of wrefling. Now when he approached neer unto her house all enhuled and anointed as he was, accompanied only with two or three persons. I menodora her self stepped sorthof doors, croffed the way upon him and only touched the mandilion that he had about him : which fignal being given, all at once her friends leapt forth and fair caught up this fair youth in his Mandillon and Dublet as he was, and gently carried him into her houfe, and immediately flut the doors full locked. No fooner had they gotten him within doors, but the women in the houle turning him out of his upper Mandilion aforefaid, put upon him a fair Wedding robe, and withal the servants of the house ran up and down, and adorned with lvie and Olive branches the doors and gates not onely of Ismenodora but also of Bacchons house: and with that a Minstril Wench also passed along through the street piping and finging a wedding fong. As for the Citizens of Thespie and the strangers who were there at that time, some of them took up a laughter, others being angry and offended hereat, incited the Masters and Governours of the publick exercises (who indeed have great authority over the youth and carry a vigilent eye unto them, for to look neerly unto all their behaviours) whereupon they made no account at all of the present exercises then in hand, but leaving the Theater, to the door they came of Ismendera, where they sell into hot reasoning and debating of the matter one against another. Now when the faid friend of Pissas was come in all hast riding upon the spur with this news, as is he had brought some great tidings out of the Camp in time of war, he had no sooner uttered, panting for want of winde and in manner breathleffe, these words, Ismenodara hath ravished Bacchon, but Zeuxippus, 4 my father told the tale, laughed heartily, and out of Euripides (as he was one who alwaics loved to read that Poet) pronounced this fentence:

Well done, fair Dame: you baving wealth at will, Are wordly wife, your mind thus to fulfil.

But Pifiats, rifing up in great choler, cried out, O the will of God, what will be the end of this licențious liberty, which thus overthroweth our City? fecing how all the World is growen already to this paffe, shat through our unbrideled audacioufiselfe, we do what we lift, and paffe for pol awes? but why fay I Lawes, for haply it is but a ridiculous thing to take indignation for the transgrefuge of Civil Law and Right: for even the very law of Nature is violated by the infolent rafineffect women. Was there ever the like example feen in the very file Lemms? Let us be gone (quoth he) gowe and quit from henceforth the wrefiling Schooles, and publick place of exercises, the common hall of justice, and the Senate house, and commit all to women, if the City be so increate as to put upsuffer an indignity. So Pifias brake company and departed in these teames, and Protogenes followed after him, partly as angry as he, and in part appeasing and mitigating his mood a little. Then Ambenius: To say a trust (quoth he) this was an audacious part of hers, and savoring somewhan of the enterprise of those Lemnian wives in old time, and no marvel; so we cour selves know that the woman was exceeding amorous. Hereat Societies: Why thinke you (quoth he) that this was a ravishment indeed, and plains force, and no retakee a substile device and strangeme, as it were of the young man himself, who hath wit at will, to colour and excuse himself, in that escaping out of the arms of his other lovers, he is fallen into the hands of a fair, young and wealthy Lady. Niver fay fo (quoth Anthemion) nor entertain fuch an opinion of Bacchon: for fay that he were not of a fimple nature (as he is) and plain in all his dealings, yet would he never have concealed fo much from me, confidering that he hath made me privy to all his secrets, and knoweth full well that in these matters, I was of all other most ready to second and set forward the fute of Ismenodora. But a hard matter it is to withstand, not anger, as Heraclitus saith, but love; for whatsoever it be that it would have, compass the same it will, though it be with the perill of life, though it cost both goods and reputation. For fetting this thing alide, was there ever in all our City, a woman more wife, fober and modell than I smentdora? when was there ever heard abroad of her, any evil report, and when went there to much as a light sufficion of any unhonest act out of that house? Cerees we must think and say, that she seems to have been surprised with some Divine instinct supernatural and above humane reason. Then laughed Pemprides: You say even true (quoth he) there is a certain great malady of the body, which thereupon they call facted : is there any marvell then that the greatest and most furious passion of the mind some do term sacred and divine? but it seems unto me that it sares with you here, as I saw it did sometimes with two neighbours in Egypt, who argued and debated one with another upon this point, that whereas there was presented before them in the way as they went, a serpent creeping on the ground, they were resolved both of them, that it presaged good, and was a lucky figne; but either of them took and challenged icto himfelf: for even fo when I fee that fome of youdraw Love into mens chambers, and others into womens Cabinets, as a Divine and fingular good thing, Inothing wonder thereat, confidering that this passion is grown to such power and is to highly honoured, that even those who ought to clip the wings thereof, and chase it trom them of all sides, those be they that magnific and extoll it most. And verily hitherto have I held my peace as touching this matter in question, for that I saw the Debate and Controversie was about a private cause rather than any publick matter: but now that I fee how Pifias is departed, I would gladly hear and know of you whereat they aimed and tended, who first affirmed that Love was a god? When Pemptides had propounded this queltion, as my father addressed himself and began to make his answer, there came another messenger in place, whom Ismenodora had sent from the City, for to bring Anthemion with him; for that the trouble and tumult in manner of a fedition grew more and more within the Town, by occasion that the two masters of the publick exercises, were at some difference one with another, whiles the one was of this mind that Backon was to be redemanded and delivered, the other again thought that they were to deal no farther in the matter. So Anthemion arose incontinently and went his way with all speed and diligence possible: and then my father calling to Pempides by name, and directing his speech unto him: You feem Pemptides (quoth he) in my conceit, to touch a very main and nice point, or rather indeed to flir a firing that would not be flirred, to wie the opinion and belief that we have, as touching the gods, in that you call for a reason and demonstration of them in particular For the ancient faith and belief received from our ancients in the Countrey where we are born is sufficient, than which there can not be faid or imagined a more evident Argument : For never was this knowledge found,

By wit of man or sense prosound.

But this Tradition being the Base and Foundation common to all Piety and Religion, if the certified and credit thereof received from hand to hand be shaken and moved in one onely point; it becomets suffected and doubtfull in all the rest. You have heard no doubt how Euripides was coursed and troubled for the beginning of his Tragedy Monalippe, in this manner.

Zd rap bisla whin eye, &c. Jupiter whose name I know By bear-say onely and no mo.

And verily he had a great confidence in this Tragedy, being as it should seem magnificently and with exquisite elegancy penned: but for the tumultuous murmusing of the people, he changed the foresaid verse, as now they stand written:

Zdi; as XiAsural the a'At Soias vai, &c.

God Jupiter (which name in verity

Dotb for full well to his Diviniy.)

And what difference is there by our words and disputation, between calling the opinion which we have of Jupiter and of Mercury into question, and making doubt of Gupid or Love? For it is not now of late, and never before, that this God begins to call for altert, or to challenge Sacrifices: neither is he a stranger come among us from some barbarous superstition, like as certain Atte and I wot not what Adonides and Adones; brought in by the means of some half-men or mungtell Hermophredites and od women; and chus being closely crept in, hath met with certain honours and worships far unmeet for him, in such fort, as he may well be accused of bastardice, and under a falle title to have been enrolled in the Catalogue of the gods: For my good friend, when you hear Empedocks saying thus,

And equal to the rest in length and breadth was Amity; But see in sp'rit thou it beheld, not with deceitfull eye.

you must understand him, that he writeth thus of Loves for that this God is not visible, but apprehended onely by opinion and belief, among other gods which are most ancient. Now if of all them in particular, you feek for a proof and demonstration, laying your hands upon each Temple, and making a sophificall triall by every Altar, you shall find nothing void and free from calumniation and envious stander: for not to go far off, mark but these Verses.

But Venuu unseh can I se
How great a goddesse she should be:
Of Cupid she the moder is,
And she alone that Love doth give Whyle children me (you wet well this)
Are all who on the agrid be live

And verily, Empedocles called her (wong), that is to fay, fertile or giving life: Sophocles, that is to fay, fruitfull, both of them using most fit and pertinent Attributes. Howbeit this great and admirable work, to wit generation, is wrought principally and directly by Verus, but collaterally and as an accessive by Love: which if Love be perfent, is pleasant and acceptable; contrariwsse if Love be away, and not allistant thereto, surely the act thereof remainest altogether not expellible, dishonourable, without grace and unamiable. For the Conjunction of man and woman without the affection of Love, like as hunger and thirst, which tend to nothing else but fateity and fulnesse, and the affection of Love, like as hunger and commendable: but the goddesse Verus putting away all coathforme satiety of pleasure, by the means of Love engendred Amity and Friendship, yet and semi-perature of two in one. And hereupon it is that Parmenides verily affirmeth Love to be the most ancient work of Verus, writing thus in his Rook intituled Cosmogenia, that is to say, the Creation of the world.

But Hissau's Gemeth in mine opinion more Physically to have made Love more ancient than any other what sover; to the end that all the rest by it might breed and take beginning. If then we bereave this Love of the due honours ordained for it, Cerces those which belong to Verna will not keep their place any longer. Neither can it be truly said that some men may wrong and reproach Love, and sorbear withall to do injury unto Venus. For even from one and the same stage we do hear these imputations, first upon Love.

Love idle is it felf, and in good troth Possesseth such like persons, given to sloth.

And then again upon Venus:

Venus (ny children) hath not this onely name Of Venus of Cypris: for the fame Anliwer right well to many an attributa, And furname which men unto ber impute. For hell she is: and also violence, The thing the state of the state

Like as of the other gods, there is not one almost, that can avoid the opprobrious tongue of unlettered rufficity and ignorance. For do but confider and observe god Mars, who as it were in a Caldean and Aftronomicall table standeth in a place diametrally opposite unto Love, mark I say, what great honours usen have yielded unto him, and contrartiwise what reprochfull terms they give him again.

Mars is stark blind and seeth not (fair dames) but like wild boar, By turning all things upside down, Worke mischief evermore.

Homer calleth him μασίσο , that is to fay, imbrued with blood and polluted with murders; likewife αλαστρίσαλος, that is to fay, variable and leaping from one fide to another. As for Chriftpus by commologizing and deriving this gods name, faftenth upon him a criminous accufacion, faying, that ger, for fo he is named, in Greek cometh of αναστρία, that is to fay to murder and defiroy: giving thereby eccasion unto some, to think that the faculty and power in us prone to war, fight, debate, quarrell, anger, and fell stomack, is called Δρεκ, that is to fay, Mars. Like as others also will fay, that concupicence in us, is termed Venus; our gift of speaking, Mercury; skill in arts and sciences, Musersa. See you not how deep a pit and downfall of Athelime and Impiety is ready to receive and swallow us up, in case we range and diffribute the gods according to the passions, powers, faculties and verues that be in vs?

If cit very well (quoth Pempiides:) but neither standeth it with Piety and Religion, to make godisto be passions; nor yet contrartwise, to believe that passions be gods. How think you then (quoth pay father) is Mars a god, or a passion of ours? Pempiides answered. That he thought him to be a god, ruling and ordering that part of our soul wherein is seated animosity, anger and manly courage. What Pempiides, cried out my father then, hath that curbulent, warring, overwhart and quatrelling part in us, a D.ity to be president over it, and shall this that breedth Amity, society and peace, be with out a D vine power to govern it? Is there indeed, a martiall and wallke god of arms, called thereupon fraism and Engalus; who bath the superintendence and presidence of mutuall murders, wherein men kill and be killed; of armour, weapons, arrows, darts, and other (hot of affaults and (caling walls, of facages, pillage and booties? And is there never a god, to be a witnefs, guide, directour and coldjutor of unptiall affection and martimonial love, which endeth in unity, concord and fellowship? There is a god of the woods and fortefts, named Agroters, who doth aid, affift, and encourage hunters, in chasing and crying after the roe-buck, the wild goat, the hare and the hart; and they who lie in fecret wait for to intercept wolves and bears in pitfalls, and to catch them with snares, make their prayers to drilleus.

Who first as I have heard men say, Did grinnes and snaves for wild beasts lay.

And Hercules when he bent his bow, and was ready to shoot at a bird, called upon another god: and as Echilus reportetly, Phoebus the hunter directed by and by, His arrow fir aight as it in air did flie.

And finall the man who hunteth after the first game in the world, even to catch friendship & amity, have no god nor demy-god, no angel to help, to savorise, and speed his enterprise and good endeavours? For mine own part, my friend Daphneus, I take not man to be a more base plant or viler tree, than is the past, the mulberry tree, or the vine which Homer honoureth with the name of Hemeris, considering that in his time and season be hath a powerfull instinct to bud and put forth most pleasantly, even the beauty both of body and mind. Then (quoth Daphneus) who ever was there, before God, that thoughe or said the contrary? Who? answered my sather: marry even all they verily, who being of opinions that the carefull industry of plowings lowing, and planting appertaineth unto the gods:

For certain Nymphs they bave hight Deiades Whose life they say, is equall with the trees.

And as Pindarus writeth,

God Bacchus who the pure resplendent light Of Autumne is, and with his hind instructed Doth nourish trees, and cause to grow upright, And srutissie at length in assume.

Yet for all this are not perswaded that the nouriture and growth of children, and young folk, who in their prime and flour of age, are framed and shaped to singular beauty and feature of Personage, betiner printe and from or egy, are named and mapes to migrate beauty and reactive or retronge, be-longeth to any of the gods or demy gods. Neither by their faying, any deity or dwine power, hath the care and charge of man, that as he groweth, he should shoot up streight, and arise directly to ver-tue; and that his naturall indument and generous ingenuity should be perverted, daunted and quelled, either for default of a carefull Tutour and directour, or through the lewd and corrupt behaviour of bad company about him. And verily were it not a shamefull indignity and ingratitude thus to fay? and in this behalf to drive God as it were from that bounty and benignity of his to mankind, which being diffused, spread, and dispersed over all, is desectious in no part, no not in those necessary actions and occasions, whereof some have their end more needfull I wis many times than lovely or beautifull to secto. As for example, even our very birth at first, is nothing fightly at all, nor pleasant, in regard of the blood and bitter pangs that do accompany it, yet hath the same a goddesse to be the President and overseer thereof, to wit Lucina, called thereupon Lochia and Illithia. Besides, better it were for a man never to have been born, than to become evil and naught, for want of a good governour and guardian. Moreover the Deity and Divine power, leave h not man destitute when he is fick, no, nor when he is dead : but some God there is or other, that hath an office or function even then, and is powerfull in those occasions: there is one, I fay, that helpeth to convey the fouls of such as have ended their life, from hence into another world, and to lay them in quiet repose, who for be-flowing and transporting of them in that fort is called Catunostes and Psychopompes according as he

The Shady night me never bare (The barps to Jound) a fine Musician: Nor Propher fecrets to declare: Ne yet in cures a good Physician: But for the Jouls of dead, below, In their due place, them to bestow.

And yet in these ministeries and functions, many odious troubles and encoembrances there be: whereas contrariwise there can be named no work more holy, no Exercise, game of price or prosession of maintenies, whatsoever, whereof it beseems a god better to have the dispose, presidence and oversight, than is the charge and regard, to order and rule the desires of lovers, affecting and pursuing beautifull persons in the sour and prime of their age: for herein there is nothing foul, nothing forced norby constraint: but that gentle personal attractive grace, which yielding in truth a pleassant and sweet labour, leadeth all travell whatsoever unto vertue and amity; which neither without a god can attain unto the defired end which is meet and convenient, nor hath any other god for the guide, master and conductor, than Love which is the companion of the Multer, Graces and Venus;

For Cupid fowing secretly, In heart of man a sweet defire, And heat of Love immediately By kindling mild and gentle fire. According as Menalippedes faith, tempereth the pleasantest things that be with those that are most fair and beautiful. How fay you Zeuxippus, is it not fo? Yes verily (quoth he) I am altegether of that mind: for to hold the contrary were very abfurd. Then (quoth my Father again) and were it not as monstrous, that whereas Amity hath four feveral kindes and branches, according as the ancient Philosophers have divided it: The first in nature, then that of propinquity and local affinity, the third of fociety, and the last this of love, every one of the rest should have a god to be the President and Governour thereof, to wit, furnamed either giail, or giris, or vuignes, and aureges, and this anorous amity only or love, as accurred, interdicted and excommunicate, be left without a Lord and Ruler? confidering that it requireth more care, solicitude and government than all the rest? It doth indeed (quoth Zeuxippus) and need it hath not of that which is strange, but proper and familiar, of the own.

Moreover (quo h my father) a man may here take hold by the way of Plato his opinion and do-Grine to this purpose ; to wit, that there is one kinde of fury transmitted from the body to the foul, proceeding from certain indispositions and malignant distemperatures of ill humours, or else occasioned by some hursful winde or pernicious spirit that passeth and entreth into it, and this sury is a sharp and dangerous disease. There is another not without some divine instinct : neither is it engendred at home and within us . but a strange inspiration it is, comming from without, a very alienation of reason, sense. and understanding, the begining and motion whereof artifeth from some better power and a certain divine puissince. And this passion in general is named Embricasmus, as one would say, a divine inspiration, for like as, in one, in Greek significant repletion with spirit or winde; And in see, that which is full of prudence and wit: Even fo, faith he, an agitation and shaking of the soul is called in Derice party the participation and fociety of some more heavenly and divine power. Now this Enthusiasme is subdivided : for one part thereof is Prophetical, and can skill of foretelling natural things, when one is inspired and poss-ssed by Apollo. A second is Bacchanal sent from Bacchus, whereof Sophocles speaketh in one place thus,

And see you dance. With Corybants.

For those furies of dame Cybele the mother of the gods, as also Panique terrors and frights, hold all of the Bacchanal facred ceremonies. The third proceedeth from the Mules, which meeting witha tender and delicate foul, not polluted with vice, flirreth up and raifeth a Poetical spirit, and Musical humour : as for that raging and Martial Enthusiasme (for Arinianius it is called) that furious inspiration breathing War, is well known to every man, for to proceed from god Mars; a fury wherein there is no grace, no musical sweetnesse, hindring the generation and nourishment of children, and inciting people to take armes. There remaineth one alienation more of the understanding, O Daphneus, and an extercy or transportation of mans spirit, and the same not obscure, nor quiet and calme : concerning which I would demand of Pemptides here,

What god is be, that shakes the Spear In hand, which doth fo fair fruit bear.

Even this ravishment of love, settled as well upon fair and good boir, as honest and sober dams; which is the hottest and most vehement transportation of the mind; for see you not that even the very fouldier and warriour himself, coming once to be surprised therewith, laid down his armes presently, fouldier and warning and caft off his warlike fury,

For then his fervants joy did make,

For then his fervants joy did make,

and himfelf having no more mind to Battel, fat fill looking upon others that fought. And as for these Bacchanal motions, these wanton skippings and frisks of the Corybants, they use to appeale and slay a by changing, only in dancing of the measures, the foot Trochaus into Spondaus; and in long, the Phrygian tune into the Dorique: femblably Pythia the Priestess of Apollo, being once come down from her three-footed fabrick, upon which the receiveth that incentive spirit of fury, remaineth quiet and in calme tranquillity: whereas the rage of love, after it hath once in good earnest caught a man, and fet him on fire, there is no musick in the world, no charm, no leni-ive fong, no change of place able to ftay it : for amorous persons when they be present, do love, if they be absent, do long; in the day time they follow after their sweet-hearts, by night they lie and watch at their doors ; falling and sober they call upon their fair Paramours, full and drunken, they fing and chant of them: neither are Poetical fansies and inventions, as one sometimes said for their lively and effectual expression, the dreams of persons waking; but rather this may be verified of lovers imaginatious, who device and talk with their loves absent, as if they were present, they falute, embrace, chide, and expossulate with them, as if they faw them in place : for it feemeth that our ordinary fight doth depaint other imagination with liquid and waterish colours, which quickly passe away, are gone and departed out of our minds: but the fanfies and visions of Lovers being imprinted in their cogitations by fire, or enamelled, leave in their memory lively images furely engraved, which move, live, breath, * xurixos, speak, remain and continue ever after; like as Cato the Roman faid, that the soul of the lover lifom: Ka- ved and dwelt in the foul of the loved : for that there is fettled fure in him the vifage, countenance, unes, that manners, nature, life, and actions of the person whom he loveth, by which being led and conducted, is Comical he quickly dispatcheth and cutteth off a long journey, as the * Cynicks are wont to say, finding a short, compendious and direct way unto unto vertue : for he passeth speedily from love to amity and triendship, being carried on end, by the favour of this God of Love, with the instinct of his affiction, as it were with winde and tide, with weather and water together : In fum : I say, that this Enthussasme or Ravishment of Lovers is not without some divine power, and that there is no othis endutation that govern it, than he whole feaft we folemnize, and unto whom we facrifice this very day : howbeit, for that we measure the greatnesse of a god by puissance especially and profit, according as among all humane goods, we hold Royalty and Vertue to be most divine, and do call them; it is time now to consider first and foremost, whether Love be inferiour to any other god in power? And verily Sophocles faith :

Venus in power doth much availe, To win a prise and to prevaile.

Great also is the puissance of Mars: and verily we see the power of all other gods to be after a for divided in these matters two waies, the one is alletive, and causeth us to love that which is beautiful and good ; the other is adversative, and maketh us to hate that which is foul and bad, which are that and good of the content of a content of the manufacture to hate that more than 1 nour and way, which are the first impressions, that from the beginning are engraven in our minds, according as Plato in one place of the political properties of the least. Let us now come to the point, and consider how the very act alone of Venus may be had for a groat or some such small piece of silver, neither was there ever man known to endure any great travel, or to expose himself to any danger, for the enjoying of such a fleshly pleasure, unlesse any great amorous withall and love fick. And to forbear here to name fuch curtifant as Physic and Lais were, we shall finde my good friend, that Gnathanium the harlot,

At lantern light in evening late, Waiting and calling for some mate. is many times passed by and neglected: but otherwhiles again, If once some sudden spirit move,

The raging fit of fervent love. it maketh a man to prize and efteem the aforefaid pleasure which erewhile he reckoned nothing worth, comparable in value to all the talents as they fay, of Tantalus treasure, and equal to his great Seignory and Dominion; so enervate is the delight of Venus, and so soon bringeth it lothsome satiety, in esseit be not inspired with the power of love: which we may see yet more evidently by this one argument; namely, that there be many men who will be content to part with others in this kinde of venereous pleasure, yea, and can finde in their hearts to profittute unto them nor only their Mistresses and Concubines, but also their own Espoused wives; as it is reported of that Galba or Cabbas a Roman, who, if I do not militake, invited Mecenas upon a time unto his houfe, and feafled him; where perceiving how from him to his wife there passed fame wanton nods and winkings, whileli bewrated that he had a mind and fansie to her, he gently rested his head upon a Pillow or Cushion, making semblance as though he would take a nap and fleep, while they dallied together: in the mean time when bante as though its works take a may animately white they controlled the Table for to fleal away fome of the Evants which were without fpying his time, came forthy to the Table for to fleal away fome of the Wine that flood there; avanut unhappy Knave (quoth Galba) being broad aways, and open eyed, knoweft thou not that I fleep onely for Mecenas fake? But peradventure this was not for flrange a matter, confidering that the faid Galba was no better than one of the buffons or pleafants that professe to make folk merry and to laugh. I will tell you therefore another example: At Argor there were two of the principal Citizens concurrents, and opposite one to the other in the Government of the City, the one was named Nicostratus, and the other Phaulius; now it fortuned upon a time that King Philip came to the Town: and commonly thought it was, that Phaulius plotted and practifed to attain unto some absolute principality and soveraignity in the City, by the means of his wife, who was a young and beautiful Lady, in case he could bring her once to the Kings bed, and that she might he with him. Nicoftratus finelling and perceiving as much, walked before Phaulius door and about his house for the nonce, to see what he would do: who indeed having shod his wife with a paire of high shoots, cast about her a Mantle or Mandilion, and withal fet upon her head a Chaplet or has after the Macedonian fashion, and dreffed her every way like unto one of the Kings Pages; sent her secretly in that habit and attire unto his lodging. Now confidering there hath been in times past and is at this present such a number of amorous persons and lovers, have you ever read or known that any one of them hath been the Bawd to profittute his own love, though he might thereby have gained Sovereign Majefty, and obrained the divine honours of Jupiter? I verily b leeve, no ; for why? there is not a person dare queech to contradict and oppose himself in Government of State against the actions of Princes and Tyrants? But on the other fide, corrivals they have and concurrents many in love, fuch a will not thick to beard them in the question of fair, youing and beautiful persons, whom they affect and fansie. For it is reported that Aristogiess the Atthenian, Antileon the Metapontine, and Menalippus of Agrigentum never contended nor contested with the Tyrants, for all they saw them to wast and ruinate the common-weale, yea, to commit many enormious outrages; but when they began once to folicite and tempt their Paramors and Lover, then they role up as it were in the defence of their facred Femples and Sanctuaries, then they stood against them even with the hazard and peril of their lives. It is faid, that King Alexander wrote unto Theodorns the brother of Protess in this wife: Convey unto me that Musical wench of thine, that fings to daintily, and receive for her ten takents, which I find by this bearer; let me have her, I fay, unless than thy felfe be in love with her. When Antipatrides another of his minions, came in a Marke on a time to his house, accompanied with a prety girle that plaied upon the Pfaltery, and fung passing well; Alexander taking great delight and contentment in the faid damosell, demanded of Antipatrides whether he were not himself enamoured of her. And when he answered, Yes verily, and exceeding much. A mischief on thee (quesh he) leud Varlet as thou are, and the Devill take thee: but the wench he abstained from, and would not formuch as touch her. But mark moreover and besides, of what power, even in Martiall sean of arms Love is 1.0ve 184y, which is not (as faith Euripides.

Of nature flow, dull, fickle, inconstant, Nor in soft cheeks of maidens resiant.

For a man that is possessed decreely in his heatt with Love, needeth not the assistance of Mars when he is to encounter with his enemies in the field; but having a god of his own within him, and presuming of his presence,

Most prest he is and resolute, to pass through fire and seas; The blast s of most tempestuous winds, he cares not to appease,

And all for his friends fake, and according as he commandeth him. And verily, of those Children, as well Sons as Daughters, of Lady Nieks, who in a Tragedy of Sophecles are represented to be show with arrowes, and so killed, one there was, who called for no other to help and succour her at the point of death, but only her Paramor, in this wise:

Oh that some God my love would send,

My life to fave and me defend. Ye all know, I am fure, do ye not how? and wherefore Chomachus the Theffalian died in Combat? Not I for my part (quoth Pemptides) but gladly would I hear and learn of you. And it is a flory (quoth my Father) worth the hearing and the knowledge. There came to aid the Chalcidians, at what time there was hot war in Theffalie against the Eretrians, this Cleomachus: now the Chalcidians seemed to be frong enough in their footmen, but much ado they had, and thought it was a difficult piece of fervice, to break the cavallerie of their enemies, and to repel them. So they requested Cleomachus their allie and confederate, a brave Knight, and of great courage, to give the first charge, and to enter upon the fist men of armes. With that, he asked the youth whom he loved most intirely, and who was there prefen whether he would behold this enterprife, and fee the conflict : and when the young man answered yea, and withall, kindly kiffing and embracing him, fet the helmet upon his head; Cleomachus much more hardly and fuller of spirit then before, affembled about him a troop of the most valorous horsemen of all the Thefidians, advanced forward right gallantly, and with great refolution fet upon the enuits, in such fort, as at the very first encounter he brake the front, difarrated the men of armes, and in the end put them to flight. Which discomfiture, when their Infanterie faw, they also fled : and so the Chalcidians woon the field, and atchieved a noble victory. Howbeit, Cleomachus himfelf was there flain, and the Chalcidians thew his sepulchre and monument in their Market place, upon which there standeth, even at this day, a mighty pillar srected. And whereas the Chalcidians before time held this rederafty or love of young Boyes an infamous thing, they of all other Greeks ever after aff. Ocd and honoured it most. But Aristotle writeth, that Cleomachus indeed lost his life after he had vanquished the Eretrians in battell: but as for him who was thus kiffed by his lover, he faith that he was of Chalcis in Thrace, sent for to aid those of Chalcis in Eubea: and hereupon it commeth that the Chalcidians useto chant fuch a Caroll as this:

Sweet Boies, fair Imps extrail from subherace, Enduced befides with youth and beauties grace, Enny not men of armes and hold conrage, Fraitien of your prime and flowring age: For here as well of Love and kinde affellion, As of proweffe, we all do make profission.

*Or initio- The lover was named Anton, and the boy whom he loved Philiftus, as Dionyfius the Poet writeth in his

And in our City of Thebes, O Pempiidss, did not one Ardetas give unto a youth whom he loved, a compleat armour, the day that he was inrolled fouldier, with the infeription of Ardetas his own name? And as for Pammenes an amourous man and one well experienced in love matters, he changed and altered the ordinance in battell of our footmen heavily armed, reproving Homer as one that had no skillage experience of Lovesfor ranging the Achazans by their tribes and wards, and not putting in array the lover close unto him whom he loveth: for this indeed had been the right ordinance, which Homer deferibeth in these words:

The Morians fet so close, and shield to shield. So joyntly touch'd that one the other keld

And this is the only battalion and army invincible. For men otherwhiles in danger abandon those of their tribe, their kindred also and such as be allied unto them: yea, and believe me they forsake their own Rahers and Children: but never was there enemy seen, that could past through, and make way of evasion between the lover and his darling, considering that such, many times, show their adventerous Resolution in an bravery, and how little restoning they make of life, unto them being in

in no diffreffe nor requiring fo much at their hands. Thus There the Theffalian laying and clapping his left hand to a wall, drew forth his fword with the right, and cut off his own thumbe, before one whom he loved, and challenged his corrival to do as much, if his heart would ferve him. Another chanced in fight to fall groveling upon his face, and when his enemy lifted up his fword to give him a mortal wound, he requested him to stay his hand a while until he could turn his body, that his friend, whom he loved, might not fee him wounded in his back part. And therefore we may fee, that not only the most martial and warlick Nations are most given to Love, to wit, the Becotians, Lacedemonians, and Candiors, but also divers renowmed Princes and Captaines, of old time : as namely, Meleager, Achilles Ariflomenes, Cimon, Epaminondas. And as for the last named, he had two young men whom he dearly loved, Aspicus and Zephiodorus, who also died with him in the field at Maninea, and was likewife interred necr unto him. And when Afopicus became hereupon more terrible unto his enemies, and most resolute, Euchnanus the Amphyslian, who first made head against him, resisted his fury, and smote him, had Heroique Honours done unto him by the Phocans. To come now linto Hercules ; hard it were to reckon and number his loves they were fo many : But among others, men honour and worthing to this day Iolaus, because they take him to have been Hercules his dearling, in so much as upon his Tombe the manner is of lovers to take a corporal oath and affurance of reciprocal Love. Moreover it is reported of Apollo, that being skilful in Phylick, he faved the life of Alceftis being desperately fick, for to gratifie Admetus, who as he loved her intirely being his wife, fo he was as tenderly beloved of him. For the Poets do fable, that Apollo, being inamoured, for pure Love,

> Did serve Admetus one whole year, As one that his bir'd servant were,

And here it falleth our, in some sort well, that we have made mention of Alessis: for albeis worthin have not ordinarily, much dealing with Mars, yet the ravishment and surious sits of Love driveth them otherwhiles to enterprise somewhat against their own nature, even to voluntary death: and if the poetical fables are of any credit, and may go current for truth, it is evident by such reports is go of * AP * For Alessis of Protessiaus, and Euridize the wise of Orpheus, that Pluto obeyeth no other god but only Love; essis was nor death what they command. And verily howsover in regard of others gods, as Sophecles saith, reported the cannot skill of equity.

He cannot skill of equity, of favour and of grace.
But only with him Justice straight, and rigour taketh place.

Yet he hath good respect and reverence to lovers, and to them alone he is not implicable nor inflexible. And therefore a good thing it is, my friend, I consessed, to them alone he is not implicable nor inflexible. And therefore a good thing it is, my friend, I consessed in Love, are in the other weight in better of the Eleusinian mysteries: but I see that the votaries protessed in Love, are in the other weight in bettering since fables of Poets, nor yet so backward as to distruct and discredit them all: for instance, which there is no backward as to distruct and discredit them all: for instance, which there were no backward as to distruct and discredit them all: for instance, we will not be a certain divine fortune and good hap they hit upon the truth, taying as they dog that none but lovers returne from hell unto this light again: but what way and how they wornot; as wanding indeed and missing of the right path, which Plato of all mish first by the meanes of Philosophy sound our and knew. And yet among the Egyptiants fables, therebe certain simal sender and obscure shadower of the truth, dispersed here an there. However, who by small tracks knoweth how to trace and sinds our great matters. And therefore let us pass: them over, who by small tracks knoweth how to trace and sinds our great matters. And therefore let us pass:

And now that I have discoursed of the force and puissance of Love being so great as it appeareth, I come now to examine and consider the bounty and liberality thereof to mankinde, not whether is confer many ben-fits upon them, who are acquainted with it, and make use thereof (for notable they be and well known to all men) but whether is bringeth more and greater estimated by the characteristic of the state of the discourse of the state of the Love teacheth Musick; marke when you will, Though one before thereof had no skill.

For he might as well have faid, that it maketh a man prudent and wittly, who before was dull and foolilis yea and valiant, as hath been faid, who before was a coward; like as they that by putting into fix burning pecces of wood, make them firme and firstlight, whice's they were before weak and tender; Semblably, every amorous person becometh liberal and magnificent, although he had been aforetime a pinching snudge; For this base avarice and michery waxeth for, and the little whom they love, than they do to take and receive of others. For ye all know well how Assignment who so the same person was and stated and gueste of his unto a sumpruous and stately scale in his house. Alcebiades came thinker in a Maske to make passine; and after he had taken with him one half of the silver copys that shood upon the boord before them, went his waies, which when the guests took not well, but said that the youth had behaved himself very proudly and malipertly toward him. Not so (quoth Anytus) for he hath dealt very courtecously with me, in that, when he might have gone away with all, he left thus much behind for me. Zenzwhite me, in that, whether the found in the foundation of the state of ridding quite out of my heart that hereditary harred derived and received from our Ancestours, which I have taken against Anyheart that hereditary harred derived and received from our Ancestours, which I have taken against Anyheart that hereditary harred derived and received from our Ancestours, which I have taken against Anyheart that hereditary harred derived and received from our Ancestours, which I have taken against Anyheart that hereditary harred derived and received from our Ancestours. tus, in the behalf of Socrates and Philosophy, in case he were so kinde and courteous in his Love. B. it fo (quoth my Father) but let us proceed: Love is of this nature, that it maketh men otherwise melancholick, auffere, and hard to be pleased or conversed withall, to become more sociable gentle, and pleafant: for as ye know well enough, and even fo, a man is more lightforme and jocund, when he is well warmed with the heat of Love. But the yulgar fort of men are in this point somewhat perversly affected and beside all reason; for if they fee a falling caleftiall light in an house by night, they take it to be force divine apparition, and wonder, thereast, but when they see a base, vile, and abject minds such replecished with Courage, Liberty, Magnificence, defire of Honour, with Grace, Favour, and Liberality, they are not forced to fay, as Telemachus did in Homer, Certes, some god, I know sull well, Is now within, and bere doth dwell.

And is not this also, quoth Daphnens, (tell me, I pray you, for the love of all the Graces) an effect of some divine cause? that a lover who regardeth not, but despiseth in a manner all other things, I say not his familiar friends onely, his fellowes and domesticall acquaincance, but the Lawes also and Magistrates, Kings and Princes; who is affraid of nothing, admireth, elleemeth, and observeth nothing; and is befides to hardy, as to prefent himfelf before the flathing that of piercing lightning, to foon as ever he efpieth his fair love,

Like to some Cock of cravain kinde less fall, Or bangs the wing, and daunted is withall,

He droups I say, his Courage is cooled, his heart is done, and all his animolity quailed quite. And here It were not impertinent to the purpose, to make mention of Sappho among the Muses. The Romans write in their history, that Cacus the Son of Vulcane breathed and flashed flames of fire from his mouth. And in truth the words that Sapphouttereth, be mixed with fire, and by her verses testifieth the ardent and flaming heat of her heart, as Philoxenus writteh. But Daphneus, unleffe peadventure the Love of Lyfandra have made you to forget your old foorts and delights wherewith you were wont to passe the time away, call to mind (1 torget your old toors and delignes where with you were wont to pane the time away, call to mind the befeech you) and rehearfe unto us those (were vertes of faire Sappho, wherein the faith, that which I Love came in her fight, file loft her voice prefently, and was speechless, her body ran all over into cold fewers, she became pale and wan, she fell a trembling and quaking, her braines turned round, surpried the was with dizainesse, and sell into a fainting sit of two writes.

Thrice bappy do I hold that wight, Who may eftsomes enjoy thy sight, Of thy fweet voice to reap delight, And pleasant smiles:

Which kindle in me such a fire, That, as I them do much admire, My beart they Ravish, and desire Transport the whiles.

And thus full wan I do remain As flower in house that long bath laine, Or graffe in field, which wanting raine, Doth quickly fade :

Until at length in extasse, Withouten sense and breath I lie ; As if death of me suddenly Surprize had made.

When Daphneus had recited this fonnet: Is not this (quoth my father, in the name of Jupiter I befeech you) a plain possession of the mind by some heavenly power; is not this (I say) an evident motion, and a very celestial ravishment of the spirit? What furious passion was there ever so great and strong, that came upon the Prophetesse Pythia, when she mounted that three-footed fabrick, from whence she delicame upon that properties plants, when the mounted that three-modes harden, from whence he centered Oracles? Who ever was there so far transported and carried beside himself by the Pipes and Flutes of sanatical persons supposed to be surprized by some divine spirit of sury, by the Tabour and other strange ceremonies in the service of Cybele the Mother of the gods? Many there be, that hold the same body, and look upon the same beauty; but the amorous person only is caught and ravished therewith. What should be the reason of is ? Certes, there is some cause thereof ? Verily, when Menander sheweth it unto us, yet we learn it not, nor understand his meaning by these verses :

There is a malady of the minds That it surpriseth fatally : Who smitten is therewith, doth finde Himself fore wounded inwardly.

And hereof is god Love the cause, who toucheth one, and spareth another. But that which ought indeed to have been spoken rather at the first,

Since now it comes into my mind, And way out of my mouth would finde, as Æfebylas faith, I think not good to overpaffe in filmes, being a matter of fo great importance. For of all things else (my good friend) in a manner, whereof we take knowledge, not by the ministry of the five natural senses, some there be, that came into credit (at the beginning) and authority, by fables others, by lawes, and the reft, by doctrine and difcourfe of reason. Now the constant beliefe and full perswafton of the gods, the first Masters, Teachers and Authors altogether thereof, were Poets, Lawgivers, and in a third ranke, Philosophers, who all with one accord joyntly did fer this down as a verity, that Gods there be: howbeit, they are at great difcord and variance, touching the number, order, nature, effence and power of them. For those whom the Philosophers acknowledge to be gods, are not subject to discases, nor to age, neither know they what it is to feel pain or endure travel:

Escape they do the passage of the firth,

Of voaring Acheron, and live mjoy and mirth.

And in that regard Philosophers admit not at all the Poetical Egists and Arrely, that is to fay, contentione and reconditations: they will not allow Asips; and selses, to be gods, nor confesse them be the Sons of Mars: and in many points do they differ also and different from Lawgivers; as Xemphanes did, who faid unto the Egyptians as touching Ofiris: If you take him for a mortal man, adore him not; if you account him an immortal god, lament not for him. Again, the Poets and Lawgivers on the other fide, deign not, nor will abide so much as to hear those Philosophers who of certain Idees, numbers, unities, and spirits, make gods; neither can they possibly conceive and understand such doctrin. In fum, much variety there is and diffonance in their opinions, about this one point: but like as in old time there were three S: As or Factions in Athens, all adverse, opposite and malicious one unto the other, to wit, of the Paralli, the Epacrii, and Pædiæi : yet notwithstanding, when they were affembled and met together in a general Council, they gave all their voices and suffrages to Solon, and elected him with one common affent their Peace-maker, their Governour, and Lawgiver, as one worthy, without any question or doubt at all, to have conferred upon him the Principality and highest degree of Vertue and Honour : even fo those three seets differing in opinion about the gods, and giving their voices fome on this fide, and others on that, and not willing to subscribe one unto another, nor easily receiving that which is otherwise delivered than by themselves, be all of one and the same mind as touching this one god Love; and him the most excellent Poets, the best Lawgivers, and the Principal Philosophers, admit with one voice into the Register and Kalender of the gods, praising and extolling him highly in all their writings. And like as Alcens faith, that all the Mitylenzans with one accord and general confent, chose Pittacus for their Soveraigne Prince and Tyrant; even so Hesiedus, Flato, and Solon, bring and conduct Love out of Helicon, into the Academy unto us, for our King, Prince, and President, crowned and adorned gaily with Garlands and Chaplets of flowers, honoured alfo, and accompanied with many shackles and couples professing amity and mutual society: not such 3 Euripides faith :

With fetters bound and tied was, Far stronger than of iron and braffe.

Linking them by a cold, heavy, and massie chain of need and necessity, as a colourable veil and pretence to shame and turpitude; but such as are carried by winged Chariots unto the most goodly and beautiful things in the world, whereof others have treated better and more at large. When my father had thus faid: See you not (quoth Sociarus) how being fallen now again, the second time into one and the same matter, you forced your self to turn away from it, I wot not how, avoiding to enter into this holy discourse, and (if I may be so bold to say what I think) shifting offunjustly so pay the debt, which you have promited us? for having ere while by the way, and against your will made Come little mention of the Egyptians and of Plato; you paffed them over then, and even fo do you at this present : as for that which Flare hath written, or rather these Muses here have by him delivered, I know well you will say nothing thereof; although we should request and pray you to do it ; but for that you have coverely fignified thus much, that the Mythology or tables of the Egyptians accord sufficiently with the doctrine of the Platonicks concerning Love: it were against all reason that you should resule to discover, reveale, and declare it unto us: and content will we be, in case we may hear but a little of fuch great and important matters. Now when the rest of the company instantly intreated likewise; my father began again and faid: That the Egyptians, like as the Greeks, acknowledge two kindes of Love, the one Vulgar, the other Celeftial : they believe also that there is a third beside, to wit, the Sun; and Venus above all they have in great admiration; as for us we fee a great affinity and refemblance between Love and the Sun; for neither of them both is (as some do imagine) a material fire, but the heat of the one and the other is milde and generative; for that which proceedeth from the Sun, giveth unto bodies nouriture, light, and deliverance from cold Winter; that which cometh from the other worketh the same effects in souls: and as the Sun between two clouds, and after a foggy mist breaketh forth most ardent : even so Love after anger, fallings out, and fits of jealousie ; upon attonement and reconciliation made between Lovers, is more pleasant and servent : and look what conceit some have of the Sun, that it is kindled and quenched alternatively, namely, that every Evening it goeth out, and every Morning is lighted again: the same they have of Love, as being mortal, corruptible, and not permanent in one cflate : moreover, that habit or conflicution of the body which is not exercised and inured to endure both cold and hear, cannot abide the Sun; no more can that nature of the foul which is not well nurtured and liberally taught, be able to brook Love, without some pain and trouble; but both the one and the other is transported out of order, yea and indisposed or diseased alike, laying the weight upon the force and power of Love, and not upon their own impuissance and weaknesse this only feemeth to be the difference between them; that the Sun exhibiteth and sheweth unto those upon the earth who have their eye fight, things beautiful and foul indifferently; whereas Love is the light that representeth fair things only, causing lovers to be lookers of such alone, and to turn toward them; but contrariwise to make none account of all others. Furthermore, they that attribute the name of Venus to the Earth, are induced thereto by no similitude nor proportion at all; for that Venus is divine and Celestial, but the region wherein there is a mixture of mortal with immortal, is of it self feeble, dark, and shady, when the Sun shineth not upon it; like as Venus, when love is not assistant unto it; and therefore more credible it is, that the Moon should resemble Venus, and the Sun Love, rather than any other god; yet are not they therefore all one, because the body is not the same that the soul is, but divers; like as the Sun is sensible and visible; but Love spiritual and intelligible: and if this would not feem a speech somwhat harsh, a man might say, that the Sun doth clean contrary unto Love, for that it, diverteth our understanding from the speculation of things intelligible, unto the beholding of objects sensible, in abusing and deceiving it by the pleasure and brightnesses of the fight, perswading it to seek in it, and about it, as all other things, so truth it felf, and nothing else where, being ravished with the Love thereof,

For that we fee it shine so fair Upon the earth, amid the air, according as Euripides faith, and that for want of knowledge and experience of another life, or rather by reason of forgetulness of those things which Love reduceth into our memory. For like as when we awake in some great and resplendent light, all nightly visions and appartitions smalishaway and depart, which our soul saw during sleep: even so it seemeth that the Sun doth assonish awalish and depart, which our soul saw during sleep: even so it seemeth that the Sun doth assonish the remembrance of such things as here happen and chance in this life is yea, and to bewitch, charm, and enchant our understanding, by reason of pleasure and admiration, so as its forgetteth what it knew in the former list: and verily there is the true and real substance of those things; but here apparitions only, by which our soul in sleep admireth, and embraceth that which is most beautiful, divine, and wonderful: but as the Poet slatith.

About the same are vaine illusions, Dreams manifold, and soolish visions.

And so the mind is perswaded that all things here be goodly and precious, unless halp by good adventure it meet with some divine, honesh, and chall Love so no be her Physitian and favior; which passing from the other World by things corporal, may condust and bring it to the truth, and to the pleasant fields thereof, wherein is seated and lodged, the persest, pure, and natural beauty, nor sophilitizate with any mixture of that which is countersit and sale; where they desire to embraceone another, and to commune together as good friends, that of long time have had no interview nor entercourse, affisted alwaies by Love, as by a Sexiain, who leadeth by the hand those that are prosested in some religion, shewing unso them all the holy reliques and facred ceremonies one after another. Now when they be sent hither again, the soul by it self cannot come neer and approach thereto, but by the Organ of the body: and like as, because young children of themselves are not able to comprehend intelligible things; therefore Geometricians put into their hands visible and palpable formes, of a substance incorporal and impassible, to wit; the representations of Sphears, Cubes, or Square bodies, as also those that be Dodecaedra, that is to say, having twelve equal faces: even to the Clessial Love doth present and shew unto us, fair mixrours to behold therein beautiful things, howbeit mortal, thereby to admire such as be heavenly and divine; sensible objects, for to imagine thereby those that be spiritual and intelligible. These be the several favours and beauties, fair colours, pleasant hapes, proportions and features of young persons in the flour of their age; which shining and glictring as they do, gently excite and ftir up our memory, which by little and little at the first is enflamed thereby : whereby it cometh to paffe that some through the folly of their friends and kinesolk. endeavouring to extinguish this affection and passion of the mind, by force, and without reason, have enjoyed no benefit thereof, but either filled themfelves with trouble and fmoke, or elfe running with their heads forwards, into beaftly and filthy pleasures, pined away and were consumed. But such as by wife and diferent discourse of reason, accompanied with honest and shamefast modelty, have taken from Love the burning furious and firy heat thereof, and left behinde in the foul a fpendour and lights together with a moderate heat (and not a boiling agitation thereof, flirring, as one faid, a flippery motion of the feed, when as the Atomes of Epicurus by reason of their smoothnesse and tickling are driven together) which causeth a certain dilatation, wonderful generative, like as in a Plant or Tree, which putteth forth leaves, blossomes, and fruit; for that she receiveth nutriment, because the pores and passages of docility, obedience, and facility to be perswaded by entertaining gently good admonitions and remonstrances be open, such I say within a small time pierce farther, and passe beyond the bodies of those whom they Love, entring as far as into their fouls, and touch their towardnesses. their conditions and manners, reclaiming their eyes from beholding the body, and converting together by the communication of good discourses, behold one another by that means; provided alwaics than they have some mark and token of true beauty imprinted within their understanding; which if they cannot finde, they for fake them, and turn their Love unto others, after the manner of Bees, which leave many green leaves and fair floures, because they can gather out of them no honey; but look when they meet with any trace, any influence, or femblance of divine beauty smiling upon them, then being rawithed with delight and admiration, and drawing it unto them, they take joy and contentment in that which is truely amiable, expetible, and to be embraced of all men-

Their is that Poets feem to write the most part of that which they deliver as touching this god of Lore, by way of meriment, and they sing of him as it were in a Makk; and little do they speak in good small touching the very truth, whether it be upon judgement and reason, or some divine inflined and inspiration: as for example among other things, that which they give outconcerning the generation of this god, in this manner:

Dame Icis with fair winged shoes, and golden yellowhair, Conceived by Sir Zephyrus, the mightiest goddid bear.

Unleffe it be so that you also are perswaded by the Grammarians, who hold that this fable was devised to expresse the variety and gay diversity, as it were of fundry colours represented in this passion of Love. For, what else should it respect (quoth Daphneus) Liften then faid my father, and I will tell you. Forced we are, by manifest evidence to believe, that when we behold the Rain-bow, it is nothing elebut a reflexion of raics and beames, which our eyes suffer, when our light falling upon a cloud somwhat moist but even and smooth withall, and of an indifferent and mean * thicknesse, meeteth with the Sun beames, and by way of repercussion seeth the radiant raise thereof, and the shining light about it, and so imprinteth in our mind this opinion, that such an apparition indeed is settled upon the cloud. And even such is the Sophistical device and subtile invention of love, that in the generous and toward minds of gentle lovers, it caufeth a certain reflexion of memory, from beauties appearing bere, and so called, in regard of that divine, lovely indeed, bleffed and admirable beauty. Howbeit the common fort, purfuing and apprehending the image only thereof, expressed in fair persons, as well boics as young damosels, as it were in mirrours, can reap no fruit more certain and affured than a litdepleafure mingled with pain among; which is nothing else as it seemeth, but the errour and wandring dizineffe or conceit of most folk, who in clouds and shadows seek and hunt after the contentment of their luft and defire: much like unto young children who think to catch the Rainbow in their hands, being drawn and allured thereto by the deceitful shew presented to their eyes. Whereas the truelover indeed, who is honest and chast, doth far otherwise: for he lifteth up his defire from thence, ma divine, spiritual and intelligible beauty: and whensoever he meeteth with the beauty of a visible body, he useth it as the instrument only of his memory, he imbraceth and loveth it : by conversing also with it joyfully, and with contentment, his understanding is more and more inflamed. Such amorous persons as these, whiles they hant these bodies here, neither rest so sitting still, in a desire and admiration of this clear beauty : nor when they are come thither after their death, return they hither again a fugitives, for to hover and keep about the doors, chambers and cabinets of young married wives, which are nothing else but vaine dreams and illusions appearing to sensual men and women given overmuch to voluptuous pleasures of the body, and such as untruly be called lovers. For he, who in tuth is amorous, and is thither come where true beauties are, and converseth with them, as much as it is possible and lawful for a man to do, is winged anon, mounteth up on high, he is purified and functified, continually abiding resident above, dancing, walking and disporting alwaies about his od, untill he come back again into the green and fair Meaddows of the Moon and of Venus, where, being laid a sleep, he beginneth to receive regeneration and new nativity. But this is an higher point and deeper matter, than we have undertaken at this prefent to discourse upon. To return therefore unto our Love, this property also it hath, like as all other gods, according to Euripides,

To take great joy and much content, When men with bonours him prefent.

And contrawife, he is no leffe displeased, when abuse or contempt is offered unto him. For most kinde and gracious he is unto them that receive and entertain him courteously: and again as curft and threwd to those who shew themselves stiff-necked and contumacious unto him. For neither Jupiter furnamed Hospitall, is so ready to chastise and punish wrongs done unto guests and suppliants, nor Tupiter Genitall fo forward to profecute and accomplish the Curses and Executions of Parents, as Love quickly heareth the praices of those Lovers who are unthankfully required by their Loves, being the punisher of Proud, rude, and uncivill persons. For what should one speak of Euchcyntus Lencomantis, her Imean, who even at this day is called in Cypres, Paracyptusa? And peradventure you have not heard of the punishment of Gorgo in Candia, who was ferved much after the manner of the faid Paracyptufa, fave onely that the was turned into a flone, when the would needs look out at a window, and put forth her body to fee the Corps of her Lover interred. But of this Gorgo there was fometime one enamoured. whose name was Afander, a young Gentleman, honest, and of good Parentage descended, who having been before time of worshipfull and wealthy Estate, was decayed much, and brought to poverty: howbeit his mind abated not fo withall, that he thought himfelf unworthy of the best fortune that might be. Whereupon he fued unto this Gorgo a Kinswoman of his, by way of Marriage, notwithstanding that for her goods and riches the was much fought unto and woord by many others: and albeit he had divers great and wealthy competitors and corrivals, yet he had wrought and gained all the guardians, tutors and nearest kinsfolk of the Damosell to second hisfute.

Moreover those things which are named to be the causes that ingender Love, be not proper and peculiar to the one fex or to the other, but common to them both. For those Images which from without periors and enter into amount as persons, according to the Epicureans opinion, running to and fro, dispring and tickling the mass of the whole body, gliding and flowing into the genetall feed, by certain other dispositions of the atomes, it cannot be that they should so do from young Boyes, and impossible altogether from Women; unlessed also these fair and facred recordations we call and refer unto that divine, true and celestial beauty, according to the Platoniques, by the meanes of which rememorations, as with wings, the foul is mounted and carryed up. What should hinder then, but that such recordations may pass as well from young Boies as Damosels or Women? Especially when as we see a good nature, chast and bonest, appear joynely in the flower of favour and beauty, like as, according to Arijboth, a streight and well-fashioned shoe, showeth the good form and proportion of the source which is as much to say, as when under beautifull faces, and in near and fair bodies, they, who are skilfull in the knowledge and judgement of such things, perceive the clear and evident traces of a sincere mind not corrupt nor counterful. For it is no reason that a voluptuous person being demanded this question.

For wanton Love how stands thy mind?
To males more, or to semale kind?

and answering,

Both hands are right with me where heanty is, Neither of twain to me can come amisse,

Should feem to have made fit and pertinent answer according to his own carnall concupiscence: and that an honest and generous person should not direct his affictions to the beautifull and toward difference of a such as the position of a youths nature, but to the naturall parts that make difference of sex. Certes he that loveth horses and is skillfull in good horsemanship, will love no less the generosity and swiftness: of the horse good Doggs and Hounds of the male kind, but also keepth the braches and bitches of Candie and Laconia. And shall he who loveth the beauty and sweet favour of mankind, not be indifferently affected both to the one sex and to the other, but make a difference; as in divers garments, between the love of Men and Women? And verily Men say, that B: auty is the flower and blossome of versue. Now to say, that the seminine sex doth not flower at all, nor show any appearance and token of a good and towardly disposition to versue, were very absurd: for Eschiss went to the purpose, when he wrote the Sverse.

A Damfell young, if the have known and tasted man once carnally, Her eye doth it bewray anon, it sparkles sire suspiciously.

Go to then: are there evident markes and fignes to be feen upon the visages of Women, to tellifis a malapart, bold, wanton, and corrupt nature; and contrariwis, shall there be no light shining in their faces, to give testimony of their modesty and pudicity? Or rather, shall there be divers demonstrative evidences in many of them, but yet such as will not fit up and provoke any person to love them? Surely it is neither so nor so, there is no truth nor probability in any of them both; but every thing is compon indifferently, as well in the one sex as the other, as we have shewed.

Here also there is another want in the originall.

O Daphneus, let us impugn and confute those reasons, whereuppon Zeuxippus erewhile discoursed, Supposing that Love is all one with Concupiscence, which is disordinate, and leadeth the Soul into all loofnesse and dissolution. And yet I do not think, that he is so perswaded indeed, and of that helief; but for that he hath heard oftentimes odious persons, and such as have no lovelinesse in them. foto fay: of whom, fome hold under their hands, and have at command, poor filly Women, whom they have gotten for some petty dowries sake, and whom together with their monies they put to the they have goten managing of domesticall affaires, and to make bale, vile, and mechanicall actomis, quarrelling and brawling with them every day; and others again, having more mind and defire to get Children, than to love choused Wives, like unto Grashoppers, which cast their feed upon Squills, sea Onyons, or, such like herbs, having dischaged their lust in all the haste upon any body that first comes in their way, and reaped the fruit only that they sought for, bid Marriage savewell, and make no farther accounts of their wedded Wives, or if they tarry and stay with them still, they regard them no more than their old shoes, making no count either to love them, or to be loved reciprocally of them. And verily, inter and eisyes, which fignifie, to love and to be loved again dearly, which differ but in one letter from the verb stren, that is to fay, to contain and hold together, feem unto me at the first fight, directly not more and first a mutuall benevolence, by long time and acquaintance tempered with a kind of needing. But look what person sover love settleth upon in Marriage, so as he be inspired once therewith; at the very first, like as it is in Platoes Common wealth, he will not have these words in his mouth, Mine and Thine: for simply all goods are not common among all friends, but those only who being severed apart in body, conjoyn and colliquate, as it were persores, their Souls together, neither willing nor beleeving that they should be twain but one : and afterwards by true pudicity and reverence one unto the other, whereof Wedlock hath most need. As for that which cometh from without, carying with it more force of Law, than voluntary obsequence and reciprocall duty, and that in regard of fear and fhame,

A piece of work, that needs the guide, Of many bits and belmes befide, required alwaies to have ready at hand a careful regard among those that are coupled in Matrinony? whereas in true Love there is so much Continency, Modesty, Loyalty, and Faithfulnesse, that although otherwhile it touch a wanton and laselvious mind, yet it diverteth it from other Lovers, and by cuting off all mallapart boldnesse; by taking down and debasing incolent Pride and untaught Stubburnesse, it is altered to lite thereof, modet bashfulness; filtened and taciturnity; it adornesh it with deemt gesture, and seemly countenance, making it for ever after obedient to one lover only. Yee have heard (I am sure) of that samous and renowned Courtisan Lais; who was courted and sought must by so many Lovers, and yee know well, how the instanced and set on fire all Greeze with the Love and longing desire after her; or to say more truly, how two seas strave about her? how after that the Love of Hippoleochus the Thessalian had seised upon her, she quit and abandoneth the Mount Acresorin bus,

Seated upon the river fide, Which with great waves by it did glide;

as one writeth of it; and flying fecrely from a great Army as it were of other Lovers, file retried her fidright decently within Magalopolis unto him; where other women upon very fright, enzy, and jaloufie, integrad of her furpalling beautys drew her into the Temple of Venus, and stoned her to death; whereupon it came, as it should seem; that even at this day they call the faid Temple. The Temple of Venus the Murderess. We our selves have known divers young Maidens, by condition nobetter than slaves, whonever would yield to lie with their Master; as also sundry private persons of mean degree, who resured, yea, and dissained the company of Queens, when their heatts were once possified with other Love, which as a Mistress had the absolute command thereos. For like as a Rome, when there was a Lord Dictatour once chosen, all other Officers of Seate and Magarates veiled bonet, were presently deposed, and layed down their ensignes of authority; even so those, over whom Love bath gotten the Mastery and rule, incontinently are quit, freed and delivered from all other Lords and Rulers, no otherwise than such as are devoted to the service of some refliction place. And in truth, an honest and vertuous Dame, linked once unto her lawfull spouse by unstigned Love, will sooner abide to be clipped, classed and embraced by any Wolves and Dragom, than the controctation and bedsellowship of any other man whatsoever but her own Husband. And albeit there Kkk k 3

* our or professed Associates in one idance, with this god Love; yet it were not well done to passe over in haply our filence the accidents which befell unto Camma the Galatian Lady. This young Dame being of incomparable Beauty, was married unto a Tetrarch or great Lord of that Countrey named Sinnatus; howbeit one Sinorix the mightiest man of all the Galatians was enamoured upon her; but feeing that he could not prevail with the woman neither by force and perswasion, so long as her Husband lived, he made no more ado, but murdred him. Camma then having no other Reluge for her publicity, nor comfort and eafement of her hearts grief, made choice of the Temple of Diana, where the became a Religious Votary, according to the Cuftome of that Countrey. And verily, the most part of her reing the befrowed in the worling of that goddeffe, and would not admit speech with any futers, many though they were, and those great Personages, who sought her Marriage; But when Simeric had made means very boldly to ask her the Cuestion, and to solicit; her about that points, the semend not to reject his motion, nor to exposulate and be offended for any thing path, as if for pure Love of her, and ardent Affection, and upon no wicked and malicious mind unto Sinnatus, he had been induced to do that which he did: and therefore Sinorix came confidently to treat with her, and demand marriage of her : the alfo for her part came toward the mankindly, gave him her hand, and brought him to the Altar of the faid goddeffe, where after the had made an offering unto Diana, by pouring forth some little of a certain drink made of wine and honey, as it should seem empoysoned, which she had put into a Cup, the began unto Sinarix, and drank up the one half of it, giving the reft unto the faid Galatian for to pledge her. Now when the faw that he had drunk it all off, the fetched a grievous grone, and brake forth aloud into this speech, naming withall her Husband that dead was: My most loving and dear Spouse (quoth she) I have lived thus long without thee in great fortow and heavinesse expe-Ging this day; but now receive me joyfully (Geeing it is my good hap to be revenged for thy death upon this most wicked and ungratious wretch) as one most glad to have lived once with thee, and to dye now with him. As for Sinorix, he was carried away thence in a Litter, and died foon after; but Camma having furvived him a day, and a night, died by report most resolutely, and with exceeding joy of spirit. Considering then, that there be many such like examples, as well among us here in Greece, as the Barbarians, who is able to endure those that reproach and revile Venus, as if being affociate and affiftant to Love, the should hinder Amity? whereas contrariwife, the company of male with male, a man may rather term intemperance and disordinate lasciviousnesse, crying out upon it in this manner.

Groffe wantonneffe or filthy luft it is, Not V cnus fair that worketh this.

And therefore such filths and baggages as take delight to suffer themselves voluntarily thus to be abused against nature, we reckon to be the most flagitious persons in the world ; no man reposeth in them aby truff, no man doth them any jot of honour and reverence, nor vouchfafeth them worthy of the least part of friendship: but in very truth, according to Sophecles,

Such friends as these, men are full glad and joy when they be gone: But whiles they have them wish and pray. that they were rid anon.

As for those who being by nature level and naugh, have been circumvented in their youth, and forced to yield themselves and to abide this villany and abuse, all their life after abhor the fight of sucked wantons, and deadly hate them, who have been thus disposed to draw them to this wickedneffe; yea and ready they are to be revenged, and to pay them home at one time or other, when loever means and opportunity is offered: for upon this occasion Gratenas killed Archelaus, whom in his flower of youth he had thus spoiled: as also Pytholaus slew Alexander the Tyrant of Phere. And Periander the Tyrant of: Ambracia demanded upon a time of the boy whom he kept, whether he werenot yet with child; which indignity the youth took to to the heart, that he flew him outright in the place: whereas with women, and those especially, that be espoused and wedded wives, these be the earnest pennics as it were, and beginnings of Amiry, yea, and the very Obligation and Society of the most facred and holiest Ceremonies. As for fleshly pleasure it self, the least thing it is of all other: but the mutuall Honour, Grace, Dilection and Fidelity that springeth and ariseth from it daily, is highly to be reckoned and accounted of: and therefore neither can the Delphians be noted for folly, in that they term Venus sepa, that is to fay, a Chariot; by reason of this yoke-sellowship: not Homer, in calling this Conjunction of man and wife, sinorns, that is to fay, Amity and Friendship. Solon likewise is deemed by this, to have been an excellent Lawgiver, and most expert in that which concerneth marriage; when he decreed expressly that the Husband should thrice in a moneth at the least embrace his wife, and company in bed with her; not for carnall pleasures sake (I assure you) but like as Cities and States use, after a certain time between, to renew their Leagues and Consederacies ons with another, To he would have that the alliance of marriage should effloors be entertained anew by such solace and delectation after jarres, which other whiles arife and breed by some bone cast between. Yea, but there be many thormous and furious parts, will fome one fay, that are played by such as are in Love with women. And be there not more (1 pray) by those that are enamoused upon boyes? do but mark him who uttereth thefe passionate words :

So often as these eyes of mine behold That beardlesse youth, that smooth and lovely boy, I faint and falls then wish I him to bold Within mine arms, and fo to dy with joy: And that on Tomb were fet where I do lie, An Epigram mine end to testifie.

But as there is a furious Passion of some men doting upon women, so there is as raging an affection in others, toward boyes, but neither the one nor the other is Love. Well, most absurd it were to fav that women are not endued with other vertues: for what need we to speak of their Temperance and Chastiry, of their Prudence, Fidelity and Justice, considering that even Fortitude it self, constant Confidence and Refolution, yea, and Magnanimity, is in many of them very evident? Now to hold that being by nature not indisposed unto other vertues, they are untoward for Amity onely and Friendship (which is an Imputation laid upon them) is altotgether beside all Reason. For well known it is, that they be loving to their Children and Husbands: and this their naturall affiction. is like unto a fertile field or battell foil, capable of Amity, not unapt for perswasion, nor deftitute of the Graces. And like as Poefic having fitted unto speech Song, Meeter and Rhime, as pleasant Spices to aromatize and season the same, by means whereof that profitable instruction which is yieldeth, is more attractive and effectuall, as also the danger therein more inevitable: Even so nature, having endued a woman, with an amiable cast and aspect of the eye, with sweet speech, and a heautifull Countenance; hath given unto her great means, if the be lascivious and wanton, with her pleasure to deceive a man, and if sae be chast and honest, to gain the good will and favour of ber Husband. Plato gave Counsell unto Xenocrates an excellent Philiopher, and a worthy Personage otherwise, howbeit in his behaviour exceeding sour and austere, to facrifise unto the Graces: and even so, a man might advise a good Matron and sober Dame, to offer Sacrifice unto Love, for his Propitious favour unto Marriage, and his Residence with her, and that her Husband, by her kind, loving demeanour unto him, may keep home, and not feek abroad to fome other, and so be forced in the end to break out into fuch Speeches as thefe, out of the Comodie :

> Wretch that I am, and man unhappy I, So good a Wife to quit with injury

For in Wedlock, to love, is a better and greater thing by far, than to be loved; for it keepeth folk from falling into many faults and flips, or to fay more truly, it averteth them from all those inconveniences, which may corrupt, marre, and ruinate a Marriage: as for those passionate affections, which in the beginning of Matrimoniall Love move fits, somewhat poinant and biting, let me entreat you (good friend Zeuxippus) not to kar, for any exulceration or fmart itch that they have, although to fay a truth, it were no great harm, if haply by fome little wound, you may come to be incoporate and united to an honest woman; like as trees, that by incision are engraffed and grow one within another: for when all is faid, is not the beginning of Conception a kind of expectation? neither can there be a mixture of two things in one, unleffe they mutually fuffer one of the other, and be reciprocally aff-ced. And verily, the Mathematicall Rudiments which Children be taught, at the beginning trouble them, even as Philosopie at the first is harsh unto young men: But like as this unpleasantness: continueth not alwayes with them, no more dorn that mordacity stick still among Lovers. And it seemeth, that Love at the first resembleth the mixture of two liquours, which when they begin to incorporate together, boil and work one with another: for even so Love seemeth to make a certain trouble and ebullition; but after a while that the same be once fettled, aud throughly cleanled, it bringeth unto Lovers a most firm and affured habit : and there is properly that mix ion and temperature, which is called universall, and through the whole: whereas the Love of other weather friends converfing and living together, may be very well compared to the mixtion which is made by a reversity these touchings and interlacings of atomes, which Epicurus speaketh of; and the same is subject to Tandale Ruptures, Separations, and Startings afunder: neither can it possibly make that Union which ma- 160% 612/16 trimoutall Love and mutuall Conjunction doth: for neither do there arife from any other Loves greater fome read pleasures, nor commodities more continually one from another, ne yet is the benefit and good of any with the other friendship so honourable or expetible, as

When man and wife keep house with one accord,

And lovingly agree at bed and board, cither the Especially when the Law warranteth it, and the Bond of Procreation common between them, is as one or coissant thereto. And verily nature sheweth, that the gods themselves have need of such Love: for rint ali. thus the Poets say, that the Heaven loveth the Earth; and the Naturalists hold, that the Sunne like but the wife is in love with the Moon, which every moneth is in Conjunction with him, by whom also she place is so conceiveth. In brief, must it not follow necessarily, that the Earth, which is the mother and breeder cormpt cof men, of living Creatures and all Plante, shall perish and be wholly excinct: when Love, which very way, is ardent desire, and instinct inspired from God, shall abandon the matter, and the matter likewise skilleth shall cease to lust and seek after the Principle, and cause of her Conception? But to the end that we may not range too far, nor uleany superfluous and nugatory words, your selfnot underdo know, that these Pæderassies are of all other most uncertain, and such as use them are wont to stood as fcoff much thereat and fay, that the Amity of fuch boyes, is in manner of an egge divided three wayes; all.

and as for themselves, they resemble the wandring Nomades in Scythia, who having encamped in and as for themselves, they received the fields be green and full of flowers, prefently dislodge and depart as it were out of an Enemies Country. And yet Bion the Sophister was more rough and odious in his words toward such, when he termed the first down or haires appearing upon the face of beautifoll youths Harmodii, and Aristoguones; for that by them Lovers were delivered out of the peautinity young reasonable with they begin once to bud and put forth. But these imputations are not jultly charged upon true Lovers. As sor that which Euripides said, it was pretty, and carried fome elegancy with it; for as he embraced and kiffed fair Agathon, even when his Beard began to grow. he faid : that of fair persons, the very latter season of the Autumn was lovely and beautifull : But Isay he laid : that of fair perions, the very latter tands of the more than fo, namely, that the loveliness of the more than fo, namely, that the loveliness of the more than fo, namely, that the loveliness of the more than former of the more than former of the more than former of the more than . there are but few couples in that other Sex, of true Loves; But of Men and Women joyned in Wed lock, an infinite number, who to the very last hour have kept most faithfully their Loyalty and hearty Love reciprocally one unto the other. But one example among many other, which beiel in our dayes, under Velpalian the Emperour, I will relate unto you. Julius, he who in Galaia was the Authour of a revole, and raifed a rebellion, had many other complices, (as a Man m.y well think) of this conspiracy, and among the reft, one Sabinus a young Gentleman of an high my west times of the southern of the print of the southern of according to Juffice, fuffer due punishment according to their deferts, fome killed themselves, other thinking to escape by flight, were apprehended; as for Sabinus, all other good and ready meanes he h do fave himfelf, and flie unto the Barbarians in a strange Country : but lately he had taken to Wife, Or Em a most vertuous Dame, and every way right excellent, whose name in those parts was * Empona, as Taminance, one would say in the Greek Language, him, that is to say, a Princesse or great Lady; but her he could not possibly either in his Love endure to forsake, nor find meanes to take with him: whereas therfore he had at an house in the Country certain secret Vaulte, and hidden Cellars deep under the ground. where he bestowed his treasure and goods in fasety, and those known to two of his enfranchised fervants, and no more; the rest of his Houshold Servitors he discharged and sent away; pretending unto them, that he was refolved to poylon himfelf; and recaining fill about him those two trufty freedmen, with them he went down into those secret Caves or Vaults digged out of the ground; which done, he fent one of these enfranchised Servants of his, whose name was " Martalinus unto his Wife, to let her *Or Mar- und: ritand that he had killed himfelf with poylon, and that the whole house together with his Corps was burnts for his purpose was, by the unseigned forrow and mourning of his Wife, to make the rumour that ran of his death, the better to believed; and so it fell out in very deed; for no sooner heard she this news, but with pitteous cries and dolefull lamentations, she cast her felf upon the ground, where she at that time was, and lay there along for three dayes and three nights together, without meat or d.ink: which when Sabinus heard, fearing left the Woman would by this meanes work her own death; he commanded the faid Martalinus to round her secretly in the ear, that he was yet living, and lay hidden within the ground, requesting her withall, that she would continue still a while longer in this mournfull flate, bewailing her Husbands death, yet fo, as the might not be perceived to counterfeit; and verily this young Lady in all other respects performed the tragicall shew of that calamity so artificially, and played her part with fuch dexterity, that the confirmed the opinions received and divulg:d of his death : but having a longing desire to see him, she went by night unto him, and came again the fame, fo fecretly, that no creature perceived it; and thus continued the this haunt from time to time, for the space of seven moneths, keeping company, and lying as one would say in hell under the ground with her husband; during which time, she one day disguised Sabinus in his apparell, and what with shaving his Beard, and knitting about his head a kerchief, she ordered the matter so, that he could not be known to them that met him: and upon hope of obtaining pardon, the brought him with her to Rome, with other fluff and carriages of hers: but when the could not speed, the retyred again into the Country, and for the most part abode and conversed with him under the ground: howbeit, otherwhiles between, she would repair to the City, and shew her self unto other Women her friends, and ofher familiar acquaintance. But that of all which other semesh most incredible, she handled the matter fo, that it was never perceived she was with child, albeit she washed and bathed ordinarily with other Dames and Wives of the City; for the oyl or ointment wherewith Women use to annoint the hair of their head, for to make the same sair and yellow like burnishing gold, hath a certain property in it to pinguific withall, to incarnate, and so to raise and rarific the flesh, that it causeth it to be lax. and fo to swell and puff up more plump: of this medicinable oyl she made no spare, butused to rub and besmere the other parts of body, in such fort, as that by their proportionable rising, the hid her great belly, which grew more round and full every day than other. Now when her time was come, the endured the pangs and paines of her Travell in Child-birth, alone by her felf, being gon down to her Husband like a Lyoneffe into her den, and there she suckled at her own Breaft secretly, if I may so say, her male Whelps, for two Boy twins she was delivered of; of which two Sons, the one chanced to be slain in Egyps, the other, not long fince, but very lately, was with us at Delphos, named after his Father, Sabinus. Howheit, for all this, Vefpafian caused this Lady to be put to death; but for this Murther of his he dearly paid, and

out from the face of the Earth, fo as there remained not one of his race: for there was not in those daies, and during his Empire, a more cruel and inhumane fact committed; neither was there ever any other fpectacle that both gods and angels feemed more to abhorr and to turn away their eyes from beholding. And yet her Grand iloquence and flout resolutions in her speech, whereby she did exasperate and prowick Vespassam most, was such, that it diminished much the pitiful ruth and compassion, that the beholders of the execution had of her: for when she was past hope of obtaining her hurb and life, she would needs die in his turn, and required that exchange for him, faying withall, that it was a greater joy unto her, for to live in darkneffe and under the earth, than to fee him Emperour.

Of the face appearing in the Moon.

And herewith (quoth my father) ended their discourse as touching Love, at what time as they were ner unto Thespies, for then they might perceive comming toward them, faster than with a soot pace, one of Pissa friends, named Diogenes; unto whom Socierus spake aloud, when he was yet a good way off: You bring us no news I hope Diogenes of War? Offe better than to (quoth he) being, as there is, a Marriage toward a why mend you not your pace therefore, and make hafte thither? for the Nuprial facrifice flayeth only for your coming: At which words (as my father faid) all the reft of the company joyed, and were exceeding glad, only Zeuzippus showed himself mal-contem, and not well pleased; for he could not diffemble it: howbeit he was the first man that approved the act of I Jmenadora, as good and lawful: and even now he willingly set a Garland upon his own head, and put on a white Wedding robe, marching before all the company through the Market-place, to render thankfgiving unto the god Love, for this Marriage. Well done (quoth my father then) I fwear by Jupicer : goe we on all hands away, and let us be gone; that we may laugh and make our felves merry with this man, and withall adore and worship the god: for evident it is, that he taketh joy in that which hath been done, and is present with his favour and approbation to grace the Wedding.

Of the Face appearing within the Rundle of the Moon.

The Summary.

This Dialogue is defective in the beginning thereof. In it are brought in Sylla and Pharnaces, with Into Diangue is accessed in the regioning surveys. Ant is according to a system of a little to the form of the confidered and read over and over again, by toof e that take delight in such pleasant speculations meet for good with to be exercised in. The weight of this matter concerneth the Globe of the Moon, and toucheth principally this notable accident of the face which appeareth therein: hy occusion whereof, divers questions depending upon the first and principal, are discussed and resolved by our Author, according as he hash comprised and understood them. But here is the mischief in this discourse, like as in many others of this second Tome, that it is not only headlesse, but maimed also and dismembred otherwise: and yet the Translatour and the French especially harb with great dexterity laid the pieces together, so as the breaches can hardly be seen, unlesse a man liokvery neer. Now the principal matters bandled here, be thefe that follow. After that Plutarch had refused three opinions concerning the face in the Moon, and brought in one Lucius, maintaining that position of the Academiques, who presuppose that the Moon is terrene and consisteth of an earthly subtance, he entreth into di putation against those who attribute one Centre unto the World and the Earth, labouring to confirm his ewn opinion by divers arguments marked in their order: which he handleth with such a grace, that yet a man may fee withal, how natural Philosophy destitute of that light of Gods word (which by Moses in the first chapter of Genclis resolveth and cleareth infinite disputations and controversies in these matters) is in a manner blinde, and stumbleth many times most grossy and absurdly. Moreover, according to the train of words and speeches, which community in such conferences follow one upon another, they treat of the Centre and Motion of the Universal World, of the proportion thereof, and the principal parts of its, of the illumination of the Moon, of reflexious and mirrours, of Eclipses, and the shadow of the Earth. Item, whether the Moon be a Globe of fire, or of what else ? What is her colour ? From whence proceedeth and how cometh this resemblance of a face which is observed in her ? Whether she be inhabited or no ? As also of her Nature and Effects. Toward the end he intermedieth a fable fetched from the Poets and ancient Natural Philosophy, for to mollifie and make more probable and credible that which had been delivered as touching those that anell within the Moon. In sun, this Treatise giveth good proof of the quick and pregnant wit of our Au-thor, who could enter into, and peirce through all things: whereof if he have not alwaiss attained unto the exall knowledge, we should rather by all likelibood blame the iniquity of long time, which hash not permitted us to have these Book; entire and whole, than the insussiciency of so deep a Clerk. To conclude, this ought to unite those that sound and search into the secrets of Nature, to joyn with that which the modern Philosophers of our time are able to write fleightly and at ease of such matters, what hath been delivered by the ancients, nbo indeed have made the overture unto these who succeeded after them: to the end that there might be drawn out of them all, a certain firm resolution, which raiseth us up above the Moon, and all other Celestial bodies, unto the only God and sole Creator of so many admirable works, thereby to acknowledge, serve and praise him according as his Omnipotent greatnesse doth deserve.

Of the face appearing in the Rundle of the Moon.

Ell, thus much faid Sylla, for it accorded well to my fpeech, and depended thereupon: but I would very willingly before all things elfe know, what need is there to make fuch a present amble for to come unto thefe opinions, which are fo current and rife in every mans mouth, as touching the face of the Moon. And why not (quoth 1) confidering the difficulty of thefe points which have driven us thither? for like as in long maladies, when we have tried ordinary remedies, and ufual rules of diets, and found no help thereby, we give them over in the end, and betake our felves to luftral facrifices and explations, to amulets or prefervatives for to behanged about our neck; and to interpretations of dreams: even fo in fuch obfcure quefitions, and difficult foculations, when the common and ordinary opinions, when ufual and apparent reasons will not ferve nor fatisfic us, necefix to the fact of the fame, but to enchant or charm our felves, as one would fay, with the disfloorties of our ancients, and try all means for to finde out the truth: for at the very first encounter you fee, how abfurd he is and intollerable, who faith, that the form or face appearing in the Moon, is an accident of our eye-fight, that by reason of weaken(fig givent place to the brightness thereof, which accident we call the dazzeling of our eyes, not weaken(fig givent place to the brightness thereof, which accident we call the dazzeling of our eyes, not considering withals, that this should befal rather against the Sun, whose light is more resplendent, and beam more quick and pieceing, according as Empedocles himself in one place pleasantly noteth the difference, when he faith:

The Sun that shines so quick and bright, The Moon with dimme and stony light:

for so he expresses that milde, amiable, pleasant, and harmlesse visage of the Moon: and afterwards rendereth a reason, why those, who have obscure and seeble sights, perceive not in the Moon any different form or shape, but unto them her Circle shinesh plain, even, uniform and full round about; whereas they who have more quick and piercing eyes, do more exactly observe the proportion and lineaments, and discembetter the impression of a face, yea, and distinguish more perfectly and evidently the several parts: for in mine opinion it would fall out clean contrary, in case the weakness of the eye being overcome, caused this apparition, that where the patient eye is more feeble, there the fail apparence and imagination should be more expresse and evident: surthermore, the enequality therein, doth fully every way constitut this reason; for this sace or countenance is not to be seen in a continuate and consused shows: But Applanax the Poet, right elegantly depainted in some fort the same, in these words:

All round about environed
Mith fire she is illumined:
And in the middes there doth appears
Like to some boy, a wisage clear:
Who se yes to us do stem in wiews,
Of colour grayish more than blow:
The browes and spechodad, tender seem,
The cheeky all red dish one would deem

For intruth dark and shadowy things, compassed about with those that are shining and clear are driven downward, and the same do rise again reciprocally, being by them repulsed, and in one word, are interlaced one within another; in such fort as they represent the form of a face lively and naturally depained; and is seemeth that there was great probability in that which Clearcus said against your Arightle. For this Aristosle of yours, though he samiliarly converted with that ancient Aristosle prevented and overthrew many points of the Peripateticks doctine. Then Appleointest, saking upon him to speak, demanded, what opinion this might be of Aristosle, and upon what reason it was grounded. Surely (quoth 1) it were more meet for any man else to be ignorant hereos, than for you, considering that it is grounded upon the very sindamental principles of Geometry. For this man affirmed that the things, which we call the face in the Moon, are the images and sigures of the great Ostean, represented in the Moon [as in a mirrour: for the circumstence of a round circle, being restled back every way, is wont to deceive the sight in such things as are not directly seen. And the sull Moon her self is, for evenesse, smoothnesse and lustre, the most beauti-beautiful and purest mirrour in the world. Like as therefore ye hold, that the Rainbow appeareth (when our cyclight is reflected back upon the Sun) in a cloud, that hath gotten smoothnesse somewhat liquid, and a confishence withal 5 even so (quoth he) a man may see in the Moon the great Ocean, without, not in the very place where it is situate: but from whence the reflexion by touching the light reverberate and sent back, maketh a fight and apparition thereof. Which Agesianax hath (aid in another place, after this manner;

is just resembled there In staming mirrour, when great waves
it doth against it rear.

Apollonides then, being perswaded that it wat so 3 a singular opinion believe me (quoth he) this was of his, and when all is said, newly and after a strange manner devised by a man, who may be thought bold and confident enough in his projects, howbeit full of wir and a great Cleark withal. But how did Charchus refute the same? First and foremost (quoth I) if the main Sea or Ocean be all of one nature, then it must need be that the current thereof is all one uniform and continuate: but the appearance of those black and dim obscurities which are observed in the face of the Moon, is not even and continued, but there be certain ishmes or partitions between clear and bright, which divide and seperat that which is shady and dark. Therefore seeing each part is distinct, and hath proper bounds and limits apart, the conjunctions and approchments of the clear to that which is dark, making a semblance of high and low, do express and resemble the similitude of a figure, with eyes and lips; so that of necessity we are to suppose, that there be many Oceans and main Seas, distinguished by the isthmes of firm Lands between : which is a manifest untruth. And admit that there is but one continued Sea for all, it is not credible that the image thereof should appear so dissipate and distracted by pieces: and as for this point, the furer way is, and leffe dangerous, to demand, than to affirm ought in your prefence; namely, whether the habitable Earth being equal in length and breadth, it be possible, that all the sight reflected and fent back by the Moon, should equally touch the whole Ocean and all those that fail therein, and whole Earth, in proportion to the Globe or Sphear of the Moon, is no more than a very prick. As for this verily (q 10th I) it is your part to regard and confider : and true it is that as couching the reverberation and reflexion of the fight from the Moon, it belongest meither to you nor to Hipparus. And yet Iassure you, my good freind Lamprias (quoth Apollonides) there be many Naturalists, who hold it not good to affirm with Hipparus that our light is so driven back; but they suppose and affirm, that it is more like and probable that it hath a certain temperature and obeyfant compact structure, than such beatings and repercussions as Epicurus imagineth the Atomes have. Neither do I believe that Clearchus would have us to suppose, that the Moon is a massive and weighty body, but Celestial and lightsome: against which you say that the refraction of our eye-sight should reach : and therefore all this reflexion. and reverberation falleth to the ground and comes to nothing. But if I should be urged, and intreated by him to receive and admit the same, I would ask him the question, how it comes to past, that this image of the Sea is to be seen only in the body of the Moon, and not in any of the other Stars? For by all likelihood and probability, our fight should suffer the same equally in all, or just in none at all. But I pray you (quoth I, casting mine eyes upon Lucius) call to mind again that which was first delivered of our part, and by those of our side. Nay rather I am affraid (quoth Lucius) lest we may be thought to offer over much injury unto Pharnaces, if we should so passe over the Stoicks opinion unconflited, and without opposing any thing against it. Why then reply somwhat upon this man (quoth 1) who holdeth that the Moon is a whole mixion of the air, and of some milde fire, and then after? wards faith, that like as in a calm, there happenerh other whiles a little horror or winde, that rumbleth and bloweth upon the Sea, even fo the air thereby becometh black, and thereupon is made a certuin resemblance and form of a visage. Courteously done of you Lucius (quoth I) thus to clad and cover with fair words and good termes to abfurd and falle an opinion. But to did not our friend, but foske the plain truth, and faid that the Stoicks disfigured the Moons face making it black and blew, and filling it with dark spots and clouds, and withal invocating her by the name of Minerva and Diana, and in the mean while making her a lump as it were of paste, confisting of dark air and a fire of Charcole, that cannot burn out, nor yield light of it felf, but having a body hard to be judged and known, ever (moaking and alwaiss burning like to those lightnings which by the Poets are called, lightlesse and smoaky. But that a sire of coales, such as they would have that of the Moon to be, continueth not long, nor can fo much as fubfift, if it meet not with fome folid matter, which may hold it in and withal feed and nourish it; I suppose that they know better, who in merriment say that Vulcan is lame and doth hilt, than these Philosophers do: for that indeed fire cannot go forward without wood or fewel, no more than a lame criple without his staff: or crutches. If then the Moon be fire, how cometh it to have fomuch air in it? For this Region aloft which moveth round, doth not confift of air, but of fome other more noble substance, which is able to subtilize and set on fire every thing beside. But in case it be afterwards engendred in it, how is it that it perisheth not by being changed and transmuted by the fire into a celeftial substance, but maintaineth it self, and continueth together as it were, cohabiting with the fire to long, like unto a spike or nail set fast continually in the same parts, and sitted thereto? For being rare as it is, and diffused, meet it were that it should not so abide and continue, but be diffipated and refolved; and to grow compact and thick it is impossible, to long as it is mixed with fire, having no earth nor water; which are the two only Elements whereby the aire will gather to a confiftence and thicknesse. Moreover, the swiftnesse and violence of motion, is wont to enflame the airethat is within Stones, yea, and in Lead, as cold as it is: much more then, that which is in fire, being whirled about, and turned with fo great celerity and impetuofity for in this regard they are offended with Empedocles, for that he made the Moon congaled aire, in manner of Haile, and included within a Sphear of fire: and yet themselves say, that the Moon being a Sphear or Globe of fire, doth enclose and concain the aire difperfed to and fro; and that the fame hath neither suptures nor concavities, ne yet any profundities, which they admit who will have the Moon to be of earth, but forfooth superficially only, and as it were fettled upon the imboffed and fwelling backe thereof : which is against all reason, if it be to endure, and cannot pollibly be, in case we give credit to that which we do see in full Moons: for divided it ought not to be, and separat apart, being black and dark, but either being hidden, to be altogether darkned, or elfe to be illuminate when the Moon is overspread by the Sun. For herebeneath with us, the aire that is in deep pits and low caves of the earth, where the Sun-beames never come. remaineth dark and shady, without any light at all: but that which is spread about the earth, is clear, and of a lightfome colour; for by reafin of the rarity thereof, it is very easie to be transmuted into every quality and faculty; but principally by the light, which if it never so little touch it, as they say, and lay hold of it, you shall see it incontinently changed, and light throughout. This very reason therefore feemeth greatly to help and maintain the opinion of them who drive the aire into I wot not what deep vallies and pits within the Moon; as allo to confute you, who mingle and compound I know not how, her Sphear of fire and aire; for impossible it is that there should remain any shadow or obscurity in the fuperficies thereof, when the Sun with his brightness, doth clear and illuminate what foever part of the Moon we are able to difeern, and cut with our eye fight. And as I spake these words, even before I had made an end of my speech : See (quoth Pharnaces) the ordinary cast of the Academy, how it is practifed upon us, in that they bufie themfelves evermore, and fpend time in all their discourses to speak against others, but never allow the discussing and reproving of that which they deliver themselves: but if any happen to confer and diffrute with them; they must plead in their own desence alwaies, and not be allowed to reply or come upon them with any acculations: for mine own part, you shall not draw me this day to render a reason of such matters as you charge upon the Stoicks, nor to speak in their behalf, before I have called you to an account, for thus turning the world upside down, as you do. Hereat Lucius laughing; And very well content am I good Sir, (quoth he) to to do, provided alwaies, that you accuse us not of impiety; like as Aristarchus thought that the Greeks ought to have called Cleanthes the Samean into question, judicially and to condemne him for his impiety and Atheifme, as one that shook the very foundations of the world to overthrow all, in that the man endeavouring to fave and maintain those things which appear unto us above, supposed the heaven to stand fill as immoveable, and that it was the earth that moved round by the oblique Circle of the Zodiack, and turned about the own Axeltree. As for us, we speak of our selves, and in our own behalf. But they, my good friend Pharnaces, who suppose that the Moon is earth, why do they turn the World upfide down, more than you; who place the Earth here hanging in the aire, being far greater than the Moon, as the Mathematicians take their measure, in the accidents of Eclipses, and by the passings of the trajections of the Moon through the shadow of the Earth, collecting thereby the Magnitude thereof, and what space it taketh up? for surely the shadow of the Earth is leffe than it felf, by reason that it in cast by a greater light. Now that the said shadow is streight, and pointed upward toward the end, Homer himself was not ignorant, but signified as much, when he called the night 2016, for the sharpeneffe at the point of the faid shadow; and yet the Moon as it appeareth in her Eclipses, being caught and comprehended within the compasse of that shadow, hath much ado to get out of it, by going forward in length, thrice as much as her own bigneff: comes to. Confider then, how many times greater must the Earth needs be than the Moon, if it be fo, that the shadow which it casteth, where it is sharpest and narrowest, is thrice as much as the Moon. But ye are asraid less the Moon should fall, if she were a-vowed to be the Earth: (for it may be haply, that Eschylus hath scaled you a warrant, and secured you for the Earth, when he faid thus of Atlas :

> He standesh like a pillar strong and sure, From earth to keaven above that reachesh streight: To bear on shoulders twain, be deth endure A massic burden and unweldy weight.)

if under the Moon there run and be spread a light and thin aire, not firm and sufficient for to sustain a solid masse: whereas according to Pindarus:

To bear the earth there stand most puissant Columns and pillars of hard Diamant.

And therefore Pharnaces for himself is our of all sear, that the Earth will sall; marry he pittieth those who are directly and plumbe under the course of the Moon, and namely the Ethiopians, and those of Taprobana, lest so weighty a masse should tumble down upon their heads. And yet the Moon hath one good meanes and help to keep her from falling, so wit, her very motion and violent revolution, like unto those Bullets or Stones, or whatsoever weights be put within a sling, they are

fore enough from flipping or tall ng our, to long as they be violently fwong and fwirled about. For every body is carried according to the natural motion thereof, if there be no other cause to empeach or turn it aside out of course : which is the reason that the Moon moveth not, according to the motion of her poile, considering the inclination thereof downward, is stayed and hindred by the violence of a circular revolution. But peradventure more cause there were to marvel, if she should fland altogether as the earth, immoveable: whereas now the Moon hath this great cause to empeach her, for not tending downward hither. As for the Earth, which hath no other motion at all to hinder it; great reason there is, that according to that onely weight of the own, it should move downward, and there fettle; for more heavy it is than the Moon, not so much in this regard. that greater it is, but more, for that the Moon by reason of heat and adultion of fire, is made the lighter: In brief, it appeareth by that which you fay, if it be true that the Moon be fire, it hath need of earths or some other matter to rest upon and cleave unto, for to maintain, nourish, and quicken still the power that it hath: for it cannot be conceived or imagined, how fire should be preserved without fuel, or matter combutible. And you your clives affirm, do ye not? that the earth abideth firm and fuel, without any base or piedstal to sustain and hold it up? Yes verily (quoth Pharmace) being in the proper and natural place, which is the very midft and centre. For this it whereto all heavy and weighty things do tend, incline, and are carried to from every fide, and about which they cling, and be counterpoized : but the upper region throughout, if haply there be any terrefirial and heavy marter, by violence fent up thither, repelleth and casteth it down again with force incontinently, or to freak more truly, letterh it go and fall, according to the own natural inclination, which is to tend and fettle downward.

For the answer and refutation whereof, I willing to give Lucius some reasonable time to summon his wits together, and to think upon his reasons: and calling unto Theon by name, Which of the Tragical Poets wastis (Theon, quoth 1) who faid that Physicians

Do bitter medicines into the body pour, When bitter choler they mean to purge and scour?

And when he made me answer that it was Sophocles. Well (quoth I) we must permit them so to do upon necessity: but we ought not to give ear unto Philosophers, if they would maintain strange paradoxes, by other positions as absurd, or to consute admirable opinions, devise others much more extravagant and wenderful; like as these here who broach and bring in a motion, for sooth, tending unto a middle, wherein, what abfurdity is there not? Hold not they that the earth is as round as a ball. to a micros. Which was any deep profundities, haughty fublimities and manifold inequalities it hath? af-firm not they that there be antipodes dwelling opposite one unto another, and those flicking, as it were, to the fides of the earth with their heels upward, and their heads downward, all arfe verfe, like unto the Woodworms or Cats which hang by their sharp claus? Would not they have even us also that are here, for to go upon the ground not plum upright, but bending or enclining sidelong, recling and staggering like drunken folk? Do they not tell us tales, and would make us believe, that if hars and maffes of iron weighing a thousand talents a piece, were let fall down into the bottom of the earth, when they came once to the middle centre thereof, will flay and rest there, albeit nothing else came against them, nor sustained them up? And if peradventure by some forcible violence they should pass beyond the faid midst, they would soon rebound back thither again of their own accord? Sav not they that if a man should saw off the trunks or ends of beams on either side of the earth, the fame would never fettle downward still throughout, but from without forth fall both into the earth, and so equally meet one another, and cling together about the heart or centre thereof? Suppose not they, that if a violent stream of water should run downward still into the ground, when it met once with the very point or centre in the midft, which they hold to be incorporal, it would then gather together, and turn round in manner of a whirlpool, about a pole, waving to and fro there continually, like one of these pendent buckets, and, as it hangeth, wag incessantly without end? And verily some of these affertions of theirs are so absurd, that no man is able to enforce himself to imagine in his minde, although falfely, that they are possible. For this indeed is to make high and low all one: this is to turn all upfide down: that those things, which be come as far as to the midst, shall be thought below and under: and what is under the middle, shall be supposed above and aloft; in such fort, as that if a man, by the fufferance and confent of the earth, stood with his navel just against the middle and centre of it, he should by this means have his head and his heels both together standing upward; and if one should come and dig through the place beyond that part of him which was above, shall in the digging be drawn downward, and that which was beneath be cast upward both at once; and if there may be imagined another to go clean contrary unto him, their feet which were opposite one unto the other, should nevertheless be said and be indeed both together, beneath and above. Thus they both carrying upon their backs, and also drawing after them, not I affire you a box or little budger, but a fardle and pack, I (wear unto you, of Juglers boxes full of so many, and so groß paradox:s and abfurdities, wherewith they play pass and repass, yet they say for all this, that others erre. who place the Moon which they hold to be earth, above, and not where the midft and centre of the world is. And yet if every ponderous body, incline to the fame place, and bendeth from all fides, and on every part to the middt thereof, certainly the earth shall not appropriate and challenge unto it self weighty masses as parts thereof, because it is the middle of the world, more than in regard it is whole and entire : and the gathering together of heavy bodies about it, shall be no sign nor argument to shew that it is the middle of the world, but rather to prove and tellific, that these bodies which have been taken and pulled from it, and return again, have a communication and conformity in nature with the carth. For like as the Sun converteth into it felf the parts whereof it is composed, even so the earth receiveth and beareth a flone, as a part appertaining unto it, in such fort as in time every one of these things is incorporate and united with it. And if it chance that there be some other body which from the beginning was not allotted and laid unto the earth, nor plucked from it, but had apart from it, a proper confidence and peculiar nature of the own, as they may fay the Moon had, what should it, a proper commence and peculiar included in a proper commence and bound close together in all the proper parts thereof? For hereby, is not shewed demonstratively, that the earth is the mids of the whole world: and the conglobation of weighty bodies here, and their concretion which the earth, declareth un-to us the manner how it is probable, that the parts the which be there gathered to the body of the Moon, may there also remain. But he who driveth all earthly and ponderous things into one place, moon, may the anternament and making them the parts of one and the fame body, I marvel why he arranging them altogether, and making them the parts of one and the fame body, I marvel why he at tributeth not in like manner the fame force and confirment unto light (tobfances, but forfereth for many conglobations of fire to be apare and diftin a funder, neither can I fee the reason why he should not bring all the starsinto one, and think that there ought to be one entire body of all those subflances that fly upward, and are of fiery nature. But you Mathematicians (friend Pollonides) affirm that the Sun is diffant from the Primum Mobile, and highest cope of Heaven, infinite thoufands of miles : and after him, that the day flariVenus and Mercury, with the other Planett, which being fittate under the fix d stars, and distant one from another, by great intervals and spaces between, do make their feveral revolutions: mean while, you do not think, that the world affordeth unto heavy and terrestrial bodies, a great and large place in it, and a distance one from another. But the what a cidiculous thing it were, to deny the Moon to be earth, because it is not seated in the low-eft place of the world; and withal to affirm it to be a flar so far remote from the simmanent and Primum Mobile, even a huge number of Stadia, as if it were plunged low into fome deep gulf: for fo far under other stars she is, as no man can express; and even you Mathematicians want numbers to reckon and fum the diffance: and the feemeth after a fort to touch the very earth, making her revolution as the doth, so neer unto the tops of high mountains, leaving behinde her (as Empedocles faith) the very prints and tracts of her Chariot wheels upon them: for often times the furpasseth not the shadow of the earth, which is very short, and reacheth not high, by reason of the earthy of the Sun that shineth upon it: and she seemeth to walk her stations so neer unto the upper face of the earth, and in a manner within the arms of it, that the obstructeth and hideth from us the light of the Sun, because she mounteth not above this shadowy, terrestrial and dark Region like unto the night, which is (as one would fay) the very finage and marches allotted to the earth. And therefore a man may be bold to fay, that the Moon is within the limits and confines of the earth, feeing withal, that darkened and shadowed it is by the high cress and tops of mountains therein. But to leave all other stars, as well fixed as wandering, consider the demonstrations of Ariftarchus, in his Treatife of Magnitudes and Distances, that the distance of the Sun from us is more than that of the Moon, above eighteen fold, but under twenty: and he verily who raifeth the Moon highelt, faith that she is from us, fix and fifty times as far as is the centre of the earth; the distance whereof is forty thousand stadia. By their calculation who keep a mean, and according to this supputation, the Sun ought to be distant from the Moon more than four thousand and thirty stadie ten thousand times told: so far (I say) is she off from the Sun, in regard of her ponderosity, and so neer approacheth she unto the earth: so that is, by places, we ought to distinguish of substances, the region and portion of the earth challengeth the Moon, and in regard of her proximity and vicinage unto it, the ought by right to be reckoned and enrolled among the natures, affairs, and bodies terreftrial. Neither shall we do amiss in my conceit, if having given unto these bodies (that are said to be alost) so large a space and distance, we allow also to those beneath, such a race and spacious room to runin, as is from the earth to the Moon: for as he is not moderate nor tolerable, who call the the upper superfices onely and cope of the heaven and, that is to say, alost, or superior; and all the rest warm, that is to say, beneath; so he who termeth the earth, or rather the centre of it onely, warm, that is to fay, below or inferior, is not to be endured; confidering that the huge vaffity of the world may afford, even in this region beneath, such a competent space as is meet and convenient for motion. For if one would maintain, that all above the earth is immediately to be counted high and aloft; another presently will comeupon him with this contradiction, and say, that he may as well hold, that whatfoever is beneath the Primum Mobile, or flarry firmament, ought to be called Below. In fum, how is the earth called, The middle? and whereof is it the middle? for the universal frame of the world, called wir, is infinite; and this infinite which hath neither head nor foot, how can it in reason have a navil? for even that which we call the midft of any thing, is a kinde of limitation; wiftreas infinity is a meer privation of all limits and bounds. As for him who faith, it is not in the midft of that universality, but of the world, he is a pleasant man, if he think not withal, that the world it self is subject to the same doubts and difficulties: for the said universal frame leaveth not unto the very world a middle, but is without a certain feat, without affured footing, moving in a voidness infinite, not into some one place proper unto it : and if haply it should meet with some any other cause of flay, and so abide still, the same is not according to the nature of the place. And as much may we conjecture of the Moon, that by the means of some other soul or nature, or rather of some difference, the earth continueth firm beneath, and the Moon moveth. Furthermore you fee, how they are not ignorant of a great errour and inconvenience; for if it be true, that whatfoever is without the centre of the earth, it skills not how, is to be counted Above and aloft, then is thete rpart of the world to be reckoned Below or Beneath; but as well the earth it felf, as all that is upon it, shall be above and aloft; and to be short, every body neer or about the centre, must go among those things that are aloft; neither must we reckon any thing to be under or beneath, but one prick or point, which hath no body: and the same for sooth must make head, and stand in opposition neceffarily, against all the whole nature besides of the world; in case, according to the course of nature, $\delta \tips$, and *\delta \tips$, that is to fay, above and beneath, be opposite. And not onely this absurdity will follow, but also all heavy and ponderous bodies must need slose the cause, for which they bend and encline hither: for, body there will be none, toward which it should move: And as for this prick or centre that hath no body, there is no likelihood, neither would they themselves have it so, that it should be so puissant and forcible, as to draw to it, and retain about it, all things. And if it be found unreasonable and repugnant to the course of nature, that the world should be all above, and nothing beneath, but a term or limit, and the same without body, without space and distance; then this that we fay, is yet more reasonable, namely, that the Region beneath, and that above, being parted distinctly one from another, have nevertheless each of them a large and spacious room to come themselves in. But suppose (it it please you) it were against nature, that terrestrial bodies should have any motion in heaven; let us consider gently and in good teerns, not after a Tragical manner, but mildely, This proveth not by-and-by, that the Moon is not earth, but rather, that earth is in some place, where naturally it should not be : for the fire of the Mountain Eina, is verily under the ground, against the nature of it; howbeit, the same ceaseth not therefore to be fire. The wind contained within leather bottles, is of the own nature light and given to mount upward. but by force it cometh to be there, where naturally it ought not to be. Our very foul it felf (I befeech you in the name of Jupiter) is it not against nature detained within the body; being light, in that which is heavy; being of a fiery substance in that which is cold, as ye your selves say; and being invisible, in that which is gross and palpable? do we therefore deny, that the soul is within the body, that it is a Divine substance under a gross and heavy mass, that in a moment it passeth thorowout heaver, earth and fea: that it pierceth and entreth within flesh, nerves and marrow; and finally, is the cause together with the humors of infinite passions? And even this Jupiter of yours, such as you imagine and depaint him to be, is he not of his own nature a mighty and perpetual fire? howbeit, now he submitteth himself, and is pliable; subject he is to all forms, and apt to admit divers mutations. Take heed therefore, and be well advifed '(good Sir) left that in transferring and reducing every thing to their natural place, you do not fo Philosophize, as that you wil bring in a diffolution of all the world, and fet on foot again that old quarrel and contention among all things which Empedacles Writeth of; or, to speak more to the purpose, beware you raise not those ancient Titans and Gyauts, to put on arms against nature : and so consequently endeavor to receive and see again, that fabulous disorder and confusion, whereby all that is weighty, goeth one way, and whatsoever is light, another way apars,

> Where neither lightfome countenance of Sun, nor earth all green With berbs and plants, admired is, nor furging fea is feen, according as Empedocles hath written: wherein the earth feeleth no hear, nor the water any winde: wherein there is no ponderofity above, nor lightness beneath; but the principles and elements of all things he by themselves solitary, without any mutual love or dilection between them; not admirting any society or mixture together, but avoiding and turning away one from the other, moving apart by particular motions, as being discalancel, proud, and carrying themselves in such fort, as all things do where no god is, as Plate faith, that is, as those bodies are affected wherein there is no underflanding nor foul, until fuch time as by fome divine providence there come into nature a defire; and foamity, Venus and Love be there engendred, according to the faying of Empedocles, Parmenides and Heliodus; to the end, that changing their natural places, and communicating reciprocally their gitts side facilities frome driven by necessity to move, other bound to rest; they be all forced to a better site, remitting somewhat of their power, and yielding one to another, they grew at length unto one, accord, harmony and society. For if there had not been any other part of the world against nature, but that each one had been both in place, and for quality, as it ought naturally to be, without any need of change or transposition, so that there had been nothing at the first wanting, I greatly doubt what and wherein was the work of divine providence; or whereupon it is, that Impiter was the father, creator and maker. For in a camp or field, there would be no need of a man who is expert and skilful in ranging and ordering of Battel, in case every Souldier of himself knew his rank, his place, his time and opportunity, which he ought to take, keep, and lobserve. Neither would there be any use of Gardiners, Carpenters, or Masons, it water were of it self taught naturally to go where as it is needful, and to run and overflow a place which requireth watering; and if bricks, timber-logs and flones, by their own inclinations and natural motions, were to range and couch themselves orderly in their due place. Now if this reason and argument of theirs doth directly abolish all Providences; if order belong unto God, together with the diffinction of all things in the world; why should any man wonder, that nature hath been so disposed and ordained by him, as that Fire should be here, and the Stars there? And again, that the Earth should be seated here below, and the Moon placed there above, lodged in a more fure and firong Prifon, deviced by reafon, then that which was first ordained by Nature? For were is fo, that absolutely and of necesfity, all things should follow their natural instinct, and move according to that motion which naturally is given them, neither would the Sun run his course any more circularly, nor Venus, nor any other Planet whatfoever; for that fuch light substances, and standing much upon fire, mount directly upward. Now if it be so, that nature receiveth such an alteration and change in regard of the place, as that our Fire here being moved and flirred, rifeth plum upward; but after it is gotten once up to heaven, together with the revolution thereof, turneth round : what marvel is it. if femblably, heavy and terrestrial bodies, being out of their natural places, be forced and overcome by the circumstant ayr, to take unto another kinde of motion? For it cannot be said with any reason, that Heaven hath this power, to take from light substances the property to mount aloft, and cannot likewife have the puiffance to vanquish heavy things, and such as naturally move downward: But one while it maketh use of that power of her own, another while of the proper nature of things, always tending to the better. But to let pass these habitudes and opinions whereto we are servilly addicted, and to speak frankly, and withous fear, what our minde is, I am verily perswaded, that there is no part of the universal world, that hath by it self any peculiar order, feat or motion, which a man simply may fay to be natural unto it: but when each part exhibiteth and yieldeth profitably ahat, wherefore it is made, and whereto it is appointed, moving it felf, doing or suffering, or being disposed as it is meet and expedient for it, either for Safety, Beauty, or Puissance, then seemeth it to have Place, Motion, and Disposition, proper and convenient to the own nature. For man, who is disposed (if any thing else in the whole world) according to nature, hath in the upper parts of the body, and especially about his head, those things that be ponderous and earthly; but in the midst thereof, such as be hot and of a fiery nature; his teeth, some grow above, others beneath; and yet neither the one range of them nor the other, is against nature. Neither is that fire which shineth above in his eyes, according to nature, and that which is in the belly and heart, contrary to nature, but in each place is it properly feated and commodiously. Now if you consider the nature of shell-fishes, you shall finde, that (as Empedocles faith)

Of the face appearing in the Moon.

The Oysters, Murets of the Sea, and Shell-fishevery one, With maffy coat ; the Tortoife cke, with crust as hard as stone, And vanited back, which archwise be aloft doth bollow rear 3 Shew all, that heavy earth they do above their bodies bear.

And yet this hard coat and heavy crust, like unto a stone, being placed over their bodies, doth not press or crush them; neither doth their natural heat, in regard of lightness, fly up and vanish away, but mingled and composed they are one with the other, according to the nature of every one. And even so it standeth to good reason, that the world, in case it be animal, hath in many places of the body thereof, earth, and in as many, are and water, not driven thither perforce, but so placed and difposed by reason: for the eye was not by the ftrength of lightness forced to that part of the body wherein it is; neither was the heart depressed down by the weight that it had, into the breast; but because it was better and more expedient for the one and the other, to be feated where they are. Semblably, we ought not to think, that of the parts of the world, either the earth fettled where it is, because it fell down thither by reason of ponderosity, or the Sun, in regard of lightness, was carryed upward, like unto a bottle bladder full of wind, which being in the bottom of the water, presently riseth up (as Metrodorus of Chies was perswaded) or other stars, as if they were put in a ballance, inclined this way or that, as their weight more or less required, and so mounted higher or lower to those places where now they are feated: but rather by the powerful direction of reason in the first constitution of the world, fome of the flars like unto bright and glittering eyes, have been fet fast in the strumment, as one would say alon in the very forestead thereof: and the Sun representing the power and vigor of the hears, fendeth and diffributeth in manner of blood and spirits, his heat and light thorowout all.

The earth and fea are to the world, proportionable to the paunch and bladder in the body of a living creature: the Moon fituate between the Sun and the Earth, as between the heart in Ithebelly, refenibling the liver or some such soft bowel, transmitteth into the inserior parts here beneath, the heat of shole superior bodies, and draweth to herself those vapors that arise from hence, and those doth she hibilate and refine by way of concoction and purification, and fo fend and distribute them round about her. Now whether that folid and terrestrial portion in it, hath some other property serving for a profitable use or no, it is unknown to us; but furely it is evermore the best and surest way in all things, togo by that which is necessary; for what probability or likelihood can we draw from that which they deliver? They affirm, that of the ayr the most subtile and light some part, by reason of the 14 rity thereof, became heaven; but that which was thickened and closely driven together, went to the miking of stars; of which the Moon being the heaviest of all the rest, was concrete and compact of the most groß and muddy matter thereof: and yet a man may perceive how she is not separate nor divided from the ayr, but moveth and performeth her revolution through that which is about her, even the region of the winds, and where Comets or Blazing-stars be engendred and hold on their courfe. Thus these bodies have not been by their natural inclinations, according as each of them is light or heavy, placed and fituate as they be, but furely by fome other reason they have been to ranged and ordained.

After the words were faid, when I would have given unto Lucius his turn to speak, and to hold on this Discourse, there being nothing at all behinds left, but the demonstrations of this Doctrine: Arifole began to fmile; I am a witness (quoth he) that you have directed all these your contradictions and refutations, against those, who hold that the Moon is it felt half fire; and who affirm, that all bodies of their own accord, tend either upward or downward directly: But whether there be any one who faith, that the Stars of their own nature, have a circular motion, and that in fuellar ce they be fur different from the four elements, that came not ever, fo much as by chance and fortune into your remembrance: and therefore I count my felf exempt from all trouble and mobilisation in that behalf. Why, good Sir (quoth Lucius) if yeshould haply suppose and set down, that the other state, and the whole heaven befiles, were of a pure and fincere nature, void of all change and mutation, in regard of passion, as also bring in a certain circle, in which they performed their motions by a perpetual revolution, you should not finde any one at this time to gain say you; notwithstanding there were in this position doubts and difficulties innumerable. But when your speech is descended so low as to touch the Moon, then can it not maintain in her that impaffibility, and the celeftial beauty of that body. But to leave all other inequalities and differences therein; certes, that very face which appeared in the body of the Moon, cometh necessarily from some passion of her own substance, or the by the mixture of some other (for that which is mingled in some fort always sufficient) because it loseth that former purity, being perforce overcast and filled with that which is worke.

As for that dull and flow course of hers, that weak and feeble hear, whereby, as the Poet Ion The grapes their kinde concoction lacks

And on the vine-tree turn not black, unto what shall we attribute the same, if not to her imbecillity, in case an eternal and heavenly body can be subject unto any such passion? In sum, my good friend Eristotle, if the Moon be earth, surely a most fair and beautiful thing it feemeth to be, and full of great Majestic: if a Star, or Light, or some Divine and Celestial body, I am afraid lest the prove deformed and foul, yea, and disgrace that beautiful name of hers, in case of all those bodies in heaven, which are in number so many, she onely remaineth to have need of the light of another,

Casting behinde, her eye always, Upon the Sun and bis bright rayis

according as Parmenides writeth. And verily our familiar friend, having in a Lecture of his, proved by demonstration this Proposition of Anaxagoras; that all the light which the Moon hath, the Sin giveth unto her, was commended and well reputed for it. For mine own part, I am not minded to fay what I have learned, either of you, or with you; but taking this for a thing granted and confessed, I will proceed forward to the rest behinde. Probable therefore it is, that the Moon is illuminate, not in manner of a glass or crystal stone, by the bright irradiation and shining beams of the San firiking through her; neither yet by a certain collustration and mutual conjunction of lights, as torches which being fet a burning together, do augment the light; for fo it would be no less Full-Moon in the conjunction or first quarter, than in the opposition, in case she did not contain and keep in, nor repel the rays of the Sun, but fuffer them to pass through her by reason of her rarity and sungofity, or if by a contemperature the thineth and kindleth, as it were, the light about her: for we cannot al lege her oblique and byas declination, or her aversions and turnings away, before and after the conjunction or change, as when it is Half-Moon, tipped croifant, or in the wane; but being directly and plum under the body that illuminateth it, as Domocritus faith, it receiveth and admitteth the Sun, in such fort, as by all likelihood she should then appear, and he shine through her: But fo far is the from to doing, that both herfelf at fuch a time is unfeen, and many times hideth the Sun, and keepeth off his beams from us: for according to Empedacles,

His Rays aloft she turneth clean side, That to the earth beneath they cannot wend: The earth it felf the doth obscure and hide, So far as she in compass doth extend.

As if this light of the Sun fell upon night and darkness, and not upon another Star. And whereas Poladonius faith, that in regard of the thickness and depth of the Moons body, the light of the Sun cannot through her pierce, as far as unto us, this is manifestly convinced as unusue. For the ayr as infinite as it is, and deeper by many degrees than the Moon, is nevertheless illuminated and lightned all over, and throughout by the Sun. It remaineth therefore, that according to the opinion of Empedacies, the Moon-light which appeareth unto us, cometh by the reflexion and reperculion of the Sun-beams. And hereupon it is, that the same is not with us hot and bright, as of necessity it would be, if it did proceed either from the inflammation or commixtion of two lighs. But like as the Refraction or Reverberation of a Voyce, doth cause an Eccho, or Resonance more obscure than is the Voyce it self, as it was pronounced; and as the raps, that shot, rebounding back again, doth give, are more milde and yield a weak and feeble reflexion or refluxion, as one would fail of light, the force thereof being much abated and refolved by the refraction and reflexion. Then Sylla: Certes, great probability this carrieth with it, that you have delivered : But the most forcible objection that is made against this Posttion, how think you, is it any ways mitigated and mollified? or hath our friend here passed it over quite with filence? Whereby speak you this (quoth Lucius?) what opposition mean you? or is it the doubt and difficulty about the Moon when the appeareth the one half? Even the very fame (quoth stre unite and unitered store trains, confidering that all reflexion is made by equal angles, that when the Half-Moon is in the midft of Heaven, the light should not be carried from her upon the earth, but glance and fall beyond the earth: for the Sun being upon the Horizon, toucheth with his rays the Moon, and and rail beyond the earth: for the soil being upon the fortient continuous thin in ray the moon, and therefore being reflected and broken equally, they mult light upon the opposite bound of the Horizon, and sonot send the light hither; or else there shall ensue a great distortion and difference of the angle, which is impossible. Why, good Sir (quoth Lucius) I dare assure you, this hath not been overpassed, but explained already: and with that, casting his eye as he spake, upon Menelans the Mathematician: 1 am abash:d (quoth he) friend Menelaus, to overthrow a Mathematical Position, that is supposed and laid as a ground, and fundamental principle for oblique matters of mirrors:

And yet, I must (quoth he) of necessity: for that it neither appeareth in this example, nor is generally confessed as true, that all reflexions tend to equal angles, for checked and confuted it is by round embowed or emboffed mirrors, when as they repretent images appearing at one point of the fight, greater than themselves. This also is dispressed by double or two fold mirrors, for that when they be inclined and turned one unto the other, fo as the angle be made within, each of the glaffes or plain superficies, yield the resemblance of a double image, and so represent four in all from one face; two apparent, answerable to that without on the left fide; and other twain obscure, and not so evident on the right side, all in the bottom of the mirrors, where they yield images, in appearance greater than the thing it self, at one point onely of the sight. The same likewise is overthrown by those mirrors which are hollow, wherein the aspect is variable: whereof Plato rendreth a reason and efficient cause: for he faith, that a mirror rifing of the one fide and the other, the fight doth change the reflexion, falling from the one fide to the other: and therefore as the views and visions, some immediately return upon us, others gliding upon the opposite parts of the mirror, have recourse again from thence unto us, it is not possible that all reflexions should be in equal angles: so that when they come to coping and close fight, they think by these oppositions to take from the fluxions of light, carried from the Moon to the Earth, the equality of angles, supposing this to carry more probability with it, than the other. Howbeit, if we must needs yield thus much, and grant this unto our best beloved Geometrian : first and formost, by all likelihood this should befal unto those mirrors that are very fmooth and exquisitely polished: whereas the Moon hath many inequalities, and asperities, in fuch fort, as the rays coming from the valt body of the Sun, and carried to mighty altitudes, which receive one from another, and intercommunicate the lights, as they be fent to and fro, and distributed reciprocally, are refracted, broken, and interlaced all manner of ways, fo as the counter-lights do meet and encounter one another, as if they came from many mirrors unto us. Moreover, if we fhould grant and suppose these reflexions of beams upon the superficies of the Moon, to be made by way of equal angles, there is no impossibility in the matter, but that the same rays being carried so great a way, should have their fractions, fluxions, and delapsions; that thereby the light should be confused and thine the more.

Some also there be who prove by lineary demonstration, that she casteth much of her light to the earth plumb down by direct line drawn under her as the doth encline: But for a man to make such a description and delineation, reading as he doth, and discoursing in a publike Auditory, especially being so frequent, it was not casie, neither could it well be. In brief, I marvel (quoth he) how they came thus to alledge against us the Half-Moon, more than half tipped or croisant. For if the Sun do illuminate the mass, as a man would say, of the Moon, being of a celestial or fiery matter, surely he would not leave half the Sphere or Globe thereof dark always and shadowed without light, to our sense, but how little foever he toucheth her, running as he doth about, reason would give, and convenient it were that she should be wholly replenished and totally changed and turned, by that brightness of his, which spreadeth so quickly, and passeth through all so easily. For considering that wine touching water in one point onely, or a drop of blood falling into fome liquor, dyeth and coloureth the fame all red or purple, like unto blood: and feeing they fay, that the very ayr is altered with light, not by any defluxion or beams intermingled, but by fudden conversion and change, even in a point or prick onely: how can they think that one Star coming to touch another Star, and one light another, should not be mingled immediately, nor make a confusion and mutation throughout, but to illuminate that onely in the outward superficies which it touchesh? For that circle which the Sun maketh in fetching acompais, and turning toward the Moon, one while falling upon the very line which parteth that which is visible in her from the invisible, another while rising up directly, in such fort, as that it both cutteth her in twain, and is cut alfo by her reciprocally, according to divers regards and habitudes a that which is light to the dark, caufing those fundry forms in her, whereby she appeared but half, more than half horned and croisant: This, I say, sheweth more than any thing else, that this illumination of the Moon, whereof we speak all this while, is not a mixture of two lights, but a touching onely, not a collustration or gathering together of fundry lights, but an illustration thereof round about. But for funder has the is not onely illuminate her felf, but he also fendeth back hither unto us the image of that brightness, this confirmeth us more and more in that which we say, as touching her terrene substance. For never are there any reflexions and reverberations upon a thing that is rare nd of fubrile parts; neither may a man eafity fo much as imagine how light from light, or one fire fhould refult and rebound from another: but needs it must be that the fubjeft which maketh the reverberation or reflexion is firm, folid and thick, to the end there may be a blow given against it, and a re-bounding also from it. To prove this, do but mark the ayr, which giveth passige unto the Sun for to pierce quite through it, neither admitteth it any repulse or driving back. Contrariwise we may fee, that from wood, from stones, and from cloathes or garments, hung forth against the same, he maketh many reflections of his light, and illuminations on every fide. And even fo we fee, that the earth by him is illuminate; for he fendeth not his beams to the very bottom thereof as in water, nor throughout the whole as in the ayr: but look what circle the Sun maketh turning about the Moon, and how much he cutteth from her, fuch another there is that compasseth the earth; and just so much and how much ne cuttern from ner, men anomer mere a consequence in the consequence in the orange he doth illuminate always, as he leaveth without light: for that which is illuminate in the one and the some other, is a little more than a Hemisphere. Give me leave therefore now to conclude after the man-meaneth ner of Geometricians by proportion: If, when three things there be, unto which the light of the that dark-Sun cometh, to wit, the Ayr, the Moon, and the Earth, we see that one of them is by him illumi. nessover nate, not as the Ayr, but as the Earth : We must of necessity collect, that those two be of one nather according ture, confidering that of the fame cause they suffer the same effects. Now when all the company the earth highly commended Lucius for this Dissuration Passing well done of you Lucius quark Unon have a which highly commended Lucius for this Disputation: Passing well done of you Lucius (quoth I) you have to a named at proper Discourse annexed as pretty a Comparison; for we must give you your right, and not defraud the very you of that which is your due.

With that smiled Lucius: 1 have yet (quoth he) a second proporti- time that on, which I will adde unto the other, to the end that we may prove by demonstration, that the Moon our Savieur wholly refembleth the Earth, not onely by this, that the fufferent together with the Earth, from the suffered fame cause, the same accidents: but also, because they both do work the life of the work in upon the fame cause, the same accidents: but also, because they both do work the like effects upon the same cross, we object. For this I am fure you will yield and grant unto me, that of all those things which are observed continued about the Sun, none do to much refemble one another, as his Eclypse doth his setting or going down; from the if you will but call to minde that meeting of the Sun and Moon together, which hapned of late days, fixt hour and beginning immediately after noonefted, caufed many a flar from fundry parts of the sky to be feen, of the day, if you will out can to infine that meeting of the day and beginning immediately after noonefled, caufed many a flar from fundry parts of the sky to be feen, of the day and beginning immediately after noonefled, caufed many a flar from fundry parts of the sky to be feen, on the and wrought fuch a temperature or disposition in the Ayr, as is of the twilight evening and morning, minth, that But if you will not grant me the faid (upposition in this, our Theon here will cite and bring, I trow, for lay, blimmermus, Cydius, Architechus: and besides them, Stessebseus and Pindarm, Innenting that in Ectyples, fromnoon, the world is robbed of their greatest light, which they bewail, as if it were enterred, saying, that mid-world thee. the world is robbed of their greatest fight, which they bewan, as it it were enterred, raying, that into of the night was come at noon day, and that the radiant beams of the Sun, went in the way and path of clock after darkness: but above all, he will alledge Homer, saying, that in an Eclypse, the faces and visages of noon, men were overcast and seized upon with night and darkness: also, that the Sun was quite lost and mis *Somwhat Ing out of the Heaven, being in conjunction with the Moon. faid of the

As one goes out, another cometh in. As for the reft, in mine advice, they be as certain, and do conclude as exactly as the demonstrations of the Suss the Mathematicians, to wit, that as the night is the shadow of the earth, so the Eclypse of the Sun, is Eclypse, to the shadow the Moon, when as the sight returneth upon it self. For the Sun going down, is hidden be at any from our fight by the earth, and being Eclypfed, is likewife darkned by the Moon, and both the one other time from our right by the earth, and being ectypted, is income darkned by the March, and the other of the darkness and the other be offsications of darkness; that of the Sun fetting, by the Earth, and the other of the change, by Sun Eclypfed, by the Moon, by the reason that the shade empeacheth our fight: of which premises courte of the conclusion evidently doth follow. because nee-firty it is, that the same accidents or effects in the same subject, must come from the same theient. Now if the darkness occasioned by the Eclypse, be not so deep, nor affect the ayr so forcithy as de to the night, we are not to marvel thereat; for the fubflance of that body which maketh the right, and of it that caufeth the Eclypic, may well be the fame, although the greatness be not equal. To the Egyptians, I suppose, do hold, that the Moon is in bigness the 72. part of the earth: And Anaxagoras faithic is just as big as Peloponnefus. Arifforchus writeth, that the overtwart Line or Dianeter of the Moon, in proportion to that of the earth, is less than it 60, were compared with ninethen 3 and somewhat more than it a hundred and eight were compared with 43. and thereby the earth bereaveth us of all fight of the Sur, fo great it is. For it must be a great obstacle and opposition between, which continueth the rime of a night; and the Moon albeit otherwhile the hideth all the Sun, yet that Eclypte neither lefteth not felling, nor is fo universal : for there appeareth always about his circumference fome light, which will not permit the darkness to be so black and deep, and altogether so obscure. Artiste also, I mean the ancient Philosopher of that name, rendring a reason why there happed Eclypics of the Moon oftner than of the Sun; among other causes, brings in this for one, That the Sun is Eclypfed by the obstruction of the Moon, and the Moon by that of the earth, which is much greater, and more ip ciou , and f by configuence is oppof d very often. And Polidonius defined this accident thus, The E. is ple of the Sun (quoth he) is the conjunction or meeting of the Sun and the Moon, the shadow whereoi doth darken our eye fight : for there is no defect or Eclypse of the Suns light, but unto those, whose fight the fin dow of the Moon hath caught, and so hindreth them from feeing the Sun. Now in contelling that the shadow of the Moon reacheth down unto us, I know not what he hath left himfelf for to allege. Certes, in possible it is, that a Star should cast a fladow; for that which is void altogether of light, is called a fladow, and light maketh no fladow, but contrariwife, naturally riddethit away. But what arguments besides, were alleged to this purpole (quoth he?) Tae Moon (quoth I then) fuffererh the same Eclypse. Well done (quoth he) of you, to reduce this into my memory: Bit would you have me to profecute this Disputation, as if you had already granted and fet down, that the Moon is fubj & to Eclypses, when she is caught within the shadow of the earth; or that for a subject and argument of some declamation, and demontion unto you, I first rehearse all the arguments one after another? Marry, do so, I pray you (quoth Theon) bestow your labor in such a Discourse. I had need verily (quoth he) of some perfwalion, having onely heard iay, that when these three bodier, to wir, the Earth, the Sun, and the Moon, are directly in one tight line, then happen Eclyptes; for that either the Earth, taketh the Sun from the Moon, or the Moon raketh him from the Earth; for the Sun is in defect or Eclypte when the Moon, and the Moon likewise when the earth is in the midft of them Ehree; whereof the one falleth out in conjunction, the other in opposition or Full Moon. Then (quoth Lucius) these be in a manner all the principal points, and the very brief of those that which hath been delivered: But to begin withal, if you think fo good, take in hand that firm argument which is drawn from the form and figure of the shadow, which indeed is a Conus or Pyramis (resembling a sugarloat) with the sharp end forward, namely, when a great fire or great light being round, comprehendeth a mais likewise round; but less : ard hereupon it cometh, that in Eclypses of the Moon, the circumscription of the black or darkness, from the clear and light, have always their sections round: for the approachments and applications of a round body, in what part foever, whether it give or receive those S. dions, by reason of the similitude do always keep a round form, and be circular. Now to the second accument. You know well (I suppose) that the first part the Erlypsed or darkened in the Moon, is that which regardeth the East: and contrariwise in the Sun, that which looketh toward the West: for the shadow of the Earth goeth from East to West, but contrariwise the Sun and Moon, from West Eastward. The experience of the apparitions, giveth us the vilible knowledge of these things: and many words there need not, to make the demonstration hereof plain and evident to be und ritood: by which suppositions is confirmed the cruse of Eclypse: For, in as much as the Sun is Eclypsed when he is overtaken, and the Moon by meeting with that which maketh her Eclypfe, by all likelihood, nay rather necessarily, the one is caught behinde, the other surprized before, for that the obstruction, and inumbration beginneth on that side on which that cometh first that maketh the said inumbration. Now the Moon lighteth upon the Sun from the Weft, as ftring with him in course, and hashing after him: but the shadow of the Earth cometh the from Bass, as having a contrary motion. The third reason is taken from the time and greatness of the Eclypses of the Moon. For when the is Eclypsed on high, and far from the Earth, the continueth but a little while in defect or want of light: but when the fuff-reth the fame default being low and near unto the Earth, the is much oppressed, and slowly getteth she forth of the shade thereof : and yet when the is low, the moveth most swifely, and being aloft, as flowly. But the cause is in the difference of the shadow, which toward the bottom or bale is broader, as are the Cones or Pyramides, and so it growth smaller and smaller taperwise, until at the top it endeth in a sharp point. And hereupon it cometh that the Moon being low, and to falling within the shadow, is compassed with greater circles of the shadow, and so passent through the very bottom of it, and that which is most dark; bus being on high, by reason of the narrow compass of the shadow, being, as it were, in a small puddle of mire, the is but a little fullied or berayed therewith, and so quickly getteth forth of it. Here I pas by the accidents and effects that have their particular causes. For we daily see that the fire, out of a shady place appeareth and shineth the rather, either by reason of the thickness of the dark ayr, which admitteth no effusions nor diffusions of the vertue of the fire, keeping in and containing within it felf the subflance thereof: or rather, if this be a passion of the sense, like as hot things neer unto cold are selt to be more hot, and pleasures presently upon pains found more vehement; even so things clear, appear better when they are laid neer unto those that be dark, by means of different passions, which do strain the imagination : but the former conjecture feemeth to be more probable : for in the Sun-shine, the the magnatum whole nature of fire not onely loseth his brightness, but also in giving place unto it, becometh more dull, and unwilling to burn, for that the heat of the Sun doth scatter and diffigure the force thereof. If then it were true, that the Moon had in it a feeble, and dim or duskish fire, as being a muddy Star, as the Stoicks fay it is, reason it were and meet, that it should not suffer any one of those accidents (but contrary all) which now we see it to suffer, namely, to be seen at that time when as it is hidden; and again to be hidden, what time as the theweth herfelf: that is to fay, to be covered all the rest of the time, being darkned by the ayr environing it, and to shine out again for six monethe. and afterwards for five moneths be hidden, entring within the shadow of the earth. For of 465. and activation of Eclypfed Full Moons 404. arc of fix moneths, and the reft of five. It must needs be then, during this time, the Moon should appear thinling in the shadow: but contrariwise we see, that in the shadow Eclypsed she is, and loseth her light, which she recovereth again afterwards, when his is ccaped and gotten forth of the said shadow, yea, and appeareth often in the day time; so that is is rather any thing else then a fiery body, and resembling a star. Lucius had no sooner thus said, but Pharmaces and Apollonides came running both together, to fet upon him, and to conflute his faceby and then Pharmaces affitted by Apollonides there present: Why, this (quoth he) is that which principally proveth the Moon to be a flar, and to fland much upon fire, namely, that in Eclypses she is not wholly darkned, and not at all to be feen, but sheweth through the shade a certain colour, refembling a coal of fice, and the same fearful to ice to, which is the very natural and proper hue of her own. As for Apollonides, he made inftance and opposition as touching the word shadow: For that (quoth he) Mathematicians by that term use always to call the place which is not illumined, but the heaven admitteth no shadow. Whereto I made answer, that this instance of his was alledged rather against the word contentiously, than against the thing Physically, or Mathematically; for the place which is darkned and obstructed by the opposition of the earth, if ann will not call a shadow, but a place void or deprived of light, yet be it what it will, when soever the Moon is there, you must of necessity confess, that she becometh obscure and darkned: and in one word, Ifay, it is a very abfurd folly to hold, that the shadow of the earth reacheth not to that place, from whence the shadow of the Moon falling upon our fight here upon the earth, causeth the Eclypse of the Sun. And now will I come against o you Pharnaces: For that burnt colour, like a coal in the Moon, which you say is proper unto her, agreeth very well to a body, that hath thickness and depth: Neither use there to remain in bodies which be rare, any mark or token of a slame, nor a coal can possibly be made of a body which is not solid and able to receive deep within it the heat of fire, and the blakness of smoak: As Homer himself sheweth very well in one place, by these

> When flower of five was gone and flowen away, And flame extinct the coals he did forth lay.

For the coal feemeth not properly to be fire, but a body fiery, and altered by fire, remaining still in a folid mass or substance which hath taken, as it were, deep toot : whereas flames are but the setting on fire and fluxions of some nutriment or matter which is of a rare substance, and by reason of feebleness is quickly resolved and confirmed. In so much, as there were not another argument so evident, to prove that the Moon is folid and terreftrial, as this, if the proper colour thereof refemble a coal of fire. But it is not fo, my Pharnaces; for in her Eclypfe the changeth diverfly her colours, which Mathematicians in regard of time and place determinately diffinguish in this fort. If the be eclypsed in the West, she appeareth exceeding black for three hours and an half: if in the middle of the heaven, the showeth this light reddish or bay colour resembling fire : and after seven hours and an halfa there arifeth a reducie indeed. Finally, when this Eclypic hapneth in the East, and toward the Sun rings, the taketh a blew or grayift colour, which is the cause that the Poets, and namely, Empedecles calleth her Glaucopis. Confidering then, that they fee manifeftly how the Moon changeth into fo many colours in the shadow, they do very ill to attribute unto her this colour onely of a burning or live coal : which intruth a man may fay to be less proper unto her than any other, and rather to be fome little foffusion and remnant of light appearing and shining through a shadow; and that her propurand natural colour is black and earthly. For seeing that here below, whereas the lakes and rivers which receive the Sun beams, and by that means feem in their superficies to be some time reddish. and other whiles of a violet colour, the shadowy places adjoyning take the same colours, and are illuminated, flaring back by reason of reflexions, and divers rebated splendures. What wonder is it, if a great river (as it were) or flux of shadow falling upon a celefial sea, as a man would say of a light not sim, stedy and quiet, but stirred with innumerable stars walking over it, and besides, which admitted the same of the same divers mixtures and mutations, doth take from the Moon the impression of fundry colours, and send the same hither unto us? For it cannot be avowed, that a star or fire should appear through a shadow either black, blew, or violet; but hills, plains, and seas, are seen to have many and sundry resemblances of colours by reflexion of the Sun running upon them, which are the very tinctures, than a brightness, mingled with shadows and miss (as it were) with Painters drugs and colours.

bringeth upon them: which tinctures Homer went about to express in some fore, and to name, when one while he calleth the fea, 1800 Mf, and 01004, that is to fay, of a violet colour, or deep red as wine, and otherwhile the waves purple : in one place the fea blew, green or grey, and the calm white : as and otherwine and colours appearing upon the earth diverfly, he hath let them pais, as I suppose, for that they be in number infinite. So, it is not like that the Moon should have but one plain, and even fuperficies in manner of the fea, but rather resemble naturally of all things especially the earth, whereof old Socrates in Plate Cemeth to fable, whether it were, that under covert words and enigmatically he meant this here of the Moon, or fpake of some other. For it is neither incredible nor wonderful if the Moon in it having no corruption nor muddiness, but the fruition of pure light from heaven, and being full of heat, not of furious and burning fire, but of fuch as is milde and harmlefs, bath allow thin her fair places and marvellous pleasant mountains also, resplendent like bright slaming fire, purple tinctures or zones, gold and filver likewife good flore, not dispersed here and there in the bottom thereof, but ariling up to the upper face of the faid plains in great abundance, or elfe spread over tom thereot, but arising up to the copy, had to the samplants in given administry or enterpread over the hills and mountains, even and fmooth. Now fay, that the tight of all thete things cometh unto us through a shadow, and that after diversand fundry sorts, by reason of the variable and different us through a shadow, and that after diversand fundry sorts, by reason of the variable and different us through a shadow, and that after diversand fundry sorts. eth of her, and the reputation of her divinity, being efteemed among men a celeftial earth, or rather a feculent and troubled fire, as the Stoicks would have it, and standing much upon kees or dreggish matter. For the very fire it self hath barbarian honors done unto it among the Medes and Affyrians, who for very fear ferve and adore fuch things as be noyfome and hurful, hallowing and confecrating the fame above those things which are of themselves good and honorable. As for the name of the earth, there is not a Greek, but he holdeth it right worshipful, facred and venerable: in so much as it is an ancient custom received throughout all Greece, to honor it as much as any other god whatsoever. And far is it from us men, to think that the Moon which we take to be a celeftial earth, is a dead body without foul or spirit, and altogether void of such things, which we ought to offer as first fruits to the gods. For both by law we yield recompence and thankfgiving unto it, for those good things which we have received, and by nature we adore the fame, which we acknowledge to be the most excellent for vertue, and right honorable for puissance, and therefore we think it no fin at all, to suppose the Moon to be earth. To come now unto the face that appeareth therein: like as this earth upon which we walk hath many finuofities and valleys, even so as probable it is, that the said heavenly earth, lieth open with great deep caves, and wide chinks and ruptures, and those containing either water or obscure ayr: to the bottom thereof the light of the Sun is not able to pierce and reach, but there falleth, and fendeth to us hither a certain divided reflexion. Then Apollonides: Now I befeech you good Sir, even by the Moon herfelf, think you it is possible that there should be shadows of caves, gulfs, and chinks there, and that the fame should be discovered by our fight here? or do you,not make reckoning of that which may come thereof? What is that (quoth I.) Marry, I will tell you, (quoth he) and albeit you are not ignorant thereof, yet may you give me the hearing. The Dianieter of the Moon, according to that bigness which appeareth unto us, in the mean and ordinary diffances, is twelve fingers breadth long: and every of those black and dark shadowy streaks therein, is more than half a finger, that is to fay, above the four and twentieth part of the faid Diameter. Now if we suppose, the whole circumference of the Moon to be thirty thousand stadia, and according to that supposition the Diameter be ten thousand, every one of those obscure and shadowy marks within her, will notbe les than five hundreth Stadia, or thereabout. Consider then first, whether it be possible that there should be in the Moon so great profundities, and such rugged inequalities, as to make fo big a shadow? and then, whether being so great, their bigness should not be descryed and feen by us? Hereupon I fmiling upon him: Now I affure you Apollonides (quoth 1) I con you thank, you have done it very well, in deviting such a proper demonstration, whereby you will prove both me and your felf also to be greater than those Gyants Aloiades, I mean not at every hour of the day, but especially in the morning and evening: do you think that when the Sun maketh our shadows to long, he yieldeth unto our fense this goodly collection and argumentation, that if the thing which is shadowed be great, then that which maketh the shadow must needs be exceeding great? Neither of us twain, I wot well, hath ever been in the Isle Lemmos, and yet both of us have many a time, heard this vulgar lambique verse so rife in every mans mouth:

'Ares nanifer and get Augules Bobs, The Monutain Athos shall on either side, The Cow that stands in Lemnos bide.

For this shadow of the hill falleth as it should feem, upon a certain brazen Image of an Heiser in that side, reaching in length over sea no less than 700 stadies; not because the side Mountain which maked the shadow is of that height, but because the distances of the light causeth the shadow of bodies to be the shadow in the bodies are. Go to then, confider that when the Moon is at the full, at what time as sharendreth unto our eye the form of a visage most expressly, by reason of the prosundity of the shadow within, then is she also farthest distant from the Sun: for the far recoiling and withdrawing backward of the light, is it that makes the shadow great, and not the bigness of the inequalities, which are upon the superficies of the Moon. Moreoverly, you see that the excelling slutering of the Sun shining all about, will now suffer a man to see in the day time the very tops of Mountains: but the deep, bollow, and shadowy parts therein, appear very far off.

therefore no abfurdity at all, that a man is not able exactly to fee and differn that full light and illutherefore no bottom, as But that the opposition of dark shadows unto clear lights, by reason of their mination of the fine the second control of the second of t flexion, and reverberation which is faid to rebound from the Moon, for that they who stand within the rays or beams that are returned and retorted back, have means to fee not onely that which is illumined, but that allo which doth illuminate. For when, in the resultation of a light from the water upon somewall, the sight falleth upon the very place it felf, which is thus illuminate by the water upon some want, and agent amount upon the very prace it ten, which is thus intuminate by the reflexion, the eye feeth three things, to wit, the beams or fhining light driven back, the water which makesh that reflexion, and the Sun it felf, whose light hitting upon the superficies of the which makent that retrivious, and the out it ters, whose agest intering upon the superficies or the water, is reflexed and sent back. This being generally granted as a thing evidently seen, yet by way of objection, they bid those who affirm, that the earth is illuminate from the Moon by the refliction of the Suns light from it, to shew by night the Sun appearing in the superfices of the Moon, like as he may be feen in the day time within the water upon which he fhineth, when there is the forefaid reflexion of his beams. But because he cannot then be seen, they infer, that it must be by some other manner, and not by reflexion, that the Moon is illuminate; and if there be no fuch reflexion, then cannot the Moon in any wise be Earth. How shall this be met withal, and what answer on, then cannot the witten, and what snewer fall be shaped unto it (quoth Apollonides) for the reason of reservoir seemeth all one, and commonas well to us as to you? True (quoth!) common it is in fome fort, and in some fort not. but first mark, I befeech you, the comparison, how they go clean kim, kam, and against the stream; as if rivers ran up hills for the water is here beneath upon the earth, and the Moon is above and in the heaven: in such fort, as the beams reflected, make the form of their angles opposite and quite contrary one unto the other, the one carrying the head or point upward against the superficeis of the Moon, the other downward to the ground. Let them not then demand and require that a mirror should render every form or face alike, nor that in every diffance there should be equal, or semthould render every form or face arms, not that the every unique there mound be equal, or the blable reflexion, for in fo doing they would go against apparent evidence. And they who hold the Moon to be a body not smooth, even, and subtile as water is, but solid, massy, and terestrial, I cannot conceive why they should look for to see the San in it as in a glass. For milk verily doth not yield fuch speculary images, nor cause reflexion of the sight, by reason of the inequality and rugged asperity of the parts: How is is possible then, that the Moon should send back from ty and rugged apperts of the party is the party is a point of the fight, at mirrors do which are more polithed? And even this also, if any rafe, blur, filth, or consuled foort have caught them in the superficies, from whence the fight being reflected is wont to receive the impression of some figure, may well be seen, but counter light they yield none; and he who requireth, that either the Sun should appear in the Moon, or our sight be redoubled against the Sun, let him require withal, that the eye be the Sun, the fight thereof the light, and man, heaven. For like it is that the erest xion of the Sun beams against the Moon, for their vehicles ment and exceeding great brightness, should with a stroke rebound upon us: But seeing our sight is weak and feeble, what marvel is it, if it neither give fuch a firoke as might rebound, nor mainain the continuity thereof if it leaped back again, but is broken and faileth, as nothaving that abundance of light, whereby it should not be difgregate and diffipated, within those uneven and un qual afterities? For it is not possible that the reflexion of our right upon water, or other forts of mirrors, whiles the same is yet strong, and able, as being neer unto the spring from whence it cometh, food door return again upon the eye. But from the Moon, Suppose there may rebound some glimmering glances, certes, they be all weak and obscure, failing in the very way, by reason of to long adiffance. For otherwise, arched and hollow mirrors fend back their reflected rays with more force, than they came, in such forces many times they catch fire and do burn : whereas the imported norce, toan circy came, in the total country and paring out like a bowl, calf from them feeble and dark and and curbed mirrors made round, and bearing out like a bowl, calf from them feeble and dark and the curbed mirrors made in the country of t because they beat them not back on all sides. You see certainly, when two Rain bows appear in the heaven, by reason that one cloud doth inviron and comprehend another, that the Rain bow which compassion by reason that one contact does not not also compassed and not sufficiently diffined and expressed, because the outward cloud being farther remote from our fight, maketh not a strong and forcible refixion. And what needs there any more to be faid? confidering that the very light of the Sun returned and fent back by the Moon, loseth all the heat : and of his brightness there cometh unto us with much ado but a small remnant, and a portion very little and feeble. Is it impossible then that our fight running the fame race, there should any parcel or residue thereof reach from the Moon back again agair confine the same race, there mound any parter of remute thereof reach from the Moon back again to the Sun? for mine own part, I think not. Confider also, I beseech you (quoth I) even your own selves, that if our eye-fight were affected and disposed alike by the Water, and by the Moon, it could not otherwise be, but that the Moon should represent unto us the images of the earth, of trees, of plants, of men, and of stars, as well as water doth, and all other kindes of mirrors. Now if there be no fuch reflexion of our eye-fight from the Moon, as to brink back unto us those images, either for the feebleness of it, or the rugged inequality of her superficies, let us never require that it should leap back as far as to the Sun. Thus have we reported as much as our memory would carry away, what foever was there delivered : Now is it time to defire Sylla, or rather to require and exact of him, to make his narration, for that admitted he was to here this discourse upon such a condition. And therefore if you think fo good, lee us give over walking, and fitting down here upon these seats, make him a se-dentary audience. All the company liked well of this motion. And when we had taken our places, Them. thus began, Certes I am desirous (quoth he) and none of you all more, to hear what shall be faid;

But before I would be very glad to understand somewhat of those who are faid to dwell in the Moon. not whether there be any persons there inhabiting, but whether it be possible that any should inhabit there. For it this cannot be, then it were meer folly, and befide all reason, to say, that the Moon is there. For it the cannot be, then there is not start in wain, and to no end: as bearing no fruits, earth: otherwife it would be thought to have been created in vain, and to no end: as bearing no fruits, no factor in the carth wherein we have or women, in regard of which caufe, and for which ends we firmly hold, that this earth wherein we live, as Plant and the carth wherein we live, as Plant wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein we live wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein wherein we live wherein where faith, was made and created, even to be our nourse and keeper, making the day and night diffinct one from another. For you fee and know, that of this matter, many things have been faid as well merrily, and by way of laughter, as serioully and in good earnest. For of those who inhabit the Moon, Tome are faid to hang by the heads under it, as if they were fo many Tantali; others contrariwise, who dwell upon it, are tyed fast, like a fort of Ixions, and turned about with such a violence, that they are in danger to be flung and shaken out. And verily she moveth not after one fingle motion, but three manner of ways; whereupon the Poets call her otherwhile, resolitis, or Trivia, performing her confe together, according to length, breadth, and depth in the Zodiack. Of which mortons, the first is called, A direct revolution; the second, An oblique winding or wheeling in and out; and the third, the Mathematicians call (I wote not how) An inequality: and yet they see, that she had no motion at all even and uniform, nor certain in all her monethly circuits and reversions. No marvel therefore, confidering the impetuofity of these motions, if there fell a Lyon sometimes one of her into Pelaponness: nutring the impectantly of the many section of the many table where we are to wonder, why we fee not every day a thoutand falls of men and women, yea, and as many beath thaken out from thence, and flung down headlong with their beels upward. For it were as many beath thaken out from thence, and flung down headlong with their beels upward. For it were a meer mockery, to dispute and fland upon their habitation there, if they neither can breed nor abide there, For confidering that the Egyptians and Troglodites, over whose heads the Sun standethdirectly one moment onely of the day in the time of the Solftices, and then prefently retireth, hardly escape burning, byreason of the excessive ficcity of the circumstant ayr; how possibly can the men in the Moon endure twelve Summers every year, when the Sun once a moneth is just in their Zenith, and fettleth plum over head, when she is at the full? As for winds, clouds, and rains, without which the plants of the earth can neither come up nor be preferred, it paffeth all imagination, that there should be any there, the ayr is so subtile, dry and hot; especially, seeing that even here beneath; the higheft Mountains do not admit or feel the hard and bitter Winters from year to year, but the aye about them being pure and clear, and without any agitation whatfoever, by reason of the subtility and lightness, avoideth all that thickness and concretion which is among us: unless haply we will fay; that like as Minerva infilled and dropped into Achilles mouth some Netter and Ambressa; when he received no other food; fo the Moon, who both is called, and is indeed Minerva, nourilheth men there, bringeth forth daily for them Ambrofia, according as old Pherecides was wont to fay, that the very gods also were fed and nourished. For as touching that Indian root, which (as Megajitemes faith) certain people of India, who neither eat nor drink, nor have fo much as mouthes, whereupon they be called Aftomi, do burn and make to smoak, with the odor and persume whereof, they live; how can they come by any fuch there, confidering the Moon is never watered nor refreshed with rain? When Theon had thus faid: You have (quoth 1) very properly and sweetly handled this point; you have ([ay) by this merry conceited jeft, layed fmooth and even, those bent and knit brows, the austrity (I mean) of this whole Discourse; which bath given us heart, and encouraged us to make an fwer : for that, if we fail and come short, we look not for streight examination, nor fear any sharp and grievous punishment. For to say a truth, they who take most offence at these matters, rejecting and discrediting the same, are not so great adversaries unto those who are most perswaded thereof; but fuch as will not after a milde and gentle fort confider that which is possible and probable. First and formost therefore, this I say, that, suppose there were no men at all inhabiting the Moon, it doth not necessarily follow therefore, that the wasmade for nothing, and to no purpose : for we see that even this earth here is not thorowout inhabited, nor tilled in all parts: nay, there is but a little portion thereof habitable, like unto certain promontories or demy-Mands arifing out of the deep fea, for to breed, ingender and bring forth plants and living creatures: for of the reft, fome part is defert, waste and barren, by reason of excessive cold and heat; but in truth, the greatest portion lieth drowned under the great and main sea. But you (for the great love that you bear to Aristarchus, whom you admire so much, and evermore have in your hands) give no ear to Grates, notwithstanding that you read thefe verfes in Homer :

The ocean Sea, from whence both men and gods were first ibred, With furging waves the greatest part of earth doth overspred.

And yet God forbid, that these parts should be said for to have been made for nought: for the Sea doth expire and breathe forth certain milde vapors: and the most gentle and pleasant winds which arise and blow in the greatest heat of Summer, come from frozen regions, and not inhabited for extream cold, which the fnow melting and thawing by little and little do fend from them, and featter over all our Countreys. And earth (as Plate faith) arifeth out of the Sea in the midfl, as a Guardianch and Workmiftress of night and day. What should hinder then, but that the Moon also may well be without living creatures in it, and yet give reflexions unto the light diffused and spread about her? yea, and yield a receis or receptacle of the flars rays which have their confluence, meeting and temperature in her, whereby the concocteth the evaporations afcending from the earth, and withall, abateth the overardent and fiery heat of the Sun. Over and besides, attributing as we do very much to the ancient opinion and voice which we have received from our forefathers, we will be bold to fay, that she hath been reputed Diana, as a Virgin, barren and fruitlesse, but otherwise salutary, helpfull and profitable to the world. And of all this that hath been faid (my good friend Theen) there is nothing that doth prove and firm directly, this habitation of men in the Moon to be impossible: for her turning about being fo mild, fo kinde and calm, polisheth the air near unto it, it distributeth and spreadeth the same all about in so good disposition, that there is none occasion given to fear, that those who live in it should fall down or slide out of her, unlesse she also come down withall. As for that manifold variety of her motions, it proceedeth not from any inequality, error or confusion, but the Afirologers demonstratively shew thereby an order and course most admirable, contriving it so, that she should be fast within certain circles that turn and winde about other circles, some devising that she her felf ftirreth not, others supposing that the moveth alwaies equally, smoothly and in conform celerity: for these are the ascensions of divers circles, the circumversions and turnings about, habiunder in references one to another, yea, and respective to us, which make most elegantly those orderly elevations and depressions in altitude, which appear in her motion, yea, and her digressions in latitude, all joyntly with that ordinary and direct revolution of hers in longitude. As touching that exceeding heat and continuall inflammation of the Sun, you will cease (I am sure) to be afraid thereof, in case, first and formost, you will lay to those eleven hot and estivall conjunctions, as it were in exchange, as many oppositions when she is at the full; and then oppose unto those excessive and enormous extremities which hold not long, the continuall change and mutation, which reduceth them into a proper and peculiar temperature, taking from them that which is excellive and overmuch in both: for it feemeth very probable, that the time between is a feafon refembling the Springtide. Moreover, the Sun sendeth his beames into us thorow a gross: and troubled air, casting his heat nourished and fed by evaporations: whereas the aire there, about the Moon, being subtile and transparent, doth difgregate and disperse the said beames, as having no nouriture to maintain them, nor body to settle upon. To come now unto Trees, Woods, and Fruits; here indeed with us, they be the raines that nourish them: but in other high Countries with you, namely, about * Thebes and Siene, it is not the water * In Egipt from heaven, but out of the earth, that feedeth them : for the earth being foaked therewith, and befides refreshed with cool winds and comfortable dewes, would be loth to compare in fertility with the best watered ground in the world, such is the goodnesse, vertue and temperature of the soil. And verily the trees of the same kinde with us, if they have been well Wintered, that is to say, if they have endured a sharp and long Winter, bring forth plenty of good fruit; but in Liby a and with you in Egypt, they are foon hurt and offended with cold, and it they fear exceedingly. And whereas the provinces of Gederofia and Trogloditis, lying hard upon the Ocean Sea, be very barren by reason of their drouth , and are altogether without trees : yet within the Sea adjoyning thereto , and which beateth upon the continent, there grow trees of a wonderfull bigneffe, yea, and there be that put forth freshand green, at the very bottom of the Sea . whereof fome they call Olive trees, others, Lawrels, and fome again Isis haires. As for those Plants which be called Anancamserotes, after they be plucked forth of the ground where they grow, and so be hanged up, they do not only live as long as a man would have them, but (which more is) bud and put forth green leaves. Moreover, of those Plants which are fet or fown, some, at namely, Centaury, if they be planted or sowed in a rich or fat soil, and the same well drenched and watered, do degenerate and grow out of their naturall qualitie, yea, and leefe all their vertue, for that they love to grow drie, and in their proper nature and foil agreeable thereto, they thrive passing well. Others cannot so much as away with any dewes, as the most part of the Arabian plants; for wet them once, they millike, fade and die. What marvell then if there grow within the Moon, Roots, Seeds, Plants, and Trees, that have no need either of shewers, or of Winter wind and weather, but are appropriate naturally to a subtile and drie air, such as the summer feafon doth afford? And why may it not fland with good reason, that the Moon her self sends certain warm winds, and that by her shaking and agitation, as she still moveth, there should bring forth a fweet and comfortable air, fine dewes, and gentle moistures, spred and dispersed all about, sufficient to maintain the plants fresh and green : considering withall, that the of her own temperature is not ardent, nor exceeding dry, but rather foft and moift, and ingendring all humidity? For there cometh not from her unto us, any one effector accident of ficcity, but of moisture and of a feminine and soft conflitution, many; to wit, the growing and thriving of plants, the putrefaction of flesh killed, the turning of wines to be fowre, flat, and dead, the frumnesse and tendernesse of wood, and the easte deliverance of women in Child-birth. But I fear me, that I should move and provoke Pharnaces again, who all this while fitteth still and sayeth nought, if I allege the ebbing and flowing, or the inundations of the great Ocean, as they themselves say, the firthes, streights, and armes of the Sea, which swell and rife by the Moon, naturally given to encrease moisture and breed humours: and therefore I will direct my words toward you rather, friend Theon, for you say unto us, in expounding these verses of the Poet Aleman.

> What things on earth the dem, as Nourse doth feed, Which Jupiter and Moon between them breed, that in this place he calleth the air Jupiter, and faith that being moistened by the Moon, he is converted into dew: for the Moon (my good friend) feemeth in nature to be quite contrary unto the Sun, not onely in this, that whatfoever doth thicken, dry, and harden, she is wont to refolve, moissen and mollifie, but that which more is, to humed and refrigerate the hear that cometh from him, when the fame ligheth upon her, or is mingled with her. Therefore as well they who suppose the Moon to be a fiery and ardent body, do erre, as those who would have the Creatures there inhabiting, to have all things necessary for their generation, food and maintenance, like unto them that live here; never confidering the great difference nor inequality which is in nature, wherein there be found greater and more varieties and diversities of living Creatures, one with another, than with other things: neither would there be men in the world without mouths, and whose lips are grown up together, and who were nourished also with smells onely, in case men would not live without solid and substantiall food. But that power of Nature, which Ammonius himself hath shewed us, and which Hesiodus under covert words hath given us to understand by these verses,

In Mallows and in Ashdodels which grow on every grounds What use and profit manifold, for man there may be founds

Epimenides hath made plain and evident indeed and effect, teaching us, that nature fuffaineth and preferveth a living Creature with very finall food and maintenance: for fo it may have but as much as an olive, it needs no more nourishment, but may live therewith and do full well. Now it is very like and probable, that those who dwell within the Moon, if any else be light, active and nimble of body, and eafie to be nourished with any thing whatsoever : also that the Moon (as well as the Sunne, who is a Living Creature, flanding much upon fire, and by many degrees greater than the Earth) is nourished and maintained as they say, by the humours which are upon the earth, like as all other flarres, which are in number infinite. So light and flender they imagine shofe living Creatures to be, that are above and fo foon contented and fatisfied with small necessaries. But we neither fee this nor yet consider that a diverse Region, nature and temperature is meet and agreeable unto them: much like, as if when we could not our felves come near unto the Sea, nor touch and taff it, but have feen it onely afar off, and heard that the water in it is bitter, brackish, salt, and not potable, one should come and sell us, that it nourisheth a mighty number of great Creatures, of all forts and forms, living in the bottome thereof, and that it is full of huge and monstrous beasts, which make use of the water, as we do of air ; he would be shought to tell us Tales and monstrous Fables : even so it seemeth that we frand affected and disposed in these matters of the Moon, not believing that there be any men inhabiting within it. But I am verily perswaded, that they may much more marvell, seeing the Earth here afar off, as the dregges, sediment and ground as it were of the whole world, appearing unto them through moift clouds, and foggy mifts, a small thing God wots and the same without light, base, abject, and unmoveable: how the same should breed, nourish, maintain, and keep living Creatures which have motion, breathing, and vitall heat: and in case they had ever heard these verses onros Homer, as touching certain habitations,

Ugly and foul, most hideous to be seen: Whereof the gods themselves right fearfull been ;

Under the earth beneath, and bell unfeen, As far as heavens from earth removed been;

they would think verily and fay, that they had been spoken of this Earth here: and that dark hell and Tartarus were here situate, and far remote: as also that the Moon onely was the Earth, as being equally diftant from heaven above and hell beneath. Now before I had well made an end of my speech, Sylla taking the words out of my mouth : Stay a while (quoth he) O Lamprias, your speech; and hold off with your boat, as they fay, for fear you run an end with your Tail upon the ground ere you be aware, and mar all the play, which for this present hath another Scene and disposition; and I my felf am the actour : but before I proceed farther, I will bring forth mine Authour unto you, if there be nothing to impeach me; who beginneth in this manner with a verse of Homer-Far from the Main, within the Ocean Sea,

There lies an Hand hight Ogygiz, diffant from Great Brittain or England Westward, sive dayes failing: And other three lies there be, of like diffance one from the other, and from the faidlland bearing North-Weft, whereas the Sun fet-teth in Summer: in one of which the barbarous people of the Countrey do fable and feign that Saturn was detained and kept prisoner by Jupiter. Now for the keeping as well of it, as of those other Isles, and the whole Sea adjacent, which was called Saturns Sea, the Gyant Ogygius, or Briareus was placed: as alfo that the Main and firm Land, wherewith the great fea is bordered round about, is remowed from the other lies not fo far, but from Ogygie five hundred if adia or there about: unto which men nie to row in Gallies, for that Sca is very chbe and low, hardly to be paffed by great Veffels, by reason of the huge quantity of mudde brought thither by a number of rivers, which running out of the main Continent, discharge themselves into it, raising mighty stelves and barrer, whereby the Sca is choked up as it were with earth, and hardly navigable: which gave occasion of that old opinion which went thereof; that it should be frozen and stand all over with an ice. Well, the coasts along the firm land, which lie upon this Sea, are inhabited by Greeks, all about a mighty Bay or Gulf thereof, no leffe spacious than the huge Lake Meetis, the mouth or entrance whereof lieth directly opposite unto that of the Caspian Sea: these people are reputed and named to be the inhabitants of the Continent or firm land, accounting and calling all us llanders, as dwelling in a land environed round ahout, and washed with the Sea. They suppose also, that they in old time who accompanied Hercules, and being left by him, abode there, and intermingled afterwards with the people and Nations of Saturn, canted to revive again the Greek Nation there, well neer extinguished, which being subdued and brought under the Language, Lawes, Manners and Fashions of the Barbaians, flourished again by these means, was well peopled, and recovered their ancient puissance and greatnesse. And hereuponit is that meanings was been principall honour, they do unto Hercules, but in a Good place, to Saturn. Now when the flar of Saturn, which we call Phenon, and there by his faying, Nyūnus is entred into the fign Tantus, (and that it doth once in the space of 30 years) they having long before prepared all necesfaries for a folemn facrifice, and a long voiage or navigation, fend forth those upon whom the lot falleth, to row in that huge Sca, and to live a long time in a strange Countrey. Now when they be imbarqued and entred once into the wide and open Sea, they take their adventured fortune as it falleth our. Such as have paffed the dangers of the Sea and arrived in fairty, land fift in those lands lying opposite against them, being inhabited by Greek Nations, where they see the Sun to be hidden from hem, not one full hour in thirty dayes (and that is all their night) whereof the darkneffe is but fmall, as having a twilight in the West where the Sun went down, much like the dawning of the day. Having heremade their abode for ninety dayes, during which space they were highly honoured aud found great entertainment, as being reputed holy men and fo termed, conducted they are with the winds, and transported over into the Island of Saturn: which is inhabited by no others but by themselves, and fuch as had been fent thither before time in this manner. For albeit lawfull it is for them, after they have done service unto Saturn the time of thirty years, to fail home again into their own Countrey; yet for the most part they chuse to remain there still in peace and rest, than to return soon, for that they be already inured and accustomed to the place: others, because without any labour and trouble of theirs, they have plenty of all things, as well for their facrifices, as for the ordinary maintenance of fuch, as continually are given to their books, and to the fludy of Philosophy. For furely by their sying, the nature of the Island and the mildnesse of the air is wonderfull. And whereas some of them were willing to depart from thence, they have been stayed and empeached by a Divine power, which bath appeared unto them as unto their friends and familiars, not onely in dreams and by way of outward fignes, but visibly also unto many of them, by the means of familiar spirits and angels, deviling and talking with them. For they fay that Saturn himfelf is personally there, within the deep eave of a great bollow rock fining and glittering like pure gold, where he lieth affeep, for that Jupi-ter had devised for him sleep, instead of other chains and bonds, to keep him fast for stirring. But there be certain birds haunting the top of the said rock, which slied own from thence and carry unto him the Divine sood Ambrasia. As for the whole Island, it is by report replenished with a most fragrant and odoriferous perfume, which out of that Gave, as from a lively fountain doth breath forth continually, and the faid Dæmons or Angels do attend and wait upon Saturn, such I mean as were his Courtiers and minions, at what time as he reigned as Soveraign over gods and men; who having the skill of Prophecie and Divination, do of themselves foretell many future things: howbeit of the greatest matters and of most importance, they make report and relation after they have been down below with Saturn, as his dreams revealed unto them: For whatfoever Jupiter thinketh, and devifeth of before, Saturn dreameth. As for his sudden weakenings they be Titannincall passions and perturbations of the spirit in him. But his sleep is mild and sweet, wherein he sheweth his Divine and Royall nature of it felf pure and incontaminate. And thither (quoth he) this stranger and friend of mine being brought, where he ferved god Saturn at his case and repose, attained unto the skill of Astrology, to far forth as it is possible for one that had the exact knowledge of Geometry. And among other parts of Philosophy, he gave himself unto that which is called naturall. But having a longing defire to vilit & fee the great Island for so they call the firm land wherein we are) after the thirty years were past, and his succeffors thither arrived, taking his leave of his kinsfolk and friends whom he bad sarwell, he took Sea in other respects lightly and nimbly appointed, but good store he carried with him of Voyageprovision within pots and cups of Gold. But to recount unto you in particular what adventures to him efell, how many Nations he visited, through what Countries he travelled, how he searched into holy Wittings, and was professed in all Religious Orders and holy Confraternities, one whole day would not be sufficient (I say) to rehearse, as he himself delivered the same unto us, particularising very well of every thing : but as much as concerneth this present Discourse, listen and I will relate unto you. For he continued a long time at Carthage, where he was greatly honoured and respected, as also amongus, for that he found facred skins of Parchment, which at the overthrow and Saccage of the former City called great Garthage had been ferretly conveyed thither and lain hidden a long time un-der the ground. So he faid, that of those good which appear unto us in heaven, we ought (and so he advised me also) to adore and worship especially the Moon, as the principall Guide and Mistris of our life. Whereat when I marvelled, and befought him to expound and declare the same more plainly : The Greeks (quoth he) O Sylla, talk very much of the gods; but in all things they fan not well. As for example, first and foremost, in naming Geres and Professions they do well and right; but to put them both together, and think that they are both in one and the fame place, they do smiles; for the one, to wit, Geres, is upon the Earth, the very Dame and Mistress of all those things they show the resound, but the chapter is in the Mann and Mistress of all those things the resound. that be above the ground; but the other is in the Moon, and called the is by them that inhabit Mmmm 2

the Moon, Gore, and Persephonic, that is to say, Proseppina: Persephonic, as one would say, employs, for that the bringeth light and brightnesse; for that the bringeth light and brightnesse; to that the bringeth light and brightnesse; to the best of the brightnesses. eye, in which is feen the image of him who looketh into it, like as the brightnesse of the Sun appeareth in the Moon, we call Core. Now whereas it is faid that they go up and down wandring and feeking one the other, the same carrieth some truth with it: for they defire and long after one another ing one the other, the lame carried that the dark many times. Moreover, when they be parted and afunder, and they embrace one the other in the dark many times. Moreover, that this Core or Proferpina is one while above in heaven, and in the light, another while in darkneffe and the night, is not untrue; onely there is some errour in reckoning and numbring the time. For we fee her not fix moneths, but every fixth moneth, or from fix moneths to fix moneths, under the Earth, as under her mother, caught with the shadow: and seldome is it sound, that this should happen within five Monethe: for that it is impossible that the should abandon and leave Plute, being his wife; according as Homer hath signified, although under dark and covert words, not untruly saying,

But to the fartheit borders of the Earth and utmost end. Even to the fair Elyfian fields the gods then shall thee fend.

For look where the shadow endeth and goeth no further, that is called the limit and end of the Earth. and thither no wicked and impure person shall ever be able to come. But good folk after their death in the world being thither carried, lead there another easie life in peace and repose; howbeit, not altogether a bleffed, happy and divine life, untill they die a fecond death : but what death this is, ask me not, my Sylla, for I purpose of my self to declare, and shew it unto you hereaster. The yulgar fort be of opinion that man is a fubject compounded: and good reason they have so to think: but tion believing that he conflicts of two parts onely, they are deceived: for they imagine that the understanding is in some fort a part of the soul; but the understanding is better than the soul, by how much the foul is better and more Divine than the body. Now the Conjunction or Composition of the the foul with understanding, maketh reason, but with the body, passion: whereof this is the beginning and Principle of pleasure and pain, the other of versue and vice. Of these three conjoyeed and compact remorphe or presure and pain, the sound of return and view. Or the entire conjugate and compate in one, the Earth yieldeth for her part the body, the Moon the foul, and the Sun understanding to the generation or Creation of man's and Understanding giveth reason unto the soul; * * * * even as the Sun, light and brightness to the Moon. As touching the deaths which we die, the one maketh man of three two, and the other of two one. And the former verily is in the region and Jurisdiction of Ceres, which is the cause that we facrifice unto her. Thus it cometh to passe that the Athenians called in old time those shat were departed, Δαματρούν, that is to say, Cereales. As for the other death it is in the. Moon or Region of Proferpina. And as with the one terrefiriall Mercury, fo wish the other Celefiall Mercury dothinhabit. And verily Ceres diffolyeth and separateth the foul from the body suddenly and forcibly with violence: but Proframe parteth the understanding from the foul, gently, and in long time. And hereupon it is, she is called, Marshain, as one would say, begetting one: for that the better part in a man becometh one and alone, when by her it is separated: and both the one, and the other hapneth according to nature. Every foul without understanding, as also endued with underflanding, when it is departed out of the body, is ordained by fatall definy to wander for a time, but not both alike, in a middle Region between the Earth and the Moon. For fach fouls as have become just, wicked and diffolute, suffer due punishment and pains for their sinfull deserts: whereas the good and honest, untill such time as they have purified, and by expiration purged forth of them, all those infections which might be contracted by the contagion of the body, as the cause of all evill, must remain for a certain fet time, in the mildest Region of the air, which they call the Meddows of Plato. Afterwards, as if they were returned from fome long Pilgrimage or wandring exile into their own Countrey, they have a taste of joy, such as they feel especially, who are professed in holy mysterics, mixed with trouble and admiration, and each one with their proper and peculiar hope: for it driveth and chaseth forth many souls, which longed already after the Moon. Sometake pleasure to be still beneath, and even yet look downward, as it were to the bottome: but such as be mounted aloft, and are there most surely bestowed, first as victorious, stand round about adorned mounted alone, and are there most threely decreased, first as victorious, find an observation with Garlands, and those made of the wings of Enflathins, that is to say, Constancy: because in their life time here upon earth, they had bridled and restrained the unreasonable and passible part of the soul, and made it subject and obedient to the bridle of reason. Secondly, they resemble in sight, the rayes of the Sun. Thirdly, the foul thus afcended on high, is there confirmed and fortified by the the rayes of the sum and feel by their pure Air about the Moon, where it doth gather strength and folidity, like as iron and steel by their pure Air about the Moon, where it doth gather strength and folidity, like as iron and steel by their pure Air about the Moon, where it doth gather strength and folidity, like as iron and steel by their thindres become hard. For that which hitherto was loose, rare and spongeous, growth close, comtinued to the strength and strength a pact, and firm, yea, and becometh shining and transparent, in such fort, as nourished it is with the least exhalation in the world. This is that Heraelitus meant, when he said, that the souls in Plutoes Region have a quick fent or fineling. And first they behold there the greatness of the Moon, her Beauty and Nature, which is not simple nor void of mixture, but as it were a Composition her Beauty and Peature, which is not impre nor void or makure, our asit were a composition of a Starre, and of Earth. And as Earth mingled with a Spirituall Air and Moisiture, becommeth fose, and the Blood tempered with Flesh, giveth it sense; Even so say the Moon mingled with a Celestiall Quintessence, even to the very bottome of, it is made Animate, Fruitfull and Generative, and withall, equally counterposited with Ponderoity and Lightnesse. For the full and Generative, and withall, equally counterposited with Ponderoity and Lightnesse. whole world it felf, being thus Composed of things which naturally movedownward and upward, is altogether void of motion local, from place to place; which it seemeth that Xencrates himself by a divine discourse of reason understood, taking the first light thereof from Plato. For Plato was he who first affirmed, that every fear was compounded of fire and earth, & by the means of midle natures given in certain proportion; in as much as there is nothing object to the fense of man, which hath not in some proportion a mixture of earth & light. And Xenocrate: faid, that the Sun is compounded of fire & the first or primitive folid : the Moon of a second solid, and her proper air: in sum, throughout, neither solidaione by it felf, nor the rare apart, is capable and susceptible of a soul. Thus much as touching the subflance of the Moon. As for the grandeur and bigneffe thereof, it is not fuch as the Geometricians fet down, but far greater by many degrees. And feldom doth it measure the shadow of the Earth by her greatnesse; not for that the same is small, but for that it bringeth a most fervent and swift motion, to the greature in that quickly and with fpeed the might paffe the dark place, and bring away with her the fouls of the bleffed which make half and cry: because all the while they are within the shade, they cannot hear any more the harmony of celestiall bodies : and withal, underneath, the fouls of the damned which are punished, lamenting, wailling, and howlling in this shadow, are presented unto them. And this is the reason, that in the Eclipses of the Moon, many were wont to ring basons and pannes of braff., and to make a great noise and elattering about these souls. And affrighted they are to behold that which they call the face of the Moon, when they approach neer unto it, seeming to be a terrible & searful fight, whereas it is no fuch matter. But like as the Earth with us hath many deep and wide gulles, as name-ly, one here, to wit, the Mediterranean sea, lying between Hercules pillars, and so running into the land hither tous: and another without, that is to say, the Caspian ica, and that also of red sea. So there be these deep concavities and vallies of the Moon, and those in number three; whereof the greatthere be thete deep concavites and values of the control which is a conding as they at they call the hole or gulf of Hearts, wherein the fouls do punish and are punished, according as they either did or fuffred hurt whiles they were here: the other two he fmall, to wit, they repeat the control while they were here. The other two he fmall, to wit, they are purely the control while they were here. whereby the fouls must go, one while to the tract of the Moon lying toward heaven, and another while fome read whereby the rouse had go one to the carth. And verily, that which looketh to heaven, they call the Elysian field, waren, whereas the other earth-ward to us, the field of Proferpina, not her, I mean, who is under the ground that is to inflagainst us. Howbeit, the Dæmons do not converse alwaies in the Moon, but descend other-fay, long. willes hither below, for the charge and superintendance of Ocacles: They be affishant likewise to the mysteries and ceremonies, and those they do celebrate, having and observant eye to wicked deeds which they punish; and withal, ready they are to preserve the good in perils as wel of War as the Sea. In mey pumm 3 and unction, if they themselves commit any fault, and here upon earth do ought either by injust favour or envy, they feel she smart thereof according to their merits: for thrust down they are again to the earth, and fent with a witneffe into mens bodies. But of the number of the better fort, are they who served and accompanied Saturn, as they themselves report; such as in simes past also were the Idei Datlyli in Crete, the Corybants in Phygia, and those of Becotia in the City of Lebadia, named Trophoniades besides, an infinit number of others in sundry parts of the earth habitable; whose names, Temples and Honours remain and continue unto this day, but the powers and pulffances of some do fail and are quite gone, as being translated into another place, and making a most happy change : which translation fome obtain sooner, other later, after that the understanding is separate from the soul.. and separated it is by the love and desire to enjoy the image of the Sun, by which that divine, blessed and defirable beauty which every nature after divers forts feeketh after, shineth. For even the very Moon turneth about continually for the love of the Sun, as longing to company and converte with him, as the very fountain of all fertility. Thur thenature of the foul ir front in the Moon, retaining only certain prints, marks and dreams, as it were, of her life : and hereof, think it was well and truly faid, The foul made haft, as one would fay;

Latin C

Like to a dream and flew away.

Which it doth not immediately upon her separation from the body, but afterwards, when she is alone by her self and severed from the understanding. And in truth, of all that ever Homer wrot, most divinely he seemeth to have writen of those who are departed this life, and be among the spirits beneath, these verles :

Next him, I knew of Hercules the strength and image plain, Or femblance : for himfelf with geds immortal did remain.

For like as every one of us is not ire and courage, nor fear not yet luft, no more than flesh or humours, but that indeed whereby we discourse and understand; even to, the foul it self being cast into a form by the understanding, and giving a form unto the body, and embracing it on every fide, expressed a receiveth a certain impression and figures to as albeit the is distinctly separate both from understanding, and allo from the body, the retaineth fill the form and femblance a long time, infomuch as well the may be called an image. And of these fouls, as I have already said, the Moon is the Element, because souls do resolve into her, like as the bodies of the dead into the Earth. As for such as have been vertuous and honest, and which loved a studious and quiet life, imployed in Philosophy, without medling in troublesome affairs, soon are resolved, for that being lest and rid of understanding, and using no more corporall passions, they vanish away incontinently; but fouls of ambitious persons, and such as are busied in negotiations, of amorous folk also given Mmmm 3 so the love of beautiful bodies, and likewise of wrathful people, calling still to remembrance schole things which they did in their life, even as dreams in their fleep, walk wandring to and fro, like to this ghost of Endymion: for considering their intenstancy and aprinesse to be over-subject unto passions. the fame transporteth and plucketh them from the Moon unto another generation, not suffering them q ileily there to paff: and vanish away, but fill allureth and calleth them away : for now is there nothing fmall, flaied, quiet, conflant and accordant, after that being once abandoned of the underflandthing imail; narco, quies, contains and accordants and the body: fo that of fuch fouls void of realon, came and ing, they come to be feized with the paffions of the body: fo that of fuch fouls void of realon, came and were bred afterwards the Tilyi and Typhon; and namely, that Typhon who in times paft by force and wiolence feized the City Dilibbis, and overturned up-fide down the banduary of the Oracle there; most violence feized the City Dilibbis, and overturned up-fide down the banduary of the Oracle there; most ungracious librs destituire of all reason and understanding, and abandoned to all passions upon a proud ungracious librs destituire of all reason and understanding, and abandoned to all passions upon a proud print and violence, wherewith they were pussed up. Howbeit, atlength, after long time, the Moon receives the fouls, and composed them: the Sun also inspiring into them again, and sowing in their extremely and composed the sun also inspiring into them again, and sowing in their viral faculty, understanding, maketh them new fouls : yea, and the Earth in the third place, giveth them a new body : for, nothing doth the give after death, of all that which the taketh to generation. And the a new body : tor, nothing of others, but taketh again that understanding which he gave. But the Moon giveth and receiveth, joyneth and disjoyneth, uniteth and separateth, according to her divers faculting and powers : of which, the one is named Ilisbyia, to wit, that which joyneth : another, Arteuiscor Diana, which parteth and divideth. Of the three fatal Bifters or Deftiffies, the who they name Atropes, is placed wishin the Sun; and giveth beginning of generation. Clothe being ladged in the Moon, is the that joyneth, ningleth and uniteth. The third and last, called Lugbeits, is in the Earth, who also lendeth her helping hand, and doth participate much with Fortune. For, that which is without foul, is weak in it fell, and naturally exposed to all injuries, and to fuffer burt: but the understanding is so veraigne over all the reft, and nothing is able to do it injury. Now the foul is of a middle nature and mixt of them both, like as the Moon was made and created by God, as a composition and mixture of chings above and things bineath; keeping the same proportion to the Sun, as the Earth doth to her, And think you have heard (quoth 87th 3 what I learned of this franger or traveller; which (as he faid himself) he understood by those Destront, who were Chamberlaines and Servicours to Satura. As for you, O Lampris, and the rest, you may take my relation in good or ill part, as you please.

whereto there were made divers answers tending to this point, to make us believe, that wheresoever the words be most rulty, and worst conched, there we are to observe so much the more the excellency of the Author. And this confirmeth fully, that which we have already spoken as touching the illusions of the Devill, who is not content thus to abuse and deceive his slaver, but in this place hath to deale with a ridiculous and most apparent andaciousnesse, if the eyes of those whom he thus abuseth, had never so little means to see the thousand part of his deceitful guiles, as groffe and thick as mountains. Continuing this discourse they handle afterwards the presages of these statues, and of others reared in divers places for the better authorising of the Oracles; which fagts of the principle this Dialogue, which comprehendeth divers matters dependent thereof, and those word in their order t the conchision whereof is this, that as reprovable they be, who tax the simplicity and rudents of such Oracles, as those, who otherwise control them for their ambiguity, obliquity and obscurity.

Who the Prophetesse Pythia giveth no answers now from the Oracle in verse or metre.

Bafilocles.

Ou have led this stranger, Philinus, fuch a walk in shewing him the statutes and publick works, that you have made it very late in the evening, and I my felf am weary in staying for you, and expecting when you will make an end.

Philinus.

N) marvel, we go to fortly, and keep to flow a pace, O Bafilocles, fowing and mowing (as they fay) presently withall, our speeches after fight and combat, which sprout forth and yield unto us by the way as we go, enemies lying as it were in ambush, much like unto those men which in old time came up of teeth fowen by Gudmus.

How then ? thall we tend for and intreat fome one of shole who were prefent there, or will you your felfgratifie us fo much, as to take the paines for to deliver unto us, what speeches those were, and who

I must be the man, I perceive Basilecles, to do this for your take, for hardly shall you meet with any other elfe throughout the whole City : for I faw the most part of them going up again together, with that Branger to Gorycium and Lycuria.

What? is this stranger so curious and desirous to see things, and is he withall friendly and wonderful fociable?

Philinus.

Yes that he is. but more fludious is he, and desirous to learn: neither is this most worthy of admimiration in him; for he hath a kinde of mildneff;, accompanied with a fingular good grace : his pregnane wit and quick conceit ministreth unto him matter to contradict, and to propose doubts how beitthe same is not bitter and odious in his propositions, nor leavened with any overthwere froward. neffe and perverte flubburneffe in his answers; in such fore as a man having been but a little acquainted with him, would foon fay of him:

> Gertes a lend man and a bad, He never for his father had.

Bafilocles.

I know him not my felf, Philinas : howbeit, many there be who report as much of this young milli But upon what occasion or cause began your discourse and disputation?

Philinus

Those who were our guides, conversant and exercised in the reading of Histories, rehearsed and read from one end to the other, all those compositions which they had written, without any regard of that which we requested them, namely, to Epitomize and abridge those narrations, and most part of the Epigrams. As for the fleanger, he cook much pleasure to fee and view those fair flatties, so many in humber, and so artificially wrought: But he admired most of all, the fresh brightness of the braffle, being fuch as firswed no filth nor ruft that it had gathered, but carried the glosfe and respieded in hew of azure : fo as he seemed to be ravished and assonied when he beheld the statues of the Admirals and Captaines at Sca (for at them he began) as representing naturally in their Tincture and Colour as they shood, Sca-men and Sailers in the very main and deep Sca Wherenpon: Had the addition workmen (quoth he) a certain mixture by them selves, and a temper of their braffs, that might give such Tincture to their works? for as touching the Corinthian braffe, which is to much renowmed, it is thought generally, and to given out, that it was by meer adventise and chance, that it cook this goodly colour, and not by any art; by occasion that the fire caught an house, wherein there was laid up some; little Gold and Silver, but a great quantity of Braffe, which mettals being melted together and to confused one with another, the whole maste thereof was still called brasse because there was more thereof in it, than of the other mettals. Then Theon? We have heard (quoth he) another reason, more subtile than this, namely, that when a certain braffe Founder or Copperfinith in Corinth, had met with a Casket or Coffer, wherein was good flore of Gold, fearing left he should be discovered, and this treasure found in his hands, he clipped it by little and little, melted and mixed it gently with his braffe, which took thereupon fuch an excellent and wonderful, temperature, that he fold the pieces of work, thereof made, passing deer, in regard of their dainty colour, and lovely beauty, which every man fer much by, and effected. But both this and the other is but alying tale : for by all likelihood this Corinchian braffe was a certain mixture and temperature of mettals, so prepared by artilike as at this day, Artisans by tempring gold and filver together, make thereof a certain fingular and exquifite pale yellow by it felf, howbeit, in mine eye, the same is but a wan and sickly colour, and a corrupt hue, without any beauty in the world. What other cause then might there be (quoth Diogenianus) as you think, that this brasse here hath such a tincture? To whom Theon made this answer : considering (quoth he) that of these primative elements and most natural bodies chat are, and ever shall be, to wit, fice, air, water and earth, there is not one which approacheth or toucheth these braffe works, but air only, it must of necessity be, that it is the air which doth the deed, and by reason of this air lying alwaies close upon them, and never parting therefro, cometh this difference that they have from all others. Or rather this is a thing notoriously known of old, even before Theognis was born, as faid the comical Poet.

But would you know by what special property and vertue the air should by touching, set such a co-lour upon brasse? Yes, very sain answered Diogenianus. Certes, so would I to, my son (quoth Theon) let us therefore fearch into the thing both together in common: and first of all, if you please, what is the c sufe that oyl filleth it full of ruft, more than all other liquor whatfoever? for furely it cannot be truly faid, that oyl of it felf fetteth the faid ruftupon it, confidering it is pure and neat, not polleted with a on filth when it comen to it. No verily (quoth the young man) and there fement to be forme other cause else, be fide the oyl; for the rust meeting with oyl, which is subtile, pure, and transparent, appeareth most evidently; whereas in all other liquors, it makes in on the way no is seen a call. Well said my son (quoth Teens) and like a Philosopher: but consider, if you think so good, of that reason which Aristotle allegeth. Marry that I will (quoth he again.) Why then I will tell you (quoth Theon) Aristotle faith, that the rust of braffe lighting upon other liquors, pierceth insensibly, and is dispersed through them, being of a rare fubfiance, and unequal parts, not abiding close together; but by reason of the compact and taff solidity of oyl, the said rust is keept in, and abideth thrust and united together. Now then, if we also of our selves were able to presuppose such a thing, we should not altogether want some means to charm as it were and allay somwhat this doubt of ours. And when we had allowed very well of his speech, and requested him to say on and prosecute the same : he said; That the air in the City of Delphos was thick, saft, strong and vehement withall, by reason of the reflexion and repercussion of the mountains round about it, and besides, mordicative, as witnesseth the speedy concoction of meat that it causeth. Now this air by reason of the subtility and incisive quality thereof, plercing into the braffe, and cutting it, forceth out of it a deal of ruft, and skaleth as it were much terrificial fubstance from it : the which it restraineth afterwards and keepeth in, for that the density and thickneffe of the air giveth it no iffue : thus this ruft being staicd and remaining still, gathering also a substance by occasion of the quantity thereof, putteth forth this flour as it were of colour, and there within the superficies contracteth a resplendent and shining hew. This reason of his, we approved very well; but the stranger said, that one of those suppositions alone was sufficient to make good the reason: For that subtility (quoth he) seemeth to be somwhat contrary unto the spissitude and thicknesse, supposed in the air: and therefore it is not necessary to make any supposal thereof; for brasse of it self as it waxeth old, in tract of time exhaleth and putteth forth this rust, which the thickness of the air comming upon, keepeth in and doth fo incraffat, as that through the quantity thereof, it maketh it evident and apparent. Against which objection and reply of his, Theor inferred thus again: And what should hinder (quoth he) that one and the same thing might not be firm or subtile, and with all thick, both at once: like as his clothes of silk, and linnen, of which Houser writeth thus:

And from fail-web of linnen, ran away, ? The oyl as moist as tis and would not stay.

Whereby he giveth us to understand, the sine spinning, and close weaving thereof, which would not suffer the oyl to rest upon it, and soak through, but to glisso ff and drop down, so neer were the threds, otherwise small, driven together, and so thick, thak it, would not let any liquot to passe through, And thuss man may allege the subtility of the air, not only for to setch out the rush, but the said deep azure. Hereupon ensued a pause and sitence for a pretty, while; and then the discoursers and Historians abovefaid, alleged again the words of a certain Oracle in verse (which was delivered, if I be not electived) as couching the Royalty and Reign of Rego, an Argine King: Whereat Diagniumus said, that it had been many times in his head to marvel, at the base, rude, and homely composition of those verses, which do centain Oracles: notwithstanding that the god Apollo is reputed the president of the Muses and eloquence; unto whom no less appearained the beauty and elegancy of file and composition, than goodnesse of voice in song and melody, as who surpassed for sweet versifting Hesiodus and Homer, both very far: and yet for all that, we see many of his Oracles rude, base, and faulty, aswel for the metre and measure, as the bare words. Then Serapion the Poet, who being come from Athens, was there present: Why (quoth he) believe you that those verses were of god Apolloes making? shall we suffer you to say as you do, that they come a great way short of the goodneffe of those verses which Homer and Hesiodus composed? and shall we not use them as passing well and excellently made, correcting our own judgment as forestalled and possessed aforehand with an ill custom? Then Boethus the Geometrician (for you wot well that the man hath ranged himself already to the fect of Epicurus:) Heard you never (quoth he) the tale of Paulon the Painter: Not I verily, quoth Serapion. And yet worth it is the hearing, faith Boethus. He having bargained and undertaken to paint an Horse wallowing and tumbling on his back, drew him running on foot with all four : whereat when the party was angry and offended, who fet him awork, Paufou laughed at him, and made no more ado, but turned the ends of the painted table; thus when the upper end was shifted downward, the horse seemed not to run, but to tunible with his heels aloft. Semblably it falleth out (quoth Bogethus) in certain speeches, when they are inverted and uttered the contrary way: And therefore some you shall have who will say, that the Oracles are not elegant, because they be of god Apolloes indicing: but contrariwife, that they be none of his, because they are but rudely made and unfavory : and as for that it is doubtful and uncertain: but this is evident and plain, that the verses of Oracles be not exquifitly couched, and labouriously endited, whereof I crave no better judge than your felf Serapion: for you are wont to compose and write Poems, which as touching the argument and subject matter be auftere and Philosophical : but for their wit, grace and elegant composition, otherwise resemble rather the verses of Homer and Hesiadus, than those of the Oracles pronounced by Pythia the Priestesse of Apollo, With that Serapion : We are diseased all of us (O Beetbus) in our eyes and cares to, being wont (such is our niceneffe and delicacy) to effect and term fuch things fimply better, which are more pleafant: and peradventure ere it be long, we will finde fault with Pythia, for that she doth not chaunt and fing more sweetly than Glauce the professed minstrel and singing wench; and because she is not besmeared with odoriferous oyle, nor richly araied in purple robes: yea, and form haply will take exception at her, for not burning Cinamon, Ladanum or Frankincense, for persume : but only Laurel and Barley meale. And see you not faith one, how great a grace the Sapphik verses carry with them, and how they tickle the ears, and joy the hearts of the hearers? whereas Sibylla out of her furious and enraged mouth, as Heraclitus faith, uttering forth and refounding words without mirth, and provoking no laughter, not glorioully painted and let out, nor pleafantly perfumed and befpiced, hath continued with her voice a thousand years, by the means of Apollo, speaking by her. And Pindarus faith, that Cadmus heard from Apollo, not lofty and high Mulick, not sweet, not delicate, nor broken and full of variety : for an impassible and holy nature, admitteth not any pleasure : but here together with the Base musick, the most part of the delight also is cast down, and as it should seem, hath run into mens cars and possessed them. When Serapion had thus said : Theon smilling; Serapion, I see well (quoth he) hath done according to his old wont, and followed his own disposition and manners in this behalf: for there being offered some occasion to speak of pleasure, he hath quickly caught at it. But yet for all that, let us Boethus, howfoever the verfes of Oracles be worfe than those of Homer. notthink that it is Apollo who made them; but when he hath given only the beginning of motion, then each Prophetesse is moved according as she is disposed to receive his inspiration. And verily if Oracles were to be penned down and written, and not to be barely pronounced, I do not suppose that we would reprove or blame them (taking them to be the hand-writing of the god) because they are not 60 curioully endited as ordinarily the Letters of Kings and Princes are. For furely, that voice is not the gods, nor the found, nor the phrase, ne yet the metre and verse, but a womans they be all. As for him, he presenteth unto her, funfies only and imaginations, kindling a light in the foul to declare things to come : and fuch an illumination as this, is that which the; call Embusiasmes. But to speak in a word to you that are the Priests and Prophets of Epicurus (For I see well that you are now become one of that feet) there is no means to escape your hands, considering that ye impute unto the ancient Prophetesses, that they made bad faulty verses, yea and reprove those modern Priestesses of these daies, who pronounce in profe and in vulgar termes the Oracles, for fear they should be articled against by you, in case they delivered their verses headlesse, without loines and curtailed. Then (quoth Diegenianus) jest not with us I pray you in the name of God, but rather affoil us this common doubt, and rid us of this scruple; for there is no man, but desireth to know the reason and cause, why this Oracle hath given over to make answer in verses and other speeches as it hath done? Whereto Theon spake thus: But now my son, we may seem to do wrong and shameful injury unto our discoursers and directours here, these Historians, in taking from them that which is their office: and therefore let that be done first which belongeth to them; and afterwards you may enquire and dispute at leasure of that which you defire. Now by this time were we gone forward as far as to the statue of King Hiero : and the stranger, albeit he knew well all the rest, yet so courteous he was and of so good a nature, that he gave car with all patience to that which was related unto him : but having heard that there flood fometime a certain column of the faid Hiero all of braffe, which fell down of it felf the very day whereon Hiero died at Saracuse in Sicilie, he wondred thereat: and I thereupon recounted unto him other like examples; as namely, of Hiero the Spartan, how the day before that he loft his life in the Battel at Leudres, the eyes of his statue fell out of the head : also that the two Stars which Lyfander had dedicated after the navall battell at the River called Agos potamos, were miffing and not to be seen : and his very statue of stone put forth of a sudden so much wild weeds and green graffe in fo great quantity that it covered and hid the face thereof. Moreover during the time of those wofull calamities which the Athenians sustained in Sicilie, not only the golden dates of a Palm tree fell down, but also the Rivens came and picked with their bills all about the Scutcheon or shield of the image of Pallas. The Cnidians coronet likewise which Philomelus the tyrant of the Phocasans had given unto Pharfalia the fine dancing Wench, was the cause of her death: for when she had pasted out of Greece into Iraly, one day as the played and danced about the Church of Apollo in Metopontine, having the faid coronet upon her head, the young men of the City came upon her for to have away the gold of that coronet : and striving about her one with another who should have it, tare the poor woman in pieces among them. Ariffoile was wont to fay that Hower was the only Poet who made and devised words that had motion, so emphaticall they were and lively expressed but I for my part would fay, that the offcings dedicated in the city, to neat flatues, jewels, & other ornaments moved together with the divine providence, do forcfignific future things: neither are the fame in any part vain and void offenfe; but all replenished with a divine power. Then Beethus: I would not else (quoth he :) for it is not sufficient belike, to enclose God once in a moneth within a mortall body, unlesse we thrust him also into every flone and piece of braffe? as if fortune and chance were not sufficient of them-felves to work such feats and accidents. What (quoth I) think you then that these things every one have any affinity with fortune and chance? & is it probable that your Atoms do glide, divide, & decline, neither before nor after, but just at the very time as each one of them who made these offeings, should fare better or worfe? And Epicurus belike, as far as I fee ferveth your turn now and is profitable unto you in those things which he hath said or written three hundred years past : but this god Apollo, unleffe he imprison and immure himself (as it were) and be mixed within every thing, is not able in your opinion, to give any thing in the world the beginning of morion, nor the ceufe of any paffion or accident whatfoever. And this was the answer which I made unto Boethus for that point: and in like manner spake I as touching the verses of Sybilla. For when we were come as far as to the rock which joyneth to the senate-house of the City, and there rested our selves, upon which rock by repett the first Sybilla fat, being new come out of Helicon, where she had been softered by the Muses, although others there be that fay she arrived at Maleon , and was the Daughter of Lamia , who had Neptune for her Father, Serapion made mention of certain verfes of hers, wherein the praifed her felf faying, that fit: should never cease to prophesise and forestell suture things, no not after her death; for that sie her fifshould then go about in the Moon, and be that which is called the face therein appearing; also that her breath and spirit mingled with the air should passe to and sto continually in prophetical words and voices of Oracles prognofficating : and that of her body transmuted and converted into earth, there should grow Herbs, Shrubs, and Plants, for the food and pasturage of facred beasts appointed for factifices : whereby they have all forts of formes and qualities in their bowels and inwards : and by the meanes whereof men may foreknow and foretell of future events. Hereat Boethus made semblance to laugh more than before. And when Zous alleged, that howfoever thefe feemed to be fabulous matters and meer fables, yet fo it was that many subversions and trasmigrations of Greek Cities, many expeditions also and voiages made against them of barbarous armies, as also the overthrowes and destructione of fundry kingdomes and dominions, give testimony in the behalf of ancient prophecies and pre-dictions. And as for these late & modern accidents (quoth he) which happed at Gumes and Dicearchia, long before chanted and forestold by way of Prophecie out of Sphili books; ald not the time influing as a debt accomplish and pay? the breakings forth and eruptions of fice out of a mountain, the strange ebullitions of the sea, the casting up aloft into the air of stones and cinders by subterranean winds under the earth, the mine and devastiation of so many and those so great Cities at one time, and that so fuddenly, as they that came but the next morrow thither, could not fee where they flood or were built, the place was so consused. These strange events (I say) and occurrents, as they be hardly believed to have happened without the finger of God, fo much leffe credible it is, that foreseen and foretold they might be, without some heavenly power and divinity. Then Boethus: And what accident (good fir, quoih he) can there be imagined, that Time oweth not unto Nature; and what is there fo firange, prodigious and unexpected, as well in the fea as upon the land, either concerning whole Cities or particular persons ; but if a man foretold of them, in processe and tract of time the same may fall out accordingly? And yet, to speak properly, this is not foretelling, but simply telling, or rather to cast forth and scatter at random in that infinity of the air, words having no originall nor foundation, which wandring in this wife, Fortune otherwhiles encountreth and concurreth with them at a very at a very venture. For there is a great difference, in my judgement, between laying thus, that a thing is hapned which hath been spoken; and a thing is spoken that shall happen: for that speech which uttereth things that are not extant, containing in it self the fault and errour, attendeth not by any right, the credit and approbation thereof, by the accidentall event; neither useth it any true and undoubted token of prediction, with a certain foreknowledge, that happen it will when it hath been once foretold, confidering that infinity is apt to produce all things; but he who gueffeth well, whom the common proverb pronounceth to be the best divinor, For whose conjecture miffeth least, that which is to come. But these Prophetical Sibyls and surious Bacchides, have cast at all aventure as it were, into a vast Ocean, without either judgement or conjecture, the time; yea, and have scattered at random the Nowns and Verbs; the words and speeches of passions and accidents of all forts. And albeit some of them fortune so to happen, yet is this or that false alike at the present sime when it is uttered, although haply the same may chance afterwards to fall out truely. When Bostbus had thus discoursed, Serapion replied upon him in this wide: Basibus (quoth he) giveth a good verdict and just sentence of those propositions which are indefinitly and without a certain subject matter in this man ner pronounced. It victory be foretold unto a General, he hath vanquished: if the destruction of a City, it is overthrown: but whereas there is expersed not only the shing thas shall happen, but also the circumstances, how, when, after what sore, and whorewith, then is not this a bare guesse and conjecture of that which peradventure will be; but a presignification and denouncing peremptorily of such hings as without saile shall be: as for example, that Prophecie which concerned the lameness of A-gessians, in these words:

Though proud and baughty (Sparta) now, and found of foot thou be, I ake but by balting regiment, there come no barm to thee:
For then shall unexpected plagues thy state long time assail.
The deadly waves of searint wars

againty these final prevail.

Semblably, that Oracle as touching the Isle which the Sea made and discovered about Thera and Therafin, as also the Prophecie of the War between King Philip and the Romans, which ran in these words:

But when the rate of Troing houd.

Phanicians shall defeat
In bloudy fight, look them to see
It range sights and wonders great.
The sea shall from amid the waves yield firy tempess strong,
And siashes thick of lightning bright, with stour shows among.
With that an Island shall appear,
that never manyet knew:
And weaker men in battel see,
the mightier shall gludue.

For whereas the Romans in a small time conquered the Carthaginians, after they had vanquished Annibal in the field, and Philip King of the Macedonians gave Battel unto the Etolians and Romaus, wherein he had the overthrow; also, that in the end there arose an Island out of the deep Sea, with huge leams of fire and hideous gufts: a man cannot fay, that all thefe things hapned and concurred together by fortune and meer chance: but the very train and orderly proceeding thereof, doth flew a certhe for fortune and fore-knowledge. Alfo, whereas the Romans were foretold the time five hundred years before, wherein they (hould have War with all Nations at once, the fame was fulfilled when they warred against the slaves and fugitives who revolted and rebelled. For in all these, there is nothing conictural and uncertain, nothing blinde and doubtful, that we need infinitly to feek after fortune therefore : whereas many pledges there be of experience, giving us affurance of that which is finite and detrainates, flewing the very way, whereby fatal defliny doth proceed. Neither do I think any man will fay, that thefe things being foretold with fo many circumflances, jumped all together by fortune. For what elfe should hinder, but that a man may aswel fay (O Boethus) that Epicurus wrote not his Books of principal opinions and doctrines fo much approved of you, but that all the letters thereof were jumbled and huddled together by meer chance and fortune, that went to the composing and finishing of that volume? Thus discoursing in this manner, we went forward fill. And when in the Corinthan Chappel we beheld the Date tree of braffe, the only monument there remaining of all the oblations there offred, Diogenianus wondred to fee the Frogges and Water-fnakes which were wrought artificially by Turners hand about the but and rootthercof; and so did we likewise: because neither the Palm-tree is a Moory plant and loving the waters, like as many other trees are: neither do the Frogges any way pertain to the Corinthians, as a mark or enfigne given in the arms of their City : like as the Selinuntians, by report, offered fometimes in this Temple, the herb Smalach or Parlier, called Sciinum, all of gold: and the Tenedians, an hatchet, taken from the Crabfilhes bred in their Illand, neer unto the Promontory called Afterion: for those Crabs only (as it is thought) have the figure of an hatches Imprinted upon their shell. And verily, for Apello himself, we suppose that Ravens, Swans, Wolves, Hawks, or any other beafts be more acceptable than these. Now when Serapion alleged, that the workman hereby meant and covertly fignified the nouriture and rifing of the Sun out of humours and waters, which by exhalation he converteth into fuch creatures, whether it were that he heard this verie our of

Then out of sea arose the Sun, And lest that goodly lake anone O: feen the Egyptians to represent the East or Sun-rising by the picture of a child fitting upon the plane Loss. Thereat I laughed heartily. What mean you thus (good fir, quoth I) to thrust histher the feet of the Stoicks: came you indeed to fossil filly among our speeches and discourse, your exhalations and kindlings of the stars, not bringing down hither the Sun and the Moon; as the Thefalian Women do by their inchantments; but making them to spring & arise as from their first original cut of the earth and the waters? For Plato verily, called man a celestial plant, as rising directly from his root above, which is his head. But you in the mean time nock and deride Empedocies, for saying that the Sun occasioned by the resection of the search light about the earth,

while your felves make the Sun terrestriall, animall, or a sennish plant, ranging him among the waters and the native place of frogs. But let us betake all these matters to the tragicall and strange monstruosities of the Stoicks: mean while treat we cursorily and by the way of these according and by-works of mechanicall artifans and handicrafts men: for furely in many things they be very engenious and witty: marry in every plot they cannot avoid the note of bald devices and aff. cled curiofity in their inventions. Like as therefore he that painted Apollo with a cock upon his hand, fignified thereby the day-break, and the time a little before the fun-riting; even fo a man may fay that these frogs do symbolize and betoken the season of the Spring, at what time as the Sun begins to rule over the air, and to discusse the Winter: at least waies if we must according to your opinion, understand the sun and Apollo to be both, one god, and not twain: Why? (quoth Serapion) are you of another mind? and do you think the Sun to be one, and Apollo another? Yes marry do I (quoth be) as well as, that the Sun and Moon do differ. Yea and more than fo : for the Moon doth not often, nor from all the world hide the Sun: whereas the Sun hath made all men together, for to be ignorant of Apollo: diverting the mind and cogitation by the means of the fenfe, and turning it from that which is, unto diverting the mind and cognation by the means of the tente, and turning it from that which is, unto that which appeareth onely. Then Serapion demanded of those Historiens our guides and conductors, what was the reason that the forsaid Cell or Chapell, was not initialed by the name of Copplian who dedicated it, but called the Corinthians Chapell. And when they held their peace, because, as I take it, they knew not the cause; I began to laugh the reat: and why should we think (quoth I) that the simen knew or remembred any thing more, being aftonied and amazed as they were to hear you fable and talk of the meteors or impressions in the Air? For even themselves we heard before relating, that after the tyranny of Cypfelus was put down and overthrown, the Corintbians were defireous to have the inferiptions as well of the golden statue at Pifa, as of this Cell or Treasure-house, for to run in the name of their whole City. And verily the Delphians gave and granted them so much according to their due desert. But for that the Elians envied them that privilege, therefore the Corinthians passed a publick decree, by vertue whereof they excluded them from the solemnity of the Isthmian games: And hercof it came, that never after that, any Champion out of the Territory of Elis, was known to show himself to do his devoir at those Isthmick games. And the massacre of the Melienides which Hercules committed about the City of Cleone, was not the cause as some do think, why the Elians were debarred from thence, for contrariwise it had belonged to them for to exclude and put by others; if for this they had incurred the displeasure of the Corintbians. And thus much said I for my part. Now when we were come as far as to the Hall of the Aranthians and of Brasidas, our difeouring Historians and Expositors shewed us the place, where sometimes stood the obelisks of iron, which Rhodopii the famous Courtian had dedicated. Whereat Diggmanus was in a great chase, and brake out into these words: Now surely (quoth he) the same City (to their shame be it spoken) hath allowed unto a common strumpet a place whither to bring and where to bestow the tenth part of that falary which she got by the use of her body, and unjustly to put to death Esop her fellow servant. True (quoth Serapion:) but are you so much offended hereat? cast up your eye and look aloft : behold among the statues of brave Captaines and glorious Kings, the image of Muefarete, all of beaten god, which Crates faith was dedicated and fet up for a Trophe of the Greeks lasciviousnesse. The young Gentleman, seeing it: Yea, but it was of Physic that Crates spake so. You say true (quoth Serapion:) for her proper name indeed was Minejarete: but surnamed she was Phryne in meriment, because the looked pale or yellow like unto a kinde of Frogg named in Greek Physic. And thus many times surnames do drown and suppresse other names. For thus the Mother of King Alexander the Great, who had for her name at first, Pollyxine, came afterwards to be as they say, surnamed Myrtale, Olympias and Stratonice. And the Corinthian Lady Eumetis, men call unto this day, after her Farhers name, Cleobuline; and Herophile, of the City Erythre, the who had the gift of divination and could skill of prophecie; was afterwards in processe of time surnamed Sibylla. And you have heard Grammarians say, that even Leda her self, was named Mnessnee, and Orestes, Achaus. But how think you (quoth he) casting his eye upon Theon, to answer this acculation as touching Phryner Then he smiling again: In such sort (quoth he) as I will charge and accuse you, for busying your self in blaming thus the light faults of the Greeks. For like as Socrates reproved this in Callias, that gave defiance onely to sweet perfumes or precious odors; for he liked well enough to see the dances and gesticulations of young boyes, and could abide the fight of kiffing of pleafants, buffons and jefters to make folk laugh : for methinks that you would chase and exclude out of the Temple, one poor filly Woman who used the beauty of her own body, haply not so honefly as the might: and in the mean time you can abide to see god Apollo environed round about with the first fruits, with the tenth and other oblations arifing from murders, wars, and pillage, and all his Temple throughout hanged with the spoils and booties gotten from the Greeks: yea, and are neither angry nor take pity when you read, over such goodly oblations, and ornaments, these most shameful inscriptions and titles: Brasidas and the Acanthians, of the Athenian spoiles: the Athenians of the Corinchians: the Phoexans of the Thessalians: the Omerates of the Sieyonians: and the Amphyetions of the Phoexans.

But peradventure it was Praxiteles alone who was offensive unto Crates, for that he had set up a monument there, of his own fweet-heart, which he had made for the love of her ; whereas Crates contrariwise should have commended him, in that among these golden images of Kings and Princes, he had placed a Gourtifan in gold, reproaching thereby and condemning riches, as the having in it nothing to be admired, and nothing venerable: for it well befeemeth Kings and great Rulers, to prefent Apollo and the gods with fuch ornaments and oblations as might testifie their own justice, their temperance and magnanimity; & not make shew of their golden store and abundance of superfluous delicates, whereof they have their part commonly who have lived most shamefully. But you allege not this example of Crafus (quoth another of our Historians and directours) who caused a statue in gold to be made and fet up here, of his woman-baker; which he did not for any proud and infolent offentation of his riches in this Temple, but upon an honest and just occasion . for the report goeth, that Alyattes the father of this Crasus espoused a second wife, by whom he had other children, whom he reared and brought up. This Lady then purposing secretly to take away the life of Crassus, gave unto the Baker aforefaid, poyfon, willing her, when the had tempered it with dough, and wrought it into bread, to ferve the same up unto Crass. But the woman gave secret intelligence hereof unto Crass, and withall, bestowed the poysoned bread among the children of this Step-dame. In regard of which demerit, Crass when he came to the Crown, would acknowledge and requite the good service which this woman had done, with the testimony, as it were, of this god himself; wherein he did well and vertuonsly. And therefore (quoth he) m:ec it is and feemly, to praise and honour highly such oblations, if any have been presented and dedicated by Cities upon semblable occasions, like as the Opuntians did. For when the Tyrants of the Phocæans had broken and melted many facred oblations both of gold and filver, and thereof coyned money, which they fent and difperfed among the Cities; the Opuntians gathered as much filver as they could, wherewith they filled a great pot, fent it hither, and made thereof an offering to Apollo. And I verily, for my part, do greatly commend those of Smyrna and Apollonia for fending hither certain coro-cars of gold, in token of Harvett : and more than that, the Erettians and Magneffans, for presenting this god with the first fruits of their men and women, recognising thereby, him tobe the giver, not only of the fruits which the earth yieldeth, but also of children, as being the auther of generation and the lover of mankinde. But I blame the Megarians as much, for that they only in manner of all the Greeks, caused to be erected here, the image of this our god, with a Lance in his hand, after the Battell with the Athenians, who upon the defeature of the Persians, held their City in possission, and were by them vanquished in fight, and disseit thereof again. And yet true it is, that these men afterward offered unto Apallo a golden Plectre wherewith to play upon his Cittern or Viole, having heard (as it should seem) the Poet Scythinus, speaking of the said instrument :

> Which Don Apollo, fair and lovely for Of Jupicer, doot trace in skilful wife, As who is worth fall things wrought and done, All ends with their beginnings to comprife: And in his hand the pleGre bright as gold, Even glittering raies of finning Sun doth bold.

Now when Serapion would have faid fomwhat else of these matters: A pleasure it were (quoth the stranger) to hear you devise and discourse of such like things, but I must needs demand the first promise made unto me, as touching the cause why the Prophetess Pythia hath given over to make animer any longer by Oracle, in verse and metre: and therefore, if it so please you, let us succease visiting therefor of these oblations and ornaments, and rather sit we down in this place, for to hear what can be faid of this matter, being the principal point and main reason which impeacheth the credit of this Oracle 3 for that of necessity one of these two chings must needs be: either that the Prophetess of this Oracle 3 for that of necessity place where the divine power is, or else that the air which was wont to breath and inspire this instinct, is nuterly quenched, and the puissance quite gone and vanished away. When we had setched therefore a circuit about, we satus down upon the tablements on the South side of the Temple, nece unto the Chapel of Italius, that is to say, the Earth, where we beheld the waters of the Fountain Castilius, and the Temple of the Muses, with admiration, in such for as Beethus incontinuedly said, that the very place it self made much for the question and doubt moved by the franger: For in old time (quoth he) there was a Temple of the Muses even there, from whence the River springs; informuch as they used this water for the solumn libations at facrifices, according as Simonides writes in this wise:

And in another place, the same Simonides with a little more curiosity of words, calling upon Cheio the Muse, saith, she is she holy keeper.

And therefore Eudoxus was much overfeen to believe those who gave out, that this was called the waconstitution of the Warders thereof, near unto that riverer, and the Temple of Tellus aforefaid, whereunto appertained the Oracle: whereby answers were rendred in verse and song. And some there be who say, that the Heroick verse was firft heard here :

That is to fay,

Tou pretty Bees and Birds that sing,
Bring birder both your wax and wing;
at what time as the Oracle being for saken and destitute of the god Apollo, lost all the Dignity and at what time as the Oaste One Strapion: These things indeed (quoth he) O Beethus, are more meet and convenient for the Muses. For we ought not to fight against God, nor together with Prophecie and Divination take away both Providence and Divinity; but to feek rather for the folution of those reasons which seem contrary thereto, and in no wife to abandon and cast off that faith and Religious Belief, which hath in our Countrey, time out of mind, paffed from father to fon. You say very well and truly (quoth I) good Serapion, for we despair not of Philosophie, as if it were quite overthrown and utterly gone, because Philosophers before time, pronounced their Sentences, and published their Doctrines in verse: as for example, Orpheus, Hesiadus, Parmenidas, Xenophanes, Empedocles, Thales, and afterwards ceafed and gave over to verifi: all but your felf, for you have into Philosophie reduced Poetrie again, to fet up a loud and lofty note, for to incite and flir up young men. Neither is Aftrologie of leff: credit and chimation , because Aristarchus , Timochares , Aristyllus , and Hipparchus have written in Profe: whereas Eudoxus, Hessedus and Thales, wrote before them in verse of that Argument; at leastwife if it be true that Thales was the author of that Aftrologie which is ascribed unto him. And Pindarus himself consesseth, that he doubted greatly of that manner of melody, which was neglected in his dayes, wondering why it was so despised. For I affure you it is no absurd thing, nor impertinent, to search the causes of such mutations: But to abolish all arts and faculties, if haply fomewhat be changed or altered in them, I hold neither just nor reasonable. Then came in Them also with his vie, adding moreover and laying, that it could not be denied, but that in truth herein there have been great changes and mutations: howbeit, no lesset rue it is, that even in this very place there have been many Oracles and answers delivered in Prose, and those concerning affairs, not of least Consequence, but of great importance. For as Thucydides reporteth in his History, when the Lacedæmonians demanded of the Oracle what iffue there would be of the War which they waged against the Athenians? This answer was made: That they should obtain the victory, and hold still the upper hand; also that he would aid and succour them, both requested, and unrequested: and that unlesse they recalled home Paulanies, he would gather together * * * of Silver. Semblably, when the Athenians consulted with the Oracle about their successe in that war which they enterprised for the Conquest of Sicilie; this answer they received : that they should bring out of the City of Eryibra, the Priefteffe of Minerva: now the name of the faid woman was Helychia, that is to fay, Repose or Quietnesse. Moreover, at what time as Dinomenes the Sicilian, would needs know of the Oracle, what should become of his sons? this answer mas returned : that they should all three be Tyrants, and great Potentates: whereat when Dinomenes replied again: Yea marry, my good Lord Apello, but peradventure they may rue that another day. Apollo answered. True indeed, and thus much moreover I prophesic unto thee, for to be their destiny. And how this was sulfilled you all know: for Gelou during his Reign, had the dropsie: Hiero was diseased with the stone all the time of his Tyranny: and Ibrasibulus being overtoiled with Wars and Civil Seditions in short time was distincned and driven out of his Dominions. Moreover, Procles the Tyrant of Epidaurus, among many others, whom he had cruelly and unjuftly put to death, murdered Timarchus, who fled from Athens unto him, with agreat quantity of money, after he had received him into his protection, and flewed him may courtefies and kindnesses at his first arrivall: him (I say) he sl:w, and afterwards cast into the Sea his Corps, which he had put into a cheft: and howfoever other knew not of this murder, yet Cleander of Ægina, was privy thereto, and the Minister to execute the same. After this in proceeds of time, when he was sallen into troubles, and that his state began to be disquieted, he sent his brother Clearinus hither to the Oracle, to enquire secretly whether he were best to flie and retire himfelf out of the way. Apollo made this answer: That he granted Procles flight and retreat thither, where as he commanded his hoft of Egina to bestow 2 Cheft, or else where the Stags cast their heads. The Tyrant understanding that Apollo willed him either to throw himself into the Sea, and there be drowned, or else to be enterred in the ground, because Stags are wont to bury and hide their horns within the earth, when they be fallen, made no haft, but delayed the time : but after a while, when troubles grew more and more upon him, and all things went backward with him, every day worse than other, az length hefled: But the friends of Timarchus having overtaken him, flew him likewise, & flung his body into the fea. Furthermore (which is the greatest matter of all) those Rhetre, by vertue whereof, Lycurgus ordained the government of the Lacedamonians Common-wealth, were delivered to him in profe. What should I speak of Alyrius, Herodotus, Philochorus, and Ifter, who of all others tranproce valled most in gathering of Oraclea together, which were given in verse, and yet have penned many of them without verse. And Theopompus, who studied, no man so much, to clear the History as southing Oracles; sharply reprove the chose, who chink that Pythia the Prophetesse in those dayes, gave no answers nor Prophecies in metre: which challenge of his when he minded to prove and make goody he could allege but very few examples; for that all the rest in manner were even then pronouned in profe, like as at this day, some there be that run in verse and metre. By which allegations of his. he made one above the rest notoriously divulged, which is this. There is within the province of Phoeis, acertain Temple of Hercules, furnamed Milogyne, as one would fay, hating women : and by the ancient cuftom and Law of that Country, the priest thereof for the time being, must not in the whole year company with a woman: by occasion whereof, they chuse old men to this Priesthood: howsoever not long fince, a certain young man, who was otherwife of no ill behaviour, but somewhat ambitious, and defirous of honour, and who besides loved a young Wench, attained to this prelacie or sacerdotall dignity : at the first he bridleth his affection, and forbare the faid damosell : howbeit, one time above the tell, when he was laid upon his bed, after he had drunk well, and been a dancing, the Wench came to wifit him; and to be short she dealt carnally with her; whereupon being much troubled in mind, and in fearful perplexity, he fled unto the Oracle, and inquired of Apollo as concerning the fin which he had committed, whether he might not be affoiled for it by prayers or expiatory fatisfaction? and this anfwer he received :

But if a man haply should grant that no answer in these days is delivered by Oracle, but in verse; yet * This is would he be more in doubt of ancient Oracles, which fometime in metre and other whiles in profe gave Divinity. answers. But neither the one nor the other (my Son) is strange & without reason, if in be you conceive aright and carry a pure and religious opinion of god Apello, and do not think that he himself it was who in old time composed the verses, and at this day prompteth unto Pythia the prophecies, as if he spake through masks & visors. But this point is of such moment, that it require tha longer discourse & farther inquiry into itemary for this present it may suffice for our Learning, that we call to remembrance and put you in mind briefly, how the body useth many Organs or Instruments; that the Soul emploieth he Body and the parts thereofiand that the Soul is the Organ or instrument of God. Now the perfedion of any Organ or Inftrument, is principally to imitate & resemble that which useth it, as much as is in the power thereof: and to exhibite the work and effect of the intention in it felf, and to shew the same not fuch as it is in the workman, pure, fincere, without passion, without error and faultlesse, but mixed and exposed to faults: for of it self obscure it is and altogether unknown to us; but it appeared another, and by another, and is replenished with the nature of that other. And here I passover to speak of Wax, Gold, Silver, Brass, and all other forts of matter and substance, which may be cast and brought into the form of a mould. For every of these verily receiveth one form of a similatude imprinted therein, but to this refemblance or reprefentation, one adjoyneth this difference, and another that, of it felt; as eafily is to be feen, by the infinit diversities of formes in images, as also by the appearance of one and the same visage in divers and fundry mirrours, flat, hollow, curbed, or embowed, round outwardly, which represent an infinit variety. But there is neither mirrour that sheweth and expressen the face becternor instrument of nature more simple, obsequent and pliable, than is the Moon : howbeit receiving from the Sun a light & firy illumination, the fendeth not the fame back unto us, but mingled with formet what of her own : whereby it changeth the colour, and hath a power or faculty faridifferent, for no heat at all there is in it : and as for the light fo weak and feeble it is that it faileth before it cometh unto us. And this I suppose to be the meaning of Heraclitus, when he faith, that the Lord, unto whom belongeth the Oracle at Delphos, doth neither speak, nor conceal, but fignific onely and give fign. Add now to these things to well faid and conceived, and make this application: that the god who is here, utel Pythia, the Prophete ff., for Sight and Hearing, like as the Sun utel the Moon. He sheweth future thinks by a Mortall Body, and a Soul which cannot rest and lie still, as being not able to shew her self immoveable and quiet to him who flirreth and moveth her , but is troubled fill more and more by the Motions, Agitations, and Pallions, of her own, and which are in her felf : for like as the turnings of Bodies, which together with a circular motion, fall downward, are not firm and ftrong, but turning as they do round by force, and tending downward by Nature, there is made of them both, a certain turbulent and irregular circumgiration: Even so the ravishment of the Spirit, called Enthusias has a mixture of two motions, when the Mind is moved in the one by infpiration, and in the other naturally. For considering that of Bodies which have no Soul, and of themselves continue alwaies in one state quiet, a man cannot make use nor move them perforce, other wife than the quality of their nature will bear, nor move a cylindre like a ball, or in manner of a fquare cube, nor a Lute or harp, according as he doth a pipe, no more than a Trumpet after the order of a Cithern or ftringed influment : ne yet any thing elfe otherwife than either by art or nature each of them is fit to be used. How is it possible then to handle and manage that which is animate, which moveth of it felf, is indued with will and inclination, capable also of reason; but according to the precedent Habitude, Puissance and Nature? As for example, to move one Musically, who is altogether ignorant and an enemy of Mufick; or Grammatically, him who skilleth not of Grammar, and knoweth not a letter of the book; or Eloquently and Rhetorically, one who hath neither skill nor practife at all in Orations. Certes I cannot fee or fay how? And herein Homer also beareth witnor practice at an in Academic use all persons indifferently in every thing, but each one according to the sufficency that he hath by Are or Nature. To prove this, fee you not (quoth he) my friend Diegnianus, that when Minera would persuants the Achzans to any thing she callent for Ussiles? when she is minded to trouble and marre the treaty of Peace, she seeketh out Pandarus? when she is disposed to discounsia and put to slight the Trojans, the addreffeth her felt and goeth to Diomedes? for of these three, the last was a valiant man of jans, the addressen ner set and goeth to Diometer: for the trees the set was a valual mano person, and a brave Warrior; the (econd a good Archer, but yet a foolish and brainfick man; the first right Eloquent and Wise withall: for Homer was not of the same mind with Pandarus, if so beit were Pandarus who made this verfe,

If God so will, in sea thou maist well sail Upon an burdle or a wicker frail.

But well he knew, that powers and natures be defined to divers effects, according as each one hath different motious, notwithstanding that which moveth them all, be but one. Like as therefore that faterent motions, nowminationing that which a training to foot, cannot make it to flies nor him who flutteth and flammereth, to fleak readily; ne yet him to cry big and aloud, who hath a small and struct the and flammereth, to fleak readily; ne yet him to cry big and aloud, who hath a small and struct the structure of the structu Pupilio, or into Africk, there to plant a Colony, and People a City; for howfoodwor he had a flutting and flammering (ongue, and was otherwife of a small volce, year a Princely mind he carried, a Politick head he

But as Xenophon thinketh, that a young Bride when the is brought to her husbands house, ought to be such an one as bath not seen much, and heard as littles femblably, Pythia being ignorant and unexpert in manner of all things, and a very Virgin indeed as touching her mind and foul, cometh to converse with Apollo. And we verily are of opinion, that God their manner: neither will we have Soothfairer, and Prophets, being as they are, the Messeng and their manner: neither will we have Soothsairer, and Prophets, being as they are, the Messeng and Heralds of God, to expound and declare their Predictions in plain and intelligible words; but we would that the voice and dialect of the Propheteffe Pythia, refembling the speech of a Chorus in a Tragedy from a Scaffold, fhould pronounce her answers not in fimple, plain, and trivial termes, without asy grace to feathern out, but with Poetical magnificence of high and stately verses, difguised as it were with metaphore and figurative phrases, yea, and that which more is, with sound of Flute and Hautboies : what answer make you then, as touching the old Oracles? Surely, not one alone, but many, First, the ancient Pythic as hath been faid already, uttered & pronounced most of them in profe : fecondly, that time at orded those complexions and temperatures of body, which had a propense and forward inclination to "oefie; whereto there were joyned incontinently, the alacrity, defires, affections, and dispositions of the foul, in such fort, as they were ever press and ready, neither wanted they ought but fome little beginning from without, to set them on work, and to stir the imagination and conception; some ince organizing from windows to be them of works and to the Indiana. Whereby there might directly be drawn unto that which was meet and proper for them, not only Aftrologies and Philosophers as Philinus faith; but also such as were well soaked with Wine, and shaken with fome paffion, who either upon pity suprifing them, or joy presented unto them, might imediately slide as it were, and fall into a melodious and singing voice; informuch as their feaths were full of vertes, and love-fongs, yea and their books and compositions, amatorious, and savouring of the like. And when Euripide said:

Love makes men Poets, mark it when you will, Although before in verse they had no skill.

He meaneth not that love putteth Poetry or Musick into a man in whom there was none before, but wakeneth, flirreth and enchafeth that which before was drowfie, idle, and cold. Or else my good friend, let us fay, that now a daies there is not an amorous person, and one that skilleth of love, but all love is extinct and perifhed, because there is no man, as Pindarus faith,

Who now in pleasant vaine Poetical His fongs and ditties doth addresse, Which just in rhime and metre fall, To praise his fair and sweet mistrosse,

But this is untrue and abfurd : for many loves there be that firre and move a man, though they meet not with fuch minds as naturally are disposed and forward to Musick or Poetry : and wellmay thefe loves be without Pipes, without Harps, Viols, Luter, and firinged infiruments: and yet lefe talkative nor ardent, than those in old time. Again, is were a shame and without all conscience to Cay, that the Academy with all the quire and company of Socrates and Plato were void of amorous affection (whose amatorious discourses are as this day extent, and to be read) although they lest no Poems behinde them. And is it not all one to fay, that there was never any woman but Sappho in love, nor had the gift of Prophecies, fave only Sybilla, and Aristonice, or such as published their vaticinations and Prophecies in verse? For, Wine, as Charemon was wont to say, is mingled and tempered with the manners of those that drink it: And this Enthuffasme or spirit of Prophecie, like unto the ravishment of love, maketh use of that sufficiency and faculty, which it findeth ready in the subject, and moveth each one of them that are infpired therewith, according to the measure of their natural disposition: and yet as we confider God and his providence, we shall see that the change is ever to the better. For the use of speech, resembleth properly the permutation and worth of money; which is good and allowable, fo long as it is used and known, being current, more or lesse, and valued diversly, as the times require. Now the time was, when the very mark and samp (as it were) of our speech, was citrrent and approved, in metre, verses, songs and sonnets: Forasmuch as then, all History, all Doctrine of Philosophy, all Affection; and to be brief, all matter that required a more grave and stately voice, they brought to Poetry and Musick. For now, only few men, hardly, and with much a do; give car and understand : but then, all indifferently heard, yea, and take great pleasure to hear those that sung, as Pindarus faith, but also most men for the great aptitude they had unto Poetry, when they would admonish and make remonstrances, did it, by the means of Harp, Lute, and Song withall : if they ment to rebuke, chastise, exhort, and incite, they performed it by tales, fables, and proverbs. Moreover their hymnes to the honour and praife of the gods, their prayers and vowes, their balads for joy of victory, they made in metre and mulical rhim: some upon a dexterity of wis, others by use and pratife. And therefore neither did Apello envy this ornament and pleasant grace unto the skill of Divination, neither banished he from this three-footed-table of the Oracle the Mule so highly honoured, but rather brought it in , and filtred it up as affecting and loving Poetical wite 1 yea, and himfelf mini-fired and infused certain imaginations, helping to put forward the lofty and learned kinde of language, as being much prized and efteemed. But afterwards, as the life of men, together with their fortunes and natures came to be changed; thrift and utility (which removeth all fuperfluity) took away the golden tuft, and foretops of peraks, the spangled coifs, caules, and attires, it cast off the fine and dainty robe, called Xystides; it clipped and cut away the bush of hair growing too long; unbuckled and unlaced, the trim bunkins, acquainting men with good reason, to glory in the fitnesse and frugality, against superfluous and sumptuous delicacies, yes, and to honour simplicity and modesty, rather than vaine poup and affected curiofity: And even to, the manner of mens speech, changing also and laying aside all glorious shew, the order of writing an History there with al, presently came down as one would say from the flately Chariot of verification, to profe, and went a foot; and by the means especially of the fathion of writing and speaking at liberty, and not being tied to measures, true flories, come to be di-flinguished from lying fables: and Philosophy embracing perspecuity of file, which was apreto teach and inftruct, rather than that which by tropes and figures amused and amazed mens brains. And then Apollo repressed Pythia, that she should not any more call her fellow Citizens, Pyricaes, that is to fay, burning fires ; nor the Spartanes, Ophioberos, that is to fay, devourers of Serpents; nor men Oreanas; nor River, Orempotas: and so by cutting off from her, Prophecies, Vetles, and ftrange termes, circumlocutions and obscurity, he caught and inured her to speak unto those who resorted to the Qracles, as Laws do talk with Cities, as Kings device and commune with their people and fubjects, and as scholars give ear unto their School-masters, framing and applying his manner of speech and language to, as it might be full of fenfe and perswafive grace : for this killon we ought to learn and know that, as Sopbocles faith

> God to the wife in heavenly things, is ay a lightfome guide, But fools fo briefly he doth teach, that they go alwaies wide.

And together with plainneffe, and dilucidity, belief was so turned and altered, changing together with other things, that before time, whatfoever was not ordinary nor common, but extravagant, or obfourely and coverely spoken, the vulgar fort drawing it into an opinion of some holinesse hidden undemeath, was aftonied thereat and held it venerable: but afterwards, defirous to learn and understand things clearly and eafily, and not with masks of difguifed words, they began to finde fault with Poefic. wherein Oracles were clad; not only for that it was contrary and repugnant to the ease intelligence of the truth, as mingling the darkness and stadow of obscurity with the sentence, but also for that they had Prophecies already in suspition; saying, that Metaphore Enigmatical, and covers words, yet and the ambiguities which Poetry useth, were but shifts, retracts, and evations to hide and cover all, witenfoever the events fell not out accordingly. And thany you may hear to report, that there be entain Poetical persons, practifed in verifying, fit yet about the Oracle, for to receive and carcle fome words there delivered; which prefently and Extempore, they reduce and contrive into verfe, metre, and thime, as if they were panniers to beflow all the answers in. And here I forbear to speak what occasion of blame, and matter of calumniation in these Oracles, these Onomatrites, Prodote and Cinefones have ministred, by adding unto them a Tragical pompe, and swelling inflation of words; when as neitl er they had need thereof, nor yet received any variety land alteration thereby. More-over, certain it is, that these juglers and Vagrant circumforanean Land leapers, these Practices of Legier de main, these Players at Passe and Repasse, with all the Pack of those Vagabonds, Ribauds and Legier of manuscric Layers as Faire and respairs, who have greatly differedited and brought into Oblo-Jellers, who haunt the Feafis of Cybele and Serapis, have greatly differedited and brought into Oblo-quie the Profession of Poetry: some by their extemporall Faculty and telling Fortunes, others by way of Lotteric forfooth, and by certain Letters and Writings, forging Oracles, which they would give a poor Varlets, and filly Women, who were foonest abused thereby, especially when they saw the fame reduced into verse, and so were carried away with Poeticall terms. And from hence it is now come to passe, that Poesie, for that sie hath suffered her self to be thus to be prophaned and made common, by such coufiners, Juglers, Deceivers, Enchanters, and false Prophets, is fallen from the truth, and rejected from Apolloes thece-footed Table.

And therefore I nothing wonder if other whiles in old time, there was need of this double meaning, circumlocution, and obscurity: for laffure you, there was not wont to come hither one for to enquire and be resolved, about the buying of a flave in open Market: another to know what profit he should have by his traffick or Husbandry : but hither came or fent great and Puissant Cities, Kings. Princes, and Tyrants, who had no mean matters in their heads to confult with Apollo as concerning their important affairs; whom to provoke, displease and offend, by causing them to hear many things contrary to their will and mind, was nothing good and expedient for those who had the Charge of the Oracle : forthis god obeyeth not Euripides, when he fetteth down a Law as it were for him.

Phoebus himself, and none but be,

Ought unto men the Prophet to be. for he useth mortall men to be his Ministers and under Prophets: of whom he is to have a speciall care to preferve them, that in doing him fervice, they be not spoiled and slain by wicked persons: in which regard he is not willing to conceal the truth, but turning aside the naked Declaration thereof, which in Poetry receiveth many reflexions, and is divided into many parcells, he thereby did away the rigor and odious austerity therein contained. And it skilled much, that neither Tyrants should know it, nor Enemies be advertised and have intelligence thereof. For their fakes therefore, heenfolded in all his Answers, Doubts, Suspitions and Ambiguities, which from others did hide the true meaning of that which was answered. But such as camerthemselves to the Oracle, and gave close and heedfullear, as whom it concerned particularly, those he deceived not, neither failed they of the right understanding thereof. And therefore a very foolish man is he, and of no Judgement, who doth take occasion of flander and calumntation, if the world and effate of mens affairs being changed, this God thinketh, that he is not to aid and help men any more after his accustomed manner, but by fome other. Furthermore, by the means of Poetrie and Verification, there is not in a Sentence, any greater Commodity than this; that being couched and comprised in a certain number of words and fillables measured, a man may retain and remember the same better. And necessary it was in old time, to carry away in memory many things, because there were delivered many signs and marks of places, many times and opportunities of affairs, many Temples of firange golds beyond fea, many ference monuments, and Repositories of demi-gods hard to be found of those who salled far from Grues. For in the Voyaget of Chies and Gandie, * * * enterprised by Onesichus and Palamthus, beside many other Captains and Admirals, how many figns and Conjectures went they by, and were to observe, for to find the refting seat, and place of abode, which was ordained to every one of them? and fome of them quite miffed thereof: as for example, Battus: fot his Prophesie ran thus, that unless he arrived to the right place, he should be banished. Failing therefore of the Countrey, whereto he was sent, he returned again to the Oracle in humble manner, craving his favour. And then Apol. lo answered him in this wife;

Thou know st thy felf, as well as I ean tell, That unneth yet in Africk thou hast been ; (For thither fent I thee to build and dwell) Nor Meliboca, that place fo fertile, feen : If thither now accordingly thou wend, Thy wisdome then greatly will I commend.

And so he sent him away the second time. Likewise Lyfander being altogether ignorant of the little hill Archeledes, of the place called Alopecon, as alfo of the river Oplites.

all which he should have avoided, was vanquished in Battell, and slain about those very places, and that by one Inachian an Aliartian, who had for his device or arms in the Target that he barea dragon pourtrayed. But I shink is needleffe to recite many other ancient Oracles of this kind, which are not eafily to be related, and as hardly remembred, especially among you who know them well enough. But now thanks be to God, the flate of our affairs and of the world, in regard whereof men were wont to feek unto the Oracle is fettled: for which I rejoyce and congratulate with you. For great Peace there is, and Repose in all parts; Warres be stayed, and there is no more need of running and wandring to and fro from one Countrey to another: Civil Diffensions and Seditions be appealed, there are no Tyrannies now exercised: neither do there reign other Maladies and and in miseries of Greece, as in times past, which had need of Soveraign Medicines, exquisite Drouges and powerfull Confections, to remedy and redreffe the same. Whereas therefore there is no variable diversity, no matter of secrecie, no dangerous affairs, but all demands be of pettie and vulgar matters, much like to thefe School Queftions: Whether a man should marry or no? Whether a man may undettake a Voyage by Sea or no? or Whether he is to take up or put forth money for interest? where I say the greatest points, about which Cities seek unto Apallo, are about the fertility of their ground, plenty of Corn, and other Fruits of the Earth, the breed and multiplying of their Cattel, and the health of their bodies : to go about to comprise the same in verse, to pevise and forge long circuits of words, to the strange and obscure terms, to such interrogatories as require a short simple and plain answer, were the part of an ambitious and vain glorious Sophister, who took pride in the elegant Composing of Oracles. Over and besides, Pythia of her self, is of a gentle and generous nature: and when the descendent thicker and conversels with the god, she half no more regard of truth than of elory, neither passeth she, whether men praise or dispraise her. And better I wis it were for us, if we also were likewise affected. But now in a great Agonie (as it were) and fearfull perplekity, less the place should lose the Reputation, which it hath had for the space of thee thousand years, and doubting that some would abandon it, and cease to frequent it, as if it were the School of a Sophifler, who feared to lofe his credit, and to be despised, devise Apologies in desence thereof, feigning causes and reasons of things which we neither know, nor is beferming us for to learn, and all to appeale and perswade him, who complaineth, and seemeth to find fault, whereas we should rather fake him off and let him go.

For with bim first, It will be worft, who hath fuch an opinion of this our God, as that he approved and esteemed these ancient Sentences of the Sager, written at the entrance of the Temple, Know thy felf; Too much of nothing; principally for their beeviry, ascontaining under few words a pithy Sentence well and closely couched, and fas a man would fay) beaten foundly together with the hammer: but reproved and blamed Modern Oracles, for delivering most part of their answers, Briefly, Succinctly, Simply and Directly. And verily such notable Apothegmes, and sayings of the ancient Sages, resemble Rivers that run through a narrow straight, where the water is pent and kept in so close, that a man cannot see through it, and even so unneth or hardly may the bottom of their sense be sounded. But if you consider what is written or faid by them, who endevour to fearch unto the very bottome, what every one of these Sentences doth comprehend, you shall find that hardly a man shall meet with Orations longer than they. Now the Dialect or speech of Pythia is such, as the Mathematicians define a straight and direct line, na m:ly the shortest that may be between two points; and even so it bendeth nor, it errokeneth not, it maketh no circle, it carrieth no double sense and ambiguity, but goth straight to the truth; and fry it be subject to consure and examination, and dangerous to be misconstrued and believed amisse: yet to this day it hath never given advantage whereby it might be convinced of untruth: But in the mean time it hath furnished all this Temple full of rich Gifts, Presents and Oblations, not onely of Greek Nations, but also of barbarous people, as also adorned it with the beautifull Buildings, and magn ficent Fabricks of the Amphictions. For you fee in some fort, many Buildings adjoyned were not before, and as many repaired and restored to their ancient perfection, which were either fallen to decay and ruined by continuance of time, or else lay confusedly out of order. And like as we fee, that near unto great trees that spread much and prosper well, other smaller Plants and shrubs grow and thrive: even to together with the City of Delphos, Pylea flourished, as being fed and maintained by the abundance and affluence, which arifeth from hence, in fuch fort as it beginneth to have the form and sh. w of solemn sacrifices of stately meetings and sacred waters, such as in a thousand years before it could never get the like. As for those that inhabited about Galaxien in Bueria; they found and felt the gracious presence and Favour of our God by the great Plenty and Store of Milk, For,

From all their ews thick Milk did Spins. As Water fresh from lively Spring: Their tubs and tunnes with Milk therein Brim full they all, home fast did bring . Nobarrels, bottles, pails of wood, But full of Milk in boules stood.

But to us he giveth better marks, and more evident tokens and apparent fignes of his presence and favour, than these be; haaving brought our Countrey (as it were from drinesse and penury, from defart and wast wilderness, where it was before, to be now rich and plentifull, frequented and peopled, yea and to be in that honour and reputation, wherein we see it at this day to flourish. Certes I love my self much better, for that I was so well affected, as to put to my helping hand in this bufiness, together with Polycentes, and Petreus: Yea and him also love in mine hears, who was the first Authour unto us of this Government and Policy, and who took the pains and endevoured to fet on foot and establish most part of these things. Bue impossible it was, that in so small a time there should be seen so great and so evident a mutation by any industry of man whatsoever, if God himself had not been Assistant to Sanctific and Honour this Oracle. But like as in those Times pash, some men there were who found fault with the Ambiguity, Obliquity and Obscurity of Oracles; to there [The delibe in these dayer, others, who like Sycophants cavill at the overmuch simplicity of them; whose humourous passion is injurious and exceeding soolish. For even as little Children take more joy and pleasure to see Rain-bowes, Haloes, or Garlands about the Sun, Moon, Sec, yea, and Cometo or blasing Stars, than they do to behold the Sun himself or the Moon; so these persons defire to have anigmaticall and dark speeches, obscure Allegories, and wrested Metaphous, which are all relations of devination upon the Fansie and Apprehension of our mortall conceit. And it shey understand not sufficiently, the cause of this change and alteration, they go their waies, and are ready to condemn the God, and not either up or themselves, who are not able by discourse of reason to reach unto the counsell and intention of the said God.

The Summary.

Thebes] He Thebans having lost their freedom and liberty by the violent proceedings of Archias, Leontidas, and in The Thebans having lost their freedom and liberty by the violent proceedings of Archias, Leontidas, and in an and other Tyrants, who banished agreet number of good Gitizens and Men of worth, in which Roll that nar- and Catalogue Pelopidas was one (as appeareth in the Story of his Life, wherein Plutarch writeth of all this matter at large) it fell out at last, that the exiled persons took beart, drew to an bead, and wrought so, taketh up as skor resurred he City of The Close, flow the Tyrants, and displaced the garrifon of the Spartans. Which a good done, they dispatched their ambassages to other States and Common-wealths of Greece, for to justifie part of this their association, and namely, among the rest, they seem caphisas to Athens: who being cap at the request this Dispatched the results and namely among the rest, they seem caphisas to Athens: who being beautiful and reported the resurre of the banished men, the surrections of Archidamus, a personage of great authority, related and reported the resurre of the banished men, the surrections of the surrection of the banished men, the surrection of the surrect prifing of the Tyrants, and the reftoring of the City to their ancient franchifes, and that with discourses wonderfull patheticall, and such as shew the singular providence of God in the preservation of States, and confusion of such wicked members as disturb the publick peace. But in this recitall, there is inserted, and that nymony processing memores as an interested process peace. But in this receival, towers in ejected, and that with good graces, a digression as southing the familiar spirit of Socrates, by occasion of a Pythagorean Pholopoper newly come out of Italy to Thebes, for to take up the bouse of Lylis: for by occasion that Galaxidorus the Epicurean derided the superstition of this stranger, praising withall, the wisdom and learning of Socrates, who had cleared and delivered Philosophy from all sanditival illusions of Spirits and Ghosts. Theoretical things in an example of a continuation of the Science Parister and the superstitute of the superstitu ocritus bringeth in an example of a certain prediction of this familiar Spirit. But withall, when the other had demanded the question, whether the same were an humane and naturall thing or no, the dishutation began to kindle and wax bot; untill fuch time as Epaminondas and this stranger named Theanor came in place : and then they fell into a Discourse of Poverty and Riches, by occasion that Theanor offered silver unto the Thebans, in recompence of their kindnesse and good entertainment shewed unto Lysis. And as they would bave proceeded forward in this argument, there came one who ministred occasion for to return unto the former narration as touching the enterprise and exploit of the said exiled persons: in which there is intermingled again a treatife concerning the familiar Spirit of Socrates, with a large recitall of the fable of Timarchus. After which, Caphifias rebearfed the iffue of the tragedy of the Tyrants, shewing thorowout, notable discourses of the divine wisdom, and joyning therewish a consideration of Socrates his wildom, guiding and directing to a particular plot for the good of all Greece. But in this place the Reader must remember and call to mind who this Socrates was; to wit, a Man diffitute of the true knowledge of God, and therefore he is keld for fu-Spetied and naught this familiar Spirit of his, if a man would receive and admit the opinion of some interloquuter, who (appole it was a Damon or Spirit from without; to the end that we should not rest upon revelation, inspirations and guidances of Angels, unlesse it be of such, the testimonies whereof are grounded upon the boly some annual and granter of grant carried to grant and the deads, who by their books publified abroad in print, have desect to revive and raife up again thefe falle opinion (which some in this age of ours have) of familiar Spirits, by whom they are forched as well defined as a furely tanget and instructed as by the very Spirit of God, Beaking unto us by his written Word.

Of the Damon or familiar Spirit of Socrates.

have heard (as I remember) O Caphifias, a prety speech of a certain Painter making a comparifion of those who came to see the Pictures and Tables which he had painted: for he was wont to say, that the ignorant beholders and such as had no skill at all in the Art of Painting, resemble them who salured a whole multitude of people all at once; but the better fort and such as were skilful, were like unto those who used to salve every one whom they meet, severally by name: for that the former had no exquifite infight into the works, but a superficial and generall knowledge onely; whereas the other contrariwise, judging every piece and pare thereos, will not misse one-joe, but grussely use, consider and censure that which is well done or otherwise. Semblably it falleth out in my judgement, and careless present on the surface of the conceit and Understanding of the more is one to get the contract only the summary and unto a judicious and excellens Spectator of Vertue, as of some great and singular Art, taketh more thing common with fortune; but the good wit is better seen in cause, and in the Vertue of sparticular common with fortune; but the good wit is better seen in cause, and in the Vertue of sparticular and well advised in the greatest perils; where the discourse of reason is mingled with passion, which of Spectators, declare you to us now in order from the beginning, how this matter did passe and in the execution thereof, as also what talk and discourse was held there; for that thy all iskelihood you were presentand for mine own part, so desirous I am to hearsthas I would not fail to go as far as to Thirbes for the knowledge thereof, were in not, that I am thoughe already of the Albenians, to savorise the Bathians more than I should.

Capbiflat.

Certes, Archidemus, fince you are so earnest and forward to learn how these affairs were managed, I ought in the regard of the good will which you bear unto ours, before any businesse whatsever (as Pindarus saith) to have come hither, exprelly for to relate the same unto you: but since we are hither come in embassing already, and at good leisure, whiles we attend what answer and disparch the people personage so kind and well affectionate to his friends, were as much as to revive the old reproach imputed upon the Batians, to wit, that they hate good letters and learned Discourses; which reproach began to wear away with your Secrets; and is so doing, it seemeth that we treat of affairs with two Priests: and therefore see, whether the Szigniors here present be disposed to hear the report of so many speeches and actions; for the narration will not be short, considering that you will me to adjoyn thereto the words that passed.

Archidamus.

Archi

You fay well. But were I beft to begin my speech, in regard of those matters that ye have already hard and known, which I would not willingly repage.

We know reasonably well, in what state the City of Thebes stood, before the return of the banished persons; and namely, how Archies and Leantidas, had secree intelligence, and complotted with Phabidas the Lacedzmonian Captain, whom they persuaded, during the time of truce, to surprise the Cassle of Cadmus; and how having executed this design, they draw forme Citizens out of the City, and put others in prison, or held the men in aw, whiles themselves ruled tyrannically and with violence. Whereof I had intelligence, because I was (a syou wow well) host muto Melon and Pelopidas, with whom (to long as they were in exile) I was inwardly acquainted and conversed familiarly. Moreover, we have heard already, how the Lacedzmonians condemned Phabidas to pay a great sine, for that he had sized the fore Cadmia, and how they put him by, and kept him from the journey and expedition of Olymbus, and sent chither in stead of him, Lysanvidas with two other Captaines, and planted a stronger garrison within the Cassle. Furthermore, we know very well, that Ismenias died nor the sirestkind of death, presently upon I wot not what processes framed, and an advien commensed against him, for shat Gorgidas advertifed the banished who were here, by letters, from time to time, of all matters that passed in the fore, as there remaineth for you to relate, nothing else, but the return of the said banished men, and the surprising or apprehension of the tyrans.

About that time (Archidamus) all we that were of the confederacy and complotted together, used ordinarily to meet in the house Simmias, by occasion that he was retired and in cure of a wound which he had received in his Leg, where we conferred feeretly of our affairs as need required; but in the wand openly, diffcourfed of matters of Learning and Philosophy, drawing unto us often times into our company, Archisis, and Leontidas, men who milliked ner fo much conferences and communications because we would remove all suspicion of such Conventicles. For Simmias having abode long time in forrain parts among the Barbarians, being returned to Thebst but a little while before, was full of all manner of News and strange Reports as touching those barbarous Nations; insomuch, as arbits when he was at letture, willingly gave ear to his Discourse and Narrations, fitting in the Company of us young Gendemen, as being well pleased that we should give our minds to the fludy of good Letters and Learning, rather than bufie our heads about those matters which they went about and practifed in the mean while. And the very Day on which late in the Evening; and toward dark night following, the exiled perform abovefaid were come closely under the wall, there arrived from thence unto us a meffenger, whom Pherenicus lent, one who was unknown to us all, unleffe it were to Charon, who brought us word, that to the number of twelve young Gentlemen, and those the braveft Gallants of all the banished conspiratours, were already with their Hounds hunting in the forrest Criberon, intending to be here in the Evening; and that therefore they had fent before and dispatched a vaunt-courrier of purpose, as well to advertise us thereof, as to be certified themfelves who it was that should make his house ready for them to lie secret and hidden therein when they were once come; to the end that upon this foreknowledge they might fer forward and go directly thither. Now as we studied and took some deliberation about this point, Charon of himself offered his houle: whereupon, when the messenger intended to return immediatly and with great freed to the exites, Theorisus the Southlayer griping me fast by the hand, and cashing his eyeupon freed to the exites, Theorisus the Southlayer griping me fast by the hand, and cashing his eyeupon freed to the exites, the twent before: This man (q-toth he) O Caphifias, is no Philosopher nor deep Scholar, Charon, that went before: This man (q-toth he) O Caphifias, is no Philosopher nor deep Scholar, neither is he come to any excellent or exquifite knowledge above others, as his Brother Epaminondas, neither is he come to any excellent or exquifite knowledge above others, as his Brother Epaminondas, and yet you feehow being naturally inclined, and directed withall by the Lawes, unto honour and and yet you tee now being naturally anothers, and the teach for the delivery and fetting free of his countering, he expoteth himself willingly unto danger of death, for the delivery and fetting free of his country; whiles Epaminondas, who hath had better means of infruction and education to the attaining of try; whiles Epaminondas, who hath had better means of infruction and education to the attaining of vertue, than any other Bastian whatfoever, is restiff, dul, and backward, when the question is of executing any great enterprise for the deliverance of his native country. And to what occasion of service shall be ever be fo well disposed, prepared & employed; than this? Unto whom I made answer in this wife: We for our parts, most kind & gently Theseritus, do that which hath been thought good, resolved & concluded upon among our (clves, but Epaminondas having not yet perswaded us, according as hethinketh it better himfelf, not to put these our designments in execution, hath good reason to go against that wherewith his nature repugneth, and so he approveth not the designment whereunto he is moved and invited. For it were unreasonable to force and compell a Physician, who promiseth and undertaketh to cure a disease, without lancet and fire, for to proceed to incision, cutting and cauterizing. Why (quoth Theoridistance, without sancet and mentor to proceed to manning actions and content ame, wany (quota Incorrectus) doth not he approve of chaconspirace? No (questi) neither alloweth he that any Citizens should be put to death, unlesse they were condemned sirry judicially by order of Law: Mary, he saith, that if without maffacre and effusion of Civizens blood they would enterprise the deliverance of the City, be would affift and aid them right willingly. Seeing then that he was not able to induce us for to beleeve his reasons, but that we followed fill our own course, he requireth us to let him alone, pure, innocent, & impolluted with the blood of his Citizens, & to fuffer him for to elpy & attend fome better occasions & oportunities, by means whereof with Juffice he might procure the good of the weal publick. For Murder (quoth he) willnot contain it (ell within liquite as it ought; but Pherenicus haply & Pelopedas; may bend their force principally upon the auxhors and heads of the tyranny, & wicked persons but you shall have some such as Eumolpidas and Samiadas hot slomacked men, set on fire with choicr and defire of revenge, who taking liberty by the vantage of the night, will not lay down their armes, nor put up their fwords, until they have filled the whole city with bloodfred, and murthered many of the best and principall Citizens.

As I thus devised and communed with Theoritus, Anaxidorus, over-hearing some of our words (for near he was unto us :) Stay (quoth he) & hold your peace, for I fee Archias & Ly anoridas the Spattan Captain comming from the caftle Cadmia, & it feemeth that they make hafte directly toward us. Hereupon we panfed and were fill: with that Archias calling unto Theorius, and bringing him apart by him felf unto Lyfanoridas, talked with him a long while, drawing him afide a little out of the way, under the Temple of Amphion; in fuch fort, as we were in an extream agony and perplexity, for fear left they had an inchling or fulption of our enterprife, or that fomething were discovered: and thereupon they examined Theoritus. As these matters thus passed, Physilidas (whom you Archidamus know) who was then the principal secretary or seribe under Archias, at that time captain general of the army, being defirous of the approach of the conspiratours, and withall both privy and party with us in the complet, came in place and took me (as his manner was) by the hand, beginning with open mouth, to mock our exercises of the body & our wrefling; but afterward, drawing me aside, a good way from the others, asked me whether the banished persons would keep that appointed day or no? I made him answer, Yea Thenhave I (quoth he) to very good purpose prepared a seast this day for to entertain Archias in my houseand so to deliver him with ease into their hands, when he shall have eaten freely, and drunk wine merily. Paffing well done (quoth I) O Phyllidas: but I befeech you withal, for to bring together all our enemics, or as many as you can. That is no case matter (quoth he) to compasse, but rather altogether impossible. For Archias hoping that some great Lady of honour and estate will come thither unto him, in no wife can abide that Leontidas should be there, so that of necessity we must divide them into sundry houses Now if Archias and Leontidas both, be once apprehended, I suppose that the rest will soon system elfe remain quier, and be very highly contented if any man will grant them fafety and security of their live. W.ll (quoth 1) we will so do:but I pray you, what business have they with Theseritus, that they are fo long in talk with him? I know not for a truth (quoth Phyllidas) but have heard I that there be certain prodictions fignes of unlucky and unfortunate prefage unto the city of Sparta.

(quoth he) requested you to stay here a while for his sake: for he is an intercessor in the behalf of Amphiteus by the means of Leonidas, that his life may be pardoned, and that inttead of death, the min might be banished, this is fallen out (quoth Theorisus) in very good time and fally to the purpose as a man would have it: for I was minded to enquire of you what things were found within the tombe of Allmens, and what shew it carried when it was opened among you: and also whether you were present when Aggillaus shen of purpose for to translate and earry the reliques unto Spatza. Prefent was not my selfs, quoth Phidolaus, in person: and I was very much angry and offended with my sellow Citizens, in that I was so discarded and left out. Howbeit sound there was with the bones and other reliques of the corps, a certain carquance of brasse, and that of no great bigness; and two carthen port, containing amphors a piece full of earth which in continuance of time was grown hard and converted.

Over the Sepulcher there was a Table of braffe likewife, wherein were written many letters, and those of a strange and wonderful form, as being of right great antiquity: for nothing could we pick out of them, notwithftanding the letters appeared very well, after that the braffe was fair walhed and scoured clean, the characters were of such a making by themselves, after a barbarous fashion, and resembling neerest those of the Egyptians. Whereupon Agesilaus also, as men say, sent a copy of them unto the King of Egypt, praying him to show the same unto their Priests, to see whether they understood them or no? But peradventure of these matters Simmias also is able to tell us some news, because about that time he converted much with the faid Priests in points of Philosophy. And those of the City Aliartos are of opinion, that their great sterility, and scarcity, as also the swelling and inundation of the Lake hapned not by chance, but was the vengeance divine upon those who suffered the monument of this Sepulchre to be digged up and opened. Then Theocritus after he had paused a little: The Lacedemonians likewife (quoth he) feem to have been threatned by the ire of the gods, as the prodigious fignes and tokens prefage no leffe, whereof Lyfanoridas ere while talked with me: who even now is gone into the City Aliarto, to cause the said Monument to be filled up again, and there to offer certain funeral effusions and libaments, to the ghost of Alemena and Aleus, according to a certain Oracle; but who this Aleus should be, he kneweth not : and so soon as he is from thence returned, he must fearch also the Sepulchre of Dirce, which none of the Thebans do know, unlesse they be those who have been Captains of the horsemen. For look who goeth out of this office, taketh with him his successour that entreth into his place, by night, and when they two be alone together, he sheweth it unto him, and there they perform certain religious ceremonies without fire, the tokens and marks whereof, they shuffle together, and confound so, as they be not seen; which done, they depart in the dark, and go divers waies, one from the other. But for mine own part, O Phidolaus, I believe verily he will never finde it out, for the most of those who have been lawfully called to the Captainship of the Cavallery, or to say more truly, even all of them are in exile, except Gorgidas and Plate, whom they will never aske the question, because they are assaud of them. And as for those who are now in place, well may they take the Lance and the Signet within the Castle of Cadonus; for otherwise they neither know nor can shew ought. As Theoritus spake these words, Leontidas went forth with his friends; and we entring in , faluted Simmias , being fet upon his bed; but I suppose he had not obtained his request, for very pensive and heavy he was; and looking wishly in the face upon us all he brake out into these words : O Hercules, what a world isthis, to fee the barbarous and favage manners of men? And was not this then a very good anfiver made by old Thales, who being returned home, after a long Voyage, from out of a forein countrey, and demanded what was the strangest news that he could make relation of? answersed: That he had feen a Tyrant live to be an old man. For thus you fee, that himfelf who in his own particular, had never received wrong by a Tyrant, yet in regard of the odious trouble, in converting and ha-, ving to do with them, is offended and become an enemy to all Soveraign and absolute Governments, which are not subject to render an account unto the Laws: But haply God will see to these matters; and provide in time convenient. But know you (Caphifias) who this stranger may be, that is come unto you? I wot not (quoth he) whom you mean. Why (quoth he) again, Leonidas came and told us of a man, who was feen by night to arife from about the Tombe of Lyfis, accompanied inflately wife, with a great train of men, in good order, and well appointed, who lodged there and lay upon Pallets: for that there were to be feen in the morning little beds hard by the ground, made of Chast tree and Heath or Lings. There remained also the tokens of fire, and of the libaments and oblations of milk. Moreover betimes in the morning he demanded of all paffingers whom he met, where he should finde the children of Polymnis dwelling in that countrey? And what stranger might this be? (quoth 1.) for by your report he (hould be some great personage, and not a private man and of mean degree. Not so (quoth Phidolans) but when he comes welcome he shall be, and we will receive him courteously. But for this present, if peradventure (Simmias) you know any thing more than we, concerning those letters whereof we were of late in doubt, declare it unto us : for it is faid that the Priests of Egypt understood by conference together the letters of a certain Table of braffe, which Agefilaus not long fince had from us, at what time as he caused the Tombe of Alemena to be opened. I have not (quoth Simmias, calling another matter prefently to mind) feen this faid Table, Q Phidolaus: but Agetoridas the Spartan carrying with him many letters from Agellaus came to the City Memphis, and went unto the Prophet Chomaphis, with whom we conferred as touching Philosophy, and abode together a certain time, my felf I mean, and Plato, with Ellopion, the Peparethian. Thither I say arrived he as fent from King Agefilaus, who requested Chonuphis, that if he understood any thing of those letters which were written in the faid braffe, he would interpret the same, and send it back unto him incontinently. So this Prophet was musing and studying three daies together by himself, peru-fing and turning all forts of the figures and characters of anciens letters: and in the end wrot back his answer unto King Agestlaus, and by word of mouth told us, that the said writing gave direction and commandement unto the Greeks, to celebrate the feaft, and folemnize the plaies and games in the honour of the Muses : also that the form of those characters, were the very same which had been used at the time when Proteus reigned in Egypt, which Hercules the fon of Amphitryo learned and that God by those letters advised and admonished the Greeks to live in peace and repose, instituting certain games unto the Muses, for the study of Philosophy and good literature, and disputing one against games unto the mates, for the many of a monthly and printing juffice, laying arms clean slide. As for another continually, with reasons and arguments as touching juffice, laying arms clean slide. As for us, we thought verily even then at the very first, that Compbis said well and ruly; but much rather, when in our return out of Egypt, as we paffed along Caria, certain persons of the life Delos, met us upon the way, who requested Plato (as he was a man well feen and exercised in Geometry) to explane the meaning unto them of a certain strange Oracle, and hard to be understood; which god Apollo had given them: the tenour whereof was this: That the Delians and all other Greek Nations, should have a cefficion and end of all their present troubles and calamities, when they had once doubled the Altar which flood in the Temple at Delos for they being not able to gueffe nor imagine what the fient and meaning should be, of this answer delivered by the Oracles and besides, making themselves ridiculous, when they thought to double the fabrick and building of the Altar (for when they had doubled each fide of the four, they were not ware how by augmentation they made a folid body, eight times a big as it was before, and that by ignorance of the proportion, which in length yieldeth the duple) they had recourf: unto Plato, for to be refolved of this difficulty. Then he calling to mind, the forefaid Egyptian Prieft faid unto them , that the god plaied with the Greeks, for despising good Sciences; reproaching them for their ignorance, and commanding them in good earnest to fludy Geometry, and not curforily after a superficial; for that it was a matter and work, not of a depravate conceit, nor of a troubled and dimme understanding, but sufficiently exercised, and perfectly seen in the Sciences of Lines ; to finde of two lines one middle proportioned, which is the only means to double the figure of a Cubick body, being augmented equally in all dimensions: And as for these (quoth he) Eudonus the Cnidian, or Helicon the Cyzicenian, hath performed fufficiently unto you: howbeit, we are not to think that the god hath need of any fuch duplication, neither was it, that which he meant, but he commanded the Greeks to give over arms for to converfe with the Mules; in dulcing their passions by the fludy of good literature, and the Sciences, and to to couple and carry themselves, as that they might profit, and not hurt one another. But whiles Simmias thus spake, my father Polynmius entred the place, and fat him down close unto Simmias, beginning thus to speak: Epaminondas (quoth he) requesteth both you, & all the reft that be here, unless your bufineffe otherwise be the greater, not to fail but here to flay, as being defirous to make you acquainted with this stranger, who is of himself a gentle person, & withall, is hither come with a generous and honest intention (being one of the Pythagorian Philosophers) from out of Italy, and his arrivall into these parts, is by occasion of certain visions and dreams as he fith, yea, and evident apparitions admonishing him to poure and offer unto the good seignior Lysu, upon his Tombe, those libaments which are due unto men departed: and having brought with him a upon his Tombe, those indements which are due unto mea departed: and naving orought with hims good quantity of gold, he supposed that he is bound to make recompense unto Epaminodaes, for the charges which he was at in keeping and maintaining good Lysis in his old age, and most ready he is, without our request, and against our will; to succour our need and poverty. Simmins taking great pleasure to hear this: You tell us (quoto the) of a wonderful man indeed, and such an one as its worthy of Philosophy; but what is the reason that he came not directly unto us? Because (quoth he) he took up lodging laft night about the Sepulchre of Lysis, and as take it, Epaminondas hath led him to the River Isnenus, for to walh , but from thence they will come both together unto us : but before that he spake with us, he lodged upon the Tombe of Lyfis, with a purpose as I thinke, to take up the bones and reliques of his body, for to carry with him back into Italy, unleffe there were some spirit or damon impeached him in the night: When my father had thus much faid, he held his tongue; and then Gelaxidorus : O Hercules (quoth he) how hard a matter is it to finde a man who is altogether free from vanity, and in whom there is no spice of superfittion? For some there be, who even against their wills are otherwhiles surprised with these passions, by reason either of ignorance or infirmity : others again, to the end they might be thought more religious, more devout, and better beloved of the gods, upon a fingularity, referre all their actions to the gods, as the authors thereof, preferring before all the Inventions that came into their mind, dreams and fantaftical apparitions, and all facts feolish toics and wanties; which peradventure is not unbefeeming nor usproficult for Politicians and Statists, who are sorted to frame themselves to a stubborn and disordinate multitude, for to reclaim and to pull back the common and vulgar fort by fuperfittion, as it were by the bit of a bridle, unto that which is expedient for them. But this mask feemeth not only undecent and unformly for Philosophy, but also contrary to the profession thereof, which promises to teach us all that which is good and profitable with reason, and afterwards referreth the beginning of our actions unto the gods, as if it contemued reason and differed the proofs of demonstration, wherein is feemeth to be most excellent turning aside to I wor nor what Oracles & Vifions in Decame, wherein oftentimes the wickedeft man in the world, findeth as thuch as the very best. And therefore in mine opinion our Secrates, O Simmias, used that manner of traching which is most worthy and besitting a Philosopher, to wit, simple, plain, without all siction, chusing it as most free and friendly unto the truth, rejecting and turning upon the Sophisters, all such enning it as most tree and treating under the artists present and utting apoint the committees and then armity, as the very time and finoak of Philosophy. Then Theorisms taking his tirm to Foeds: How now (quoth he) Galaxidorus, hath Melinus personaded you, as well as he made the Judges believe, that Socrates dispised the gods and all divine powers? For this is that which he chargeth him with before the Athenian. In no wife (quoth he) as touching those heavenly powers: but having received from the hands of Pythageras and Empedecles, Philosophy full of ridiculous fables, fantastical illusions, and vain superfittion, he acquainted us, playing thus the Fool in good earnest, and being drunk with fury, totake up betimes, and wifely to cleave unto things of substance, yea and to acknowledge, that in fober reason consisteth the truth. Be it so (quoth Theocritus,) but as touching the familiar spirit of Socrates, what shall we think or say of it? was it a cogging lie and meer fable, or what should we call it? For in mine own conceit, like as Homer feigneth that Minerva was evermore affiftant in all the Travels and Perils of Uy first even for from the very first beginning, this divine spirit allotted unto Serater a certain vision, which guided him in all the actions of his life, this only went and walked before him: it was a light unto him in all those affairs wherein nothing could be seen, and which possibly might not begathered, nor comprehended by reason and wildome of man, insomuch, as many times this spirit fake with him, inspiring, directing, and governing, after a heavenly manner, his intention. Now he that would know a greater number of proofes, and those more wonderful, let them hear Simmias fpeak, and others, who lived familiarly with him: as for my felf, I will relate one example, which Isaw with mine own eyes, and where I was in person present: One day when I went to consult with the Divinor or Soothfaice Euthybren, Socrates went up (as you may remember well, O Simmias, for present you were there also) toward a place called Symbolon, and the house of Andacides, asking all the way as we went, and troubling Euthyphron with many questions, merrily and by way of sport; but all on a fudden he staied and rested, very studious and musing with himself a good while : then he turned back and went along the street where Joyners dwelt, that made coffers and chests, and called unto those his familiar friends who were gone before, the other way, for to have them return : for why, his familiar spirit forbad him to go forward as he began : thus the greater part of them, retired and went with him, and among them, I my felf was one, following evermore Enthyphren hard as heels; but some other of the younger sort, would needs go streight on still, of a very deliberate purpose to cross and convince the familiar spirit of Socrates, and drew along with them Charillus the Player upon the Flute, who was then come with me to Athens, for to visit Cebes. Now when they went by the shops of the Imagers, neer the common Hals and Courts of Justice, they might see before them a mighty herd of Hogges, as thick as one might fland by another, full of dirt and mire, and bearing down all before them, by reason of their great number; and for that there was no means to umafide from them, they overthrew some of the young men abovefaid, and laid them along, on the ground, yea & all to be raied the rest of their fellows. Thus returned Charillus home to his lodging, with his legs, his thighes, and all his clothes, foully bedaubed with filthy dirt; in such fort, as he maketh us remember many times, and that with good laughing, the familiar of Socrates, and causeth us to marvel how that divine power never for fook this man, but had evermore a care and charge of him in all places and occasions what foever. Then (quoth Galaxidorus:) Think you that this familiar spirit of Socrateswas some proper and peculiar power, and not a parcel of that universal and common necessity, which confirmed this man by long experience, to give the counterpoile and overweight for to make him encline to or fro, in things obscure and hard to be conjectured and guessed at, by discourse of reafon? For like as one pound weight by it felf alone draweth not the balance, but when as the polic hangeth qually, if a man put it then either to the one fide or the other, it draweth the whole, and ma-keth all to incline that way : even so a voice or some small and light signe, is not sufficient to flire a grave cogitation to proceed unto the execution of a thing, but being put into one of the two contrary difcourfes, it folyeth all the doubt and difficulty, taking away the inequal in fuch fort, as then it maketh a motion and inclination. Then my father taking his courfe to speak: But I have heard (quoth he) O Galaxidorus, a certain Megarian fay, who likewise heard as much of Terpsion, that this spirit was nothing else but the sneeling either of himself, or of others about him; for if any one of his company sneeded on his right hand, whether he were before or behinds, it mattered not, then he enclined to do that which he intended, and was presented into his mind; but if were on the left hand, he gave over; and if it were himself that sneesed, when he was in doubt or suspense to do, or not to do a thing, he then was confirmed, and refolved to do it; but if he hapned then to fneele when a thing was already begun, it stated him, and checked his inclination and purpose, to effect and failh the same. But this is very frange, if it be true that he used this observation of facesing, how he could say, unto his friends, that it was his familiar spirit, which either moved him forward to do a thing, or drew him back from it: for this my good friend cannot chuse but proceed from a foolish vanity, and prefumptuous oftentation, and not of truth and frank simplicity, for which we esteem this personage, to be very great and excellent above others, in case for some voice comming without forth, or by reason of sneesing, he should be troubled and impeached in the continuance of an action which he had commenced already, and so relinquish his designe and deliberation : whereas it feemeth clean contrary, that the motions and inclinations of Socrates carried with them a firmitude and durable vehemence in whatfoever he went about and undertook, as proceeding from a direct and powerfull judgement, and from a strong motive that see him on work.

For he continued voluntarily all his life time in poverty, whereas he might have had wealth enough, if he would have received at his friends hands fufficient, who were very willing, yea, and took joy to beflow their goods upon him : also he would never leave the study and profession of Philosophy, for all the great hinderances and imp:achments that he met withall : and finally, when he might eafily have escaped and saved himself, by the means that his friends had prepared and made for him, he would never be removed, nor yield unto their prayers, nor defift from his manner of merry and jefting speeches. though death were presented unto him, but held his reason firm and unremovable in the greatest peril that was. These were not the parts of a man, who suffered himself to be transported or carryed away with vain voices, or freelings, from any resolution which he had taken: but of him who was guided and conducted by a greater command, and more puiffant power, unto his duty. I hear alfo, that he foretold some of his friends, the defeature and overthrow of the Athenians Army in Sicilie. And before these things, Pyrilampes the son of Antephon, being taken by us, in the chase and execution of Victory about Delion, and wounded with a Javelin, when he heard by those who were sent from Athens unto us for to treat of Peace, that Socrates, together with Alcibiades and Laches, being gone down by the way Rhetiffe, were returned in rafety, made report unto us, that Socrates had many times called him back, and other of his friends, and of his band, who flying with him for company, along the Mountain Parnes, were overtaken andkilled by our horsemen, for that they had taken another way of flight from the Battel, and not it, that he directed him unto by his angel or tamiliar spirit. And thus much lippose that simmins himself in the hard as well as I. True (quoth Simmins) I have heard it oftentimes, and of many persons, for upon this example and such like, the familiar spirit of Socrates was not alice. tle spoken of in Asbens. Why suffer we then, O Simmias (quoth Phidolaus) this Galaxidorus here, by way of jest and meriment, to debase so much, this so great a work of divination, as to passe it away in I wot not what voices and fneelings? Which fignes the vulgar fort of ignorant persons made use of by jest and mockery, in small matters, and of no consequence : for when the question is of more grievous dangers, and affairs of greater importance; the faying is verfied of Euripides:

No man will play the fool, nor fuch vain words Cast out, so neer the edge and dint of swords.

And Galaxidorus : If Simmias (quoth he) O Phidolaus, hath heard Socrates himself say ought of these matters, I am willing to give car and to pardon him with you: but for any thing that you(O Polymnis) have faid, and eafie matter it is to confute the same : for like as in Phytick, the beating of the pulle is no great matter in it felf, nor a pimple or whelk : but fignes they be both of no small things unto the Physician : and unto the Pilot and Master of a ship, the noise of the S.a, the sight or voice of some bird, or a thin cloud running through the air, fignifieth some great winde or violent tempest in the Sca : even so unto a Prophetical and divining mind, a fneeling or voice spoken, in it self confidered, is no such great matter, but signes these may be of most important accidents. For in no an nor science what soever, men do de pife the collection or judgement of many things by a few, nor of great matters by small : but like as if an ignorant person, who knoweth not the power of letters, secing them few in number, and in form vile and comtemptible, could not believe that a learned man was able to read and relate out of them long Wars in times paft, the foundations of Cities, the ads of mighty Kings, and their variable foremes; and fhould fay that there were fombling underneath, which told and declared unto the faid Historian, every one of those matters in order; he might give good occasion of laughter, and pleasantly to deride his ignorance, unto as many as heard him speak to: even so take heed and beware, left we (for that we know not the vertue and efficacy of every figne and foretoken, in as much as they prefage future things be not foolilly angred, if fome prudent and wife man by the fame lignes foretell formwhat as touching things unknown, and namely, if he say that it is not a voice nor a finefing, but a familiar (pirit, which hath declared the fame unto him. For now come I to you Polymmis, who effects and ad nive Socrate: as a personage, who by his plain simplicity, without any counterfeit vanity whatsoever, hath humanized as I may so say, Philosophy, and attributed it to humane reason, if he called not his figne that he went by, a voice or sneefing, but after a tragical manner should name it a spirit familiar. For contrariwise, I would marvel rather that a man so well spoken as Socrates was, so eloquent, and who had all words so ready at command, should say that is was a voice or a fincefing, and not a divine spirit that taught him: as if one should say that himself was wounded by an arrow, and not with an arrow by him who shot it, or that a poise was weighed by the balance, and not with a balance, by him that held or managed the balance in his hand : for the work dependeth not upon the instrument, but upon him who hath the instrument, and useth it for to do the work : and even to the inftrument is a kinde of figne used by that, which doth fignific and prognosticate thereby. Bit as I have faid already, we must listen what Simmias will say, as the man who knoweth this matter more exactly than others do. You say true indeed (quoth Theoretius) but let us see first, who they be that enter here in place: and the rather because Epaminondas is one, who feemeth to bring with him hither unto us the stranger above said. And when we looked all toward the gates, we might perceive Epaminondas indeed going before and leading the way, accompanied with Ismenodorus, Baccbilidas and Melissis, the player upon the Flute. The ftrangerfollowed after, a man of a good and ingenious countenance to fee to, and who carried in his vifage great mildness and humanity, and besides went in his apparel very gravely and decently. Now when he had taken his place and was fet down close unto Simmias, and my brother next unto me, and all the rest as every one thought good : after filence made, Simmias addressing his speech unto my brother: Go to now Epawinondas, (quoth he) what stranger is this, from whence commeth he, and what may be his name? for this is the ordinary beginning and usual entrance to farther knowledge and acquaintance. His name (quoth my brother) is Theanor, O Simmias: a man born in the City Croton, one of them who in those parts profess. Philosophy, and discrediteth not the glory of great Pythagoras: but is come hither isom out of Italy, a long journey, to confirm by good works, his good doctrine and profession. But you Epaminandas your felf (quoth the stranger then) hinder me from doing, of all good deeds, the beft. For if it be an honest thing for a man to do good unto his friends, dishonest it cannot be to recrive good at their hands: for in thanks there is as much need of a receiver as of a giver, being a thing composed of them both, and tending to a vertuous work : and he that receiveth not a good turn, as accoss ball fairly fent unto him, difgraceth it much, fuffering it to fall short and light upon the ground. For what mark is there that a man shooteth at which he is so glad to hit, and so sory to miss. as this, that one worthy of a benefit and good turn, either hath it accordingly, or failest thereof, unworthily? And yet in this comparison, he that there, in shooting at the mark which standeth still, and miffeth it, is in faule; but here, he who refuseth and flieth from it, is he that doth wrong and injury unto the grace of a benefit, which by his refusal, cannot attain to that which it tendeth unto. Asfor the causes of this my voyage hither, I have already showed unto you; and desirous I am to rehearle them again unto thele gentlemen here prefent, that they may be judges in my behalf againft you. When the colleges and focieties of the Pythagorean Philosophers, planted in every City of our Country, were expelled by the strong hand of the feditions faction of the Cyclonians, when those who kept still together were assembled and held a council in the City of Metapontine, the feditions fer the house on fire on every fide, where they were met : and burnt them all together except Philolaus and Lysis, who being yet young, active and able of body, put the fire by and escaped through it. And Phylolaus being retired into the countrey of the Laconians, faved himself among his friends, who beganakeady to rally themselves and grow to an head, yea, and to have the upper hand of the said Cyclonlans. As for Lysis, longit was ere any man knew what was become of him, until such time as Gorgias the Leontine being failed back again out of Greece into Sicilie, brought certain news unto Aressis, that he had spoken with Lysis, and that he made his abode in the City of Thebes. Whereupon Arcesus minded incontinently to embark and take the sea; so desirous he was to see the man : but finding himself for seeblenesse and age together, very unable to perform such a voyage, he took order expresly upon his death-bed with his friends, to bring him over alive if it were possible into Itab, or at leastwife, if haply he were dead before, to convey his bones and reliques over. But the wars, feditions, troubles and tyrannies that came between and were in the way, impeached those friends, that they could not (during his life) accomplish this charge that he had layed upon them : but after that, the spirit or ghost of Lysis now departed, appearing visibly unto us, gave intelligence of his death, and when report was made unto us, by them who knew the certain truth, how liberally he was entertained and kept with you, O Polymnis, and namely, in a poor house, where he was held and reputed as one of the children, and in his old age richly maintained, and to died in bleffed effate, I being a young man, was fent alone from many others of the ancient fort, who have flere of money, and be willing to befrow the same upon you who want it, in recompense of that great savour and gracious friendship of yours, extended to him. As for Lysis, worthipfully he was enterred by you, and bestowed in an honourable Sepulchre, but yet more honourable for him will be that courteli-, which by way of recompense is given to his friend, by others friends of his and kinsfolk. Whiles the stranger spake thus, the tears trickled down my fathers checks, and he wept a good while for the remembrance of Lysis. But my brother smiling upon me, as his manner was: How shall we do now Capbifias, quoth he; shall we cast off and abandon our poverty for money, and so fay no more, but keep filence ? In no wife (quoth 1) let us not quit and for fake our old friend, and fo good a fofirefs of young folk: but defend you it, for your turn it is now to fpeak. And yet I (quoth he) my father, fear not that our house is pregnable for money, unlesse it be in regard only of Caphistas, who may feem to have some need of a fair robe, to show himself brave and gallant unto those that make loveunto him, who are in number formany, as also of plenty of viands and tood, to the end that he may endure the toil and travel of bodily exercifes and combats which he must abide in the wrettling Schools. But feeing this other here, of whom I had more diffruit, doth not abandon poverty, nor rafeth out the hereditary indigence of his father and house, as a rincture and unscennly stain; but although he be yet a young man, reputeth himfelf gaily fet out and adorned with frugality, taking a pride therein, and refting contented with his prefent fortunes: Wherein should we any more employ our gold and filver, if we had it, and what use are we to make of it? What, would you have us to gild our armour, and cover our fhields as Nicias the Athenian did, with purple and gold intermingled therewith ? And shall we buy for you, father, a fair mantle of the fine rich cloth of Mileus, and for my mother, a trim coat of scarlet coloured with purple ? For furely we will never abuse this present, inpampering our belly, in featting our felves, and making more fumptuous cheer than ordinary, by receiving riches into our house as a costly and chargeable guest? Fie upon that, my son (quoth my father) God forbid I should ever see such a change in mine house. Why (quoth he again) we will not fit still in the house, keeping riches with watch and ward idle: for so the benefit were not beneficial but without all grace, and the possession thereof dishonourable. To what end then shall we receive it? but without all grates and a quoth my father. It (seemed of late (quoth Epaminondar) unto Jasona Captain of the Thessalians, that I made him an uncivil and rustical answer, when he sent hither a great masse of gold, and requested me to take it as a gift: for I charged him plainly, that he did me great wrong, and began to pick a quarrel with me, in that he affecting and aspiring to a Monarchy, came with money to tempt and solicit me a plain Citizen, of a free City, and living under the Laws. But as for you Sir, who are come unto us as a stranger, I approve your good will, for it is honest, vertuous and beseeming a Philosopher, yea, and I love and embrace it fingularly well: but this I must needs say unto you, that you bring medicines and Phyfick drogs to men that are not fick and ail nothing. Like as therefore, if you headicines and rhynce trogs to the them to be a constant of the c and that we lived in peace and amity with our neighbours, you would not think that ye ought to give or leave the faid armes among them that had no need nor defire thereof : even fo, come you are to aid us against poverty, as if we were afflicted and diffressed thereby : but it is clean contrary, for we can bear it with case, and well content we are to have it dwell with us still in the house : and therefore we feel no want either of money or munition, against her that doth us no displeasure. But this mellige you shall carry back unto your fellows and brethren in the same prosession beyond sea, that as they use their goods and riches most honeftly in the best manner, so they have friends here also, that can make use of their poverty as well. Now for the keeping, sunerals and sepulture of Lysis, he hath himself sufficiently paied us therefore and discharged all, in that among many other good instructions, he taught us, not to be assaid of poverty, nor to take it in ill part. To this, Theaver replied in this manner: Doth it (I pray you) bewray a base mind and want of courage, to fear poverty? and is it not as abford and as great a default in judgement, to dread and eschueriches? in case (I say) a man, not upon any sound reason, but for outward dispuised shew, and in a soolish humour of vanity, resustant reason, but for outward dispuised shew, and in a soolish humour of vanity, resustant reason. iect it. And what reason is there, to disswade and debar the getting and possession of goods, by all just and honest means, as Epaminondas useth? But rather, foras much as you are ready enough in your anfwere, as appeareth by that which you made as touching this point, unto Jason the Theffalian, Idemand of you first, Epaminondas, whether you think any kinde of giving money to be just and lawful: but no manner of taking? or that fimply, both givers and takers do offend and fin? Not fo, quoth Epaminondas: but of this opinion I am, that as of other things, so of riches likewise, there is one giving and possessing, that is civil and honest; and another, dishonest and shameful. Well then, quoth Theaner; what say you of him who giveth willingly and with a good heart, that which he ought: doth he not give it well? The other granted and confessed it. Go to then, quoth Theaner, he who receive the that which is given well and honefuly, doth he not take it honefuly also? or can there be more just and lawful taking of money, than that which is received of him who giveth righteously? I suppose (quoth Epaminondas) there cannot be. Between two friends therefore (quoth he) O Epaminondas, if the one may give, the other likewile may justly take : for in battels I confesse, a man ought to turn away and decline from that enemy of whom he hath received some pleasure; but in the case of benefits and good turnes, it is neither seemly nor honest, either to avoid or to reject that friend that giveth well and honeftly. No in truth, quoth Epaminondes; but you are to confider with us, thus much, That there being in us many lufts and defires, and those of fundry things; some are natural and (as they fay) inbred, budding and breeding in our flesh and about our bodies, for the entertainment of those pleasures which be necessary; others be strangers, proceeding from vain opini-One, which gathering strength and force by tract of time and long custome in bad nouriture, grow to fuch an head, that many times they pluck down and hold our fouls in subjection more forcibly and with greater violence, than do those natural before said. Now reason, by good use and vertuous ercise, minstreth means, that a man may draw away and spend many of those very passions which are inbred within us; but he had need to employ all the power and strength of custome and exercise against those other concupifcences which be foreiners and come from without forth, for to consume, cut off and chastife them, by all means of repressions and retentions that be reasonable. For if the resistance which reason maketh against the appetite of eating and drinking, forceth many times and conquereth both hunger and thirst; far more easie is it, to cut off avarice and ambition, by forbearing and abfteining those things which the same do cover, so far forth, as in the end they will be discomfitted and fubdued. How fay you, think you not that it is fo? The ftranger confessed no leffe. See you not then, quoth he again, that there is a difference between an exercise, and the work unto which the exercise is addreffed? And like as of the art which teacheth how to exercife the body, a man may fay, that the work is the emulation, strife and contention to win the prize of the crown against the concurrent or adversary; but the exercise thereof, is the preparation that the champion makes, for to have his body apt, nimble and active thereto by continual trials of masteries : even so you will grant, that a difference there is between vertue and the exercise of vertue. The stranger said yea unto it. Then tell me first and formost, quoth he, To abstein from vile, filthy and unlawful lusts, what think you, is it an exercise unto Continency, or rather the very work it self, and proof of continency? The very work and proofe, I take it to be, quoth he again : and the exercise and accustomance to sobriety, Temperance and Continency, is not that which you all practife, when after you have travelled your hodies, and like brute beafts provoked your appetites, you fit down to meat, and there continue a long time, having your Tables before you furnished with exquisite viands of all forts, but touch not one when you the while prefent fome little thing, and that plain and fimple, unto your apppetites, which are already dulled and quenched: for the abfinence from pleasures and delights permitted, is it not an Exercise against such as are forbidden ? Yes verily quoth the ffranger. There is then (quoth he) my friend, a certain Exercise of Justice against avarice and coverousnesse of money; and that is not to forbear in night feason to rob and spoil our neighbours houses, or to strip passengers out of their cloaths: no, nor if aman do not betray his Countrey or friends for a piece of money, is he truly faid to inure and exercise himself against avarice; for haply the Law and sear doth bridle and reftrain his covetous defire from doing wrong or hurt to another; but he who many times abstaineth from taking just gains, and such as are granted and permitted him by the Laws, he willingly exercifeth and wonteth himfelf to keep far from any unjust and unlawfull taking of money. For neither is it possible, that in great pleasures and those wicked and pernicious, the soul should contain her self from the appetite thereof, if many times before being in full liberty to enjoy them, she did not despite the same : nor easie for a man to passe over and contemn wicked takings and great gains presented, who long before hath not chassised and tamed his covetous defire to have and gain, which by other has biudes enough is nourifhed and bred up impudently and without all fhame to lucre: for it fwelleth again, and is puffed up with injustice, fo as hardly and with much ado it can abstain from doing ontrage to any one, for to win private profit thereby : but never will it affault a personage who hath not abandoned and given himself over to receive gifes and largesses of his friends, or to take presents, and re-wards of Kings, but hath renounced the very benefits allotted unto him by fortune: who also hath retired and removed himself far from avarice, and a leaping defire after a treasure discovered and seen: it will never (I fay) tempt him to commit any injustice, nor trouble his thoughts and cogitations: but fuch an one will quietly and peaceably frame himfelf to do that which is honeft, as having hisheart more haughty, than to floup to Law, and being privy to himfelf of all good things fettled in his foul. Loe, what men they be, upon whom Caphifias and my felf be enamoured: and this is the reason, friend Simmias, why we request this honest Gentleman here, the stranger, to suffice us to be sufficiently exercised in poverty, that we may attain unto such vertue. After that my brother had finished this speech, Simmias having twice or thrice nodded with his head : A great man no doubt (quoth he) is this Epaminondas, and a very great man indeed: and well may he thank his good father here Polynmis for all; who from the first beginning, hath given his children the best education and bringing up in Philosophy: but as tounhing these matters, agree and accord with them, good stranger and triend. As for you Lyris, Ice mee demand of you (if we may be so bold, as to hear and know of you) whether you purpose to remove him out of his Sepulchre, and so transport him over into Italy? or rather to leave him behind you, to tarry among his friends and well-willers, who no duobe will be glad of us to lodge with him, when we shall be there. Theanor smiling upon him: It seemeh Simmias (quotis he) that Lysis liketh well of the place where he is, and is not willing to remove, for that he had no want of any good things here, by the means of Epaminondas: for there be certain particular facred Ceremonies, which we observe in the sepulture of our sellow Professions in this Confraternity of the Pyhagoreans, which if they have not when they be dead, methink they have not attained to that happy end which we defire. When as therefore we knew by dreams, that Lyfis was departed this life (for we have an infallible fign appearing unto us in our fleep, wheteby we can differn whether it be the Ghoft and image of one alive or dead) many had this conceit, that being departed in a forcein and far Country, he had been otherwise enterred than he ought, and therefore we were to translate him from thence where he was, to the end that being transported, he might have the due service, and accussomed observices belonging to our society. Being therefore come with this mind and cogitation into these parts, and incontinently conducted by those of this Countrey to this Sepulchre; about the Evening I powred out the libaments for mortuaries, for to call forth his spirit that it might come and instruct me how lmight proceed in this action: and this last night passed, I saw nothing; but me thought I heard a voice saying unto me: That I should not remove that which ought not to be stirred; because the corps of Lysis had been by his friends in holy manner enterred, and his soul having her doom already, had her conge and pasport to go unto another Generation and Nativity, accompanied and coupled with another Dæmon. And verily this morning when I had conferred with Epaminondas, and heard the manner how he had buried Lysis, I understood that he himself had been instructed by him, in the most secret points of our Religion, and how he used the same Spirit or Damon for the guidance of his life, unleff: I be so unnexpert, that I cannot conjecture what the Pilot is by his manner of Navigation: for broad be the wayes of this life, but few they are which these Angels do direct and lead menin. When Theanor had thus faid, he cast his eye upon Epaminondas, as if onceagain he would behold his Nature and Manners, by the inspection of his Countenance and Visage. And hereupon came in the Physician, and looked the band wherewith Simmias his wound was bound up, as purposing to dresse him. Then Phyllidas who came in afterwards with Hipposthenidas, willing m: and Charon, and Theocritus to arife, drew us apart into a certain corner or angle of the porch, wonderfully troubled as it might feem by his countenance. With that, I spake unto him and faid: What news Phyllidas? No news Caphifias (quoth he unto me) for I forefaw my felf, and foretold you as news thindas? No news Capalijas (quotine unionine) in the content you amuch, namely, the Slackneffe and Cowardife of Hippothenidas, requesting you not to communicate unto him your enterprife, nor admit him into your company. Now whiles we were much amized and assoned at these words: Say not so good Phyllidas (quoti he) for Goods sake, inchier be you a cause both of our undoing and of the ruine of this City, by thinking rathnesse to be hardin sie; but have patience, and fuffer these men to return in safety, in case it be so by farall destiny appointed.

Thy lidas being chasted herewith, and set in a choler: Tell me (quoth he) Hippositemidas, how ma ny think you be privy to our fecrets in this delignment? I know my felf (quoth he) to the number ny think you be privy to our lecrets in this defignment? I know my fell (quoth he) to the number of thirty at the leaft. If there be so many (quoth he) how cometh it to passe, that you only dost and gainsty, yea, and hinder that which hath been concluded and agreed upon by us all? and to this purpose have dispatched a light-horseman, to ride in post unto the banished persons, (who had put themselves in their journy hitherward) charging them to return back, and that in owise they should go forward this day? considering that the most part of those things which went to this journey, fortune it selfshad procured and prepared fit for their hands? Upon these words of Physlidax, we were almost the subject of the procured the subject of the subject of the subject words of the subject much troubled and perplexed : but Gharon above the reft, fastning his eye upon Hippothenidas, and that with a fowre and stern countenance: Most wicked wretch that thou art, quoth he, what hast thou done unto us? No harm, faid Hippofibenidas, in cafe, leaving this curft and angry voice of yours, you can be content and have patience, to hear and underfland the reasons of a man as aged as your self, and having as many gray haires as you have : for if this be the point, to shew unto our fellow Citizens how hardy and couragious we are, that we make no reckoning of our lives, and care not for any perill of death, feeing we have day enough Phyllidas, let us never flay for the dark evening, but prefently, and immediatly from this place run upon the tyrants with our fwords drawn, let us kill and flay, let us die upon them, and make no spare of our selves: for it is no hard matter to do and suffer all this: mary to deliver the City of Thebes out of the hands of so many armed men as hold it, to diffeile and expell the garrison of the Spartans, with the murder of two or three men, is not so case a thing, (for Phyllidas hath not provided so much wine for his feast and banquet, as will be sufficient to make sincen bundred fouldiers of Archias guard drunken: and say we had killed him, yet Crippidas and Arcesus, are ready at night, both of them fober enough to keep the corps du gard) why make we fuch hafte then, to draw our friends into an evident and certain danger of present death, especially, seeing withall that our enemies be in some fort advertised of their coming and approach; for if it were not so, why was there commandement given by them to those of Teefie, for to be in their arms upon the third day, which is this, and ready to go with the Lacedzmonian Captainer, whenforeer they gave commandement? And as for Amphilbeus, this very day as I understand, after their judiciall proceeding against him, they minded to put to death, upon the coming of Archies. And are not these pregnant presumptions, that the plot and enterprise is to them discovered ? Were it not better then to defer the execution of our designments a while longer, untill such time as the gods be reconciled and appealed? For our Divinors and Wisards having sacrificed a Beef unto Gares, pronounce that the fire of the sacrifice denounceth some great sediction and danger to the Common-weal: and that which you Charon particularly ought to take heed of, is this: Yesterday, and no longer since, Hippathodorus the Son of Erianthes, a man otherwise of good fort, and one who knoweth nothing at all of our enterprise, had this speech with me : Charon is your familiar friend, Hipposthenidas, but with me not greatly acquainted; advertise him therefore, if you think so good, that he beware and look to himself, in regard of some great danger and firange accident that is toward him : For the last night, as I dreamed, me thought I faw that his house was in travell as it were of Child; that he and his friends being themselves in difireffe, prayed unto the gods for her delivery, flanding round about her during her labour and painful travell; but the seemed to loow and rore, yea, and to cast out certain inarticulate voices, untill at the last there issued out of it a mighty sire, wherewith a great part of the City was immediatly burnt, and the Castle Cadmea, covered all over with smooth only, but no part of the fire ascended thereto. Lo, what the vision was, which this honest man related unto me, Charon: which I affure you, for the prefent, ferme in a great quaking and trembling; but much more when I once heard fay, that this day the exiled persons were to return and be lodged here within an house of the City. In great anguish therefore I am, and in a wonderfull agony, for fear left we engage our felves within a world of calamities and miscries, without being able to execute any exploit of importance upon our enemies, unlesse is to to make a Garboile, and to set all on a light fire: for I suppose that the City when all is don, will be ours, but Cadmea the Castle as it is already, will be for them. Then Theocritus taking upon him to speak, and staying Charon who was about to reply somewhat against this Hippofibeniors : I interpret all this (quoth he) clean contrary: for there is not a fign that confirmeth me more in following of this enterprife (although I have had alwaies good prefages in the behalf of the banished, in all the sacrifices that I have offred) than this vision which you have reheared; If it be fo as you say, that a great and light fire shone over all the City, and the same arising out of a friends house, and that the habitation of our Enemies, and the place of their retreat was darkned and made black again with the smoak, which never brings with it any thing better than tears and troublesome consustion: and whereas from among us there arose inarticulate voices, (in case a man should conftrue it in evill part, and take exception thereat, in regard of the Voice) the same will be when our enterprise, which now is enfolded in obscure, doubtfull, and uncertain suspicion, shall at once both appeare, and also prevail as for the ill signes of the facrifices, they touch not the publick state, but those who now are most powerfull and in the greatest authority. As Theoritus thus was speaking yet still, I are most powerfull and in the greatest authority. As Theocritus thus was speaking yet still, I said unto Hipposthenidas: And whom I prayyou have you sent unto the men? for if he be not soo sar onward on his way, we will send after to overtake him. I am notable to say of a truth Caphista; whether is be possible to reach him, (quoth Hipposthenidas) for he hath one of the hell Horses in all Thebes under him; and a man he is, whom ye all know very well, for he is the Maiter of Meion: Chariots, and his Chariot men, one unto whom Moho himself from the very first discovered this plots, and made privy unto it. With that, I considering and thinking with my self what man he should speak of: Is is not Ghidon (quoth I) O Hipposthenidas, he who no longer since than the last year, wan the prize in the horse running, at the foleum seast of Juno's The same is the man quoth he. Who then is he whom I have sen this long while standing at the Hall door and looking shill spon us? It is Schildan himself affure you quoth he. Now by Hercules I swear, could any thing have hapned worse? And with that, the man perceiving how we looked upon him, approached sign and sofiste hapned worfe? And with that, the man perceiving how we looked upon him, approached fair and foffly from the door unto in. Then Hippothenidas beckned unto him, and nodded with his head, as willing him to fpeak unto as all; for that there was no danger because they were all honest men, and of our side. I to lipeat unto us an, for that there was no danger became they were an honest men, and of our hoe, a know them all well enough quoth he (Hippothenidus) and not finding you at home not in the market place, I guessed by and by that you were gone toward them, and therfore I made as great haste as I could hither, to the end that you might not be ignorant of all things how they go: For so son a you com-manded me in all speed to meet with our banished citizens in the forrest, I went presently to my house for to take horse, and called unto my wife for my bridle, but she could not give it me; and to mend the matter, flayed a great while in the Chamber or Store-house where such things use to be: now after she had made a feeking & puddering in every corner within the room and could not find it, at length when fh: had played long enough with me, and made a fool of me, she confessed and told me plainly, that she had lent it forth to one of our neighbours, whole wife the evening before came to borrow it of her: whereupon I was in a great chafe, and gave her fome curft words; but the like a threw, payed me with as good as I lent her, and made no more ado, but curfed me in abominable tearms, withing my forthgoing might be unhappy, and my home coming worse: which executions I pray God may all light upon her own head. To be short, she provoked me so far, that in my choler I dealt her some blowes for hershrewd tongue: with that, comes out a number of the Neighbours and Women especially, where after I had given and taken one for another with shame enough, at last with much ado I got away from them and came hither to pray you so to send some other Messenger to the parties you wo of; for I assure you at this present I am so much our of temper that I am not mine own man, but in manner beside my self. This wrought in us all a marvellous alteration of our wills and affections: For whereas a little before we were offended that our defignments were croffed, and their coming impeached, now a-gain upon this fudden occurrence, and the shortness of time, which allowed us no lessure pur off, and to procraftinate the matter, we were driven into an agony & fearfull perplexity. Howbeit fetting a good countenance upon the matter, feaking also cheerfully unto Hippofibenidas, and taking him friendly by the hand, I encouraged him, and gave him to understand, that the very gods themselves seconded our intentions, and invited us to the execution of the enterprise. This done, Phyllidas went home to his house for to give order about his feast, and withall to draw on Archias to drink Wine liberally and to make merry: Charon departed also to make ready his house for the entertainment of the bapished men, against their return. Mean while Theorritus and I went again to Simmias: to the end that finding some good occasion and opportunity for the purpose, we might talk with Epaminondas again, who was well entred already into a prety question, which Galaxidorus and Phidolaus a little befor had begun, demanding of what fubdance, nature and puisfance was the familiar spirit is post so, so much spoken of? Now what Simmias had alleged against Galaxidorsu upon this post, we heard not. Mary thus much he said, that when he demanded upon a time of Socrates himself concerns ing the faid matter, he never could get of him any answer, and therefore he never after would ask him the question, but he said that oftentimes he had been present when Socrates gave out that he reputed those men for vain persons, who said they had seen with their eye any divine power, and so communed therewith: but contrariwife that he could hold better with those, who faid they took knowledge of such a thing by hearing a voice, speaking unto one that gave attentive ear thereto, or earnefly enquired thereof: whereupon he fet our heads on work when we were apart by our felves, and made us to gueffa and conjecture, that this Dzemon of Socrates, was no Vision, but a sense of some voice, and an intelligence of words, which came unto him, by an extrordinary manner. Like as in our dreams, it is not a voice indeed that men hear lying fast assep, but the opinion of some words that they think they hear pronounced : but this intelligence of dreams cometh in truth, to men afleep, by reason of the repose and tranquillity of the body: whereas they that be awake cannot hear, but very hardly, these divine advertisements, being troubled and disquieted with tumultuous passions, and the distraction of their affairs, by occasion whereof they cannot wholy yeeld their mind and thought to hear the Revelations that the gods deliver unto them. Now Secrates having a pure and clear Underflanding not toffed and turmoiled with any passion, nor mingled with the body, unlesse it were vety little, for things necessary and no more , was easie to be touched, and so subtile, that soon it might, be altered with what loever was objected and presented to it : now that which met with it, we may conjecture that it was not fimply a voice or found, but a very articulate freech of his Damon, which without any audible voice touched the intellectuall part of his foul, together with the thing that it declared and revealed unto him. For the voice refembleth a blow or firoke given unto the Soiff, which by the ears is conftrained to receive speech, when we speak one to another; but he latelligence or Understanding of adjvine and better nature, leadeth and conducteth a generous minde by a thing that causeth it to understand without need of any other stroke : and the same minde or Soul obeyeth and yeeldeth thereto accordingly, as it either flacketh loofe or firetcheth hard the infinites and inclinations, not violently by refiftance which the paffions make, but supple and plinifinets and inclinations, not violently by refiftance which the paffions make, but supple and plinifinets and inclinations, not violently by refiftance which the paffions make, but supple and plinifinets. able, as flack and gentle reigns. And hereof we shall not need to make any wonder, considering that we fee how little helmes turn about and wind the greatest hulks and caraques that be : and again the wheeles that Potters use, being never so little touched with the hand, tirn very easily: for although they be inftruments without life, yet being as they are counterpointed and framed even on every fide, by reason of their pollished smoothness, they are apt to sir and yield unto the moving custe with the least moment that ir. Now the Soul of man being bent and stretched out siff with innumerable inclinations, as it were with so many cords, hath more agility than all the engine or instruments in the world, if a man bath the skill to manage and handle it with reason, after it hath taken once a little motion, that it may bend to that which conceived it: for the beginnings of infilinits and paffions, tend all to this intelligent and conceiving part, which being firred and shaken, it draweth, pulleth, stretcheth and haleth the whole man: Wherein we are given to understand, what force and power hath the thing that is entred into the conceis and intelligence of the mind. For bones are senseless, the sinewer, and fielh, full of humours, and the whole masse of all these parts together, heavy and ponderous, lying still without some motions: But so soon as the Soul putteth somewhat into the Understanding, and that the same moveth the inclinations thereto, it starteth up and rifeth all at once, and being streeched in all parts, runneth amain, as if it had Wings, unto action. And so the manner of this moving, direction, and promptitude, is not hard, and much lesse, impossible to comprehend: whereby the Soul, hath no sooner understood any object, but it draweth presently with it, by instincts and inclinations, the whole maffe of the body. For like as reason conceived and comprised without any voice, moveth the Understanding : even so in mine opinion, it is not such an hard matter, but that a more divine intelligence, and a Soul more excellent, should draw another inferiour to it, touching it from without, like as one speech or reason may touch another, and as light, the reflection of light: For we in truth, make our conceptions and cogitations known one unto another, as if we touched them, in the dark, by means of voice: but the intelligences of Dzemons having their light, do shine unto those who are capable thereof, flanding in need neither of nownes or verbs which menuse in speaking one to the other, by which marks they see the images and resemblances of the conceptions and thoughts of the mind: but the very intelligences and cogitations indeed they know not, unless they be such as have a singular and divine light, as we have already said: and yet that which is performed by the public of the value of the value of the locations. formed by the ministery of the voice, doth in some fort help and satisfic those who otherwise are incredulous. For the air being formed and stamped as it were by the impression of articulate sounds. and become throughous all speech and voice, carrieth a conception and intelligence into the mind of the hearer: and therefore according to this Similitude and Reason, what marvel is it if that also which is conceived by these superious natures altereth the air, and if she air being by reason of that quality which it hath, apt to receive impressions, fignifieth unto excellent men and such as have a rare and divine nature, the speech of him who hath conceived ought in his mind? For like as the strokes that light upon Targuits or shields of braffe, be heard a far off, when they proceed from the bottom in the mids within, by reason of the resonance and rebound: whereas the blows that fall upon other shields are drowned and dispersed, so as they be not heard at all: Even so the words or speeches of Damons and Spiritts, although they be carried and flie to the ears of all indifferently, yet they resound to those onely, who are of a seeled and flayed nature, and whose Souls are at quiet, such as we call divine and celefiall men. Now the vulgar fort have an opinion, that some Damon doth communicate a kinde of divinity unto men in their fleeps; but they think it strange and a miracle incredible, if a man should say unto them, that the gods do move and affect them semblably when they be awake, and have the full use of reason: As if a man should think that a Musician may play well upon his Harpor Lute, when all the ftrings be flacked and letedown, but when the faid inftruments upon nis riarpor Lute, when an the trings be tacked and recooms, our when the an intensible be fein tune, and have their fittings fet up, he cannot make any found, nor play well thereupon. For they confider not the caufe which is within them, to wit, their diffeord, trouble and confusion, where of our familiar friend Socrates was exempt, according as the Oracle prophetical of him before, which during his infancy was given unto his father: for by it, sommanded he was, to let him do all that came into his mind , in no wife either to force or divert him, but to fuffer the inflinct and Nature of the Child to have the Reigns at large, by graying only to Jupiter Agorem; that is to fay Eloquent, and to the Muses for him: and farther than fo, not to busin himself, nor to take care for Socrates, as if he had within him a Guide and Conductour of his life better than ten thousand Masters and Peedagogues.

Thus you fee, Philolaus, what our Opinion and Judgement is as touching the Dæmon or familiar Spiris of Socrates both living and dead, as who reject these voices, sneefings, and all such sool-Spirit of Bound and Manager and Timarchus of Charmea to discourse of this point, I won not well whether I were best to utter and relate the same, for sear some would think, that I loved to tell vain whether were best to dictar and state of the scritus) for he died when he was very young, and requested earnessly of Socrates, to be buried, near unto Lamproclei, Socrates his Son, who departed this life but sew dayes before, being a dear friend of his, and of the same age. Now this young Gentleman, being very desirous (as he was of a generous dis-position, and had newly tasted of the sweetnesse of Philosophy) to know what was the nature and power of Socrates familiar Spirit, when he had imparted his numd and purpose unto me only and Cebes, went down into the Cave or Vault of Trophonius, after the usuall facrifices and accustomed complements due to that Oracle performed: where having remained for two nights and one day, infomuch as meny men were out of all hope that ever he would come forth again, yea and his kinsfolks and friends bewailed the loffe of him, one morning betimes he iffued forth very glad and jocund: And after he had given thanks unto the god and adored him, fo foon as he was gotten through the preffe of the multitude, who expected his return, he recounted unto us, many wonders strange to be heard and feen : for he faid, that being descended into the place of the Oracle, he first met with much darknesse, and afterwards when he had made his prayers, he lay a long time upon the ground, neither knew he for certain whether he was awake, or dreamed all the while. Howbert, he thought he had heard a noise which light upon his head, and smote it, whereby the sutures or seames thereof were disjoyned and opened, by which he yeelded forth his foul; which being thus feparate, was very joyous, feeing it felf mingled with a transparent and pure air. And this was the first time that it feemed to breath at liberty, as if long time before untill then, it had been drawn in and bent, for then it became greater and larger than ever before, in 'manner of a fail fored and diplayed to the full. Then he supposed that he heard (though not cleerly and perfectly) as it were anoise or found turning round about his head, and the same yeelding a sweet and pleasant voice. And as he then looked behind him he could see the earth no more, but the Isles all bright and illuminate with a mild and delicate fire, and those exchanged their places one with another, and withall, received fundry colours, as it were divers tinctures, according as that variety of change the light did alter : and they all feemed unto him in number infinite, and in quantity excessive: and albeit they were not of equal pour price and extent, yet round they were all alike: also, to his thinking, by their motion which was circular, the ekie resounded, because unto the uniform equality of their moving, the pleasant sweetnesse of the voice and harmony composed and refulting of them all, was correspondent and conformable. Amid these liliands there feemed a sea or great lake diffused and spreed, shining with divers mix colours, upon a ground of grey or light blew. Moreover, of these liles some sew sailed as one would say, and were carried a direct course down the water beyond the current; but others, and those in number many, went aside out of the Chanell, and were with fuch a violence drawn back, that they feemed to be swallowed under the waves. Now this Sea or Lake, was (as he thought) very deep toward the South; but on the North fide full of shelves and shallow flats; in many places it swelled and overflowed the land; in others it retired and gathered in, as much for it again, and arose not to any high tides: as for the colour, in some place it was simple and sea-like; in another, not pure, but troubled and confused with mud, like unto a Meer or Lake. As concerning the force of the waves about these Isles which are carried together, the same bringeth them back a little, but never conjoyneth the end to the beginning : fo as they make at no time a circle entire and perfect, but gently divert the application and meeting of their ends, fo as in their revolution they wind in and out, and make one crooked obliquity. To the midsof thefe, and toward the greatest part of the ambient air, is inclined the fea, fomewhat leffe than eight parts of the univerfall continent, as he thought. And the same sea hath two mouths or entrances, whereby it receiveth two rivers of fire breaking into it, opposite one to the other, in sitch fore, as the blewress; thereof became whitish, by reason that the greatest part was repelled and driven back. And these things he said, that he beheld with much delight. But when he came to look downward, he perceived a mighty huge hole or gulfall round, in manner of an hollow globe cut thorow the mide, exceeding deep and horrible to fee to, full of much darknesse, and the same not quiet and still, but tur-bulent and often times boyling and walming upward, out of which there might be heard innumerable roarings and groanings of beafts, cries and wailings of an infinite number of Children, with fundry plaints and lamentations of men, and women together, besides many noyses, tumults, clamors, and out-cries of all forts, and those not clear, but dull and dead, as being sent up from a great depth underneath, wherewith he was not a little terrified, untill fuch time as after a good while, there was one whom he faw not, who faid thus unto him, O Timarchus, What is your defire to know? Who made answer: Even all, for what is there here, not admirable? True, quoth he ; but as for us, little have we to do, & a fmall portion in those superiour regions, because they appertain to other gods: but the division of Proserpma being one of the four, and which we dispose and govern, you may see if you will, how it is bounded with Styx. And when he demanded again of him, what Styx was: It is (quoth he)

the way which leadeth unto hell and the Kingdome of Pluto, dividing two contrary natures of Light aud Darknesse, with the head and top thereof; for as you see, it beginneth from the bottome of Hell beneath, which it toucheth with the ore extremity, and reacheth with the other to the Light all above, and so limiteth the utmost part of the whole world, divided into four Regiments. The first, is that of life; the second of moving; the third of generation; and the fourth of corruption. The first is coupled to the second by Unity, in that which is not visible; she second to the third, by the mild or intelligence, in the Sunne; the third to the fourth, by nature, in the Moon. And of every one of these Copulations, there is a Fiend or Destiny, the Daughter of Necessary, that keeping the key. Of the first, she that is named Arropos, as one would fay, inflexible; of the second, Ch the key. Of the mind; of the third in the Moon, Lackefit, that is to fay, Lot, about which is the bending of geniture or Nativity. As for all the other Islastiney have gods within them; but the Moon appertaining to the terrestrial Damons, avoideth the Confines of Syn, as being somewhat higher exalted, approached once onely in an hundred seventy seven second measures: and upon the approach of this precinct of Styx, the fouls cry out for fear. And why Hell catheth and swallowthe approach of this predict of any state about it: and others the Moon receiveth, and takeful and the imming from beneath unto her; such I mean, as upon whom the end of generation fell in good and opportune time, all fave those which are impure and polluted: for them with her searfull flashing and hideous roaring, the fuffereth not to come near unto her; who feeing that they have miffed of their intent, bewall their would flate, and be carried down again as you kee, to another generation and nativity. Why quoth Timarchus, I fee nothing but a number of ftars leaping up and down about this huge and deep gulf, fome drowned and fwallowed up in it, others appearing again from below. Their becquoth he) the Damons, that you fees though you know them not. And mark withall how this comes about. Every foul is endued with a portion of mind or madesthooding, and of man there is about. Every foul is endued with a portion of mind or understanding; and of man, there is not one word of reason: but look how much thereof is mingled with flesh and with passions, being altered with pleasures and dolours, it becometh unreasonable. But every soul is not mixed after one fort, one as pleasures and documents in exceeding plunged within the body, and being troubled and disquited much as another; for some are wholly plunged within the body, and being troubled and disquited with pattors, run up and down all their life time: others partly are mingled with the fixth, and in part leave out that which is most pure, & not drawn downward to the contagion of that goofs part, but remaineth swimming and floating as it were aloftstouching the top or crown only of mans head (where as the reft is depressed downward to the bottome, and drowned there) and is in manner of a cord hanging up aloft just over the foul which is directly and plumb under, to uphold and raife it up, fo far forth as it is obeifant thereto, and not over-ruled and fwayed with passions and perturbations: for that which is plunged down within the body, is called the foul; but that which is entire and uncorrupt, the vulgar fort calleth the understanding, supposing it to be within them, as in micrours that which appeareth by way of reflexion: but those that judge aright and according to the truth, name it Dæmon, as being clean without them.

These stars then which you see as if they were extinct and put out, imagine and take them to be the fouls which are totally drowned within bodies: and such as seem to shine out again, and to return lightfome from beneath, caffing and shaking from them a certain, dark, and foggy mill, as if it were fome filth and ordure, esteem the same to be such fouls, as after death are retired and escaped ont of the bodies: but those which are mounted on high and move to and fro in one uniform course throughout, are the Dzmons or spirits of men, who are faid to have Intelligence and Under-throughout, are the Dzmons or spirits of men, who are faid to have Intelligence and Under-flanding. Endevour now therefore and strain your self to see the connexion of each one, whereby it is linked and united to the foul. When I heard this, I began to take more heed, and might fee flars leaping and floating upon the water, fome more, fome leffe, like as we observe pleces of Cork, thewing in the fea where Fishers nets have been cast: and fome of them turned in mannet of spindles or bobins, as folk spin or twist therewith, yet drawing a troubled and unequall course, and not able to direct and compose the motion straight. And the voice said that those which held on a right course and orderly motion, were they whose sould have considered to the reigns of reason, by the means of good nurture and civill education, and such as shewed not upon the earth their Beasily, Groffe, and Savage Brutishnesse: but they that estsoons rise and fall up and down unequally and disorderly, as struggling to break out of their bounds, are those which strive against the yoke, with their disobedient and rebellious manners, occasioned by want of good bringing up, one while getting the maftry and bring them about to the right hand, another while curbed by passions and drawn away by vices, which notwirflanding they refult another time again, and with great force firive to withfland. For that Bond, which in manner of a Bridle-bit is put into the mouth at it were of the Brutish and unreasonable part of the soul, when it pulleth the same back, bringeth that which they call repentance of fins, and the shame after unlawfull and prohibited pleasures, which is a grief and remorte of the soul restrained and brideled by that which governeth and commandeth it, untill such time, as being thus rebuked and chaffiled, it become obediene and tractable like unto a beaft made tame without beating or tormenting, as quickly and readily conceiving the Signs and Marks which the Damon our nearing or committing, as quantity and tearing sometime, the signs are many and the Defendance. These therefore, at the last (long and last though it be) are ranged to the Rule of Resonant of the sare obsedient at the first, and presently from their very Nativity hearken uses the proper Dzmon, are all the kind of prophets and diviners, who have the gife to foretell things to come, it is not the proper Dzmon, are all the kind of prophets and diviners, who have the gife to foretell things to come, likewise holy and devout men : Of which number you have heard how the soul of Hermodorus the Claz menian, was wone to abandon his body quite, and both by day and night to wander into many placer: and afterwards to return into it again, having been prefent the while to hear and fee many things done and aid afar off: which it used so long, untill his enemies by the treathery of his wife, surprifed his body one time when the foul was gone out of it, and burnt it in his house. Howbeit, this was not true : for his Soul never departed out of his body : but the same being alwayes obedient unto his Dæmon, and flacking the bond unto it, gave it means and liberty to run up and down, and to walk to and fro in many places, in such fort, as having seen and heard many things abroad, it would come and report the same unto him: But those that consumed his body as he lay asset, are tormented in Tartarus even at this day for it : which you shall know your self good young man, more ecttainly within these three moneths (quoth that voice) and for this time see you depart. When this voice had made an end of speaking, Timarchus, as he told the Tale himself, turned about to see who it was that spake; but seeling a great pain again in his head, as if it had been violently pressed and crushed, he was deprived of all sense and understanding, and neither knew himself nor any thing abouchim: But within a while after when he was come unto himself, he might see how he lay along at the Entry of the aforesaid Cave of Trophonius, like as he had himself at the beginning. And thus much concerning the Fable of Timarchu: who being returned to Aibens, in the third moneth after, just as the voice roretold him, departed this life. And then we wondred hereat, and made report thereof back to Socrates; who rebuked and chid us, for faying nothing to him of it, whiles Timar-chus was alive; for that he would willingly himself have heard him more particularly, and examined every point at the full. Thus you have heard, Theocritus, a mingled Tale and History together of Timarchus: But see whether we shall not be fain to call for this strangers help, to the decision of this question : for very proper and meet it is for to be discussed by such devout and Religious men-And why (quoth Theaner) dort not Epaminondas deliver his opinion thereof, being a man trained up, and inflituted in the same Discipline and School with us. Then my father smiling at the matter: This is his nature (quoth he) my good friend, he loveth to be filent, and wary he is what he speaketh, but wonderfull desirous to learn, and insatiable of hearing others. And hereupon Spinibarus the Tarentine, who converted familiarly with him here a long time, was wont to give out this Speech of him; That he had never talked with a man, who knew more and spake leffe than he. But tell us now what you think your self, of that which hath been said. For mine own pars (quoth he) I fay, that this Discourse and Report of Timarchus, as Sacred and inviolable, ought to be confecrated unto God: and marvell I would, if any should discredit and hardly believe that which Simmias himself hath delivered of him; and when they name Swannes, Dragons, Dogs and Horses, Sacred, believe not that there be men Celestiall and beloved of the gods, considering they hold and fay, that God is never pitopies, that is to fay, a lover of Birds, but pitas 90000, that is to fay, a lover of Mankind, Like as therefore a man who is faid to be Philippes, that is to fay a lover of Horses, taketh not a fancy, nor regardeth alike all Horses, comprised under the whole kind, but chufing alwayes some one more excellent than the reft, Rideth, Cherisheth, and maketh much of himespecially: even so those Divine Spirits which surmount our nature, make choice and take as it were out of the whole flock the best of us, upon whom they set their Brand or Mark, and them they think worthy of a more fingular and exquisite education, and those they order and direct, not with Reigns and Bridles, but with Reason and Learning, and that by signs, whereof the common and Rascall forthave no Knowledge nor Experience. For neither do ordinary hounds understand the Sign; that Huntimen use, nor every Horse the fifting and chirting of the Escuirry, but such onely as have been taught and brought up to it; for they with the least whistling and houping that is, know prefently what they are commanded to do, and quickly be ordered as they ought. And verily, Homer feemeth not to be ignorant of this difference whereof we fpeak : for of Diviners and South Tayers, some he calleth & are to Augurs, that is to fay Authours or Observers of Birds; others is see, that is to fay, Bowel-priers, that spie into the inwards of Sacrifices; and some again there be, who hearing and knowing what the gods themselves do speak, are able to declare securly, and foretell things to come, as may appear by thefe verices;

King Priams dear fon Helenus, their mind foon understood, And what this god and goddesse both in counsell deemed good.

And a little after :

For thus I beard the gods to fay,

Who as immortall live for ay.

For like as they who are without, and not of the Domesticall and near acquaintance of Kings, Princes, and generall Captains, do know and understand their wills and minds by the means of certain Fire-Lights, found of Trumpets, and Proclamations; but to their Faithfull, Trufty, and Familiar Friends they speak by word of mouth: Even so, God communeth and talketh with few, and that very seldomes but unto the common fort he giveth signs, and of these consistest the are of Divination: for the gods receive very few men in recommendation for to adorn their lives, but those onely whom they are disposed to make exceeding happy and Divine indeed; and those souls which be delivered from farther generation, and are for ever after at liberty and dismiffed, free from the body, become afterwards Damons, and take the charge and care of men, according as Hefiodus faith. For like as Champions, who otherwise heretofore have made profession of wrestling and other exercises of the body, after they have given over the practice thereof, by reason of their old age, leave not altogether the delire of glory by that means, nor cast off the affection in cherishing the body, but take pleasure the deute or giory by that means, because their bodies, exhorting and encouraging them thereto, yea, fill to fee other young men to exercise their bodies, exhorting and encouraging them thereto, yea, and enforcing themselves to run in the race with them: even so, they that are past the combats and and emoterny anomates and through the vertue of their fouls come to be Dismons, despite not utterly the affairs, the foreches and fludics of those that be here, but being favorable unto them who in their good and any one appear to the fameend that they have attained to, yea, and after a fort, banding and fiding with them, do incite and exhort them to vertue, especially when they see them neer unto the ends of their hopes, and ready in manner to touch the fame. For this divine power of Damons, will not fort and be acquainted with every man indifferently, but like as they who fland upon the flore, can do no other good unto them who fwind far within the fea, and a great way from the land, but look upon them and fay nothing; but to fuch as are neer to the fea fide, they run, and for their fakes, on their and say nothings, so wading a little into the fea, help both with hand and voice, and to fave them from drow-ning: even to (Simmiss) dealeth the Dzmon with us; for to long as wee are plunged and drowned within mundane affaires, and change many bodies, as it were so many waggons and chariots, passing out of one into another, it suffereth us to strive and labour of our selves, yea, and by our own patience and long fufferance to fave our felves, and gain the Haven : but when there is a foul, which hath already by innumerable generations supported and endured long travels, and having in manner performed her course and revolution, straineth all her might and maine, with much fwee to get forth and afcend up ; to it God envieth not her own proper Dæmon and familiar spirit to be affiliant, yea, and giveth leave to any other whatfoever, that is willing thereto. Now one is defirous and ready alwaits to help and fecond another, yea, and forward to promote the fafety thereof : the foul alfo forher part, giveth good ear, because she is so neer, and in the end is saved; but the that obeyeth not nor hearkeneth to her own familiar and proper Dæmon as forfaken of it, fpeedeth not well in the end. This faid, Epaminoudas looking toward me: le is high time, Gaphifias, for you (quoth he) to go into the wrefiling School and place of exercise, to the end that you disapyou quous us to go man writing we cannot it fall be thought good to diffolie and difinife point not your companions: mean while, we cannot it fall be thought good to diffolie and difinife this meeting) will take the charge of Theaner. Then faid I, Be it to: but I suppose, that Theorisis, together with Galaxidorus and my felf, is willing to commune and reason with you a little. In good time (quoth he) let them speak their mind and what they will. With that, he rose up and took us apart into a winding and turning corner of the Gallery, where we came about him, and began to perfwade and deal with him for to take part with us in the enterprise. He made us answer, that he knew well enough the day when the banished persons were to return; and had taken order with his friends to be ready against the time with Gorgidas, and to embrace the opportunity thereof: howbeit, they were not determined to take away the life of any one Citizen, net condemned by order of law, unleft from the tent of the companies all that then shall be committed; for so these men will be lesse suspected of the people, and be shought to counsel and exhort them for the best. We thought very well of this advice of his, and so he repaired againe to Simmias; and we went down to the place of publick exercises, where we met with our friends; and there we dealt one with another apart, as we wrefiled together, questioning about our thing or another, and telling this or that, every one preparing himself to execution of the de-figne: and there we might see Archias and Philippus all anointed and oyled going toward the feast. For Phyllidas fearing that they would make hafte and put Amphitheus to death, fo foon as ever he had accompanied Ly fanoridas and fent him away, took Archias with him, feeding him with hope to enjoy the Lady whom he defired, and promiting that the should be at the feast : whereby he perswaded im to minde no other thing, but to folace himfelf and make merry with those who were wont to roift and riot with him. By this time it drew toward night, the weather grew to be cold, and the winde rose high, which caused every man with more speed to retire and take house. I for my part, meeting with Damoclidas, Pelopidas and Theopompus, entertained them; and others did the like to the reft. For after that thefe banished persons were passed over the mountain Gythera, they parted themselves, and the coldnesses of the weather gave them good occasion (without all suspition) to cover their faces, and so to passe along the City undiscovered. And some of them there were, who as they entred the gates of the City, perceived it to lighten on their right hand without thunder, which they took for agood prefage of fatery and glory in their proceedings, as if this figne betokened, that the execution of their designment should be lightfome and honourable, but without any danger at all. Now when we were all entred in, and fafe within house, to the number of eight and forty, as Thee critus was facrificing apart in a little oratory or chapel by himfelf, he heard a great rapping and bouncing at the door; and anon there was one came and brought him word, that two halberds of Archies guard spocked at the outward gate, as being fent in great hafte to Charen, commanding to open them the door, as greatly offended that they had flaied fo long. Whereat Charon being troubled in mind, commanded that they should be let in presently : who meeting them within the court with a coronet upon his head, as having newly facrificed unto the gods, and made good cheer, demanded of these halberds, what they would? Archias & Philippus (fay they) have fent us, willing and charging you with all freed to repair unto them. Why, what is the matter (quoth Sharon) that they should fend for me in such halte at this time of the night; and what great news is there? We know not, faid these Sergeants; but what word would you have us to carry back unto them ? Marry, tell them (quoth he) that I will caft off my Chaplet, and put on another Robe, and presently follow after: for it I should go with you, it might be an occasion of trouble, and move some to suspect that you lead me away to Prison. You say well, answered the Officers again, do even fo; for we mult go another way to those Souldiers that watch and ward without the City, and deliver unto them a commandement from the head Magistrates and Rulers. Thus departed they. With that, Charm returned to us, and made relation of these newes, which fruck us into our dumps, and put us in a great affright, supposing for certain, that we were betrayed and our Plot detected: most of the company suspected Hippositemidas, for that he went about to impeach the return of the exiled persons, by the means of Chidon, whom he meant to send unto them who Geing that he miffed of his purpose, by all likelihood, upon a fearfull and timorous heart, might reveal our conspiracy, now when it was come to the very point of execution : for come he was not with others into the house where we were all affembled; and to befort, there was not one of us all, that judge ed better of him than of a wicked and treacherous Traytor : howbeit, we agreed all in this, that Charon should go thither as he was commanded, and in any wife obey the Magistrates who had fent for him.

Then he commanding (O Archidamus) his own Son to be present, a stripling about fifteen yeers of age, and the fairest youth in all the City of Thehes, very laborious and affectionate to bodily exercises; and for flature and ftrength, furpaffing all his fellows and companions of that age; made this speech unto us: My Mafters and Friends, this is my Son and onely Child, whom I love entirely, as you may well think; him Ideliver into your hands, befeeching you in the name of the gods and all Saints in heaven, that if you find any perfidious Treachery by me against you, to do him to death and not spare him. And now I humbly pray you, most valiant and hardy Knights, prepare your selves resolutely against the last Feast that ever these Tyrants shall make: abandon not, for want of Courage, your bodies to be villanoully outraged and spoiled by these most leud and wicked persons, but he revenged of them, and now shew your invincible hearts, in the behalf of your Countrey. When Charos had delivered these words, there was not one of us all but highly commended his Magnanimity and Loialty; but we were angry with him, in that he doubted of us that we had him in suspicion and diffrufts& therefore willed him to have away his Son with him, And more than that, me thinks (quoth Pelopidas) you have not done well & wifely for us in that you fent him not before to some other houses for what reason or necessity is there, that he should either perish or come into perill, being found with us? and yet it is time enough to convey him away, that in cafe it fall out with us otherwise than well, he may grow up after his kind, for to be revenged of the Tyrants another day. It fall not be fo, quoth Charon; he shall even stay here, and take such part of fortune as we shall do: and besides, it were no pare of honefly or honour, to leave him in danger of our enemies : And therefore, my good Son (quoth he.) take a good heart and a resolute, even above these yeers of thine, enter in Gods name into these hazzards and trials that be thus necessary, together with many valiant and hardy Citizens, for the maintenance of liberty and vertue. And even yet, great hope we have, that good fucceffe will follow, and that fome bleffed Angel will regard and take in protection those who adventure thus for Righteoutnesse and Justice fake. Many of us there were (Archidamus) whose tears trickled down their cheeks, to hear Charon deliver these words; but himself being inflexible and not relenting one jot, with an undanted heart, a fetled countenance, and eyes fill dry, put his Son into Pelopidas hands, embraced every one of us, shook us by the hands, and so encouraging us to proceed, went forth of the doors. Wonderfull was this; but much more you would have wondred, to have feen the alacrity, cheerfull and conftant resolution of his Son, as if he had been another Neoptolemus, who never looked pale, nor changed colour for the matter, notwithstanding fo great danger presented; neither was he one jot aftend : but contrariwile, drew forth Pelopidas Sword out of his Scabberd, to fee and try whether it was keen enough.

Whiles these matters thus passed, there comes towards us Diotomus, one of Cephisodorus friends, with a Sword by his fide, and a good Cuirason of Steel under his Robe, who having heard that Char ron was sent for to come to Archias, blamed much our long delay, and whemed us on to go forthwith to the Tyrants houses: For in so doing (quoth he) we shall prevent them, by comming suddenly upon them if not, yet better were it for us, to fet upon them without dores, separate one from another, and you all in one plump, than to stay for them, enclosed all within one Parlour, and be there taken by our Enemies, like a fwarm of B:es, and have all our throats cut. In like manner Theocritis the divinor, urged us to make hafte, faying, that all the fignes of facrifices were good, and prefaged hap-py fuccesse with all security. Whereupon we began on all hands to take Arms, and to prepare our felves : by which time, Charon was returned to us, with a merry and cheerfull countenance : who fmiling and looking upon us . B: of good cheer (quoth he) my Mafters and Friends, all is well : there is no danger, and our affair proceedeth well : for Archias and Philippus, fo foon as they heard that I was come, upon their fending for me, being already well Cup thoten, and half drunk with Wine, fo as both their minds and bodies were very far, out of tune; with much ado they rose from the boord, to a count ment minus and counts were very rat, out or time; with minus and they role infinite boorts, and came forth to the dore unto me; Now Charm, quoth Archias we hear that our banified men lyelviking here within the City, being fecretly and by fleath entred into it. Whereat I (cenning to be much amazed; Where(quoth I) are they faid to be, and who? That we know not (quoth Archias) & that is the cause why we fent for you, to come before us, if haply you have heard any thing of it more certainly.

Hercupon I remaining for a while asone formwhat aftonied and penfive, comming again tomy felf. began thus to think, that this must needs be fome headleffe rumour, and arifing from no good ground nor certain Author; Reither was it like to be any one of them that were privy to the complot who had discovered it, b.cause they would not then have been ignorant of the house where they were affembled. and therefore it could not chuse but be some blind bruit blown abroad through the City, and come to and therefore it could not only on the folial plant beautiful, we had heard many fuch flying their cares. So I faid unto him, that during the life of Androlids, we had heard many fuch flying tales, and vain faile rumors that ran about the City and troubled us. But now (quoth he) ô Archias, I have heard no such thing: howbeit, it it please you to ecommand me, I will enquire and hearken farther into the thing, and if I find any matter of importance, I will come and enform you of it. Icis narrier mo use times, and a man and it were very good Gbaron, that in these cases you be very inqui-well said of you (quoth Phyllidat) and it were very good Gbaron, that in these cases you be very inqui-litive, and leave nothing unsearched. for why should we be carelesse and negligent in any thing, but rather it behooveth as to be circumfeet, and to look about us on every fide, providence in these cases is very requifite, and good it is to make all fure : and when he had fo faid, he took Archia; and had him into the Parlour, where they be now drinking hard: and therefore my good friends, let us flay no longer; but after we have made our Prayers unto the gods, for our good speed, go abeut our bufineff.. Charen had no sooner faid this, but we prayed unto the gods for their affiflance, and encouraged one another to the enterprise. It was the very just time, when all men use to be at Supper : and the whifiling wind arifing fill more and more, had brought fome flow or fleet, mingled with a drifling Rain, fo as there was not one person to be seen in the Streets as we passed along. Those therefore who were appointed to assal Leonidas and Hippares, who dwelt neer together, went out in their Cloakes, having no Arms or Weapons, but each of them their Swords, and those were Pelopidas, Democlidas, and Cophisodorus : But Charm, Melon, and others, ordained to fict upon Archias, had their Bieft-plates or Demy-cuiraces before them, and upon their Heads thick Chaplets, some of Fire, others of the Pine or Pitch-Tree-Branches : and part of then were clad in women Apparell, counterleiting drunken persons, as if they were come in a Mask and Mummery with their Women. And that which more is, O Archidamu, fortune also making the beathly Cowardife and fortish ignorance of our Enemies equall to our hardinesse, and resolute preparations, and having divertified and diffinguished even from the beginning our enterprise, like a play or enterlude, with many dangerous intercurrents, was affiltant and ran with us, at the very point and uoshor of the execution thereof, presenting unto us, even then a doubtfull and dangerous occurrent, of a most sudden and unexpected accident : for whien Charon after he had talked with Archias and Phi-Lippus, was returned to the house , and had disposed us in order, for to go in hand with the execution of our delignment; there was brought from hence a Letter written by Archias the High-Prieft here among you, unto that Archias his old hoaft and friend, which declared unto him (as it should seem) by all likelihood, the return of the banished, and the surprise which they were about, the house also wherein they were affembled, and all the complices who were of the conspiracy. Archias being by this time drenched and drowned in wine, and besides that, transported and past himself, with the expetition of the women, whose comming he attended, albeit the messenger that brought the Letter, faid it contained ferious affairs, of great confequence, yet he onely received it; and made no other answer but this : What tellest thou me of serious affairs ; we shall think of them to morrow ; and with that, put the Letters urder the Pillow, whereon he leaned, calling for the Pot again, and commanding that it should be filled; sending Phyllidas ever and anon to the dore, to see if the women were yet comming. Thus whiles this hope entertained and held the Feast, we came upon them, and passed along through the servicours unto the very Hall or Parlour, where they were at Supper, and there we flayed a while at the dore, eying and viewing every one of them as they fat about the Table. Now the fight of those Chaplets and Garlands which we ware upon our heads, and of the womens apparell, which fome of us were dreffed in, deceived them a little upon our first comming; in such fort, as for a while there enfued filence, untill fuch time as Melon first laying hand upon his Sword Hile; withed into the there entited lifence, until locu time as meion intribying and upon in Swore line, rounce must middle of the place; with thes, Cabrichus Cyamifto who was Archai for the time; took him by the Acmasche paffed by, and held him hack, crying out withall: Phyllidus, is not this Melon? but Melon Acmasche paffed by, and held him hack, crying out withall: Phyllidus, is not this Melon? but Melon this in off 60, as he left his hold, drew forth his Sword withall, and ran upon Archias, whom being hardly able to rife, he gave not over untill he had killed outright in the place. Charen then fee upon Philippus, whom he wounded in the neck, and notwithstanding that he desended himself with the Pots that flood about him upon the Table, yet Liftbess mounting upon the boord, lated him along on the floor, and there under-foot dispatched him. As for Gabinichus we spake him sair, and entreated him not to take part with the Tyrants, but to joyn with us, in delivering our Native Country from Tyranny, as he was a facrofaint Magistrate, and confectated unto the gods for the good and fafety of the common wealth. But being not easily induced to hearken unto reason, and that which was most expedient for him, because he was little better than half drunk; he hanging still in doubtfull suspence and perplexity, arose up on his Feet, and presented unto ut his javelin, with the head forward, which by the cutiome of the place, the Provotts with us, ever go withall : whereupon I caught hold of the Javelin in the mid'it, and held it over my head; crying unto him, to let it go, and fave him-felf; or elfe he should die for it. In this mean white, Theopompus standing on his right side, ran him. through with his Sword, faying withall; There lye thou also together with them whom thou half latered and foothed up : for it were not be farming the to wear a Coroner and Garland when Thebes in fet free, nor to offer any more facelifice to the gods, before whomsthou haft curied thy country, by making prayers to often for the prosperity of her enemies. When Cabirichus was fallen down dead, of the winds was fallen down dead, of the winds was the was faced. This massacre being done, some sew of the servants, who durst interpose themselves, and come between for the desence of those usurpers, we slew; but as many as were quiet, and fittred not; we shart up within a chausher, where men are wont to keep; being not willing that they should get forth; and go to publish throughout the City what was done, before we knew how the world went with

Thus you'hear how this chare was done. As for Pelopidas and his train, they came to the utmost gate of Leontidas, where they knocked as foftly, as they thither came gently and with filence, and to one of the servants who heard them knock, and demanded who was there, they answered, That they were come from Athens, and brought Letters unto Leontidas from Califtrains. The fervitor went and told his mafter fo much, who being commanded to fet open the gate, unbarred and unbolted it; the gate no fooner yielded from them a little, but they rushed in all at once with violence, bare down the man, and laid him along, ran a pace through the Court and Hall, and fo directly paffed to the Bedchamber of Leontidas: who prefently suspecting what the matter was, drew his dagger, and put himfelf forward to make refiftance, and to ftand upon his defence. Unjust he was, no doubt, and Tyrannical, howbeit otherwise a tall man of his hands, and of a couragious flomach: yet forgat he to overthrow the lamp, and put out the light, and in the dark to intermingle himfelf with those who came to affault him, and so haply to get away from them; but being espyed by them, so soon as ever the door was open, he flabbed Cephifodorus in the very flank under the fore ribs : and then encountring with Pelapidas, who would have entred fecond into the Chamber, he cryed out aloud, and called to his fervants for help: but Samidas, with others about him, kept them back, and otherwise of themselves they durft not meddle nor hazard their lives to deal with the nobleft persons of the City, and those who for ftrength and valor were known to furpale the reft. So there was a fcuffling and ftiff combate between Pelopidas and Leontidas, in the very portal of the Chamber door, which was but narrow, where Cephifodorus fell down in the midst between them ready to dye, so that others could not come in to succor Pelopidas: At the last when our friend Pelopidas had received a little wound in his head, but given Leontidas many a one, he overthrew him, and flew him upon the body of Cephifodorus, who being yet warm, and not fully dead, faw his enemy fall, and therewith putting forth his right hand to Pelopidas, and bidding all the rest adicu, he joysully yielded up his breath. When they had dispatched this bufines, they turned immediately from thence to Hypates house, and when the door was likewise set open for them, they killed him also, as he thought to escape, and fled by the roof of the house unto his neighbors. Which done, they returned with speed directly unto us, whom they found abroad at a Gallery called Polyftylon. After we had faluted and embraced one another, and talked a little altogether, we went strait to the common Gaol; where Phyllidas having called forth the Gaoler: Archias (quoth he) and Philippus command you with all speed to bring your Prisoner Amphibeus unto them. The Gaoler considering that is was an unreasonable hour, and withal, perceiving that Philidas in his speeches was not very well stayed, but that he was yet chafed, and panted fill unquietly upon the fresh fray that he had been at, doubting and suffecting a skirmish: When was it ever seen (quoth he) O Phyllidas, that the Polemarchy or chief Captains fent for a Prisoner at this time of the night? when by you? and what token or watchword bring you from them? As the Gaoler reasoned thus, Phyllidas made no more ado, but with an Horsemans staff or launce that he had in his hand, ran him through the fider, and laid him dead on the ground, wicked wretch that he was, whom the next morrow, many a woman trampled under their feet, and spit in his face as he lay. Then brake we the Prilon door open, and first called by name unto Amphitheus, and afterwards to others, according as each of them was of our acquaintance and familiarity; who hearing and knowing our voyces, leapt out of their Pallets upon their feet, and willingly drew their chains and irons after them: but fuch as had their feet fast in the stocks, stretched forth their hands and cryed unto us, befeeching they might not left behinde: and whiles we were bufie in fetting them loofe, many of the neighbors by this time who dwelt neer and perceived what was done, were run forth already into the ffreets with glad and joyful hearts. The very women also, as any of them heard ought of their acquaintance, without regard of observing the custom and manner of the Bootians, ran out of doors one to another, and demanded of every one whom they met in the fireet, what news? And as many of them as light either upon their fathers or husbands, followed them as they went, and no man impeached them in fo doing : for the pitiful commiferation, the tears, prayers, and fupplications, especially of honest and chast wives, were in this case very esfectual, and moved men to regard them. When things were brought to this pass, so soon as we heard, that Epaminondas and Gorgidas, with other friends, were now affembled within the Temple of Minerva, we went directly unto them, and thither repaired also many honest Citizens, and men of sality, flocking still more and more in great frequency. Now after relation was made tinto them, how all things fped, and that they were requested to assist us in the performance and execution of that which was behinde, and for that purpose to meet all together in the common Market-place, incontinently they fet up a shour, and cryed unto the Citizens, Liberty, liberty, distributing Arms and Weapons among as many as came to joys with them: which they took forth of the Temples and Halls, being full of the spoils of all forts, won from enemies in times pashas also out of the Armorers, Furbushers, and Cutlers hops there adjoyning: Thither came Hippofthenidas likewife with a Troop of friends and fervants, bringing those trumpeters with him, who were by chance come to the City against the feast of Hercules: and immediatly some sounded the alarm in the Market place, and others in all parts of the City besides, and all to associate the would artich techose of the adverse part, as if the whole City were revolted, and had rissen against them: who making a great shooks, for the nonce in the streets, because they would not be descricted, put themselves within the Cassle Cadmea, drawing with them those choice Souldiers called Kinsslows; that is to say, the better, who were worn usually to Ward all night, and keep a standing corps that to run so disorderly and in great affright, and to make hade to get in, perceiving also from above, how we were gathered together about the Market-place in Arms; and no part of the Cit; quier, but foll of tumult, upprores and garboils, whereof the noise ascended up unto them, durst not adventure to come down, though they were to the number of five thousand, as searing the present angers plur pretended for their excuse the absence of Lysanoridas their Captain, who was ever wont to remain with them, but only that day, which was the cause that afterwards, as we have heard, the Lacedemonians making means by a piece of money, to apprehend him in Carinth, whither he was retired, immediately put him to death: but upon Composition and safe Conduct, they delivered up the Cassle into our hands, and departed with all the Souldiers in it.

Of the Malice of Herodotus,

The Summary.

Pluterch considering in what credit and request Herodotus the Historiegrapher was, who in many place of his Books, which are at this day extant in our hands, defameth divers States and honourable person of Greece, is minded here in this Treatise to arm, as it were, and prepare the Readers against all such last suggestions and imputations: and in the very entry of his Dissouries, excessibe Herodotus of malice and last sings. For proof of this Challenge he settent down certain marks, whereby a man may discern a standard Writer from a sage and discreet Historiegrapher. Whith done, he applyeth the said marks unto Herodotus, spexing by a number of examples thrown out of his Stories and Narrations, that of sett times he used out words, when as others more midde and gentle were as ready for him to use: that he described han evail that among praise, he inserted to make mention thereof: that he tacketh placifure to speak ill and to rail: that among praise, he inserted the bitter blames of one and the same personage: and in recomning on thing two manner of ways and more, he resisted havays in the worse, and imputet worthy deeds and brave exploits unto disordinate and irregular passifus, and so siter an oblique manner dots he person in proceedings with Treatise teacheth as well the Writers of Histories, to look well about themselves, and shand upon their guard, left they be esteemed, standard such processing and sincere judgement, for to make their profit by those Books, which they take in hand to read.

Of the Malice of Herodotus.

Any n en there be, O Alexander, whom the file and phrace of Herodous the Historiographer (because it elemeth unto them plain, simple, natural, and running smoothly upon the matters which he delivereth) hath much deceived: but more there are, who have been eaught and brought into the same errour, by his manners and behaviour. For it is not only exerciam injustice, as Plato said, to seem just and righteous, when a man is nothing less, but allo an act of malice in the highest degree, to counterfeit mildness and simplicity, and under that pretence and colour, to be covertly most bitter and malicious. Now for that he sheweth this spight of his against the Becotians and Corinthians especially, although he spareth not any others whatsever, I thought it my part of his Writings, and no more. For to pursue and go thorow all other lies and forged tales of his, dispersed in that history, would require many great volumes. But as Sopheles said:

especially when is meeteth with a tongue which is pleasant, and carrieth such a force, as to cover among other vices, the malicious nature of an Historiographer. Philip king of Macedonie was wont to say unto those Greeks who revolted from his alliance, and sided with Trius Quintius, that they had changed their former chains, and given them for others, that were indeed more polithed; howbeit longer a fair deal. Even so a man may say, that the Malignity of Herodotus is smoother and more delicate than that of Theopompus, but it toucheth neers to the quick, and stingeth more; like as the winds are more sharp and piercing, which blow through a narrow streight or close glade, than such as are spred more at large. I think therefore that I shall do very well, first to describe generally, and as it were in geossic, the teads and marks as it were of a narration which is not pure, sincere, and friendly, but spightfull and malicious, for to apply the same afterwards to each point that we shall examin, and see whether they do agree fully thereto.

First and formost therefore, he that useth the most odious nowns and verbs, when there be others at hand more milde and gentle, for to express things done: as for example; whereas he might say, that Nicias was very ceremonious, and somewhat superstitionshy given; reported that he was sanaticall; and chuseth rather to Chalenge Cleon for rash audactity, and surious madnesse, than for light and waif speech: surely he carrieth not a good and gentle mind, but taketh pleasure to make a narration in the

Secondly, when there is some vice otherwise in a man, which appertaineth not unto the History, and yet the Writer catcheth hold thereof, and will needs thrust it into the narration of those affairs which require it not, drawing his History from the matter, fetching a compasse about, after an extravagant manner, and all to bring in either the insortunity or unhappy accident, or else some absurd and stame-full act of a man it is very evident that such an one delightest in reproachfull and evill Janguage. And therefore contrativities, Thucidides, howevere Cless committed an infinite number of grosse and foul faults, yet he never traduced him openly for them in his writings. And as touching the busy Oratour Hyperbolur, heglanced at him onely by the way, terming him a naughty man, and so let him got Philithis likewise passed over all the outrages and wrongs (many though they were) of Diomysius the Tytant, which he offered unto the Barbarous Nations, so long as they were not interlaced among the affairs of the Greeks. For the digressions and excursions of an History, are allowed, principally for some Fables or Antiquities. Moreover, he who among the praises of some great personage, thrustert in some matter tending to reproach and blame, scemeth to incurre the malediction of the Tragicall Poet, Cursed be thou, that lov'st a roll to have, Of mens mishaps, who now lie dead in grave.

Furthermore, that which is equipollent and reciprocall thereto, every man knoweth, that the leaving out and palling over quite of fome good quality, or laudable fact, seemeth not to be a thing reprehensible and subject to account; though done it were maliciously, and the same were left out in some such place as perteined well to the train of the History: for to commend a man coldly after an unwilling manner, savoureth no more of civility, than to blame him affectionately; and befides that, it is no thing more civill, it smelleth haply more of malice, and of the twain is worse.

The fourth fign of a malicious nature in an Historian, in my account is this: when one and the same thing is interpreted or reported two wayes, or more, to encline unto the harder conftruction. For permitted it is unto Sophisters and Rhetoricians, either for to gain their fee, or to win the name and reputation of eloquence, otherwhiles to take in hand for to defend and adorn the worfe cause; because they imprint not deeply any credit or belief of that which they deliver: & they themselves do not deny, that they undertake to prove things incredible, even against the common opinion of men. But he that composeth an History, doeth his part and devoir, if he writeth that which he knoweth to be true; but of matters doubtfull, obscure, and uncertain, those which are better seem to be reported more truly alwayes, than the worfe. And many there be, who omit quite and overpaffe the worfe : as for example; Epherus having faid as touching Themiticeles, that he was privy to the Treason that Paulanias Plotted and Practifed, and how hee Treated with the Lieutenants of the King of Perfia: Howbeit, he consented not (quoth he) nor never could be induced to take part with him of those hopes, whereto he did sollicite him. And Thucidides left this matter wholly out of his story, as not acknowledging it to be true. Again, in matters confessed to have been done, but yes not known, for what cause, and upon what intention; he that guesseth and casteth his conjecture in the worse pare, is naught and maliciously minded; and thus did the comicall Poets, who gave out, that Pericles kindled the Peloponnesian War, for the love of the courtisan Aspasia, or else for Phidias fake, and not rather upon an high mind and contention to take down the pride of the Poloponne. fains, sand in no wife to give place unto the Lacedemonians. For of arts approved and laudable af-fairs, he that supposeth and setteth down a leud and naughty cause, and by calumniations draweth men into extravagant suspicions, of the hidden and secret intention of him who performed the Act, which he is not able to reprove or blame openly : as they who report of Alexander the Tyranis death, which Dame Thebe his wife contrived, that it was not a deed of magnanimity, nor upon the hatred of wickednesse and vice, but proceeding from the passionate jealousic of a woman : as also those who fay, that Gato Uticensis killed himself, searing left Ceser would execute him shamefully: these (I say) are envious and spightfull in the highest degree. Semblably, an Historicall Narration smelleth of Malice, according as the manner of a work or act done is related: as if it be put down in writing, that it was by the means rather of Money and corruption, than of vertue and valour, that some great exploit was performed, (as some there were who did not flick to say as much of Philip:) or else, that is was executed without any travell and danger, as others gave out of Alexander the Great: also not by forecast and wisedome, but by the favour of fortune; like as the envious and ill willer of Timetheus, who in Painted Tables represented the Pourtrature of divers Cities and Towns, that of themselves sell within the compais of his Net and Toil, when he lay fast affect : evident it is, that is tendeth to the empairing of the Glory, Beauty, & Greatness of those acts, when they take from them the magnanimity, vertue, and diligence of the authors, and give out, they were not done and executed by themlelves. Over and befides, those who prosessed and and include the peak evill of one, incur the imputation of quarrelers, rash-headed and surious persons, in case they keep not within a meanibut such as do it after an oblique manner, as if they discharged bullets, or shot arrows at one side from some blind corner, charging surmises and suspicions; and then to turn behind and shift off all, by saying, they do not believe any such thing, which they desire most of all to be believed, howsfover they disclaim all malice and evils will: over and besides their cancred nature, they are stained with the note of nototious impudency, Next neighbours unto these, are they, who among imputations and blames, adjoyn certain praise; as in the time of Socrates, one Aristoxenus having given him the terms of ignorant, untaught, dissolute, came in with this afterwards: but true it is that he doth no man wrong, and is worst to himself: for like as they, who will cunningly and artificially flatter otherwhiles, among many and unmeasturable praises, mingle some light reprehensions, joyning with their sweet flatteries, (as it were some tart sauce so said on them) certain words frankly and freely spoken: even so the malicious person, because the wouldhave that believed which he blameth, putteth thereto some little sprinkling of a sew praises. There may be exemplified and numbered many other signs and marks of malice: but these may suffice to given to understand the nature and intention of this Author whom now we have in suffice to given to understand the nature and intention of this Author whom now we have in

First and formost therefore to begin at heavenly wights, and as they say at Vesta, Io the daughter of Inachus, whom all the Greeks think to have been deified & honoured with divine honours by the Barbarous Nations, in such fort as that she hath lest her name to many Seas, and noble Ports, in regard of her great glory and renown; and opened the fource (as it were) and original beginning of many Right Noble, most Famous and Royal Families; this our gentle Historiographer faith, that she yeelded her self unto certain Merchants of Phanicia, to be carried away, for that she having been defloured not against her will, by a Master of a Ship, seared lest she should be spied great with child; and withall belyeth the Phoenicians themselves, as if they gave out as much of her. Hereports himself also to theteftimony of the fages and wife men of Perfia, that the Phoenicians ravifhed and carried her away with other women : shewing withall directly his opinion a little after, that the most noble and bravest exploit that ever the Greeks atcheived, to wit, the war of Trey, was an enterprise begun in folly, for a lewd and naughty woman : for it is very apparent quoth he, that these women if they had not been willing themselves, they had never been so ravished, and had away as they were. And therefore we may as well fay that the gods did foolifhly to flew themselves angry and offended, with the Lacedzmonians for the abufing of the daughters of Scedasus the Leuctrian; as also to punish Ajax, for that hee forced Lady Caffandra : for certain it is according to Herodotus, that if they had not been willing, they had never been defloured : and yet himfelf faith that Aristomenes was taken alive, and carried away by the Lacedæmonians, and afterwards Philopamen Captain General of the Acharans tafted the same fortune, and Atilius Regulus the Confull of the Romans, fell likewise into the hands of his enemies : all of them fuch personages as hardly may be found more valiant and hardy warriors in the world. But what marvell is this, confidering that men do take Leopards, and Tygres alive? Now Herodaus blameth the poor women, who were by force abufed, and defendeth those wicked men who offered them that abuse. Besides, so much affected he is in love unto the Barbarous Nations, that he will acquit and cleer Business of that ill name which went of him, for slaying of his guests, and sacrificing men, and attributing unto all the E typitans by his teltimonies, much godlinele, Religion and Juffice, returneth upon the Greeks this inhuman and abhominable cruelty. For in his fecond book he writeth that Mnelaus having received Helena at the hands of King Proteus his wife, and been by him honoured with great and rich prefents, shewed himself again a most unjust and wicked man. For when the wind and weather ferved him not for to embark and fail away, he wrought by his report, a most curfed and deteftable fact, in taking two of the inhabitants male children of that Countrey, and cut them in pecces for facrifice : by occasion whereof being hated of the Ægyptians, and pursued, he fled directly with his fleet, and departed into Libya. For mine own part, I wor not what Ægyptian hath given out this report of Menelaus: but contrariwise I know full well, that in Ægypt they retain fill to this day many honours in the memoriall, both of him and also of his wife Helena. Moreover this writer holding on still his course, reporteth that the Persians learned of the Greeke, to abuse boyes carnally and constary to kind. And yet how is it possible that the Persians should learn this vilany and silthinesse of the Greeks, confidering that the Persians in manner all do confesse, that the children were there guelded, before they had ever feen the Greeks fea. Also he writeth, that the Greeks were taught by the Ægyptians, sheir folemn pomps, feastivall processions, and publick Assemblies: likewise to adore the twelve gods: yea and that Melampus had learned of the same Ægyptians the very name of Dionysius, that is to say, Baccour, who taught it the others Greeks. Astouching the facred mysteries, and secret ceremonies of Ceres, that they were brought out of Egypt by the daughters of Danans : as also that the Egyptians beat themselves and are in great forrow, yet will themselves name nothing why they so do, but remain close and keep silence in the Religious Service of the gods. As touching Hercules and Bacchus whom the Ægyptians efteem as gods, and the Greeks very aged men, he maketh mention in 10 place of this precise observation and diffinction: howsoever he saith, that this Ægyptian Hercules, was reckoned and ranged in the fecond order of the gods, and Bacches in the third, as those who had a beginning of their effence, and were not eternall : and yet he pronounceth those other to be gods, but unto thefe, he judgeth that we ought to perform anniversary sunerals, as having been sometime mortall, and now canonized demi-gods, but in no wife to facrifice unto them as gods. After the fame manner spake he of Pan, overthrowing the most holy and venerable sacrifices of the Greeks by the vanities and fables which the Egyptians devised. Yet is not this the worst, nor so intollerable; for deriving the pedegree of Hercules from the race of Perfeus, he holdeth, that Perfeus was an Affyrian, according to that which the Persians fay : But the Captains and Leaders of the Dorians (faith he) feem to be defeended in right line from the Egyptians, and fetch their genealogic and ancestours from before Danae and Acrifius: for as concerning Epaphus, Is, Jasus and Argus, he hath wholly passed over and rejected, striving to make, not onely the other two Hercules Egyptians and Phoenicians, but also this whom himself nameth to be the third, a meer stranger from Greece, and to enroll him among Barbarians, notwithstanding that of all the ancient learned men, neither Homer, nor Hesiodus, ne yet Archilochus, Pifander, Stefichorus, Aleman, nor Pindarus, do make mention of any Hercules an Egyptian or Phenician, but acknowledge one alone, to wit, our Bootian and Argien. And that which more is, among the feven lages, whom he termeth by the name of Sophifters, he will needs bear us down, that Thales was a Phoenician born, extracted from the ancient flock of the Barbarians. And in one place, reproaching in some fort the gods, under the visard and person of Solom, he hath these words: O Gresses, thou demandest of me as touching humane things, who know sull well, that the deity is envious and full of inconstant incertitude: where attributing unto Solon, that opinion which himself had of the gods, he joyneth malice unto impiety and blasphemy. And as for Pittachus, using him bus in light matters, and fuch as are of no consequence, he passeth over in the mean while, the most worthy and excellent deed that ever the man did : for when the Athenians and Mitylenians were at war about the port Sigeum, Phrynon the Captain of the Athenians having given defiance, and challenged to combat hand to hand, the hardiest warriour of all the Mitylenians, Pittacbus advanced torward and presented himself to his face for to perform his devoir, where he bare himself with such dexterity, that he caught this Captain, as mighty a man as he was and tall of flature, and fo entangled him, that he flew him outright. And when the Mitylenians, for this proweffe of his, offered unto him goodly rich prefents, he launced his javelin out of his hand as farre as ever he could, and demanded so much ground onely as he raught with that shot. And thereupon, that field, even at this day, is called Pittacium. But what writeth Herodotus, when he comes to this place ? In lieu of reciting this valiant act of Pittachus, he recounteth the flight of Alceus the Poet, who flung from him his Armour and Weapons, and fo ran away out of the Battell: whereby it appeareth, that in avoiding to write of vertuous and valiant acts, but in not concealing victous and foul facts, he tellifieth on their fide who fay, that envy, to wit, a grief for the good of another, and joy in other mens harms, proceed both from one root of malice.

After all this, the Alemzonidz who shewed themselves brave men and generous; and namely, by delivering their Countrey from tyranny, are by him challenged for Treason : for he saith, That they received Pissiratus upon his Banishment, and wrought means for his return again, upon condition, that he should espoule and marry the daughter of Megacles : and when the Maiden said thus unto her Mother, See my good Mother, Pifitratus doth not company kindly with me, as he fhould, and according to the law of nature and marriage; hereupon the faid. Alemzonidze took fuch indignation against the Tyrant for his perverse dealing, that they chased him into exile. Now, that the Lacedamoniana should taste as well of his malice as the Athenians had done before them, see how he defaceth and traduceth Othryadas, a man efteemed and admired among them above all others, for his valiance: He only (faith he) remaining alive of those three hundred, ashamed to return to Sparta, when all the rest of that company and confort of his were flain and left dead in the field, prefently overwhelmed himself in the place under an heap of his enemies shields reared for a Trophæ, and so dyed : for a little before, he faid, that the Victory between both fides refled doubtfull in even Ballance; and now he witnesseth, that through the shame and bashfulnesse of Othryadas, the Lacedamonians lost the day i for as it is a financ to live being vanquilled, so it is an great an honour to survive upon a victory. I forbear now to note and observe, how in describing Grasus every where for a soolish, vain-glorious and ridiculous person in all respects, yet neverthelesse he saith, that being prisoner he taught and instructed Gyrus, a Prince who in prudence, vertue and magnanimity surpassed all the Kings that ever were. And having by the testimony of his own History, attributed no goodnesse unto Crasius, but this onely, that he honoured the gods with great offerings, oblations and ornaments, that he presented unto them ; which very fame (as himfelf declareth) was the most wicked and profanest act in the world: for whereas his Brother Pantaleon and he were at great variance and debate, about succession in the Kingdome during the life of their Father; after that he came to the Crown, he caught one of the Nobles, a great friend and companion of his Brother Pantaleon, who had before-time been his adversary, and within a fullers mill all to beclawed and mangled him with Tuckers Cards and Burling Combs, to as he died therewith; and of his money which he did confiscate and leize upon, he caused those oblations and Jewels to be made which he fent as a prefent to the gods. Concerning Deisees the Median , who by his vertue and justice atteined to the Kingdome, he saith, that he was not such an one indeed, but an Hypocrite, and by semblance of justice was advanced to that regall dignity. But what should I stand upon the examples of Barbarous Nations; for he hath ministred matter enough in writing onely of the Greeks. He faith, that the Athenians and many other Ionians, being ashamed of that name, were not only unwilling, but also denied utterly to be called lonians : also, as many of them as were of the noblest blood, and descended from the very Senate and Prytaneum of the Athenians, begat children of Barbarous women, after they had killed their Fathers and former children : by occasion whereof those women made an Ordinance among themselves, which they bound with an oath, and ministred the fame unto their daughters, never to cat nor drink with their Husbands, nor to call them by their names: and that the Milefians at this day be descended from the faid women. And having cleanly delivered thus much under hand, that those onely who celebrated the feast named Apaturia, were indeed true lonians : And all (quoth he) do keep and observe that folemnity, fave onely the Ephefians and Colophonians. By this flie device he doth in effect deprive these States, of the Noble Antiquity of their Nation. Hewriteth likewise, that the Cumwans and Mitylenzans, were compacted and agreed withall, for a prece of Money, to deliver into the hards of Gyrus, Padyas, one of his Captains, who had revolted from him : But I cannot fay (quoth he) certainly, for how much, because the just sum is not exactly known. But he ought not by his leave to have charged upon any City of Grece such a note of Infamy, without he had been better affured thereof. And afterwards he faith, that the Inhabitants of Ghios pulled him, being brought unto them out of the Temple of Minerva Po-liuchos, that is to (ay, Tutelar and Protectreffe of the City, for to deliver him unto the Perfians; which the Chians did after they had received for their hire, a peece of Land called Atarnes. Howbeit, Charon, the Lampfacinian, a more Ancient Writer, when he handleth the flory of Pallyas, taxeth neither ron, the Lampiachian, a most charm for any fuch facrilege: but writeth of this matter, thus, word the Mivylenzans, nor the Chians, for any fuch facrilege: but writeth of this matter, thus, word for word: Paljas (quoth he) being advertifed that the Persian Army approached, sled first to Mnylene, and afterwards to Chios: and there he tell into the hands of Cyrus. Moreover this our Authorin his third Book, describing the expedition or journey of the Lacedamonians against Polycrates the Tyrant, faith that the Samians, both are of opinion and also report, that it was by way of recompence and requitall, because they had sent them aid in their War against Messen, that the Lacedzmonians and requitars, occasion they must be a state of the state they enterprifed this War : but rather to chastife the Samians, for that they had intercepted and taken away a fair flanding Cup of Gold, fent by them as a prefent unto King Crafus: and besides a goodly Cuirace or Breft-plate, fent unto them from King Amasis. And yet we know for certain, that in all those dayes, there was not a City in Greece so desirous of Honour, nor so insest and deadly bent against Tyrants, as Lacedemon was: for what other Cup of Gold, or Cuirace was there, for which they chaced out of Corinth and Ambracia the uturping race of the Cypsclide; banished out of Noxos, the Tyrant Lyedamis; expelled out of Athens, the Children of Pififratus; drave out of Sicyone, Aeschines; exiled from Thefor, Symmachus ; delivered the Phocasas from Anlis; and turned Arijtogenes out of Milesus: as for the lordly dominions over Thessay, they utterly ruinated and rooted out, which Arithmedis and Angelus usurped, whom they suppressed and defaited by the means of Leotychidas their King? But of thefe things I have written elsewhere more exactly and at large. Now if Herodotus faith true, what wanted they of extreme folly and wickednesse in the highest degree, in disavowing and denying a most just and honourable occasion of this War, to confesse that they made an invasion upon a poor and miferable Nation oppressed and afflicted under a Tyrant, and all in remembrance of a former grudge, to be revenged for a small wrong upon a base mind and mechanicall avarice. Now haply he had a sling at the Lacedzmonians and gave them a blur with his pen, because in the train and consequence of the flory, they came fo just under it; but the City of the Gorinthians, which was clean out of his way, he hath notwithstanding taken it with him and bespurted and deshed as he passed by, with a most grievous flander and heavy imputation. The Corinthians also (quoth he) did favour and second with great affection this voyage of the Lacedæmonians, for to requite an hainous outrage and injury, which they had received before time at the Samians hands : And that was this ; Periander the Tyrant of Gorinib, fent three hundred young Boyes, that were the Sons of the most Noble perfons in all Corfu, to King Aliastes for to be guelded. These youths arrived in the Isle Samos, whom being landed the Samians taught how to sit as humble suppliants within the Temple and Sanctuary of Diana, and set Sammans taught now to it as unamost uppersons when it has no seen Seed and Honey. And this forfooth was it that our trim Hilforingrapher calleth fo great an outrage and abuse offered by the Samians uno the Corinthians; for which he saith, the Lacce zmonians also were flirred up and provoked against them, because they had saved the children of Greeks from eviration. But surely he that fasteneth this reproach upon the Corinthians, sheweth that the City was more wicked than the tyrant himself. As for him, his desire was to be revenged of the Inhabitants of Corfu, who had killed his son among them: but the Corinthians, what wrong received they of the Samians, for which they should in hostile manner fet upon them, who opposed themselves and empeached so inhumane and barbarous cruelty to be committed ? and namely, that they should revive and raise up again an old cankred grudge and quarrels, that had lien dead and buried the space of three Generations; and all in favour and maintenance of Tyranny, which had lain very grievous and unsupportable upon them, and whereof, being overthrown and ruined as it is, chey cease not ftill to abolish and do out the remembrance for ever, Loe, what outrage it was, that the Samians committed upon the Corinthians; but what was the revenge and punishment at was, that the Corinthians deviced against the Samians? For if in good carness they took indignation and were offended with the Samians, it had been meet, not to have incited the Lacedamonians, but to have diverted them rather, from levying Warre upon Polycrates, to the end that the Tyrant not being defaited and put down, they might not have been freed nor delivered from Tyrannicall servitude

But that which more is, what occasion had the Corinthians to be angry with the Samians, who though they defired, yet they could not fave the Corcyreans children, considering they took no displeasure against the Chidians, who not only preserved, but also restored them to their Parents? And verily the Corcyreans make no great regard, nor speak ought, of the Samians in this behalf; marry the Cnidians, they remembred in the best manner; for the Chidians they ordained honours, priviledges, and immunities, and enacted publike decrees to ratific and confirm the fame. For these Chidians failing to the Isle of Samos, arrived there, drave out of the foresaid Temple the Guard of Periander, took the children forth, and brought them fafe to Corfu, according as Antenor the Candiot, and Diony sus the Chalcidian in the Book of Foundations have left in writing. Now that the Lacedæmonians undertook this expedition, not for to be quit with the Samians, and to punish them, but to deliver them rather from the tyrant, and for to fave them ; I will believe no other testimony but the Samians themselves. For they affirm, that there is among them now standing, a Tomb or Monument by them erected at the publike charges of the City, for the corps of Archias a Citizen of Sparta, whose memorial they do honour, for that in the faid fervice he fought valiantly, and lost his life; for which cause the posterity descended from that man, do yet unto this day, bear singular offiction, and do all the pleasures they can unto the Samians, as Herodotus himself beareth witness. Furthermore, in his fifth Book he Writeth, that Califlhenes, one of the most noble and principal personages of all Athens, perswaded the Priestes Pythia, to be a false Prophetes, in moving the Lacedemonians always by her answers that flegave out, for to deliver the City of Athens from the thirty Tyrants : and thus unto a most glorion piece of work and right juft, he adjoyneth the imputation of 10 great an impiety, and a damnable device of fallhood; and withal, bereaved god Apallo of that prophecie which is 60 good and honesh; yea and beseeming Themis, who also as they say affisted him in the Oracle. He saich also, that Isagoras yielded his wife unto Cleomenes, for to use her at his pleasure, whensover he came unto her: and then, as his ordinary manner is, intermingling some praises among blames, because he would be the better believed: This Isagoras (quoth he) the son of Tilander, was of a noble house; but I am not able to say of what Anriquity before-time his pedigree was; but only that his kinstolk and those of his blood, do sacrifice unto Jupiter, sirnamed Carius. Now I affure you, this our Historian is a proper and pleasant conceited tellow, to send away sageras thus to the Carians, as it were to Ravens, in a mischief. And as sor Aristogicas, he packeth him away not by a back door or Poftern, but directly by the broad and open gate, as far as unto Phanice; faying, that his first original came long fince from the Gephyrians: but what Gephyrians trow ye? not those in Eubaa, or in Erstria, as some do think: but he saith plainly they be Phonicians, and that he is so persuaded of them by hear-fay. And not being able to deprive the Lacedæmonians of their glory, for delivering the City of Asbens from the fervitude of the thirty Tyrants, he goeth about to obliturate quite, or at leastwife in some fort to difgrace and dishonour that most noble act, with as foul a pasfion, and as villanous a vice : for he faith, that they repented incontinently, as if they had not well done, by the induction of false and supposed Cracles, thus to have chaced out of their Countrey the Tyrants their Friends, Guests, and Allies, who promised to deliver Athens into their hands, and to have yielded the City unto an unthankfull people; and that anon they fent for Hippias, as far as to Sigeum, for to reduce him to Athens: but the Corinthians opposed themselves, and diverted them, whiles Soficles discoursed and shewed how many miseries and calamities the City of Corinth had endured whiles Periander and Cypfelus held them under their Tyrannical Rule : and yet of all those enormous outrages which Periander committed, they could not name any one more wicked and cruel, than that of the three hundred children which he fent away for to be gelded: How. beit, this man dareth to fay, that the Corinthians were moved and provoked against the Samians, who had faved the faid youths, and kept them from suffering such an indignity, and carried the remembrance thereof for revenge, as if they had done them fome exceeding great injury : fo full is his malice and gall of inconstancy, of repugnance and contradiction in all his speeches, which ever and anon is ready to offer it felf in his Narrations. After all this, coming to describe the taking of the City Sardis, he diminisheth, defameth, and discredite the exploit all that ever he can, being (0) armed with shameless audacity, that he termeth those Ships which the Athenians set out, and sent to fuccour the King, and to plague the Ionians, who rebelled against him, the original causes of all mischief, for that they assayed to set at liberty and deliver out of servitude, so many goodly and fair Cities of the Greeks, held forcibly under the violent Dominion of the barbarous Nations. As touching the Eretrians, he maketh mention of them only by the way, and paffeth in filence a most worthy and glorious piece of fervice, which they performed at that time: for when all Ionia was now already in an uproar and hurliburly, and the Kings Armada neer at hand, they put out their Navy, and in the main Sea of Pamphylia, defeated in a Naval battel the Cyprians: then returning back, and leaving their Navyjin the Rode before Ephefus, they went by land to lay Siege unto the Capital City of Sardis, where they beleagured Artaphernes within a Caftle, into which he was fled, intending thereby to raise the Siege before the City Miletus : which fervice they put in execution and performed; cauling their enemies to remove their Camp, and dislodge from thence, in a wonderfull great fear and affright: but feeing a greater number of enemies to prefs hard upon them, they returned. Many Chroniclers report the History in this manner; and among the reft Lyfanias Mallotes, in his Chronicle of the Eretrians. And verily it would have beformed well, if for no other reason, yet after the taking and destruction of their City, to have added this their act of valour and powels. Howbeit, this good Writer, contrariwife faith, that being vanquished in the field, she Barbarians followed in chafe, and purfued them as far as to their ships: and yet Charon the Lamplacenian, maketh no mention thereof, but writeth thur, word for word. The Athenians (quoth he) put to Sea with a flect of twenty Galleys, for to ayd the Ionians, and made a voyage as far as to Sardeis, where they were masters of all, except the Kings Fortressor Wall; which done, they returned to Miletus. In the fixth book, our Herodotus, after he had related thus much of the Platzans, that they had yielded and committed themselves to the protection of the Lacedemonians, who made Remonstrance unto them. that they should do far better to range and fide with the Athenians their neighbors, and able to defend shem : headdeth moreover, and faith afterwards, not by way of opinion and fuspicion, but as one who knew it was fo indeed, that the Lacedemonians thus advised and counselled them at that time, not for any good will and loving affection that they bare unto them, but because they were all very well appayed to see the Athenians to have their hands full, and to be matched with the Bæotians. If then Herodotus be not malicious, it cannot chuse, but that the Lacedemonians were very cautelous, fraudulent, and fpightful; and the Athenians as blockish and senseles, not to see how they were thus deluded and circumvented. The Platæans likewife were thus posted from them, not for any love or honor intended unto them!, but because they might be the occasion of War. Furthernove or nonor intended into them, one all fydericed, and colourably pretended the excellent of war. Furtner-more, he is convinced to have fallfy deviced, and colourably pretended the excellent of the lacedemonian, which whiles they attended and flayed for, he faith, they failed and went not in that journey of Marathon, to ayd the Athenians; for not onely they began a thouland voyages, and fought as many battels in the beginning of the moneth and new of the Moon, but also at this very battel of Marathon, which was fought the fixth day of the moneth Boedromion, that is to fay, November, they miffed very little, but they had arrived in due time : for they came foon enough to finde the dead bodies of those that were flain in the field, and lying fill in the place: and yet thus hath he written of the Full Moon. It was impossible for them to do this out of hand, being as they were, not willing so break the Law; for that, as yet, it was but the ninth day of themoneth; and they made answer, that they might not fet forth, unless the Moon were at the full. And thus these men waited for the Full Moon. Butyou, good Sir, transfer the Full Moon into the beginning of the Half Moon, or Second Quarter, confounding the course of Heaven, and the order of days, yea, and fluffling every thing together. Over and befides, promifing in the forefront and inferiprion of your Hiftory, to write the decidand affairs of the Greeks, you employ all your eloquence to magnific and amplifie the acts of the Barbarians; and making semblance to be affectionate to the Athenians, yet for all that, you make no mention at all of that folemn pomp and procession of theirs at Agre, which they hold even at this day, in the honor of Hecate, or Proferpina, by way of thanklgiving for the victory, the feast whereof shey do celebrate: But this helpeth Herodorus very much to meet with that improperation and flander that went of him, namely, that he flattered the Athenians in his flory, for that he had received a great fum of money of them for that purpose: for if he had read this unto the Athenians, they would never have neglected nor let pass that wicked Philippides, who went to move and sollicite the Lacedemonians to be at that battel, from which himself came, and he especially, who as he saith himself, within two days was in Sparta, after he had been at Athens, if the Athenians after the winning of the field, did not fend for the ayd of their Confederates and Allies. But Diyllus an Athenian, none of the meanest Chroniclers, writeth, that he received of the Athenians the summe of Ten Talents of Silver, by vertue of an Act that Anytus propounded.

Moreover, many are of opinion, that Herodotus in his Narration of the battel of Marathon, himfelf marred the whole grace and honor of the exploit, by the number that he putteth down of them who there were flain: for he faith, that the Athenians made a vow to facrifice unto Proferpina or Dians firnamed Agrotera, as many year-old Goats as they slew of the Barbtrians: But when after the discomfiure and overthrow, they saw that the number of the dead bodies were infinite, they made supplication to the Goddess for to be dispensed for their vow and promise, and to acquie them for five hundred every year to be killed in facrifice for her. But to pass over this, let us fee what followed after the battel. The Barbarians (quoth he) with the rest of their ships drawing back and retiring into the open Sea, and having taken afhip boord those flaves of Eretria, out of the Isle where they had left them, doubled the point of Sunium, with a full purpose to prevent the Athenians before they could recover the City. And the Athenians were of opinion, that they were advised thus to do by a secret complet between them and the Alemzonidz, who had appointed and agreed with the Perfians to give them a fignal fo foon as they were all embarked, by holding up aloft, and shewing them a shield afar off. And so they setched a compass about the Cape Sunium: And here I am content that he should go clear away with this, that he called those Prisoners of Eretria by the name of slaves, who th: wed as much courage and valor in this War, yea, and as great a defire to win honor, as any Greeks whatloever, although their vertue fped but ill, and was unworthily afflicted. And lefe account I make also of this, that he defamed the Alemzonidz, of whom were the greatest families, and noblest persons of all the City. But the worst of all is this, that the honor of this brave victory is quite overthrown, and the iffue or end of fo worthy and renowned a piece of fervice is come just to nothing in a manner, neither feemeth it to have been any fuch battel, or fo great an exploit, but onely a short scuffling or light ekirmish with the Barbarians when they were landed, as evil willers, carpers and envious persons give out to deprave the service, if it be so, that after the battel, they fled not when they had cut the Cables of their Ships, permitting themselves to the wind, for to carry them as tar as poslibly might be from Attica, but that there was a Shield or Targuet litted up aloft in the air as a Signall unto them of Treason, and that of purpose they made sail toward the City of Athens, in hope to surprife it; and having without any noise in great filence doubled the foresaid point of Suntum, and were discovered a float, hovering about the Port Phalere, insomuch as the principall and most honourable personages of the Athenians, being out of all hope to save the City, betrayed it into their hands: for afterwards he dischargeth and cleereth the Alcmanida, and attributeth this Treason unto others: And certain it is (queth he) that fuch a Targuet or Shield was shewed. And this he saith so confidently, as if himfelt had feen the thing. But impossible it is that it should be fo, in case the Athenians won the victory cleer: and fay it had so been, the Barbarians never could have perceived it, flying fo as they did in great affright and danger, wounded also as they were, and chased both with Sword and Shot into their Ships, who left the field every man, and fled from the Land as fast as ever he could. But afterwards again, when he maketh femblance to answer in the behalf of the Alen zonidz, and to refute those crimes which himself broched, and charged upon them: I wonder (quoth he) and I cannot believe the rumour of this imputation, that ever the Alenannica, by any compact with the Barbarians, showed them the fignall of a shield, as willing that the Athenians should be in subjection to the Barbarians under Hippias. In thus doing, he putteth me in mind and remembrance of a certain clause running in this manner: Take him you will; and having taken him, let him go you will. Semblably, first you accuse, and anon you defend : write you do and frame accusatory imputations against honourable persons, which afterwards you seem to cancile, discrediting herein (no doubt) and diftrufting your felf : for you have heard your own felt to fay, that the Alemzonida fee up a Targuet tor afignal so the Barbarians vanquilhed and flying away; but in relieving them again and answering in their defence, you shew your feif to be a flanderous sycophant : for if that be true which you write in this place, that the Alemaonida were work, or at least wife, as badly affected to Tyrants, as Callias the Son of Phenippus and Father of Hipponicus, where will ou bellow and place that confpiracy of theirs against the Commonwealth, which you have written in your form: Books ? faying, that they contracted alliance and affinity in marriage with Pififratus; by means whereof, they wrought his return from exile to ex reife Tyranny : neither would they ever have banished him again, had it not been that their daughter had complained and accused him, that he used her not according to law of marriage and of nature. Thus you fee what confused variations, contradictions and repugnances there be in that imputation and suspicion of the Alemaonida: but in founding out the plaifes of Callias the Son of Phenippus, with whom he joyneth his Son Hipponicus, who by the report of Herodorus himself, was in his time the richest man in all Atkens, he conselleth plainly, that for to infinuate himself into the favour of Hipponicus, and to flatter him, without any reason or cause in the world arising out of the matter of the flory, he brought Callias. All the world knows, that the Argives refused not to enter into that generall confederacy and affociation of the Greeks, requiring onely, that they might not be ever at the Lacedæmonians command, nor forced to follow them, who were the greatest enemies, and those who of all men living hated them most when it would not otherwise be, he rendereth a most malicious and spightfull cause and reason thereof, writing thus : When they (aw (quoth he) that the Greeks would needs comprise them in that league, knowing full well, that the Lacedamonians would not impare unto them any prerogative to command, they feemed to demand the communion thereof, to the end that they might have some colourable occasion and excuse to remain quiet and sit fill! which he faith, that Artaxerxes long after, remembred unto the Embaffadors of the Argives, who came unto him at Sufa, and gave this testimony unto them, That he thought there was not a City in all Greece friended him more than Arges. But foon after, as his accustomed manner is, feeming to retract all, and cleanly to cover the matter, he comes in with these words: Howbeit, as touching this point, I know nothing of certainty; but this I wot well, all men have their faults; and I do not believe. that the Argives have carried themselves work of all others: but how soever (quoth he) I am bound to lay that which is commonly received, yet I believe not all : and let this stand thorowout the whole course of mine History. For this also, is given out abroad, That they were the Argives who follicited and sent for the King of Persia to levy Warupon all Greece; because they were not able in Arms to make head against the Lacedemonians, and cared not what became of them, to avoid the present difcontentment and grief wherein they were. And may not a manyery well return that upon himfelf, which he reporteth to be spoken by an Æthiopian, as touching the sweet Odours and rich Purple of the Persians? * Deceiful are the Persian Ointments, deceitfull are their habiliments. For even so a man may Grace me very well fay of him: Deceitfull are the * phrases, deceitfull are the figures of Herodotus his speeches;

> So intricate and tortuous, fo winding quite throughout, As nothing found is therein found, but all turn's round about.

Grace melius, Sonseà ulu ru ixoi para son ea gra si para fu mirroza bei Greeks, but held off and stood out upon a jealousie of sovereign command or emulation of vertue and valour against the Lacedamonians; no man will fay the contrary, but that they greatly dishonoured the memory of their Progenitour Hercules, and difgraced the Nobility of their Race. For better it had been, and more beferming, for the Siphnians and Cithnians, the inhabitants of two little Isles, to have defended the liberty of Greece, than by striving thus with the Spartans, and contesting about the prerogative of command, to shift off and avoid so many combats and so honourable pieces of fervice. And if they were the Argives, who call d the King of Persia into Greece, because their Sword was not so sharp as the Lacedzmonians was, and for that they could not make their part good with them ; what is the reason, that when the said King was arrived in Greece, they shewed not themselves openly to band with the Medes and Persians? And if they were unwilling to be seen in the Field and Camp with the Barbarian King; why did they not, when they flayed behind at home, invade the territory of the Laconians? why entred they not again upon the Thurians Countrey, or by some other means prevented and impeached the Lacedæmonians? for in fo doing, they had been able greatly to have endamaged the Greeks, namely, by hindring them from comming into the field at Platee with to pullfant a power of Armed Footmen. But the Athenians verily in this fervice, he highly extolleth and fetteth out with glorious Titles, naming them, The faviours of Greece; which had been well done of him and justly, if he had not intermingled with these praises, many blames and reproachfull terms. Howbeit now, when he faith, that the Lacedæmonians were abandoned of the other Greeks, and nevertheleffe, thus forfaken and left alone, having undertaken many worshy exploits, dyed honourably in the field, forefeeing that the Greeks favouring the Medes, complotted and combined with King Xerxes; is it not evident hereby, that he gave not out those goodly words directly to praise the Athenians, but rather, that he commended them, to the end that he would condemn and defame all other Greeks? For who can now be angry and offended with him, for reviling and reproaching in fuch vile and bitter terms the Thebans and Phoceans continually as he doth, confidering that he condemneth of Treason (which never was, but as he gueffeth himself might have so fallen out) even those who were exposed to all perils of death for the liberties of Greece? And as for the Lacedamonians themselves. he patteth a doubt into our heads, Whether they dyed manifully in fight, or rather yeelded? making flight arguments, God wot, and frivolous conjectures, to impair their honour, in comparison of others that fought at Thermopyle. Moreover, in relating the overthrow and shipwrack which hapned to the King of Perfias fleet, wherein a mighty and infinit maffe of Money and Mony worth was caft away : Aminocles a Magnefian Citizen (quoth he) and Son of Cretines, was mightily enriched; for he met with infinit Treasure as well in Coyn as in Plate both of Silve, and Gold. But he could not paffe over fo much as this, and let it go, without fome biting nip favouring of malice: For this man (quoth he) who otherwise beforetime was but poor and needy, by since wind-fals and unexpected cheats became very wealthy: but there befell unto him also an unhappy accident, which troubled him and difgraced his other good fortune, for that he killed his own Son. For who feeth not, that he inferteth in his Hiftory thefe golden words of wrecks, and of great Treasure found floating or cast upon the Sands by the Tides of the Sea, of very purpole, to make a fit room and a convenient place, wherein he might bestow the Murder committed by Aminocles upon the Person of his own Son. And whereas Arisophane the Bectian wrote, that having demanded Money of the Thebans, he could receive none of them; and that when he went about to reason and dispute scholastically with the youth of the City in points of learning, the Magistrates (such was their rusticity and hatred of good Letters) would not suffer him : other Proof and Argument thereof he putteth down none : but Heredotus gave Testimony with Aristophanes, whiles those imputations wherewith he chargeth the Thebans, he putteth down some fally, others ignorantly, and some again upon hatred, as one that had a quarrell against them : for he affirmeth, that the Theffalians combined and fided with the Medians at the first upon meer necessity, wherein he faith true. And Prophefying as it were of other Greeks, as if they minded to betray and forfake the Lacedæmonians, he commeth in afterwards with this shift, that this was not voluntarily and with their good liking, but upon conftraint and necessity, because they were surprised City by City, one after another. But yet he alloweth not unto the Thebans the excuse of the same compulsion, albeit they had fent a band of five hundred men under the Conduct of Captain Mnamias, for to keep the Streights of Tempe, and likewife unto the paffe of Thermopyle, as many as King Leonidas demanded, who onely together with the Thespians stuck to him and remained with him, when hee was forsaken of all other, after they faw how he was environed round about on every fide. But after that the Barbarous King, having gotten all the Avennes, was entred upon their confines, and Demaratus the Spartin, being in right of mutuall Hospitality friendly affected to Apaginus a chief upholder and principall Pillar of the Oligarchy, or faction of fome few, usurping principality, wrought so, as that hee brought him first acquainted and afterwards into familiar friendship with the Barbarian King, while all other Greeks were embarked and at Sea, and none feen upon the land to encounter the enemier. By this mean, at the last driven they were to accept conditions of Peace, and to grow into a composition with the Barbarians, finding themselves brought to so hard termes of necessity: for neither had they Sea at hand, nor any Navy at Command as the Athenians, neither dwelt they far off from the heart of Greece in a most remote angle thereof, as did the Lacedamonians, but were not above one dayes journey and an half from the Medians Royall Camp, and had already encountred in the fireight passaffer with the Kings power, assisted onely with the Spartans and Thespians, where they had the worse and wire defeited. And yet this our Historiographer is fo just and equal, that he faith, The Lacedemonians leeing themselves for faken and abandoned of all their Allies, were fain to give ear unto any compolition whatfoever, and to accept at a venture what was offered : and fo being not able to abolish nor utterly blot out to brave and fo glorious an act, nor to deny, but that it was atchieved; he goeth about to discredit and deface it with this vile imputation and suspicion, writing thus, The Allies then and the Confederates being fent back, returned into their Countreys, and obeyed the Commandement of Leonidat : onely the Theigians and Thebans remained fill with the Lacedemonians : and as for the Thebans, it was full against their wills, for that Leonidas kept them as Hostager; but the Thespians were willing thereto, for they faid, they would never forfake Leonidas nor his company. Sheweth he not apparently herein, that he carrieth a spightful and malicious minde particularly against the Thebans. whereby not onely he flindereth the City fallly and unjustly, but also careth not so much, as to make the imputation feem probable, no nor to conceal at leastwife unto few men, that he might not be espical to have been privy unto himself of contradictions: for having written a little before, that Leonida's feeing his Confederates and Allies out of heart, and altogether discouraged to hazard the fortune of the field, commanded them to depart : a little after, clean contrary he faith, that he kept the Thepansperforce with him, and against their wills, whom by all likelihood he should have driven from him, if they had been willing to stay, in case that he had them in jealouse and suspicion, that they rook part with the M dians : for feeing he would not have those about him who were cowardly aff &to, what boot was it tokeep among his Souldiers men suspected? For being as he was, a King of the Sparans, and Captain-General of all the Greeks, he had not been in his right wits, nor found in judgement, it he would have stayed with him in hostage four hundred men well armed, when his own company were but three hundred in all, especially at such a time when as he saw himself hardly bested and belet with enemies, who preffed upon him at once, both before and behind. For howfoever before time he had led them about with him as Hostages, probable it was that in such an ex remity they would either have had no regard of Leonidas, and so departed from him, or else that Leonidas might have feared to be environed by them rather than by the Barbarians. Over and besides, had not King Leonidas been ridiculous and worthy to be laughed at, to bid other Greeks to depart, as if by tarrying they should soon after lose their lives : and to forbid the Thebans, to the end that he might keep them for the behalf of other Greeks: he, I say, who was resolved anon to dye in the field; for if he led the men about with him in truth as Hoffiges, or no better than flaves, he never flould have kept them flill with those who were at the point to perish & be flain, but rather delivered them unto other Greeks who were from him. Now whereas there remaineth one cause yet, that a man may allege, why he received them fill with hims for that peradventure they should aldie with him, this good writer hath overthrown that also, in that he writeth thus of the honorable minde & magnanimity of Leonidas, word for word in this wife: Leonidas (quoth he) casting and considering all these matters in his minde, and desiring that this glory might redound unto the Spartans alone, fent away his friendly allies every on into their own ountreys, therefore rather than because they were of diff rent mindes and opinions : for exceeding folly it had been of his part, to keep his enemies for to be partakers of that glory, from which he repelled his friends. It appeareth then by the effects, that Lemidas distrusted not the Thebans, nor thought amifs of them, but reputed them for his good and loyal friends: For he marched with his Army into the City of Thebes, and at his request obtained that which to no other was ever granted, namely, to be lodged all night, and fleep within the Temple of Hercules, and the next morning related unto the Thebans, the vision which appeared unto him : For he saw, as he thought, all the greatest and most principal Cities of Greece in a Sea, troubled and disquieted with rough windes, and violent tempolits, wherein they flored and were toffed to and fro. But the City of Thebes surpass d all the rest, for mounted it was on high up to heaven, and afterwards suddenly the fight thereof was lost, that it would no more be seen. And verily these things as a type, resembled that which long time after besel unto that City. But Herodotus in writing of this conflict, burieth in filence the bravelt act of Leonidas himfelf, faying thus much barely, They all loft their lives in the Streights, about the top of a certain hill. But it was far otherwife: For when they were advertifed in the night that the enemies had invefted them round about, they arose and marched directly to their very Camp, yea, and advanced so far forth as they came within a little of the Kings Royal Pavilion, with a full resolution there to kill him, and to leave their lives all about him. And verily down they went with all before them, killing, flaying, and putting to flight, as many as they met, even as far as to his tent. But when they could not meet with Xerxes, feeking as they did for him in fo vaft and spacious a Camp, as they wandred up and down fearching for him with much ado, at the last hewed in pieces they were by the Barbarians, who on every fide in great number came about them. And albeit we will write in the life of Leonidus, many other noble acts and worthy layings of his, which Herodotus hath not once touched, yet it shall not be amis to quote here also by the way, some of them. Before that he and his noble Troop departed out of Sparsa in this journey, there were exhibited folenen Funeral Games for his and their fakes, which their fathers and mothers flood to behold : and Leonidas himfelf, when one faid unto him, That he led forth very few with him to fight a battel: Yea, but they are many enough (quoth he) to dye there. His wife asked him when he took his leave of her, what he had elfe to fay? No more (quoth he) turning unto her, but this, that thou marry again with some good man, and bear him good children. When he was within the Vale or Pass of Thermopyla, and there invisoned, two there were in his Company of his own Race aud Family, whom he defired to fave: So he gave unto one of them a Letter to carry whither he directed it, because he would send him away: but the party would not take it at his hands. with the medical management of the medical m the Magistrates of Sparta: but he made answer not by word of mouth, but by his deed: for he took up his Shield in hand, and went directly to his place, where he was appointed to fight. Would not up mis onicia in mand, and went currently to may have planted another for leaving out these things? But this writer having taken the pains any man have blamed another for leaving out these things? But this writer having taken the pains to collect and put in writing the Bafen and Clofe fool of Amajis, and how he brake winde over it site comming in of certain Affes which a Thief did drive; the congiary or giving of certain bottles of comming in or certain Aues which a liner did did; can never be thought; to have omitted through negligence, nor by overfight and forgetfulneffe, fo many worthy exploits and notable fayings; but not of Peevifuneffe, Malice and Injuffice, to fome. And thus he faith, that the Thebam as first being evin of Peevifuneffe, Malice and Injuffice, to fome. with the Greeks, fought indeed, but it was by compulfion, because they were held there by sorce. For it should seem fortooth, that not only Xerxes, but Leondas also, had about him a company that followed the Camp with Whips, to courge those I trow, who lagged behind, and these good fellower held the Thebans to it, and made them to fight against their Wills: And thus he faith that they fought perforce, who might have fled and gone their wayes: and that willingly they took part with the Medes, whereas there was not one came in to succour them. And alittle after, he writeth, that when others made hafte to gain the Hill, the Thebans being disbanded and divided as under, both stretched forth their hands unto the Barbarians , and as they approached near unto them , faid that which was most true, namely, that they were Medians in heart, and so in token of homage and fealty, gave unto the King Water and Earth: that being kept by force they were compelled to come into this paffe of Thermopyle, and could not do withall, that their King was wounded, but were altogether innocent thereof: By which allegations they went clear away with their matter : For they had the Theffaliens witnesses of these their words and reasons. Loe how this Apology and Justification of theirs, had andience among those barbarous out cryes of so many thousand men, in those confised shouts and diffo-nant noise, where there was nothing but running & flying away of one side, chasing and pursue of another: See how the witnesses were deposed, heard and examined. The Thessalio amid the throng and rout of those that were knocked down and killed, and over those heaps of bodies which were trodden under foot (for all was done in a very gullet and narrow passee) pleaded no doubt very formally for the Thebans: for that a little before they having conquered by force of armes all Greec, chased them as far as to the City Thefpie, after they bad vanquished them in battell, and flain their Leader and Captain Lattamias. For thus much paffed even at that very time between the Thebans and the Theffalians: whereas otherwise there was not so much as civill love and humanity, that appeared by mutuall offices from one to the other. B. fides, how is it possible that the Thebans were faved, by the teftimony of the Theffalians? For the barbarous Medes, as himfelf faith, partly killed outright fuch as came into their hands: and in part whiles their breath was yet in their bodies, by the commandement of Xerxes, fet upon them a number of the Kings marks, beginning first at the Captain himself Leoniades. And yet neither was Leoniades the Generall of the Thebans at Thermopyle, but Anaxander, 28 Aristophanes writeth out of the Annals, and records in the arches of Thebes, as touching their foveraign Magistrates: and so Nicander likewise the Colophonian hath put down in his Chronicle: neither was thereever any man before Herodotus who knew that Xerxes marked and branded in that manner any Theban: for this had been an excellent plea in their defence against the foresaid calumniation, and a very good meanes for this City to vaunt and boaft of fuch marks given them, as if King Xerxes meant to punish and plague as his greatest and most mortall enemies, Leonidas and Leonidades. For he caused the one to be securged, and his body to be hanged up when he was dead; and the other to be pricked whiles he was alive. And this our Historiographer hath ased this cruelty which they shewed unto Leonidas dead, for a maniscst proof that the barbarcus King hated Leonidas in his life time above all the men in the world. And in avouching that the Thebans who fided with the Medes at Thermopple were thus branded and marked as flaves, and afterwards, being thus marked, fought eagerly in the behalf of the same Barbarians before Plates, me thinks he may well say as Hippoclides the state morisk dancer, unto whom, when at a feaft he bestirred his legs, and hopped artificially about the tables, one faid unto him, thou dancest truly. Hippoclides answered again, Hippoclides careth not greatly for the truth. In his eighth book he writeth that the Greeks being affrighted like Cowards, entred into a resolution for to fly from Artemisium into Greece: and that when those of Eubaa besought them to tarry still a while, untill such time as they might take order how to bestow their Wives, Children and Family, they were nothing moved at their prayers, nor gave any ear unto them, untill fuch time as Themistocles took a piece of mony of them, and parted the same between Emybiades and Adimantus the Pretor or Captain of the Corinthians. And then they flayed longer, and fought a navall battell with the Barbarians. And verily Pindarus the Poet, albeit he was not of any confederate City, but of that which was fufpected and accused to hold of the Medians fide, yet when he had occasion to make mention of the battell at Artemisium, brake forth into this exclamation :

This is the place where Athens youth, Jone time as writers Jay, Did with their blood, of liberty the glorious groundwork lay.

But Herodotus contrariwise, by whom some give out that Greece hath been graced and adorned, writeth that the faid victory was an act of corruption, bribery and meer thefi, and that the Greeks fought against their wills, as being bought and fold by their Captains, who took money therefore Neither is here an end of his malice. For all men in manner do acknowledge and confes, that the Orecks having gotten the upperhand in Sea fight upon this coast, yet abandoned the cape Ariemisium, and yielded is to the Barbarians, upon the news that they heard of the overthrow received at Thermopyle. For it had been no boot, nor to any purpose, for to have sitten fill there, and kept the Sea for the be-hoof of Greece, considering that now the War was hard at their doors within those streighte, and Xerxes, Master of all the Avenies. But Herodotus seigneth, that the Greeks, before they were adver-tised of Leontidas death, held a counsel, and were in deliberation to sly. For these be his words, Being in great diffres (quoth he) and the Athenians especially, who had many of theirships, even the one half of their sleer, shrewdly brused and shaken, they were in consultation to take their slight into Greece. But lee us permit him thus to name or to reproach rather this retreat of theirs before the battel: but he termed it before, a flight: And now at this present he calleth it a flight; and hereaster he will give it the name of flight, so bitterly is he bent to use this vile word, Flight. But (quoth he) there came to the Barbarians presently after this, in a Bark or light Pinnace a man of Estica, who adwertifed them, how the Greeks had quit the cape Artenifum and were fled: which because they could not believe, they kept the Messenger in Ward and safe cushody, and thereupon put forth certain swift foils in espial to discover the truth. What say you Herodojus? What is it you write? That they sled as vanquilhed, whom their very enemies themselves, after the battel, could not believe that they fled; as supposing them to have had the better hand a great deal? And deserveth this man to have credit given him, when he writeth of one particular person, or of one City apara by it self, who in one bare word, spoileth all Greece of the victory? He overthroweth and demolisheth the very Trophec and Monument, that all Greece erected. He abolifacth those Titles and Inscriptions, which they set up in the honor of Diana, on the East side of Artemisium, calling all this but pride and vain-glory. And as for the Epigram, it ran to this effect :

From Alia Land, all forts of Nations stout, When Athens Touth, sometime in natual fight Had vanquished, and all these coasts about Disperts their steet; and therewish put to stight And stain the host of Medes: Lo here in sight What Monuments to the with due respect, Diana Viries to use a the didness.

Diana Virgin pure, they did erest.

He described not the order of the Battels, and how the Greeks were ranged, neither hath he shewed what place every Givy of theirs held, during this terrible fight at Sea: But in that retreat of their fleet, which het earmeth a flight, he faith, that the Corinthians failed formosh, and the Athenians hindmost: he should not then have thus trodden under foot, and insulted too much over those Greeks, who took part with the Medes: He (I say) who by others is thought to be a Thurian born, and reckoneth himfelf in the number of the Halicernaffeans, and they verily being defeended from the Dorians, come with their wives and children to make wat against the Greeks. But this man is so far off from naming and alleging before the streights and necessities whereto those States were driven, who sided with the Medians, that he reporteth thus much of the Medians, how notwithstanding the Phoceans were their capital Enemies, yet they fart unto them aforchand, that they would foare their Countrey, without doing any harm or damage unto it, if they might receive from them as a reward, fitty talents of filver. And this wrote he as touching the Phoczans in these very terms: The Phoczans (quoth he) were the onely men who in these quarters sided not with the Medians, for no other cause, as I finde upon mature consideration, but in regard of the hatred which they bare against the Thessalians: for if the Thessalians had been affected to the Greeks, I suppose the Phocaeans would have turned to the Medes. And yet a little after, himself will say, that thirteen Cities of the Phoceans were seton fire, and burnt to ashes by the Barbarian King, their Countrey laid waste, the Temple within the City Abes confumed with fire, their men and women both put to the fword, as many as could not gain the top of the Mount Parnassus: Nevertheless, he rangeth them in the number of those that most aff. Ctionately took part with the Barbarians, who indeed, chose rather to endure all extremities and miferies that war may bring, than to abandon the defence and maintenance of the honor of Greece. And being not able to reprove the men for any deeds committed, he buffed his brains to devile false imputations, forging and framing with his pen divers firmiles and fulpicions against them, not willing that their intentions should be judged by their acts, if they had not been of the same minde and affection with the Thessalians, as if they would have renounced the Treason, because kheir Countrey was already seized by others. If then a man, who would go about to excuse the Thessalians for fiding with the Medes, should fay, that they were not willing thereto, but for the hatred which they bare unto the Phocasins, feeing them adhere and allied to the Greeks, therefore they took the contrary fide, and clave to the Medes, even against their will and judgement: might not he seem to be an excegious slatterer, who thus in favor of others, searching honest pretences to colour and cover foul facts, perverteth the truth ? Yes verily, as I think. How then can it otherwise be, but that he shall be taken for a plain Sycophant, who faith, that the Phoceam followed not the better for vertue, but because they knew the Thessalians were of a contrary minde and judgement? For he doth not turn and father this flander and calumniation upon others, as his manner is elsewhere to do, saying, that he heard by, &c. but he affirmeth, that in conferring all things together, himself found no other occasion thereof. He ought then to have alledged withal, his presumptions and proofs; whereby he was perswaded, that they who perform all actions semblable to the best, are yet in will and intention all one with the worft. For the occasion which he alledgeth, to wit, Enmity, is frivolous, and to be laughed at, because neither the enmity that was between those of Egina and the Athenians; nor that which the Chalcidians bare against the Eretrians; nor the Corinthians against the Megarians; was a bar to empeach them for joyning together in the League of Greece, for the defence of common liberty: like as on the contrary fide, the Macedonians most bitter and mortal enemies unto the Thef. falonians, and those who plagued them most, diverted them not from the confederacy and alliance with the Barbarians. For the publique peril, covered and hid their private quarrels : infomuch as abandoning and banishing their passions, they gave their consent, either to honesty for vertue, or to profit for necessity. And yet beside this necessity, wherewith they found themselves overtaken, yea, And forced to submit themselves to the Medes, they returned again to the Greeks side: and hereof Legerates the Spartan, giveth direct testimony in their behalf. Yea, and Herodoms himself being forced and compelled thereto, confessed in the description of the affairs that passed at Plates, that the Phocians sided with the Greeks. And no marvel is it, if he be so rough and violent with such as have been infortunate; when as, even those who were present in the action, and hazarded their whole chate for the good of the Common-wealth, he transposeth into the rank of Enemies and Traytors, For the men of Naxas sent three Galleys or Ships of war to syd the Barbarians in their service; but one of the Captains of those vessels, named Democritus, perswaded his other two fellows, to turn, and range rather on the Greeks fide. See how he cannot for his life, praife, but he must wishal difpraise: but look when some paraicular person is commended, he must needs by and by condemn a whole City and Nation : Witness hereof, among ancient Writers, Hellanicus, and of our modern Authors. Ephorus: for the one faith, that the Naxians came to fuccour the Greeks with fix Galleys, and the other faith with five: yea, and Herodotus himself is convinced to have seigned and fallified this: For the particular Chroniclers of the Naxians write, that before time they had repulfed Megabeies the Lieutenant of the Kings, who with two hundred fail arrived at their ifle, and there rid at anchor: Afterwards drave away Datis another General of his, who as he paffad by, burnt their Cirics. And if it be fo as Herodotus faith elfewhere, that they themselves destroyed their City, by fetting it on fire, but the people faved themselves, by flying into the Mountains, had they good cause to fend and unto those, who were the cause of the ruine and destruction of their own Countrey, and not to joyn with them who fought for the common liberty? But that it was not so much to praise Democritus, as to blame the Naxians, that he devised this lye, he sheweth evidently by this, that he concealeth and omitteth to fpeak of the valiant feats of Arms, which at that time Captain Democritus exploited, according as Simonides shewed by this Epigram,

Democritus in the third place gave the charge with all his might, What time as Greek, nere Salamis, with Medes at Sea did fight; Five hips of enemies be took; a fixth there chanc' do be, One of the Greek; in Barbareus hands, and that recovered he

But why should any man be angry with him about the Naxians? For if there be any Antipoder, at some say there are, who dwell in the other Hemisphere, and go opposite unto us, I suppose that they also have heard of Themistocles, and the counsel that he gave unto the Greeks for to fight a naval Butel before Salamis, who afterwards caused a Temple to be built in the Isle of Melite, unto Diana the wife Counsellor, after that the Barbarous King was discomfited. Now this kinde and gentle Chronicler of ours, refusing as much as lieth in him to avow this exploit, and to transfer the glory thereof unto another, writeth exprelly thus, When things flood upon these terms, as Themisleoles went about into his own Galley, there was a Citizen of Athens named Mnessphilus, who demanded of him what they had refolved upon in their Council? And when he heard that concluded it was, to retire with their fleet unto Ilibmus, or the Streighte, there to fight a Battel at Sea even before Peloponnesus: l'ay unto you (quoth he) again, that if they remove the Navy from Salamis, you shall never fight more upon the Sca for any Countrey of your own: for every man will prefently return home to his own City. And therefore if there be any device and means in the world, go your ways and endeavor to break this refolution, and if it be possible, deal so with Eurybiades, that he may change his minde, and tarry here still: And a little after, when he had faid that this advice pleased Themistocles wondrous much, and that without making any answers all, he went directly to Europiades; he writest again in these very terms:

And fitting neer unto him, he relatest what counsel he had heard Mnosphilus to give, taking it upon himself, and addeth more things besides. Thus see you not how in some fort he brings Themistocles unto an ill name and opinion of lewdness, in that he attributeth unto himself a counsel which was none of his own, but the invention of Mnesiphilus? And afterwards deriding still the Greeks more and more, he faith, that Themistocles was no such wife man, as to see what was good and expedient, but failed in his forelighe, notwithstanding that for his prudence and cunning he cartied the firname of Ulyffes. Marry, Lady Artemifia born in the fame City that Herodotus, without prompting cr teaching of any person, but even of her own head, foretold Xerxes, that the Greeks could not hold out long, nor make head against him, but would disband and disperse themselves, and every one fly home unto his own City: Neither it is like (quoth she) if you march with your Army by Land un-to Peloponnesus, that they will be quiet and sit still, and take no care to sight as Sea for the Arhenians: Whereas, Sir, if you make hafte to give them a naval barrel, I fear me greatly that if your Armada receive any foil or damage, it will greatly prejudice your Land Forces. But here Herodotus wanted nothing but his Prophetical verses, to make Artemisia another Sibylla, prophesying of things to come so exactly. Well, in regard of this advertisement, Xerxes gave her commission to carry his children with her to the City of Ephefus: for he had forgotten belike, to bring any women with him from his Royal City of Sufa, in case his children needed a convoy of women to conduct them. But I make no account of fuch lies as these which he hath devised against us : yet let us onely examine a little what slanders he hath raifed upon others. He faith that the Athenians give out, how Adimantus the Captain of the Corinthians, when the enemies were at the point of giving the charge, and joyning battel, in great fear and aftonishment fled, not by shoving the ship backward at the poop by little and little after a fost manner of retreat, nor yet making way of evalion, and escape closely and with silence through his ene-mics; but holsing up, and spreading sull fail, and turning the processed beak heads about of all his vesfels at once. And then there was a Frigot or fwift Pinnace fent out after him, which overtook him about the coasts of Salamis, out of which one cryed unto him, What Adimantus, do you fly indeed, and have you abandoned and betrayed the Greeks? And yet they have the better hand, according as they made their prayers unto the gods for to vanquish their enemi s. Now this Frigot, we must think verily came down from heaven: for what need had he to use any such Tragick Engine or Fabrick, so work such seats, who every where else surpasses all the Poets Tragical in the world, for lying and vanity. Well, Adimantus believing the said voyce, was reclaimed and returned again to the Armada, when all was done, and the business dispatched by others to his hands. Thus goes the bruit and speech among the Athenians. But the Corinthians confess not so much, faying, that they themselves were the formost who in the vaward gave the first onset, and charged the enen ites in this battel at sea: and on their fide bear witness all the other Greeks. And thus dealeth this man in many other places : He soweth flinders here and there upon one or other to the end that he may not mife, but light upon fome, fall it out as it will, who may appear most wicked. Like as in this place he speedeth very well in his purpose. For if his flander and accusation be believed, the Corinthians shall sustain infamy; if discredited, the Athenians shall bear the dishonor: or if the Athenians have not lyed upon the Corinthians, yet himfelf hath spared neither of them, but told a lye of them both. For proof hereof, Thucydides, who bringeth in an Ambassador of Athens, to contest against a Corinthian at Lacedemon, and speak bravely of their own worthy exploits against the Medes, and namely, of the naval battel of Salamis, chargeth upon the Corinthians no matter of treason nor cowardize in abandoning their colours; for there is no liklihood, that the Athenians would have reproached the City of Corinth in fuch terms, confidering that they faw it engraven in the third place after the Lacedemonians, and those Inscriptions of Spoils which they won from the Barbarians, were consecrated to the gods. And at & alamis, they permitted them to inter and bury their dead neer to the City lide, as who were brave Warriors, and had born themselves most valiantly in that service, with an Inscription in Elegick Verses to this ef-

Once (paffenger) we dwelt in Corinch Town,
Well watered with Sea on either fide:
And now our bones this life of renown,
Hight Salamia, within dry mould doth hide:
Phoenician Ships were funk, that here did ride:
The Medes fo front we flew and Perfians brave,
That facred Greece from bondage we might fave.

But their Cenotaph or imaginary Tomb which was erected in Ijthmus, carrieth this Epituph:

Lobere welve, who with our lives fet free

All Greece, neer brought to shameful slavery.

Likewife over the offerings which Diodorus one of the Captains of the Corinthian Galleys, caused to be fet up in the Temple of Latona, there was this Superfeription:

From cruel Medes, these arms which hang in sight, The Mariners of Theodorus won:

And as memorial of their naval fight,

To Dame Latona offered them anon.

Adimentus himself, whom Herodotus evermore doth revise and reproach, saying, That he alone of all the Captains, went away with a full purpose to sty from Artemissium, and would not stay until the consists: see what honor he had?

Friend Passenger, here lies Sir Adimant Entombed, by whose prowest valiant All Greece is crown d with freedom at this day, Which else had been to thraldome brought for ay For neither is it like that such honor should have been done unto him after his death, if he had been a Coward and a Traytor; neither would he ever have dared to name one of his daughters Nauspinie, that is to say, Victory in Battel at Sea; a another, Acroshinion, which is as much, as the First-fruits of Spoils won from enemies; and a third, Alexibia, that is to say, Ayd against Force; also, to give unto his son the name of Aristeus, which signifieth a brave Warrior: if he had not won some glory and reputation by worthy seas of Arms. Moreover, it is not credible, I will not say, that Heredous, but the meanest and most obscure Carian that is, was ignorant of that glorious and memorable prayer which in those days the Coninchian Dames alone, of all other Grecian wives made. That it might please the Goddets Yenus to inspire their husbands with the love and defire to give batted unto the Barbarian. For this was a thing commonly known and divulged abroad, infomuch as Simonides made an Epigram For this was a thing commonly known and divulged abroad, infomuch as Simonides made an Epigram sengraven over those their Images of brass, which are set up in the Temple of Yenus, which by report was sounded in times pathly Medea, as some say, to this end, that she herself might cease to love her husband; but an others, that Jason her husband might give over the love of one Their. And the said Epigram goeth in this manner:

These Ladies here, whose Statues stand in place, Did whilm prapers to Goddes I Venus make, In Greek, behalf; that it might plees for grace Them to incite, the Wars to undertake. Dame Venus them, for those good womens sake To Median Archers export a net as a present the Greeks, nor would their Citadel betray.

Such matters as thefe, he should have written and made mention of, rather than inserted into his History, how Aminocles killed his own fon. Over and besides, after he had satisfied himself to the full with most impudent imputations which he charged upon Themistocles, accusing him, that he ceased not secretly to rob and spoil the lifes, without the knowledge of the other Captains joyned in Commission with him 3 in the end, taketh from the Ath nians the crown of principal valiance, and fettethit upon the head of the Ægincts, writing thus, The Greeks having fent the first-fruits of their froils and pillage unto the Temple at Delphos, demanded of Apallo in general, whether he had fufficient, and Rood content with that portion of the booty : unto whom he answered, that of all other Greeks, he had received enough, and wherewith he was well pleased : But of the Æginets not so; at whose hands he required the chief prize and honor of provels, which they won at the battel of Salamis. Thus you ne required the enter prize and motor of provides, which they won at the dates of salamis. I must you feelth fathereth not upon the Scythians, the Perfians, or Egyptians his lying tale, which he coggeth and deviteth, as £6p dosh upon Crows, Ravens and Apes; but he ufeth the vary perfon of god Apollo Pythius, for so disappoint and deprive the Athenians of the first place in honor, at the battel of Sa-Lamis; as alfo Temificeles of the fecond, which was adjudged unto him at Iffamus, or the Streights of Pelopounefus; for that each Captain there, attributed the highest degree of prowers to himself, and the next unto him: and thus the judgement hereof growing to an end and conclusion, byracion of the ambitton of the faid Captains, he faith, All the Greeks weighed anchor and departed, as not being willing to confer upon Tkemifocks the foveraign honor of the victory. And in his ninth and laif Book, having nothing left to wreak his teen upon, and to discharge his malicious and splightful stomack, but onely the Lacedemonians, and their excellent piece of service which they performed against the Barbarians before the City of Plates, he writeth, That the Lacedemonians, who aforetime feared greatly that the Athenium being follicited and perfunded by Mardonius, would forfake all other Greeks:

Ambaffadors of the Artenians, and holding them off with delays, and not giving them their diffracts. And how is it then, that there went to Platee a thousand and five Spartans, having every one of them feven llotes about him, for the guard of his person? How is it (I fay) that they taking upon them the adventure of fo great a peril, vanuuished and discomfitted so many thousands of Barbarians? But hearken what a probable cause he allegeth: There was (quoth he) by chance, a man at Sparts, named Chileus, who came from Tegea thicher, and sojoyned there, for that among the Ephori he had fome friends, as between whom and him there was mutual Hospitality: He it was who perswaded them to bring their Forces into the field, thewing unto them that the Bulwark and Wall for the defence of Peloponnesus, would serve in small stead or none, if the Athenians joyned once with Mardonius; and this was it that drew Pausanias forth with his power to Platea; fo that if some particular bufines haply had kept Chileus at home ftill in Teges, Greece had never gotten the victory. Again, not keowing another time what to do with the Athenians: one while he extolleth their City on high, and another while he debaseth it as low, tolling it to and tro, saying, that being in question about the second place of honor with the Tegeats, they made mention of the Heraclidz, alleging their valiant acts, which piace or nonor with the Legeauseup made mention of the cereactions attegring their variant accounted before eitine they had archive ed against the Amezoner: the Sepaltures also of the Peloponner ins, who dyed under the very walls of the Castle Gadmas; and finally, that they went down to Marathon vauning gloriously in words, and taking great joy that they had the conduct of the left wing or point of the Battel. Also a little after, he putteth down, that Paulanias and the Spartans willingly yielded the superiority of command to them, unddefired them to take the charge of the right wing them felves, to the end they might confront the Perfiants, and give them the left : as if they had excused themselves by their disuse, in thet they were wont to encounter with the Barbariasn. And verily, albeit this is a meer mockery, to fay, that they were unwilling to deal with those enemies, who were not accusiomed to fight with them: yet he faith moreover, that all the other Greeks, when their Captains led them into another place for to encamp in, so foon as ever their Standards marched and advanced forward. The Horsemen (quoth he) in general fled, and would willingly have put them selves within the City Plates, but they fled indeed as far as to the Temple of Juno. Wherein he accuse hall the Greeks together of disobedience, cowardiz; and treason. Finally, he writeth, that there were none but the Lacedemonians and the Tegesta who charged the Burbarians; nor any besides the Athenians, who fought withthe Thebans depriving all other Citiesequally of their part in the glory of that so noble an exploit: for that there was not one of them who laid hand to work, but titting all filll, or leaning upon their weapons hard by, abandoned and betrayed in the mean time, withough long ought, those who fought for their safety, until that the Phliasians, and the Megarians, though long it were first, hearing that Pausains had the upperhand, ran in with more hale than good speed, and falling upon the Cavalry of the Thebans, where they were presently defeated and film, without any great ado. But the Corinthians (quoth he) ware not at this fray, but after the vistory, keeping above on high ground among the Mountains, by that means men not with the Thebans Horsemen. For the Cavalry of the Thebans, seeing the Barbarians to fly all in a rout, put themselves forth before them, to make them way, and by this means very afficiancely salitied them in their slight, and all in recompence, and by way of thanksgiving, forsooth (for soyou must take it) of those marks which were given them in their faces, within the Streight of Themsolies. But in whatrank and place of this battel the Corinthians were ranged, and how they did their devoit, and quit themselves against the Barbarians before Plates, you may know by that which Simonides writeth

Amid the bost arranged stood, and in the battel main, Those who inhabit Ephyra, water'd with many a vain Of lively springs: Men who in feats of Martial Arms excel: And joynt with them, they that in old Sir Glaucus City dwell, Fair Corinth bight: and thefe their deed of promoss to express, Aftately gift of precious gold, did afterwards address, And confecrate to gods above in beavens : and by the fame Much amplified their own renown, and their forefathers fame,

For this he wrote of them, not by way of a Scholaftical exercise, as if he taught a School in Corinh 5 nor as one who of purpose made a Song or Balad in praise of the City, but as a Chronicler penning the History of these affairs in Elegiack verses to that effect. But this Writer here of ours, preven eth the conviction of a loudlye, left he might be taken therewith, by those that should demand of him in this manner, How cometh it then to pals, that there be fo many Sepulchres, Tombs, Graves, and Monuments of the dead, upon which the Plateans even to this day do folemnly celebrate the Anniversary Effusions, to the Ghosts and Souls of those that are departed, in the presence of other Greeks assistant with them? And verily in mine opinion, he seemeth yet more shamefully to charge these Nations with the crime of Treason, in these words following, And these Sepultures or places of burial which are feen about Plates, those I mean, which their posterity and successors, being assumed of this foul fault, that their Progenitors were not at this battel, or came too late, cast up, and raised on high, every man for his part in general, for the posterity sake. As for Herrdotus, he is the onely man of all others who hath heard of this absence from the battel, which is reputed Treason: But Paulanias Ariftides, the Lacedemonians and the Athenians, never knew of those Greeks who made default, and would not be at this dangerous conflia: And yet the Athenians neither impeached the Æginetes, though they were their adversaries, that they were not comprized within the inscription, nor yet charged and convinced the Corinthians for flying from the battel at Salawis, confidering that Gregor beareth witness against them. And verily as Herodotus himself doth testific, ten years after this war of the Medes, Cleadas a Citizen of Plates, to gratifie iand pleasure the Æginetes as a friend, raised a great Mount bearing their name, as if they had been interred therein. What ailed then the Lacedemonians and Athenians, or what moved them, being so jealous one of another about this glory as they were, that they had like to have gone together by the care prefently upon the exploit performed, for erecting of a Trophee or Monument of Victory, not to deprive them of the price of honor, who upon cowardly fear were either away or elfe fled from the fervice, but to fuffer their names to be writen upon the Trophees, Coloffes and Gyant-like flatues erected in memorial of them, allowing them their part in the spoils and pillage, yea, and in the end causing this Epigram or Superscription to be engraven upon a publik Altar ?

The Greeks in fign of noble victory,
Which they sometimes wan of the Perfians host,
And to retain the thankful memory
That they them drave away from Grecian coast,
(So resolute they were or elfe all had been lost)
This common Altar built to Jupiter Surnamed hereupon Deliverer.

How now Herodatus, was it Cleades, or some other, I pray you, who in flattery of the Greeks, made this Epigram or Inscription? What need had they then to take such pains and trouble themselves in digging the ground in vain, and by casting up earth raise such Mounts and Monnments for the age to come, when as they might see their glory conscreted and immortalized in these most conspicuous and famous mensorials, dedicated to the honor of the gods? And verily Pausanias, when as he intended, as men say, to usurp Tyrannical Government, in a certain oblation which he offered in the Temple of Apollo at Delphoi, set this Inscription;

Paulanias the Captain General
Of all the Greeks, when he had conquered
The Medes in fight, for a memorial
This Monument to Phochus offered.

And albeit in some forthe communicated the glory of this execution with the Greeks, whose soveraign Captain he termed himself, yet the Greeks being not able to endure it, but utterly milliking him therefore, the Lacedemonians above the reft sent their Ambassadors unto Delphos, and caused the faid Episors, the Lacedemonians above the reft sent their Ambassadors unto Delphos, and caused the faid Episors to be cut out with a chizzel, and in lieuthereof, the names of the Cities, as good reason was, to beengraven: And yet what likelihood is there, that either the Greeks should take offence and discontentment for being lest out in this Instription, in case they were culpable, and privy to themselves, that they were not with others at the battel? or the Lacedemonians when they reaced out and defaced the name of their General and Chief Commander, cause to be written and engraved their names, who had for saken and left them in the midft of danger? For this were a manisest indignity, and most absurded if when Sochares, Deiphijsus, and all those that performed the best service in that journey, never grieved in or complained that the Cythnians and Melians had their names recorded in those Trophese, Heredons in attributing the honor of this bartel unto three Cities onely, should dash all others out, and not suffice theirnames to stand upon any Trophies or Consecrated Places. For whereas there were sour battels given their unto the Barbarians, he saith, that the Greeks sed from the Cape Artemssum: And at the Pass or Streights of Thermopsles, whiles their King and Soveraign Captain exposed himself to the heavard of his Streights of Thermopsles, whiles their King and Soveraign Captain exposed himself to the heavard of his life, they kept themselves color as home, and sate still, taking no chought for the matter, but solemnized their Olympick Games and Carnian Feats.

Moreover, when he cometh to describe the battel at Salamis, he speaketh so much of Artemisia, that hespendeth not so many words again, in all the narration of that naval battel, and the issue thereof. Finally, astouching the journey of Plates, he faith, that all other Greeks, fitting idly at their cafe, knew nothing of the field fought, before all was done, according as Pigres Artimifius being pleasantly disposed to jest, writteh merrily in verse, that there was a battel between Frogs and Mice, wherein they were agreed to keep filence, and make no noise all the while they fought: to the end that no others might take any knowledge thereof: alfo, that the Lacedemonians were no better Warriors, nor more valiant than the Barbarians: But their hap was to defeat and vanquish them, because they were naked men, and distarmed: For Xerxes himself being present in person, if they had not been followed with whips, and scourged forward, had never been able to have made them fight with the Greeks; marry, in this journey of Platee, having changed their hearts and courages (for needs it must be fo) they were nothing inferior in boldness of hears, strength of body, and resolution, to the Greeks; but it was the apparel, which wanting arms upon it, hurt them so much, and marred all, for being themselves lightly appointed, and in manner naked, they had to deal with the Lacedemonians that were heavily armed at all pieces. What honor then, or great matter of glory could redound unto the Greeks out of these four battels, in case it be so that the Lacedemonians encountred naked and unarmed men? And for the other Greeks, although they were in those partupresent, yet if they knew not of the combats, until the service was done to their hauds; and if the Tombs honored yeerly by the several Cities beautil the service was loneine to them, be empty, and mockeries onely of Monuments and Sepulchres; and if the Trevett and Aleare ercerd before the gods, be full of falle Titles and Infections; and Herodotus onely knew the truth; and all men in the world besides, who have heard of the Greeks, were quite deceived by the honorable name and opinion that went of them for their singular prowess and admirable vertue; what is there then to be thought or faid of Heredotus? Surely that he is an excellent Writer, and depainteth things to the life: he is a fine man; he hath an eloquent tongue; his Discourses are full of grace, they are pleafant, beautiful, and artificial: And as it was faid of a Poet or Musician in telling his tale; how ever he hath pronounced his Narration and History not with Knowledge and Learning, yet furely he hath done it elegantly, smoothly, and with an audible and clear voyce, And thefe, I wis, be the things that move delight, and do affect all that read him. But like as among rofes we must beware of the venimous Flies Cantharides: even so we ought to take heed of detractions and backbiting of his base penning likewise of things deserving great praise, which infinuate themselves and creep under his smooth stile, polithed phrase, and figurative speches: to the end, that ere we be aware, we intertain not, nor softer in our heads, salse conceits and at surd opinions of the bravest men, and noblest Cities of Greece.

Of Musick.

A Dialogue.

The Persons therein discoursing, Onesicrates, Soterichus, Lysias.

This Treatife, little or nothing at all concerneth the Musick of many Voyces according and interlaced together, which is in use and request at this day; but rather appertaineth to the ancient fashion, which consisteth in the accord and consonance of Song with the sense and measure of the letter, as also with the good grace of gesture: And by the stile and manner of writing, it seemeth not to be of Plutarchs doing.

He wife of that good man Phocion, was wont to fay, that the jewels and ornaments wherein firjoyed, were those firatagems and worthy feats of Arms which her husband Phocion had atchieved: but I for my part may well and truly avouch, that the ornaments not onely of my felf in particular, but also of all my friends and kinsfolk in general, is the diligence of my Schoolmafter, and his affiction in teaching me good Literature. For this we know full well, that the nobleft exploits, and braveft pieces of service performed by great Generals and Captains in the field, can do no more but onely fave from prefent peril or imminent danger, fome finall Army, or fome one City, or haply at the most, one entire Nation and Countrey; but are not able to make either their Souldiers or Citizens, or their Countreymen, better in any respect : whereas on the other fide, good erudition and learning, being the very substance indeed of felicity, and the efficient cause of prudence and wisdom, is found to be good and profitable, not onely to one Family, City and Nation, but geherally to all mankinde. By how much therefore the profit and commodity enfuing upon knowledge and good letters, is greater than that which proceedeth from all stratagems or mirtial feats; by fo much is the remembrance and relation thereof more worthy and commendable. Now it fortuned not long fince, that our gentle friend Oneficrates invited unto a feast in his house, the second day of the Saturnal Solemnities, certain persons very expert and skilful in Musick, and among the rest, Soterichus of Alexandria, and Lysias, one of those who received a pension from him: And after the ordinary ceremonies and complements of fuch Feafts were performed, he began to make a speech unto his company after this manner! My good friends (quoth he) I suppose, that it would not bessen a Feast or Banquet, to search at this time what is the efficient cause of Mans Voyce; for, a question it is, that would require better leisure, and more sobriety: but for a such as the best Grammarians define Voice to be the beating or percussion of the ayr, perceptible unto the sense of hearing, and because that vefterday we enquired and disputed as touching Grammar, and found it to be an Art making profession and very meet, to frame and shape Voyces according to lines and letters, yea, and to lay them up in writing, as in the Treasury and Store-house of Memory; let us now see what is the second Science next to it, that is meet and agreeable to the Voyce: and this I take to be Musick. For a devout and religious thing it is, yea, and a principal duty belonging unto men, for to fing the praifes of the gods, who have beflowed upon them alone this gift of a diffinet and articulate Voyce: which Honer allo by his testimony hath declared in these Verses.

Then all do hose the Grecian youth in fongs metodious, in fongs metodious, Befongto god Phechus of his grace, to be propitious:

They chant and praise, who takes great joy, so hear field barmony.

Go to therefore my matters, you that are professed Musicians, relate unto this good company here that are your friends, who was the first inventor of Musicks what it is that time hath added unto it afterwards who they were that became famous by the exercise and profession of this Science; as also, to how many things, and to what, is the faid fludy and practice profitable. Thus much as southing that which On ficrates our Master moved and propounded; whereupon Lysias inferred again, and said, You demand a question, good Onesicrates, which hath already been handled and discussed : for the most part of the Platonique Philosophers, and the best fort of the Peripateticks, have employed themselver in the writing of the ancient Mulick, and of the corruption that in time crept into it. The best Grammarians also, and most cunning Musicians, have taken great pains, and travelled much in this argument; rians allo, and most confining manifesting state taxon given pains and yet there is no small discord and jar among them, as harmonical otherwise as they be about these points. Heraelide in his Breviary, wherein he hath collected together all the excellent Professor of Musick, written that Amphion devised first the manner of singing to the Lute or Culturn, as also, the Citharzdian Poefics for being the fon of Antiope and Jupites, his father taught him that skill.

And this may be proved true, by an old evidence or record enrolled, and diligently kept in the City Siegore, wherein he nameth certain Priestesses in Arges, as also Poets and Musicians. In the fare age, he faith, there lived Linus also of Eubaa, who composed certain lamentable and doleful Ditties; Anthes likewise of Anthedon in Baotia, who made Hymns; and Pierius born in Pieria, who wrote Poems upon the Muses: he maketh mention besides of Philammon a Delphian, who reduced into Songs and Canticles the nativity of Latona, Diana, and Apollo; and he it was who inflitted first the Quires and Dances about the Temple of Apollo in Delphos. And as for Thanyris a Thracian born, he reporteth, that of all men living in those days, he had the sweetest breast, and fung most melodiously, infornuch as if we may believe Poets, he challenged the Mules, and contended with them in finging. It is written moreover, thas this Thampris compiled in verse the War of the Titans against the gods; as also, that Demodocus of Corcyra was an ancient Musician, who endited a Poem of the destruction of Trey, and the mariage between Venus and Vulcan: Semblably, that Phemius of Ithaca, wrote in verse of the return of those Greeks from Troy, who came home again with Agamenmon. Furthermore, it is faid, that the file of those Poems abovefaid, was not loofe, and in profe, without metrical numbers, hut like unto that of Stefichorus, and other old Poets, and Song-makers, who first made naked Ditties in Verse, and afterwards arrayed them with musical Tunes and Notes: for the same Author reporteth, that Terpander a maker of Songs, with Notes and Measures, to be sung unto the Lute or Cithern, according to each Law and Rule of the faid measures, adorned both his own Verses, and those of Homer also, with harmonical Tunes, and fung them accordingly at the solemn games, wherein Mulicians fing one against the other for the prize he affirment likewise, that the fame Inpander was the first who imposed names and terms to those Tunes which are to be fing to the foresaid ftringed instruments; and in imitation of Terpander, Clonas first composed Songe and Set-tunce to the Flute and other winds instruments, as also the Prosodies and Sonets sung at the entry of sacrifices, and that he was a Poet who made Elegiack and Hexameter Verses; also, that Polymuejtus the Colophonian, who came after him, used likewise the same Poems. Now the M:trical Laws and Songs in meafures, called in Greek Nopes, which these Poets and Musicians used to the Pipe, were termed (good Oneficrates) in this fort, namely Apothetos, Elegi, Comarchios, Schemion, Cepion, Dies and Yrmeles; but in process of time, were devised others beside, called Polymenstia. As for the Musical Laws on Tunes to be fung unto the firinged instrument, they were invented long time before those other belonging to Pipes, by Terpander ; for he beforetime named those of the ftringed instruments, Baotius, Eslius, Trocheus, Oxys, Cepion, Terpandrios and Tetraudios. Furthermore, the faid Terpander made certain Process, or voluntary Songs to the Lute, in Verfe. Now, that Songs or Ditties to be fung unto stringed instruments, were composed in old time of Hexameter Verses, Timotheus giveth us to understand; for mingling the first metrical rules in his Verses, he sung the Dithyrambick Ditty, to the erritants to the might not feen immediately at the first, to break the Laws of the ancient Musick. This end, that he might not feen immediately at the first, to break the Laws of the ancient Musick. This Terpander feemeth to have been excellent in the art of playing upon the Lute, and finging to it; for we finde upon record in ancient Tables written, that four times together, one after another, he carried the prize away at the Pythian Games: and no doubt, of great antiquity he was. Certes, Glancus the Italian Writer, will have him to be more ancient then Archilochus; for fo he writeth in a certain Treatife as touching the old Poets and Musicians, faying, that he followed in the second place after those who inflituted first Songs unto the Flute and other Pipes. And Alexander in his Breviary of the Poets and Musicians of Phrygia, recordeth Olympus to be the first man who brought into Greece the feat and skill of striking the strings of instruments, and besides, those that are called Idei Dallyli. But Hyagnis was the first by his faying, who played upon Pipes: after him, his son Marsyas, and then Olympus: alfo, that Terpander imitated Homer in Versee, and Orpheus in Song : as for Orpheus, it should fcem, that he imitated none, confidering that before him there was not one, but those Poers who made Ditties and Songs to Pipes, wherewith the works of Orpheus have no refemblance at all. Touching this Clonas a Composer of Songs and Tunes for the Pipe, who lived somewhat after the time of Terpander, he was a Tegewan born, as the Arcadians fay, or rather as the Bootians give out, a Theban. After Terpander and Clonas, Archilochus is ranged in a third place, howfoever other Chroniclers write, that Ardalus the Treezenian ordained the Musick of Pipes before Clonas, as also, that there was one Polymuestus a Poet, the son of Meles a Colophonian, who made those Tunes and Songe which carry the name of Polymnestos and Polymneste. True it is, that those who compiled the Tables and Records of Musicians, make mention that Clonas devised these two Songs or Tunes named Apothesis, and Schemios. And as for the above named Polymorshus, Pindaras and Alexans, both Song-makers, made mention of him; and they report besides, that old Polimorson Delphos composed some of those Songs and Tunes to the Lute and Harp, which he attributed unto Terpander. In summ, the Song and Musick to the Lute and Harp, devised by Terpander, continued very plain and simple; unto the clayes of Phymis: for in old time, it was not lawfull to sing voluntary, as now they do at their pleasure, to it ringed instruments; nor to transfer either Harmonies or Musicall numbers and measures: for according to every Song and Tune, they kept a proper and peculiar tension or stretching of the firings, which in the reason that they be called Nowa, as one would say Lawa, because it was not lawfull to transgress in any of these Songs or Tunes, that severall kinde of tension and stretching the strings, which was usuall and ordinary. For after that they had performed those Songs which appearant to the pacifying of Gods Wrath, they leapt immediately to the Poetry of Homer and of others, at their pleasure, which may evidently appear, by the Procemes and voluntary Tunes of Terpanders, And verily, about this time, according as Gapion the Scholar of Terpander reporteth, was first formed that manner of Lute or Cithern which was called Asias, for that the Lesbian Minstiels and Musicians, who bordered hard upon Asia, used such form: and it is said, that Perichius was the laif Player upon such an Instrument, who wan the prize at the Camina games at Lacedemy, iot all those who were Lesbians born: after whose death ever after, there sailed in Lesbos, that continuall succession of such Musicians But some there be, who are greatly deceived, to think that Hypponas was of the same time with Terpander: and it seemeth that ever after. Here failed in Lesbos, that continually succession of such missings and it seemeth that ever after.

Having thus declared the old metricall Songs and Tunes joyntly together, of Muficians to firinged Infruments and Pipes, let us turn now to fuch as properly concern those that pertain to player upon Pipes alone: for it is faid, that the above named Olympus being a Player of the Flure and other Pipes, and came out of Phrygia, fet a Song to his inftrument in the honour and praise of Apollo, and the same was called Polycephalus: and by reppore, this Olympus defeended lineally from that first Olympus the Scholar of Marlyas, who composed Ditties, and set Tunes for the worship of the gods: for this Olympus being the Derling of Marlyas, and singularly loved of him, learned likewise of him to play upon the Flute and other Pipes, and by that means brought into Greece those harmonical Tunes and Songs, which as this day the Greeks use at the folemn feafts of the gods. Others are of opinion, that the fore faid Song or Tune Palycephalus, is to be afcribed unto Crates a Scholar of Olympus; but Pratinas writeth, that this Song came from another Olympus of latter time; and as for that other kinde of Song or Tune, named Harmstion, the first Olympus, Disciple to Marsias, by report, composed it. And somethere be who hold, that Marsias was named Masses: others sayno, and that he was called Marsias onely, who though the state of Hyagin, who first devised the art of playing upon the Flute. And that this Ohmpus was the author of the Musick or Tune, named Harmatias, appeareth by the Table or Register of the ancient Poets, collected by Glaucus: and by the same, a man may also learn, that Stefichorus born in Himera, proposed to himself for to imitate, neither Terpander, nor Antilochus, ne yet Thaletse, but Olympus; using altogether the Law of Musick Harmatias, and that form of measure which is according to Datylus: and that, fome fay, arifeth from the loud Mufick called Orthios, but others hold, that it was the invention of the Mylians, for that there were certain ancient Pipers of the Mylians, Moreover, there is another antick Song or Tune, called Cardias, according to which (as Hipponax (aith) Mimnermus played: for at the beginning, the Minstrels and Players of Pipes, sung certain Elegies, reduced into measures and metricall Lawes, which appeareth by the Tables and Registers, that testific what Musicians they were, that contended at the Games of Prize in the festivall Panathenack fol-mnities. Moreover, there was one Sacadas of Argos, a Poet that made Songs and Elegies of Duties. reduced into measures, for to be sung; and reckoned he is among the better fort of Poets, and as it appeareth upon Record in those Registers, he wan the best Game shree times at the Pythian solemnities. And Pindarus himself maketh mention of him. And whereas there be three kinds of Tunes and measures in Musick, according to Polymnestus and Sacadas, to wit, the Phrygian, Dorian, and the Lydian, they fay, that in every one of them Sacadas made a certain Flection or Tune, called Strophe, and taught the Chorus to fing the first according to the Dorian Tune; the second after the Phrygian measures; and the third, to the Lydian Musick: and that this manner of Song was thereupon called Trimeres, by reason of the three changes or parts: Howbeit in the Tables and Registers of the ancient Poers, which are to be feen at Siczone; it is observed and noted, that it was Clongs who deviviled this Melody or Mulick Trimeres. Now the first manner of Mulick, ordained and instituted in the City of Sparta, by Terpander, was in such fort. The second was appointed as it is most generally received, by Thaletas the Gortynian, by Xenedamus the Cytherian, Xenorius the Locrian, Polymn stus the Colophonian, and Sacadas the Argive; as the principall Authors and Directors: for as these were they who inflituted first at Lacedemon the naked Dances called Gymnopedia, fo in Aradia they ordained those that were termed Apodixes; and in Arges the Endymaties. As for Thaletas, Xenodamus, ordained mote than were termed appearans; and refer the Songs of Victory, named Paans: Polymnelius, of the Orthian Canticles; and Sacadas of the Elegies. Others (say, that Xanadassus was the Poet who invented the Songs intituled Hyporchemata, at the found whereof, folke danced at the feafts of the gods: but he deviled not the Pæans aforesaid, as Pratinas did. And even at this day, there is a Sonet extant of this very same Xenodamus, which is evidently Hyporchema; and this kinde of Poefic Pindarus useth. Now that there is a difference between a Paan and an Hyperchema, the works of Pindarus infliciently do flows, for he hath written as well the one as the other. Polymnejius also made Songs and Ditties to the Flute: And in Osthian Canticles, used measures and melody, according as our harmonical Musicians give it out : As for us, we know not the truth, because our Ancients have left pothing in writing thereof. There is some doubt also, whether Thalet as of Candie were a Poet than made Pains: For Glauens in faying, that he was after Archilechus weiteth indeed, that he imitated his Songs; but he extended them farther, and made them longer, inferting the measures Maron and Creticus into his melody, which Archibechus never ufed , nor Orphaus, not wet Terpander: for it is faid. that Thaletes learned this from Olympus his playing and pining, and was reputed a good Poes. As touching Xenoritus of Locres in Italy, it is not yet reformed, and for certain known, that he was a maker of Pzins. Certes, it is confidently faid, that he took for the faibjest matter and argument of his Poefic Heroick deeds, infomuch as, some term his arguments Dichycambes. Glaucus affurerh us, that Thaletar was more anciens than Xenoritus. And Opropus, at Ariflocutus writteth, is repated by Musicians to have been the Inventor of the Musick called Lemantonian; for before his time, all by mentioning to make Diatonique, or Chromstique; and it is conjudured to have here invented in this manner: For Olympus practiting the Diatonique Mufick, and extending his fong sotherwhiles as far as to the note Parhypate Diatonique, sometimes from Paramela, and sometime from Mese, and furpiffing Lichenor Diatonique, observed the sweetness and beauty of such an affiction, and the composition arising of that proportion, and allowing it to be good, inferred at an the Dorian Musick: for he touched nothing of that which properly pertained to the Diatonique or Chromatique kinde, neither melled he with that which concerned harmony. And these were the Organizage of the Edhamiter melled he with that which monique M nick : For first of them they put a Spondens, wherein no division showeth that which is proper, unless a man having an eye unto a vehement Spondialen, will corrictione and fay the fame to be a kinde of Diatonos. But manifeft it is, that he will put a faifity and difford, who thus fletteth it down : A fallity (Ifay) in that it is by one Diefis; next unto the prime; and a difcord or diffonance: for that if a man do fet in the power of Toniæum, that which is proper unto a vehement Spondi-fm, it will fall out that he shall place joyntly together, two Diatoniques, the one simple, and oponism, it was the control of this Enharmonique re-enforced, and coming thick upon the M.fe, which the other compound, for this Enharmonique re-enforced, and coming thick upon the M.fe, which now adays is fo much ulced, feemeth not to be devited by the Poet. Thus may a min foon perceive if he observe and mark one very well, who playeth upon a Pipe after the old manner: For by his good will, the Hemicone in the Mele, will be incompounded. Thus you fee what were the first rudiments and beginnings of Enharmoniques: But afterwards the demi tone, was divided and diftracted as well in Lydian as in Phrygian Mufick: and it seemeth that Olympus hath amplified and augmented Matick, because he brought in that which never yet was found, and whereof his Predecessors all were ignorant; so that he may very well be thought the Greekish and Elegant Musician. Semblably we are to speak of the numbers and measures in Musick called Rhythmi: for devised there were and found out to the reft, certain kindes and special forte of Rhythmi, as also there were those who ordained and inflituted such measures and numbers. For the former innovation of Terpanter, brought one very good form into Musick : Polymneftus after that of Terpander anoth no which he uf d, and yet he adhered alfo to that good form and figure before. Semblably did Thate tas and Sacadas: And these men verily were sufficient in making of these Rhythmi, aud yet departed not from that good and Isudable form: But Crexus, Timotheus, and Philoxenus, and those about their age, were overmuch addicted to new devices, and loved novelties, in affecting that figure which in their days is called Philantaropon, that is to fay, humane; and Thematicon, that is to fay, positive. For antio ity embeaced few firings, implicity also, and gravity of Musick. Thus having according to my said and ability discoursed of the primitive Musick, and of the first Authors who invented it, and by what inventions in process of time it grew to some mean perfection, I will break off my speech, and nake an end, giving leave to our friend Seterichus for to speak in his turn, who is a man not onely well fludied in Musick, and as well practifed therein, but also throughly feen in all other Learning, and Liberal Literature. For mine own part, I am better acquainted with the fingering Mufick and manual practile, than otherwise.

When Lifat had thus faid, he held his peace: and then Soterichus after him began thus, You have here, good On-fierates, moved and exhorted us to diffeourfe of Mufick, a venerable Science, and a Profeffiouright pleafing to the gods: and for mine own part, I greatly approve of my Mafter Liffat, as well for his good conceit and knowledge, as for his memory, whereto he hath given us a fufficiant proof, by reciting the Arthors and Inventors of the first Mufick, and the writers allo thereof. This will I put you in minds by the way, that in all his proofs he hath reported himfelfs, to the Registers and Records of those who have written thereof, and to nothing elfe. But I am of a far other minde, and think verily that no earthly man was the Inventor of this fo great good, which Mufick bringesh with it unto us, but even good Apolls himfelfs, who is adorned with all manner of vertues. For neither Marfyas, nor Olympas, no ver ity gaits, as some do think, devised the use of the Flute and Pipe, no more than the Littee the Harp onelys, was the invention of Apollo: for this god devised the play both of the one and the other: which may easily be known by the dances, and folemuties of Secrifices, which were brought in with the found of Hauthoys and Flutes; to the honor of that godaccording as Allocus among mary others, hash lett written in one of bis Hymns: moreovers, his very image in the Ille of Delis testisisth as much, where he is pourtraicd Banding thus; holding in his right hand a bow, and in his left the Gracts, and every one of them hath an influement of Musick; the one an Harp or Lute; a mother the Shauhn or Hauthois; and she in the mids a Flute or shell Fife neer unto her mouth. And because I would not have you to think, that I have picked this out of mine own fingers ends; both Anticles and Hifer in their Commentaries, and Elucidaries, of these things do quote and allege as much. As for the Image aforcsaid, and the dedication thereof, so ancient it is, that by report, it was made and ere-Aed in the time that Hercules lived. Moreover, the Child that bringeth the Lawrell out of the valley of Tempe to the City of Delphos is accompanied with a Piper or Player of the Hauthoice: yea and the facrifices which were wont in old time to be fent from the Hyperboreans into the Ille of Deles, went with a fort of Hautboics, Flutes, Pipes, and Lutes, or stringed Instruments about them. And some there be who say more than this, namely, that god Apollo himself played upon the Flute and Hauthoies. And thus writteh Aleman an excellent Poet, and maker of fonnets. And Corinna faith furthermore, that Apello was taught by Minerva, for to pipe. See how honourable and facred every way Musick is, as being the very invention of the gods. And in old time they used it with great reverence, and according to the dignity thereof, like as they did all other fuch exercises and professions: whereas in thele dayes men rejecting and difdaining the majefly that it hath, in flead of Mulick, namely, holy and acceptable to the gods, bring that into the theaters, which is effeminate, enervate, broken, puling and deceitfull. And therefore Plato in his third book of his Common wealth, is offended with fuch Mufick, and utterly rejected the Lydian Harmony, which is meet for mones and lamentation, like as it is faid, that the first institution and making thereof was lamentable: for Aristocenus in his first book of Musick reportech, that Olympus sounded with the Hauthoies a dolefull and sunerall dump in Lydian Mulick, upon the death of Python. And others there be who affirm, that Melanippides began first this une: Pindarus in his Parans faith, that this Lydian Mufick began first to be taught at the wedding of Niebe; Others, that one Torebus ured first this Harmony, according as Dionysius Iambus writeth. The Myxolydian Mufick alfo, is full of affection, and in that regard meet for tragedies. Ariftoxenus writeth, that Sappho invented first this Myxolydian Harmony, of whom the tragedy makers learned it, and joyn. edit with the Dorian: for that as one giveth a certain dignity and stately magnificence, so the other moveth affections: and a Tragedy you wor well is mixed of them both: Howbeit, in their rolls and registers, who have written of Musicians, it is faid, that Pythoclides, the Player of the Hamboies, was thefieft inventer of this Mufick. But Lyfis referreth the invention thereof to Lamprocles the Athenian, who having found & perceived, that the disjunction is not there where in manner all others think it is but toward that which is high and fmall, made fuch a form and figure thereof, as is from Paramete to Hypate and Hypaton. Likewife the Sublydian Musick, if it be contrary unto the Myxolydian, and in refemblance comming near unto the lonique, was by report deviced by Damson the Athenian:

Now because of these two Harmonies, the one is mournfull and lamentable, the other dissolute and enervate; Plato had good reason to reject them both and therefore he chose the Dorian, as that which is most beteening valiant; soler and temperatemen; not laffure you because he was ignorant (as Aristocenus faith, in his second book of Musicans and Musick) that in the other there was some thing good for a Common-wealth, and circumspect policy; for Plato had much applyed his mind unto Musick, as having been the Scholar of Draco the Athenian, and Attenius the Agrigantine) but considering as we have said before, that there was more gravity and dignity in the Dorian Ma-fik, he preferred the same before the rest. And yet he wist well enough, that Pindarus, Ale-man, Simouides, and Bacchylides, had written and sent many other Parthenies to the Dorian Menck: besides Protodies and Pasins also. Neither was he ignorant, that tragicall Plaints, and dolefull mones, yea, and amatorious ditties, were composed for to be sung in this Dorian Tune. But he stood sufficed and contented with those which are endited to the praise of Mars, and Misnervid, and with Spondees; for these are sufficient to fortifie and confirm the mind of a temperate and folor man. Neither was he unskilfull in the Lydian Musick, nor the loniant for he knew well enough that the tragedy used this kinds of Melody. Moreover, all our ancients before time, being not unexpert of all other kinds of Musick, yet contented themselves with the use of one. For ignorance or want of experience, was not the caule that they ranged themselves into so narrow a fleight, and were contented with fo few strings; nather are we so think that Terpander and O. hinputs, and they that followed their seet, for default of skill and experience, cut off the multiplicity of strings, and their variety. Witness the Poems of Terpander, Olympus, and all their followers. or trings, and their variety. We there necess the 10 cuts of 12 panners, Osports and an interest the standard and fluck as took their course! for being but simple, and having no more than three strings, yet are they more excellent than those which consist of many strings, and be full of variety; in such storage man is able to limitate the manner of Olympus; and all those who use many strings and variety, be far short and excite behind him. Now that our ancients in old time abstained from the third, in that Spondeaik kinde, not upon ignorance, they shew sufficiently, in the use of striking the strings; for never would they have used the accord and confonance with Pare hypate, if the use thereof had been known into them to but certain it is, that beauty of affection which is in the Spondeaick kinde, by the third, washi that led their fenie to raile and exalt their note and long to Paranete; and the fame reason allor there is of Nete; For this verily they used to their flooke of the infirument, to wit, unto Patrinere in discord, and unto Mese in accord. But in long they seemed not unto them, proper and fifter the Spondeaik kinds. And not only in these, but also in Nese of the Tetrachord conjunct; all used to to do : For in the very stroak of the strings, they disaccorded with Paramete, Paramete, and Lichanos, but in long, they were alliamed thereof, for the very affection that refuled thereupon. Moreover, it appeareth manifeltly by the Phrygians, that this was not for any Rrrr ignorance of Oympus, or his fecturies: for they used it not only in fingering, and in the stroak of the ignorance of company, or mis techniques of the great Mother of the gods, Cybele, and in fome other Phrygian folemnities. I appeareth also manifestly, by the Hypates, that it was not for ignorance that in the Dorian Tunes they forbare this Tetrachord, for incontinently in other tunes they rance that in the bottom that they did it willingly. But to avoid affection they took it out of the Dorique Musick, honoring the beauty and honesty thereof: as we may observe some such like thing in tragicall Poets. For never yet to this very day, did the tragedy use Chromatick Musick, nor Rhyme : whereas the Cithern or Lute, which by many ages is more ancient then the tragedy, used thyme: whereas the Crossin of Late, which is that Chromais of greater antiquity than is Harmony. For we must account this antiquity, whereby the one is fail to be more ancient than an other, according to the use and practice of men, because in regard of the nature of these kinds one is not elder than another. If then some one would say, that Aeschylus or Phrynicus forbare to use Chromatick Musick upon ignorance, and for that they knew it not, were he not think you very abfurd and much deceived? For the same man might as well say that Pancrates also was ignorant of this Chromatick kinde, because for the most part he forbare to use it; and yet in some places he used it. So that it was not for want of Knowledge, but of set purpose, and upon Judgemena that he abstained from it. He imitated then, as he saith himself, the manner of Pindarus and Simonidus, and in one word, that which the modern Muficians call the anciens Mufick. The like reason there is of Tyrteus the Mantinean, of Andreas the Corinthian, Thrasyllus the Phliasian, and of many others whom we know upon good confideration to have abffained from the Chromatick, from change and mulciplicity of firings, yea and many other things interferted which are in common use, namely, Rhynes, Harmonies, Ditties, Songs, and interpretations. And not to go far for proof hereof, Telephane nes the Megarian was fo great an enemy to Flutes, Fifes, and small Pipes, that he would never abide the Artificers and Pipemakers fo much as to fet them to the Shawm and Hantboics; and for this cause especially, he forbare to come unto the Pythick or Apollican games of prize. In summ, if a man will conjecture that if a thing be not ufed, it is long of ignorance, he might condemn of ignorance many of those who live in these dayes; as for example the Dorioncans, because they desplie the Antigenidian kinde of Musick, for that they used it not. To the Antigenidians likewise they might impute ignorance of the Dirionian Musick, for the same cause, as also the minstrels and harpers, as ignorant of the manner of Timotheus his Mufick. For they have in manner all betaken themselves to patcheries and fallen to the Poems of Polydius. On the other fide, if a man confider aright, and with experience make comparison between that which then was and that which now is, he shall finde that variety and diverfity was in use and request even in those dayes also. For the ancient Musicians used in their numbers and measure, their variety, much more diverse and indifferent than nowit is. So that we may boldly fay that the variety of Rhymes, the difference allo and diverfity of flroakes was then more variable. For men in these days slove Skill and Knowledge, but in former times they effected numbers and measure. So that it appeareth plainly, that the ancients abstained frombroken Musick and song, not because they had no skill, but for that they had no will to approve thereof. And no marvell: for many fashious there be in the world and this our life, which are well enough known, though they be not practifed: mary strange they be by reason of disuse, which grew upon occasion that forething was observed therein, not decent and seemly. But, that it was not for ignorance, nor want of experience, that Plato rejected other kinds of Mnick, but only because they were not before ing such a Common-wealth of his, we will shew hereafter: and withall that he was expert and skilfull in Harmony : For in that procreation of the foul which he describeth in the book of Timeus, he declareth what fludy he had employed in other Mathematicall fludies, and in Musick besides, writing after this manner : Thus in manner (quoth he) did God at the first : And after that, he filled the double and techle intervals, in cutting off one portion from thence, and putting it between both of them: In fuch fort as in every intervall or diffance, there were two moieties. Certs, this Exordium or Procene, is a sufficient proof of skill and experience in Harmony, according as we will shaw here-after. Three forts of primitive medicales there be, out of which all other be drawn, to wit, Arithmetical, Geometricall, and Harmonicall. Arithmeticall is that which furmounteth, and is furmounted inequall number: Geometricall, in even proportion: and Harmonicall neither in reason and proportition nor in number. Plate therefore intending to declare Harmonically, the Harmony of the four elements of the foul, and the cause why things so divers' accorded together: in each interval hath put down two medicties of the foul, and that according to Musicall proportion. For in the accord Diapafon in Mufick, two intervals there are between two extremities, whereof we will shew the proportion. For the accord Diapason consistent in a double proportion: as for example, six and twelve will make a double proportion in number: And this intervall, is from Hypate Meson, unto Nete Diezengmenon: Now fix and twelve being the two extremities: Hypate Meson containeth the number of fix, and Nete Dizzugmenon that of twelve. It remains thow, that we ought to take unto their the mean numbers between their two extremities; the extreams whereof will be found, the one in proportion Epitritos or fedgulaterian, the other Hemiolios, or fedgulateral, And their be numbers eight and nine. For eight is fequivertian to fix; and nine is fedgulateral. Thus much as touching one of the extreams. As for the other which is twelve, it is above nine in sesquitertian proportion, and above eight in sesquialteral. These two numbers aben, being between six and twelve, and the interval Diapason compounded and consisting of Diatesseron and Diapente, it appearesh that Mese shall have the number of eight; and Paramele, the number of nine: which done, there will be the same habitude, from Hypate and Mele, that is from Paramele to Nete, of a disjoynt Tetrachord. The same proportion is found also in numbers, for the same reason that is from fix to eight, is from nine to twelve, and look what reason there is between fix and nine, the same is between eight and twelve. Now between eight and fix the proportion is fesquitertian, as also between twelve and nine. But between nine and fix, sesquialterall, like as between twelve and eight. Thus much may serve to show that

Plato was well fludled and very expert in the Mathematicks,

Now that Harmony is a venerable, worthy and divine thing, Arifiele the Disciple of Plato testifieth in these words: Harmony (quoth he) is Celestial of a beautifull and wonderfull nature, and more than human; which being of it felf divided into four, it hath two medicties, one Arithmeticall, the other Harmonicalls, and of the parts thereof the magnitudes and extremities are feen according to number and equality of measure: for accords in Song are appropriate and fitted in two Tetrachords. These be the words of Aristotle: who said that the body of Harmony is composed of parts dislike, and accordant verily one with another, but yet the medicties of the fame agree according to reason Arithmeticall: for that Nete according to Hypate, by double proportion maketh an accord and confonance of Diapaton : For it hath as we have before faid, Nete of twelve unities, and Hypate of fix, and Paramele according with Hypate, in proportion sesquialterall of nine unities. But of Mele, we say, it hath right unities : and the principall intervals of Musick are composed of these : to wit, Diatesferon, hich consistent of a proportion sesquitertian, and of Diapente, which standed upon a sesquialterall? and Dispason of a duple: For so is preserved the proportion sesquioctave, which is according to the proportion Tonizus. Thus you fee how the parts of Harmony do both furmount and also are furmounted of other parts, by the same excesse: and the medicties of medicties, as well according to excess: in numbers, as Geometricall puissance. Thus Aristotle declareth them to have these and such like powers, namely that Note surmounteth Mese by a third part, and that Hypate is semblably surmounted of Paramele: in such fort as these excess:, are of the kinde of Relatives, which have relation to another: for they furmount and be furmounted by the fame parts. And therefore by the same proportion the two extreams of Mese and Paramele, do surmount, and be surmounted, to wir, fefquitertian and fefquialterall. And after this fore is the harmonicall excesse. But the excesse of Nete and Mese by Arithmeticall proportion, sheweth the exuperances in equall party: and even so Paramese in proportion to Hypate: for Paramese surmounterh Mese in proportion session of Hypate and Paramese of Hypate in sesquinterall: and Mese resquitercian in regard of Hypate. See then how Harmony is composed according to Aristotle himfelt, of her parts and numbers. And so verily it is by him composed most naturally of a nature as well finite as infinite: both of even and also of odd, it self and all the parts thereof: for it self totally and whole is even, as being composed of four parts or terms: the parts thereof and their proportions, be even, odd, and even not even. For Nete it hath even of twelve unities: Paramete odd of nine unities: Mefe even of eight unities, and Hypate even not even of fix unities. So that Harmony thus composed both of it left and the parts thereof one to the other, as well in excesse as in proportions, the whole accordeth with the whole and the parts together. And that which more is, the very lenses being inserted and ingraffed in our bodies by Harmony, but principally those which are Celefitall and Divine, namely Sight and Hearing, which together with God give Understanding and Discourse of reason unto men with the voice and the light, do represent Harmony: yea and the other inferiour fences which follow them, in as much as they be fenfes, are likewife composed by Harmony : for all their effects they perform not without Harmony, and howfoever they be under them and leffe noble, yet they yeeld not for all that: for even they entring into the body accompanied with the presence of a certain Divinity, together with the discourse of reason, obtain a forcible and excelfent nature. By thefe reasons evident it is that the ancient Greeks, made great account, and mot without good cause, of being from their infancy well instructed and trained up in Musick ! for they were of opinion, that they ought to frame and temper the minds of young folk unto vertue and honesty by the means of Musick, as being right profitable to all honest things, and which we should have in great recommendation, but especially and principally for the perillous hazzards of war: In which case some used the Hauthoice, as the Lacedamonians, who characted the Song called Caftorium to the faid instruments, when they marched in ordinance of battell, for to charge their enemics. Others made their approach, for to encounter and give the first onler, with the noyle of the Lyra, that is to fay, the Harp or fuch like fteinged inftrmaence. And this we finde to have beeen the practice of the Candiots, for a long time, for to use this kinde of Mufick, when they fet forth and advanced forward to the doubtfull dangers of battell. And fome again consinue even to our time in the use of Trumpets found. As for the Argives, they went to wrefile as the foleron games in their city called Sthenia with the found of the Hauthoics. And thefe gamer, were by repors inflicated at first in honour and memory of their King Danaus; and afterwards again were conferrated to the honour of Jupiter furnamory of their Aing Danaus: and atterwares again were contestated to the honour of Jupiter luma-med Sibenius. And verily even at this day, but he Percathian games of prize, the manner and cuftom its o play upon the Hautholies, and to fing a Song thereto, although the fame be not antique nor ex-quifites, nor fuch as was wont to be played and fing inclines past as that Canticle composed formetime by Hierax, for this kinde of Combus, and naised it was Euderona. Well, though it be but a faint and feeble manner of long, yet formerhat, such as leves, they clied with the Hautholes. And in the times of great Antiquity it is faid that the Greeks did not fo much as know Theatricall Musick, for that they employed all the skill and knowledge thereof in the fervice and worship of the gods, and in the institution and bringing up of youth, before any Theater was built in Greece by that people: but all the Mussick that yet was, they bestowed to the honour of the gods and their divine fervice in the Templer, also in the praises of valiant and worthy men: So that it is very probable that these terms Theater assertions on the wind of the state of difference and diversity, that there is no mention made, nor memory remaining of any kinde of Musick for youth to be taught, neither doth any man sechia mind thereto, or make proseculous the state of the state o

And if it be tracas Pindarus faith, Terpander was the inventor of those fongs called Scolia, which wer fung at feasts. Architechus also adjoyned those rhymes or Lambick measures called Trimetra: the translation also and change into other number and measures of a different kinde, yea, and the manner how to touch and ftrike them. Moreover, unto him, as first inventour, are attributed the Epodes, Tetrameter lambicks, Procritique and Profodiacks; as also, the augmentation of the first, yea, and as some think, the Elegy it felf: over and b fides, the intention of lambus unto Paan Epibatos, and of the Herous augmented both unto the Prolodiaque, and also the Cretick. Furthermore, that of lambique notes, some be pronounced according to the stroke, others sung out. Archilochus was the man, by report, who shewed all this first, and afterwards, tragical Poets used the same : likewise it is said, that Crexus receiving is from him, transported it to be used at the Bacchanal songs, called Diathyrambs. And he was the first alfo, by their faying, who devifed the stroke after the fong; for that beforetime they used to fing, and strike the strings together. Likewise unto Polymnestus is ascribed all that kinde of note or tune, which now is called His polydius, and of him they fay, that he first made the drawing out of the note longer, and the difficultion and ejection thereof much greater than before. Moreover, that Olympus, upon whom is fathered the invention of the Greek Musick, that is tied to laws and rules, was he who first brought up, by their faying, all the kinde of Harmony, and of rhymes or measures, the Prosodiaque, wherein is contained the tune and fong of Mars; also the Chorios, whereof there is great use in the folemnities of the great Mother of the gods: yes, and some there be, who make Ohmpus the authour also of the measure Bacchius. And thus much concerning every one of the ancient tunes and songs. But Lasus the Harmonian, having transferred the rhymes into the order of Dithyrambs, and followed the multiplicity in voice of Hautholes, in using many founds and those diffused and dispersed to and fro, brought a great change into Mufick, which never was before. Simblably, Melanippides who came after him, contained not himself in that manner of Musick which then was in use, no more than Philoxenus did and Timotheus, for he, whereas beforetime unto the daies of Terpander the Antiffean, the Harp had but feven ftrings, diftinguished it into many more sounds and strings; yea, and the sound of the Pipe or Hautholes, being simple and plain before, was changed into a Musick of more distinct variety. For in old time, unto the dales of Melanippides a Dithyrambick Poet, the players of the Hauthoies were wont to receive their falaries and wages at the hands of the Poets, for that Poetry you must think, bare the greatest stroke, and had the principal place in Musick and acting of Places, so as the Minstrels beforesaid were but their ministers : but afterwards, this custom was corrupted ; upon occasion whereof, Pherecrates the Comical Poet bringeth in Musick in form and habit of a woman, with her body piteously scourged and mangled all over: and he deviseth besides, that Dame Justice demanded of her the cause why, and how the became thus missing unto whom Poesse or Musick maketh asswer in this wise:

Musick.

I will gladly tell, since that we pleasure take Tou for to bear, and I to answer make.
One of the first, who did me thus displease
And work my wee, was Melanippides;
He with twelve strings my body whip to fore,
That soft it is, and losser than before;
That soft it is, and losser than before;
And not to the some names now, comparable.
For one of Achick land, Cynelias he,
Shame come to him, and cursed may be be,
By making turnes and winding cranks fastrange
In all his strephes, and those without the range
Of harmony, hath my perverted so,
That where I am, unsuch I now do know.
His Dithy rambs are framed in such guise,
That soft some right, in shield and targuet wise.

And yet of him, one cannot truly fay,
That cruelly be meant me for to flay.
Phypins it was who fet to me a wrest
(His own device) that I could never rest:
Wherewith he did me winde and writh so hard,
I hat I well nees for ever was quite marr'd.
Out of five strings for so the would devise
No sower than twelve harmonies to rise:
Well, of this man I cannot most complain,
For what he miss, he soon repair'd again.
Timotheus sweet Lady (out alas)
Hath me undowe: Timotheus it was,
Most shamefully who wrough me all despite,
He hath me torne, he hath me buried quite.
Instince

And who might this Timotheus be (dear heart)
That was the caufe of this thy wofull smart?

Musick

I mean him of Miletus, Pyrthias Surnam d, his head and hair fo ruddy was.
This fellow brough tenpanue forrows more Than all the reft whom I have nam'd hefore.
A for the of unpleafant quavers brings,
And running points, when as he plaies or fings:
He never meets in when I walk alone
Upon the way, but me affails anon.
Offg one yobes, and thus develted have
He teams me with twelve flrings, and makes no spare.

Aritiophanes also the Comical Poet makes mention of Philozents, and makes no pare.

the dances called Rounds: and in this manner he deviseth, that Musick should speak and complain:

When which is The deviseth, that Musick should speak and complain:

What with his Exharmoniams, Niglars and Hyperbolians, And fuch loud notes, I wot not what, He hath mestult so full, as that My voice is brittle when I speak, Like radish root that soon will break.

Semblably, other Comical Poets have blasoned and fer out in their colours, our modern Musicians, for their abfurd curiofity, in hewing and cutting Musick thus by peace-meal, and mineing it so small. Bit that this science is of great power and efficacy, aswel to set strait and reform, as to pervers, deprave and corrupt youth in their education and learning, Arifloxenus hath made very plain and evident: for he faith, that of those who lived in his time, Telefias the Theban happened when he was young, to be brought up and instructed in the most excellent kinds of Musick, and to learn many notable ditties and longs; among which, those also of Pindarus, of Dionysius the Theban, of Lamprius, Pratinas and other Lyrical Poets, fingular men in their faculty, and profession of playing cunningly upon the Harp and other stringed instruments. He had learned likewise to found the Hauthoies passing well, and was sufficiently exercised and practised in all other parts of good literature : but when he was once past the slower and middle of his age, he became so far ravished and carried away with this Scenicall Musick so full of variety, that he despised that excellent Musick and Poesi: wherein he was nourtred, and all for to learn the ditties and tunes of Philoxenus and Timotheus, and principally fuch of them as had most variety and novelty: and when he betook himself to compose ditties and set songe, making triall what he could do in both kindes, aswell in that of Pindarus and this of Philoxenus, he was able to perform nothing well and to the purpose in that Musick of Philoxenus: the reason whereof was, his excellent education from his infancy. If then a man be defirous to use Musick well and judiciously, let him imitate the old manner : and yet in the mean while furnish the same with other Sciences, learn Philosophy, as a misserest to guide and lead; for the is able to judge what kinde of measures is meet for Musick, and profitable. For whereas three principal points and kindes there be, unto which all Musick is univerfally divided, to wit, Diatonos, Chroma, and Harmony, he ought to be skilful in Poetry, which useth these several kindes, who cometh to learn Musick; and withall, he must attain to that sufficiency, as to know how to express: and couch in writing his Poeticial inventions. First and foremost therefore he is to understand, that all musical science is a certain custom and usage, which hath not yet therefore he is to understand, that an inducation the desired by him that is the Cholar-aratinat of for as the knowledge to what end every thing is to be learned by him that is the Cholar-Next to this it would be confidered, that to this teaching and infruction, there he not yet adjoyned pre-fendly the enumeration of the measures and manners of Musick. For the most part learn rashly and without discretion, that which seemeth good and is pleasant either to the learner or the teacher; but the better fore reject fuch indiferetion; as the Lacedemonians in old time, the Mantineans likewise and the Pelleatins: for thefe, making choice of one manner above the reft, or elfe of very few, which they took to be meet for the reformation and correction of manners, used no other musick but it : which more evidendy may appear, if a man will enquire and confider, what it is that every one of shele Sciences taketh for the subject matter to handle : for certain it is, that the Harmonique skill containeth the knowledge of intervals, compolitions, founds, notes and mutations of that kinde which is named Hermolinerish, that is to fay, well befieting and convenient : neither is it possible for it to proceed farther. mojmenan, that is to tay, with nor require nor exact of her, that the should be able to discern whether a Poet hath well, properly and fiely used (for example fake in musick) the Hyperdorian tune in his entrance; the weil, properly and may mee the spring forth; and the Phrygian or Hypophrygian in the mids: for Mixolydian and the Dorian at his going forth; and the Phrygian or Hypophrygian in the mids: for this pertaineth not at all to the subject matter of the Harmonick kinde, and hath need of many other things : for he knoweth not well the force of the propriety. And if he be ignorant of the Chromatick kinde and Enharmonian, he shall never attain to have the perfect and absolute power of the propriety, according to which, the affection of the measures that are made are feen : for this is the office and part of the artificer. And manifest it is, that the voice of the composition called Systema, is one thing; and the melody or fong which is tramed in the faid composition, another; which to teach and whereof to treat, pertaineth not to the faculty of the Harmonick kinde. Thus much also we are to say as touching Rhythm; for no Rhythm will ever come to have in it the power of perfect propriety: for that alwaies which is faid to be proper, is in regard and reference to the affection; whereof we affirm the cause to be either composition or mixtion, or else both together : like as with Olympus, the Enharmonian kinde is put in the Phrygian tune, and Pzon mixed with Epibatos: for this affection of the beginning hath it ingendred and brought forth in the fong of Minerva. For when the melody and rhythm or measure was artificially set 10, and the number or rhythm alone cunningly transmuted. fo as a Trochæus was put in fitead of a Pæon; Hereof came the Harmonick kinde of Olympus to be composed. Yet neverthelesse, when both the Enharmonick kinde and the Phrygian tune remain: and befide thefe, the whole composition also, the affection received a great alteration: for that which is called Harmony in the long of Minerva, is far different from the affection which is in common use and experience. If he then, who is expert and skilful in Mufick, had withal the faculty to judge, certain perience. In tertien, was one would be a perf-& Workman, and a palling good Mafter in Mufick. For he is is that fuch an one would be a perf-& Workman, and a palling good Mafter in Mufick. For he who is skilled in the Dorique mufick, and knoweth not how to judge and different he propriety, he thall never know what he doth, nor be able to keep formuch as the affection, confidering thereis fome doubt as touching the judgement of Dorian melodies and tunes, whether they appertain to the fubject matter of Harmony or no ? as some Dorians are of opinion. The like reason there is of all the Rhythmick skill; for he who knoweth Paon, shall not incontinently know the property of the use thereof, forafmuch as there is fome doubt as concerning the making of Pzonick rhythms, to wit, whether the Rhythmetique matter is able to judge with diffinit knowledge of them? or whether as forme fay, it do not extend to fax? Of neerflist therefore it followeth, that there must be two know-ledges at the leaft in him, who would make difficient and be able to judge between that which is proper and that which is strange: the one of manners and affections, for which all composition is proper and that which is trange: the one of mainters and succious, for which an composition is made; the other, of the parts and members of which the composition do the confile. Thus much there fore may fuffice, to flow that neither the Harmonique, nor the Rhythmick, nor any one of these faculties of Musick, which is named particular, can be fufficient of it self alone to judge of the affection, or to different of other qualities. Whereas therefore, Hermonfenian, which is as one would say, the defent and elegant temperature of voices and founds, is divided into three kindes, which be equal in the confidence of the confidence of confidence the magnitudes of compositions, in puissances of founds, and likewise of Tetrachords; our ancients have treated but of one : for those who went before ut, never considered, either of Chroma, or Diatonos, but only of Enharmonios, and that onely in a magnitude of a composition, called Diapason: for of the Chroma they were at some variance and difference : but they all in manner did accord to fay, that there wasno more but this Harmony alone. And therefore he shall never understand that which pertaineth unto the treatife of Harmony, who hath proceeded fo far as to this only knowledge: but apparent it is that he ought to follow both other particular sciences, and also the total body of Mulick; yea and the mixtions and compositions of the parts; for he that is only Harmonical is confined within one kinde and no more. To speak therefore generally and once for all, it behovets, that both outward sense and inward understanding concurre to the judgement of the parts in Musick: Neither is one to prevent and run before another, as the Enfes do, which are more forward and hally than their fellows; norto lag behinde and follow after, as those fenfes do which are flow and heavy of motion. And yet otherwhile in some senses it falleth out upon a naturall inequality which they have, that both happen at once, to wit, they draw back, and halfe forward together: we must therefore cut off these extremities from the sense; if we would have it runne joyntly with the understanding: for necessary it is, that there be alwaiss three things at the least meet together in sense of hearing, to wit, the sound, the time, and the syllable or letter. And come to passe it will, that by the going of the found, will be known the proportionable continuity, called Hermofim-non; by the gate of time, the Rhythm, and by the patting and proceeding of the fyllable or letter, the ditty : Now when they march altogether, there must needs be an incursion of the sense. This also is evident, that the fense not being able to diffinguish and discern every one of these three things, and accompany them feverally, impossible it is, that it should know or judge that which is well or a-mission, in each of them particularly. First and foremost therefore, we are to take knowledge of the co-herence and continuations for necessary it is, that there should be in the faculty and power of judging, certain continual order, for as much as good and bad be not determinately in fuch founds, times, letters or fyllables, severed one from the other, but in the continued fuit and coherence of them, for there is a certain mixture or parts which cannot be conjoyned in usage. And thus much may suffice for the confequence. After this we are to confider, that men, sufficient otherwise, and skilful Masters in Mufick, are not by and by able to judge : for impossible it is to be a perfect Musician, and a judge withal of those which seem to be the parts of total Musick, as the science and skill of instruments; likewise of fong, as also of the exercise of the senses, I mean that which tendeth to the intelligence and knowledge of the well-proportioned Hermosmenon, and of Rhythm. Over and besides, of the Rhythmick and Harmonique treatife, and of the speculation, touching the stroke and the ditty, and what other soever there are besides. But what the causes should be, that it is not possible for one to be a Critick and able to judge, by means of these things by themselves, let us endeavour to search and know. First, by this supposal, That of those things which are proposed unto us for to be judged of, some be perfect, others imperfect: Perfect, for example, every Poetical work, that is either chanted, or played upon the Pipe, or founded on the Lute and stringed instrument; or else the interpretation or elocution of the faid Poems, which they call spluses: as is the noise of pipe, or of the voice, and such like: Unperfect, as those which tend hereto, and are for them ordeined, as be the parts of that which is called interpretation. Secondly, by Poefic or fiction, whereof the case is alike; because a man may as well judge if he hear the minitrel play or fing, whether his pipes accord or no, and whether his dialect or ditty be clear, or contrary wife obscures for each of these is a part of the foresaid interpretation of pipes, not the end it self, but that which respecteth the end; for the affection of the interpretations shall be judged hereby, and by all fuch causes, whether they be well fitted and accommodate to the Poem composed, which the agent hath taken in hand to treat of, to handle, to expresse and interpret. Semblable is the reason also of the affections and pallions, which are fignified in the Poems, by Poefie. Our ancients then, as those who made principal account of the affiction, preferred and esteemed best that fashion of antique Musick, which was grave, not curious nor much affect d. For it is faid that the Argives did fet down in times past a punishment for those who brake the laws of Musick, yea, and condemned him to pay a good fine, who first ofed more than feven strings, and who went about to bring in the use of the Mixolydian Musick. But Pythagorus that grave and venerable personage, reproved all judgement of Musick which is by the ear, for he faid, that the intelligence and vertue thereof, was very fubtile and flender, and therefore he judged thereof, not by hearing, but by proportional harmony; and he thought it sufficient to proceed as far as to Diapaton, and there to flay the knowledge of Mufick: Whereas Mulicians in these daies disesteem and reject wholly that kinds of Musick which was in greatest reputation among our ancestours, for the gravity thereof: infomuch as the most part of them make no reckoning of any apprehension of Euharmonian intervals and spaces. So idle and lazy they be that they think and say, the harmonical Diefis givethino apparence at all, nor representation of those things that fall under the fense of hearing; yea, and banish it quite out of their tunes and songs, counting those no better than practing, vain, and toyish persons, who have either written or spoken thereof, or used that kinde: and for proof hereof, that they say true, they suppose they have found a doubty good argument and de-monstration, drawn from their own groffe stupidity and senselesses, as if all that which their sense apprehended nor, must needs incontinently have no subfiftence at all in nature, and be altogether unprofitable. And then moreover they hold, that there can no magnitude be apprehended by symphony and consonance of voice, as the note, the halfenote, and other such intervals. Mean while they do not perceive (fuch is their ignorance) that they may as well banish the third magnitude, the fift, and the feventh; whereof the first confisteth of three, the fecond of five, and the third of feven Diefes : and generally they should reject and reprove all the intervals that be odd, as superfluous and good for nothing ; inafmuch as none of them can be found by confent or fymphony. And thefe they may be, which the least Diesis doth measure in odd number: whereupon it followeth necessarily, that no division of the Tetrachord, is profitable, but this only, by which we may use all even intervals: and these verily were that of Syntonos, Diatonos, and Tonian Chroma. But to give out, or to conceive fuch things, were the parenot of those only who contradicted that which is apparent and evident, but also of such as went against themselves : for they use more than any other such partitions of Tetrachords, wherein all the intervals be either odd or elfe proportionable to those that be odd : for evermore they mollifie all the notes, called Lichani, and Paraneta : yea, and they let down a little, those very notes which are fleadfast and firm, by I wot not what interval, without all reason; and together with them, they let slack also very absurdly, the Thirds and the Paranetæ, and they suppose that the use of such compositions is most commendable, wherein the most part of the intervals, be without all reason and proportion, by letting down not only those sounds which naturally are wont to flir and be moved, but also some of them which are immovable: as appeareth manifestly to those who are sufficient and able to judge of fuch things.

To come now to the use of Musick, how meet and seemly it is for a valiant man, gentle Homer hath given us very well to understand: for to prove unto us how commodious Musick is in many respects, he seigned and devised Achilles to concoch his anger which he had conceived against Agamemons, by the means of Musick, which he had learned of that most prudent and wise Chiron: for thus he written:

They found him then, within his tent, with found of Lute fo shrill,

His heart that was now discontent, to Colace and to Still : 'An instrument right fair in sight this was, and trimly wrought: The neck with filver richly dight which he himself had caught Out of the spoils then lately won of Thebes, that stately Town, And City of Ection, when it was rafed down : Herewith I say, he passed his time, this was his bearts delight. He fang withall the praise in rhyme of many a valiant Knight.

Note hereby and learn (quoth Homer) what use we ought to make of Musick: for he sung unto the Lute, the noble exploits of brave men, and the glorious acts of worthies and demi-gods: a thing that full well beforemed Achilles the fon of most rightcous Peleus. Over and besides, Homer teaching us the prowen betermen time of using Musick, found out an exercise, both profitable and pleasant for a man at leisure, and not occupied otherwise in affairs. For Achilles being a martial man of action, yet for the anger that he had conceived against Agamemnon, had no hand in the perils and hazards of War: Hothe anger that he had conterved against a same interfered to the therefore that it became very well this Heroique and hardy Knight, to whet his courage by these excellent songs, to the end that he might be provided and ready against that sally and skirmish which foon after he undertook: and this no doubt he performed very well, by calling to remembrance the doubty deeds and leats of armes archieved by others in times paft. Such verily was the ancient Mufick, and for this purpose it served. For we do hear, that both Hercules made use of Musick, and also Achilles, with many other valourous Knights, whom Chiron that most sage and learned master and bringer up of youth taught, who was a teacher not of Mulick only, but of justice beside and Physick. In fum, a man of wisedom and sound judgement, will thus deem, that good Sciences are not to be blamed, if haply they be not well used, bur impute all fault unto them that abuse the same. And therefore if any one from his childhood, shall be well instructed and trained up in Musick, and withall employ his labour and diligence therein, he will receive and approve that which is honest and commendable: blame also he will and reject the contrary: not in Musick noly, but in all things else: and such a one will decline all unhoneft and unworthy actions, and thus reaping from Musick the greatest and best con-tenument that can be, he may benefit exceeding much, as well himself as his whole Country, using no word nor deed unseemly, but observing at all times and in every place, that which is besitting, decent, temperate and elegant. Moreover, that Cities and States best Governed by Policy and good Laws, have alwaies had a special regard of generous and good Musick, many and fundry testimonies may be alleged: and namely, a man may very well cite to this purpose Terpander, who suppressed in times past, the great sedition and civil discord that was in Lacedamon: Thales also the Candiot, who went as it is faid, by the commandement and Oracle of Apollo, to Lacedemen, and there cured the Citizens, and delivered them from that great pestilence, which reigned in that City, and all by the means of Musick, as writeth Pratinas. Homer alfo himfelf faith, that the plague which afflicted the Greeke, was by Mufick staicd and appeared:

Then all day long, the Grecian youth in longs melodious, Befonght god Phoebus of bis grace, to be propitious: Phoebus I fay, who from a far doth shoot bis arrows nie They chant and praise, who takes great joy, to bear fuch barmony

With these verses as with Corollaries, good master I will conclude this my discourse of Musick, and the rather, because you first by the very same verses commended unto us the force and power of Musick : for in very truth, the principal and most commendable work thereof, is thanksgiving unto the gods, and for in very truth the principal and the continuous with intercepts training and the principal the acknowledgment of their grace and favour: the fecond, and that which next followeth, a fanctified heart, a pure, confonant and harmonical efface of the foul. When Soterickus had faid. Thus you have (quoth he) my good Mafter heard us discourse of Musick round about the board as we fit. And verily Soterichus was highly admired for that which he had delivered ; for he shewed evidently both by his voice and visage, how much he was affected unto Musick, and what study he had employed thereto. Then my mafter: Over and above other things, this also I commend in you both, that you have kept your own course and place, the one as well as the other. For Lysias hath surnished our seastwith those things which are proper and meet for a Musician, who knoweth only to handle the Lute or Harp, and hath no farther skill than manual practice. Soterichus also hath taught us whatsoever concerneth both the profit and also the speculation thereof, yea and withall comprehendeth therein the power and use of Musick, whereby he hath mended our fare, and feasted us most sumptuously. And I suppose verily that both of them, have of purpose and that right willingly, left thus much unto me, as to draw Musick unto feasts and banquets: neither will I condemn them of timidity, as it they were afamed fo to do : For if in any part of mans life, Certes in fuch feafls and merry meetings it is right profitable. For according as good Homer faith,

Both fong and dance, delight afford,

As things that well beform the boord.

Neither would I have any man to infer hereupon, that Homer thought Musick good for nothing elfe but to delight and content the company at a feast : considering there is in those verses couched and hidden amore deep and profound meaning. For he brought Musick to those times and places, wherein it might profit and help men molt, I mean the feafts and meetings of our ancients : and expedient it was to have her company there, for that the is able to divert and temper the heat and ftrength of wines according as our Aristoxenus also elf: where faith : Musick (quoth he) is brought in thicher, because that whereas wine is wont to pervert, and overcurn as well the bodies as the minds of those who take in immoderately, Musick by that order, fymmetry, and accord which is in ir, reduceth them again into a contrary temperature, and dulceth all. And therefore Homer reportes h that our ancients ofed Musick as a remedy and help, at fuch a time: But that which is principal and maketh Mulick above all things moft venerable, you have my good friend let paffe and omitted. For Pythagorus, Archias, Plato, and all the reft of the old Philosophers do hold, that the motion of the whole World, together with the rerolution of the Stare, is not performed without Mulick: For they teach that God framed all things by Harmony, But to profecute this matter more at large, this time will not permit : and befides it is a very high point and most Musical to know in every thing how to keep a mean and competent measure.

This said, he sung an hymn, and after he had offered a libation of wine unto Saturn, and to all the gods his children, as alfo to the Males, he gave his guelts leave to depart.

Of the Fortune or Vertue of King Alexander.

The Summary.

Nthis treatife and that which followeth, framed both in form of a declamation, Plutarch magnifieth A. lexander, a praise-morthy Prince, for many good parts that were in him : wherein he sheweth also, that we ought to astribute unto Vertue and not to Fortune, those brave, exploits which he performed. By Fortune, he meaneth that course of the affairs in this World, whereby it falleth out many times that the wiseft men are not alwaies most bappy and best advanced. To prove therefore, that Alexander was endued with exquisit qualities for execution of those enterprises which by him were atchieved afterwards and brought to an end, be compareth bim in the beginning of this treatife, with the Kiugs of Perlia raifed up to their greatuesse and then sheweth, that Alexander being an excellent Philosopher, we ought not to wonder or be assonished, if by his vertue he faw the end of many things which the most fortunate Princes of the World durst never take in band and begin. Now the better to set out the excellency of this Philosophy of Alexander, he compareth his scholars with the disciples of Plato and Socrates: proving that those of this Prince surpassed the others, as much as a good deed or benefit done to an infinit number of men surmounteth a good speech or instruction given many a a goota acea or central come to an infinit inimore of ours furmounted a goota species or infruction given to some particular persons; the most part of whom make no account thereof. He proceedeth forward and distribut the wisdom and sufficiency of Alexander in politick Government, which he amplifies by the consideration of his amiable behaviour and lovely carriage toward those Nations; which by kim were subdued: also by the recital of some notable sayings of his : likewise by the love and affection which he carried unto wisdom, and men of knowledge. In brief, his acts be evident proofes of his vertue, and in no wife of the temerity andrashnesse of Fortune. But even in this very place, Plutarch bath broken off his treatife, leaving the end thereof defeauous: namely where he began to discourse of the contempt of death, and of the constant resolution of Alexander against the most churtish and boisterous assaults of Fortune.

Of the Fortune or Vertue of King Alexander.

Hele are the fayings and allegations of Fortune, affirming and proving that Alexander was her own peculiar piece of work, and to be afteribed unto her alone. But we must gainfay her in the name and behalf of Philfophy, or rather of Alexander himself: who taketh it not well, but is highly displeased, that he should be thought to have received his Empire at Fortunes hand statis, and as a meer gift and benefit which he had bought and purchased with sheding much of his own bleud, and receiving many a wound one upon another.

> Who many restlesse nights did passe Without all fleep full broad awake: And many a bloudy day there was, Whiles be in field did skirmish make.

Whiles he fought against forces and Armies invincible, against Nations innumerable, Rivers impassabe Rocks inaccessible, and such as no shot of arrow could ever reach; accompanied alwaies with predent counsel, conflant patience, resolute valour, and stated temperance. And verily I am persuaded that himself would say unto Fortune, chalenging unto herself the honour of his haughty and worthy act, in this manner. Come not here either to deprave my vertue, at to deprive me of my due honour, in afcribing it unto thy felf. Darius was indeed a piece of work made by thee, whom of a bafe level tor, no better than a Curriour or a Lackey to a King, thou diddeft advance and make the Lord of the Perfinn. Sardanapalus likewife was thy handy-work, upon whose head, when he was carding and spinning fine purple wooll among women, thou diddelt set the Imperial Diadem. As for me, I moujiipinining interparties world and to surface with Victory after the Bauthan Arbella. The conquested Cheir made the way open forme to enter into Egypt: and the field that I wan at the siver Granicus; which passed over going upon the dead bodies of Mitbridates and Spithridates Lieutenams to the King of the fus, gave me entrance into Cilicia. Vaunt now and boaft as much as thou will of those Kings, who the ver were wounded in Fight, nor loft one drop of their bloud. Thefa I fay may well be counted fortuffate and thy darlings, Ochus I mean and Artaxerxes, whom immediately from the very day of their nativity, thou haft enstalled in the Royal Throne of Cyrus. But this body of mine carries the marks and token of fortune not favourable and gracious, but contrariwife adverse and opposite unto me. First in Thirt cum, I had my head broken with a great flone, and my seck brufed and crushed with a pefill. Afterwards in the journey and Battel of Granicus, my head was cloven with a Barbarians Cimeter. At the field fought neer Iffus, my thigh was run through with a fword : before the City of Gund; I was fhor through the ancle above my foot with one arrow, and into the shoulder with another, whereupon I was unline fed, and falling heavy in mine armour out of my faddle, I lay there for dead upon the ground. Among the Maracadarts, my thin bone was cut in funder with thot of quarels and arrows. Befides many a knock and wound which I gat among the Indians: and every where I met with hot fervice among them, until I was that quite through the thoulder. Another time as I fought against the Gandrida I had the bone of my leg cut in twain; with another that likewife in a skirmith with the Mallota, il caught an arrow in my breaft and bosome, which went so far, and fluck so fall, thank left the flead the hinder and with the rap and knock of an iron peftill my neck bone was crufted. And at what time as the iskling ladders reared against the wals brake, fortune enclosed and faut me up alone to fight and maintain combate, not against noble concurrents and renowned enemies, but obscure and simple Barbarous Souldiers, gracing and gratifying them thus far forth, as they went with in a little of taking away my life: And had not Prolomeus come between and covered me with his Targuet; had not Limneus in defence of me opposed his own body and received many a thousand darts, and there lost his life in the place for me; had not I fay the Macedonians by force of armes and refolute courage broken down the wall and laid it along, Certes that base village, that Barbarous burrow of no name, had been at this day the sepulcher of Alexander. Furthermore, all that journey and expedition of mine, what was it else but tempeluous flormes, extream heat and drought, rivers of an infinit depth, mountains so exceeding high, as no bird could file over them, monftrous beath and so huge with al, as they were hideous and terrible to be feen, firange and favage fashions of life; revolts of diffoyal States and Governours, yea and afterwards their open treafons and rebellions? And as for that which went before his voyage: all Greece panting fillt and trembling for remembrance of the Wars which they endured under his father Philip, now put up their head. The City of Abous now shaking off from their armour the dust of the Battel at Cheronea, began to rife again and recover themselves after that overthrow. To it joyned Thebes and put forth their helping hand. All Macedonia was suspected. and flood in doubtful termes, as enclining to Amyntas and the children of Eropus. The Illyrians brake our into open Wars and made hoftile investions. The Scythians hung in equal ballance uncer-tain which fide to take, expecting what their neighbours would do, that began to flir and revolt. Befides the good gold of Perfia which had found the way into the purfes of Oratours and Governours of every City, made all Peloponnefus to rife in armes. The coffers of Philip his father were chapty, and had no treasure in them: but instead thereof they were indebted and paid interest as Onesicritas writes for * two hundred talents. In these great wants, in such poverty and so troubled a States, see a young man newly come out of his infancy and childhood, durit hope and affiredly look, for to be Lord of Babylon and Sufa: nay to speak more truly in a word, he intended in his defiguration after conquest of the whole World; and that with a power only of thirty thousand sootmen, and source thousand horses for no greater forces brought he into the field, as Aristobulus reporteth or according as King Ptolyme. as writeth, they were thirty thousand foot, and five thousand men of armes : or as Anaximenes purties it down, his Army amounted to fourty thousand three hundred footmen, and five thousand five hundred horsemen. Now all the glorious means and great provision for the maintenance, and entertainment of this powermore or leffe, which fortune had prepared for him, came to feventy talents : as Ariflabulus hath for it down in writing, or as Duris recorders, he was fornished with money and victuals to ferve for thirty dates and no longer. How then? was Alexander fo inconfiderate, rash and void of counsel, as to enterprise War with so small means, against sopuissant an Army of the Persians? No I wis: for never was there Captain, that went forthto War better appointed and with greater and more inflicient helps than he, to wit, magnaniusty, printence, temperance, and fortitude, wherewith Philosophy had furnished him, as with manieton for his voyage: as being better provided for this enterprise against the Persians, by that which he had fearned of his Master and Teacher Aristoste, than by all parrimony and revenews which his father Philip had left him. Well, to believe those who write, that Alexander himself would otherwhile say, that the llias and Odyssea of Homer accompanyed him alwaies as his voyage provision to the Wars, we may be easily enduced, for the reverence and honour which we owe unto Homer: but if a man should say, that Homers Ilias and Odyssa, were unto him an easement of his travels, or an honest pastime and recreation at his leasure, and that the true munition and voyage provision indeed for the maintenance of his Wars, were the discourses and precepts which he had learned out of Philosophy, and the treatifes or commentaries as touching confidence and fearlest resolution : of prowesse, valour, magnanimity and temperance, we are ready to mock and deride him; and why fo? because for footh he hath written nothing of Syllogismes, of Axiomes, or of the elements and principles of Geometry; because he hath not used to walk in the School of Lycen, not held positions and disputed of questions in the Academy : for these be the things whereby they measure and define Philosophy, who think that it confisteth in words and not in deeds. And yes Pythagoras never writ ought, nor Socrates, nor Arcefilaus, no nor Carneades : who all, no doubt, were most renowned Philosophers: neither were they imployed and occupied in so great Wars, in reducing Barbarous things to civility, or in founding and building great Cities, among (avage Nations; neither traveled they through the world vificing lawlesse and cruel people, to teach them to live peaceably and in order, who had never heard of peace or of laws: but these great and famous personages, for all the leasure and rest that they had from imployments and busse affairs, less all writing for Sophisters only. How and ref that they had from importants and once anairs, tert all writing for sopritiers only. How came it then, that they were reputed Philosophers? Surely it arose either upon their sayings which they delivered, or the manner of life that they led, and the actions which they did, or else the detrine which they taught. Let us now therefore judge of Alexander also accordingly, by the same: for it will be found and feen by the words which he faid, the deeds that he wrought, and the leffons which he be found and continued to the state of the s the scholars of Plate or of Socrates. These men taught those, who were of quick wit, and spak the fame language that they did; and if they had nothing elfe, yet understood they at leastwife the Greek tongue: howbeit for all this, many of their auditours and disciples there were whom they could never perswade to their rules and precepts : but such as Critias, Alcibiades, Cleftiphon, r. jecked and shook offall their doctrine, as the bitte of a bridle, and turned another way. Whereas, if you mark and confider the discipline of Alexander, you shall finde, that he taught the Hyrcanians to contract Marriage and live in Wedlock; the Arachofians to Til the ground and follow husbandry; the Sogdians he perfinaded to nourish their aged Fathers, and not to kill them; the Persians to reverence and honour their Mothers, and not to Marry them as they did before. O the admirable Philosophy of this Princ: ! By means whereof, the Indians adore and worship the gods of Greece: the Scythians bury their dead and ear th:m not. We wonder at the powerful and effectual speech of Carneades, for that he knew how to make Clitomachus, named before Afdrubal, and a Carthaginian born, to conform himself to the Greeks fashion and language. We admire the emphatical gift of Zeno, who was able to perfunde. Diogents the Baby-lonian, to give himfelf to the fludy of Philosophy. But while Alexander conquered Afra, and educed it to civility, Homer was read ordinarily : the fons of the Persians, Susians, and Gedrosians, chanted the Tragedies of Euripides and Sophocles. As for Socrates, condemned he was and put to death by the Athenians, at the fute of sycophants and promoters, who enformed against him, that he had brought into Athens new gods : whereas by the means of Alexander, the inhabitants of Battra and the Mountain Caucalus, even at this present, adore the gods of Greece. Plate hath left in writing one form of Policy and Government of Common wealth, but he could never perswade so much as one man to tile and follow it, so harsh and austere it was found to be. But Alexander having founded above threescore and ten Cities among the barbarons Nations, and fowen throughout all Afia, the mysteri. s, facrifices, and ceremonies of Divine fervice which were used in Greece, reclaimed them from their favage and brutish life. And verily, few there be among us, who read and peruse the laws of Plato: whereas there be infinit thousands and millions of men, who have used, and do at this day practice those of Alixon anders ordaining: and such Nations were much more happy whom he conquered and subdued, than they that escaped his puissance. For these had never any person who eased and delivered them out of their miserable life, but the other were forced by the conquerour to lead a bleffed life; in such fores as that which Themistocles sometime said, when being banished out of Athens, and fled to the King of Perfia, at whose hands having received rich gifts, and the donation besides of three Cities which paid him yeerly tribute, one for bread, another for wine, and the third for his meat and other viands; he fpake thus unto his fons : Oh, how had we been undone, if we had not been undone ! The fame may more justly be verified of those who were then subdued by Alexander: Never had they been civilized. if by him they had not been vanquished and brought under his subjection: there had been no City Alexandria built in Egypt; no Seleucia in Mesopotamia; no Propothasa in the Sogdians Countrey; no Bucephalia among the Indians; neither should the mountain Cacausius have had necrunto it the City. Hellas, inhabited and peopled s by the means of which Cities, their rude bestiality being first staied and held under, by little and little was extinct, and by cultom of the better, changed the worle. To conclude therefore, if Philosophers stand most upon this point, and bear themselves alost, for that they are able to dulce and reform rude manners, and not polished before by any doctrine. And if it be seen that Alexander hath altered and brought into order an infinite number of wilde Nations, and beaftly natures, good reason there is, that he should be effected an excellent Philosopher.

Moreover, that Policy and form of Government to highly effected, which Zeno the first founder of the Stoicks feet devised, tendeth to this one principal point, that we who are men, should not live divided by Cities, Towns and divers Countries, separated by diffinet Laws, Rights, and Customs in feveral, but think all men our fellow-Citizens, and of the same Countrey : also that there ought to be but one kinde of life, like as there is but one World, as if we were all of the same flock under one herdman, feeding in a common paffure. Zeno hath fet this down in writing, as a very dream and imaginary Idea, of a Common-wealth well-governed by Philosophical laws; but Alexander hath put that in real execution and practice, which the other had figured and drawn out in words : for he did not as his Mafter Aristotle gave him counsel to do: namely, to carry himself towards the Greeks as a father; and towards the Barbarians as a Lord : likewife, to have regard and care of fome, as of his friends and kingfolk; but to make use of others, as if they were brute beasts or plants, and no better; for in so doing, he should have pestered his Dominions and Empire with banishments; which are evermore the secret feeds of War, of Factions and fidings most dangerous; but taking himfelf to be fent down from Head ven, as a common reformer, reconciler, and governour of the whole World; such as he could not draw to accord and agreement, by reason and speech, he compelled by force of armes, and so from every fide reduced all into one; cauling them to drink round (as one would fay) of one and the fame cup of amity and good fellowhip, wherein he tempered and mixed cogether, their lives and manners, their marriages and fathions of life, commanding all men living to think the whole Earth babitable, to be, their Countrey, his Camp their Citadel and Caffle of defence; all good men to be their kinsolk and alies, all leud perfons, strangers and aliens. He commanded them moreover, to diffinguish Greeks and Barbarians, not by their Mantle, round Targuet, Cemeter, Turbants, or high-crowned Chaplets; but to mark and differn Greece by vertue; Barbary by vice: in reputing all vertuous folk Greeks, and all vicious persons Barbarians: to think also their habilliments and apparel common, their tables common, their marriages besides and manner of life common, as being united all, by the mixture of bloud and communion of children. Demaratus verily the Corinthian, one of the friends that used to give entertainment to King Philip, when he law Alexander in the City of Sufa, greatly rejoyed thereas, infomuch as for very joy of heart, the teares ran down his cheeks, and he brake forth into these words: That the Greeks before departed out of this life, were deprived of exceeding contentment, and licarts delights; in that they had not seen Alexander sitting upon the regall Throne of Darius. For mine delights; in that they had not teen Alexander litting upon the regail Intone of Dariul. For mine own part verily, I would not repute them very happy, for feeing fuch a fight as that, confidering it the gift of Fortune, and as much as that befalleth ordinarily to meaner Kings: but I affure you, much pleafure could have taken, if I had beheld those goodly and facred eipoufals, when under the roof of one Pavilion, feeled all over, and wrought with Gold, he entertained at once, all at one common Feaft and Table, a hundred Perfian Brides, married to an hundred Bridegromes of Griece and Macedonie: at which folemnity himself being Crowned with a Chaplet of flowers, was the full that began to fing the Nuptial fong Hymenzus, as a canticle of general amity, when two of the greateft and most puissant Nations of the World came to be joyned in alliance together by Marriage, being himfelf fponse unto one, but the maker of all their Marriages, yea, and common father and media-tour to them all, being the means of that knot and conjunction. For willingly I would have said; Obarbarous, senselesse and blockish Xerxes, that tookest so great paines, and all to no purpose, about making a Bridge over Hellmons. For after this manner should wife Kings and predent Princes, conjoyn Europe and Affa together, not with wood and timber; not with boats and barget, nor with those linkes and bonds which have neither life nor mutuall affection; but by lawfull love, by chafte and honest wedlock, by communication also of children, to unite and affociate two Nations together. To this comely ornament Alexander had an eye, when he would not admit the habili-ments and robes of the Medes, but the attire and apparell of the Persians, as being far more sober, model and decent than the other: for rejecting and cafting afide that outlandish, unusal pompous and tragical excesse in the barbarous habit, to wit, the copped Turbant, Tiara, the side and superfluous purple mantle Candies, their wide breeches and flack floppes Anaxyride; he wore himfelf a certain kinde of robe, composed partly of the Macedonian, and in part of the Persian habit, according as Eratoftbenes hath written. As a Philosopher he made use of things indifferent, neither good simply, nor ill : and as a gracious Ruler and courteous King, he wan the love and heart of those whom he had Indued, by gracing and honouring upon his own perfor their apparel : to the end that they should continue fast unto him, and firm in loyalty; loving the Macedonians as their natural Lords, and not hating them, as tyrannizing enemies. For it would have bewraied a foolish mind, and withall difdainful and proud, to have made great account of a felf-coloured homely mantle, and withall, to have taken offence at a rich coat, embrodered all over with purple; or contrariwife, to have had this in admiration, and the other in contempt; like unto fome infant or little shild, keeping still precisely to that apparell, which the custome of the Countrey as a Nurse or Foster mother hath once put on : whereas we fee, that huntimen who use to chace Deere, are wont to clad themfelves with skines and hides of those wilde beafts which they have taken; as for example, of Stagges and Hindes : Foulers also, that lie for to catch Birds, cast upon themselves, gabardines, and coates of featherwork, or befee wish wings and feathers. Those who wear red clothes, beware how they come in the way of Buls : and fuch as be clothed in white, are as carefull not to be feen of Elephants, for that these beasts fare as though they were wood and mad at the fight of such colours. Now, if so great a King as Alexander was, minding to tame warlike Nations, like unto wilde beafts, or to dulce and keep their gentle, who were so sierce and untractabee, used those Robes and Habilliments which were proper, u vial, and familiar to them; and all to gain their hearts by little & little, mollifying by that means the fierceness of their courage, pacifying their displeasure, and dulcing their grimness and auflerity: Would any man blame or reprove, and not rather honor and admire his Politick wildom. in that with a little change and altering of his garments, he had the dexterity and skill to gain all Afia, and lead it as he would, making himself, thus by his Armor, Master and Lord of their bodies; and by his apparel alluring and winning their hearts. And yet these men commend Aristippus the Philosopher, and Dicciple of Secretes, for that one while wearing a poor, thin and threadbare closk, and another while putting on a rich mantel of Tiffew wrought and died at Miletuis, he knew how to keep decurum, and decently to behave himself, as well in the one garment as the other: mean while, they blame and condemn Alexander, in that as he honored the habit of his own Countrey, so he disdained not the apparel of another, which he had conquered by Arms, intending thereby to lay the groundwork and foundation of greater matters: for his design and purpose was not to over-run and waste Afia, as a Captain and Ring-leader of a Rable of Thieves and Robbers would do, nor to fack and rack, harry and worry it, as the prey and booty of unpected and unhoped for felicity; like as afterwards Annibal did by Italy; and before time, the Trierians dealt by Ionia; and the Scythians by Afia, who made havock and waste as they went : but as one, who meant to range all the Nations upon earth, under the obedience of one and she same reason, and to reduce all men to the sume policy, as Citizens under Government of a Common-weal, therefore thus he composed and transformed himself in his rayment and habit. And if that great God, who fent the foul of Alexander from heaven to earth b. low, had not so suddenly called it away again unto himself; peradventure there had been but one Law to rule and overlook all men living, the whole world haply had been governed by one and the fame juffice, as a common light to illustrate all places: whereas now, those parts of the carth, which never had a fight of Alexander, remain in the shadow of darknes, as destitute of the very light of the Sun: and therefore the very first project of his expedition and voyage sheweth, that he carried the minde of a true Philosopher indeed, who aimed not at the gaining for himself dainty delights, and coffly pleafures, but intended to procure and compals an universal peace, concord, unity and society of all men living one with another.

In the second place consider we his words and sentences; for that in other Kings and Potentates alfo, their manners and intentions of their minde, are principally bewrayed by their speecher. Antigomentatics and Treatises which he had composed as touching Justice: Good fellow (quoth he) thou
of other Princes, and battering their walls as I do. Denys also the Tyrant was wont to say, that we should deceive children with Dies and Cockal-bones, but beguile men with oathes: And upon the Tomb of Sardanapalus was engraven this Epitaph:

What I dideat and drink, I have: the spots also remain Which Lady Venus did vouchsafe, all else I count but vain.

Who can deny, but that by the laft of those speeches and apophthegms, sensual lust and voluptuousness was authorized; by the second, Athelsm and impley; and by the sird, luistice and Avarice? Now if you take away from the sayings of Alexander his Royal Grown and Diadem, the addition of Jupiter Ammon whose son he was stiled to be, and the Nobility of his birth, cerees you would say they were the fage sintences of Socrates/Platope Physogras. For we must not stand upon the brave titles and proud inscriptions which Poets have devised to be imprinted or engraven upon his Pictures, Images and Statuers, baving an eye and regard not to shew the modesty, but to magnifie the putilince of Alexander: as for example;

This Image here that stands in brass so bright, Of Alexander is the Pourtrast right: Up toward because he both bis eyes dub cast, And unto Jove stems that to speak at last: Mines the earth, by conquest I it bold: Those Jupiter in heaven maist be bold.

Of Jupiter that heavenly God of might, The son am I (Great Alexander hight.)

These were the glorious Titles which glavering Poets, Isy, in flattery of his fortune fathered upon him. But if a man would recount the true apophthegms indeed of Alexandre, he may do well to be ginsfirst a those which he delivered in his childehood: so being in footmanship the switted of all other yong lads of his age, when his familiar play-feeres and mates were in hand with him very earnestly to run a course at the Olympian Games for a prize, he demanded of them again, whether he fould meet with Kings there for his concurrents in the race; and when they answered, No: Then were the match (quoth he) not equally nor indisferently made, wherein if I have the worse, a King hall be foiled; and if I gain the victory, I shall but conquer private persons. When his father Philip chanced in a battel against the Triballians to be run thorow the thigh with a Lance; and albeit, that he escaped danger of death, yet was much much grieved and dismayed to limp and halt thereupthat he steaped danger of death, you was much through growing and bart therein on as he did : Be of good chear, good father (quoth he) and go abroad hardly in the fight of the whole on as he did: he or good canear, good sainer (quota in) and go be put in minde of your valour and ver-world, that at every flep you tread and fea forward, you may be put in minde of your valour and ver-ue. How ay you now, proceed not shefe words from a Philosophical minde? and flew they not use the word of the proceed not shefe words from a Philosophical minde? and flew they not an heart, which being ravished with a divine infinite and ardent love of good and honest things, carefu an neart, which being ravance while a givine minine and authority of good and about timing, careth not for the defects of the body? for how greatly, think you, joyed and gloried he in the wounds that he received in his own person, who in every of them bare the testimony and memorial of some Nation subdued, fome Battel won, of fome Cities forced by affail, or of fome Kings that yielded to his mercy Certes, he never took care to cover and hide his fears, but carried them about him, and flewed them wherever he went, as so many marks and tokens engraved, to testifie his vertue and prowels. And if at any time there grew fome comparison, either by way of serious disputation in points of learning, or in table talk, as touching the verses of Homer, which of them were best : when some seemed to commend this verse, others that, he would evermore prefer this, above all other :

'Αμφότος, ζασιλούς τ' αγαθος, κορίλούς τ' σιχμητής.

A Prince right good and gracious, A Knight withal most valourous, as making this account, that the praise which another had given to King Agamemson beforetime, frood as maning time account; infomuch, as he would fay, that Hower in that one verse had recommended the vertue of Agamemon, and prophefied the prowels of Alexander. And therefore, so often ashe paffed over the Streight of Hellespont, his manner was to go and visit Troy, where he represented unto his own minde, the worthy feats of Arms which shofe brave Princes and noble Worthies performed, who fought there. And when one of that Countrey promifed to beflow upon him in freegift, if he would accept it, the Harp of Paris: I have no need (quoth he) of it, for I have already, that of Achilles ; to the found whereof he was wont for his recreation,

and Balads of love Now most certain it is, that to love wisdom, and to have in esteem, Sages and Learned persons is an infallible fign of a Philosophical fpirit. And this was in Alexander, if ever in any other Prince : for what kindenels and affection he carried to his Tutor and Master, Aristotle; also, that he did as great honor unto Anaxarchus the skilful Mufician, as to no favorite and familiar friend the like; I have already shewed elsewhere. The first time that ever Pyrrho the Elian talked and conferred with him, he gave unto the man ten thousand pieces of gold. Unto Xenocrates one of Platoss Disciples, num, ne gave unto the man con thomas passes a good through the form of the first prefer to fifty talents. And as most Historiographets do report, he made Onigirins, one of Diogenes his Scholars, his Admiral at Sea. And himself meeting upon a time with Diogens at Corintb, where he communed with him, he fo wondered at his manner of life, and had his gravity in fuch admiration, that many a time after, in speaking of him, he would say, Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes: which was as much to say as thus, I could willingly employ my whole life, and I would be Dingens: which was a manufacture of the property of preserred Fortune besore Wisdom; nor the Purple Mantle of Estate, or the Royal Diadem, besore a Scrip, and a poor threadbare Philosophers Cloak; but simply this was his saying, Were I not Alexe ander, I would be Diogenes; that is to fay, Had I not purposed to my felf to joyn together in mumil fociety, Barbarous Nations with the Greeks, and by travelling in voyage thorow the earth, to polish and make civil what favage people foever I finde, fearthing from one end of the world to another, and and make even what tay he people to ver a linear, sea coming nonstantena or the world to another and vifiting all the coasts of the Sea, to joyn Macedonie unto the Ocean, to low, as it were, Greece in all parts, and to spread thorowout all Nations peace and justice, yet would I not fit still idle in delights, parts, and to ipread the formulate the fimplicity and frugality of Diogenes. But now pardon me, I pray thee, O Diogenes: I follow Hercules, I take the way of Perfeus, I tread the trace of good Bacchus, my Stock-father and Author of my Race and Progeny; I would gladly, that the Greeks might once my stock father and nuture of my reactions and reduce into the memory and remembrance of those more dance with victory among the Indians, and reduce into the memory and remembrance of those Mountainers and Savage Nations who dwell beyond the Mountain Caucajus, the jollie feafts and memments of the Bacchanales. And even there, by report, there be those who follow a certain strichaustere and naked profession of wisdom, called thereupen Gymnosophists, holy men, living according to their own Laws, devoted altogether to a contemplative service of God, making less account of this life than Diogenes doth, and living more barely, as having no need at all of bag and wallet; for, no provifron make they of victuals, because the earth furnisheth them always with that which is new and fresh to their hand : the Rivers afford them drink ; the leaves falling from trees, and the green grafs of the earth together, serve for their beds: by my means shall they know Diogenes, and Diogenes them. I must also alter the stamp of the coyn, and instead of a Barbarian mark, sign it after the Greek manner, and according to their Commonwealth. Well, thus much of his words and fayings: Come we now to his deeds. And do they feem to carry before them the blinde raffiness and temerity of Fortune, and bare force of arms and violences of the hand? or rather, of the one fide, great prowefs and juffice; on the other fide, much clemency and lenity, together with good order and rate prudence, of one managing all things by fober, discreet and confiderate judgement? Certes, I am not able to fay and differn in all his acts thus much, as to pronounce, That this was a deed of valor; that, of humanity; and another, of patience or continence: but every exploit of his, feemeth to have been mingled and compounded of all vertues in one, to confirm the famous sentence and opinion of the Stoicks, That every act, a wife man doth effect by all vertues joynely together. True it is indeed. that in each action there is one vertue or other, eminent and predominant always above others; buc the same inciteth and directeth the rest to the same end ; and even so we may see in the acts of Alexander. That ashis martial valour is humane, so his humanity is valorous; his hounty is thrifty, his libera-lity frugal; his choler soon appeased, his heat quickly cold; his loves temperate, his passimes not idle; and his travels not without their folace and recreation; who, evermore tempered feafts with war, miittary expeditions with games, masks and sports; who interlaced among his sieges of Citier, Warlike exploits and executions, festival Bacchanals, Wedding and Nuptial Songs of Hymeneus. Who was there ever, greater enemy to those that do wrong, or more merciful and gracious to the afflicted? Who ever carried himself more heavy to stiff-necked and obstinate persons; and more friendly again, to humble Suppliants? And here in this place it comes into my minde, for to allege and cite the faying of King Forus, who being brought Prisoner before King Alexander, and demanded by him, in what manner he wished that he should him: Royally (quoth he) O Alexander. And when Alexander replyed again, and asked what he had elfe to fay, Nothing, quoth Pows; for in that one word, Royal, is comprized all. And even fo, methinks, that in all the actions of Alexander, a man may use this for a reffrein or faburden, All Philosophically. For this indeed containeth all. He was enamored of Roxane the daughter of Oxiathres, by occasion that he saw her to dance with a good grace among other captive Ladies: howbeit, he would not force her, nor offer any violence to her ditho-nor; but espouled her for his wife: wherein he did as a Philosopher. When he saw his enemy Datius lying dead, with many an arrow and dart flicking in his body, he neither facrificed to the gods, nor founded the triumph for joy, that folong a war by his death was come to an end; but taking the mande from his own flouders, cash to over the dead corps, as if he would thereby have covered and hidden the world definy of a King. And this also was done like a Philinsopher. He received one day a Letter of Secrets from his own Mother, which whiles he perufed, it chanced that Hephaftion alfolitting at that time by him , read it simply together with him, and thought nothing, Alexander debarred him not; onely he took the fignetfrom his own finger, fet it to his mouth, fealing, as it were, his filence, by the faith that he owed unto a friend. See how herein he shewed the part of a Philosopher: for if these be not Philosophical acts, I know not what else be. Socrates was well enough content, that fair Alcibiades should lie with him; but Alexander, when Philozenus his Lieutenant General over the Sea coasts of Asia, wrote unto him, that there was a yong Boy within his Government in Ionia, for sweet favor and beauty incomparable, demanding of him by his Letters to know his pleasure, whether he should send the said Youth unto him, he wrote sharply unto him, in this wife : What haft thou known by me, most leud and wicked Varlet as thou art, that thou shouldst prefume thus to allure and entice me with fuch pleafures? Xenocrates we have in admiration, for turning back a prefent of fifty talents, which Alexander fent unto him; and shall we not wonder as well at the giwe' finall we not think, that he made as small account of money, who gave so liberally as he want to get it? Xenocrates had no need of riches, professing as he did Philosophy; but Alexander had use therefore, even in regard of Philosophy, because he might exercise his liberality in bestowing the same so bountially upon such persons. We honor the remembrance of those, who have left behinde them testimonies of their contempt of death: and how often, think you, hath Alexander delivered as much when he faw the darts and arrows flying fo thick about his ears, and himfelf preffed hard upon by the violence of enemies? We are perswaded verily, that there is in all men whatfoever, some light of found judgement, for that nature herself frameth them to discern that which is good and honest: but a difference there is between the common fort and Philosophers, for that Philosophers excel the reft in this, that their judgements be more firm, fettled and refolute in dangers than others; whereas the vulgar fort are not armed and fortified beforehand with fuch deep impressions and resolutions as

Eર્દે, હેલ્થ છે. લેલ છે, &c. The best presage by augury and bird-flight, Is, in defence of Countrey for to fight. Again,

This full account all men must make, By death one day their end to take.

But the occurrences and occasions of perils presented unto them, do break their discourse of reason; and the imaginations of dangers imminent, do drive out all counfel and confiderate judgement. For fear doth not onely masker and aftonish the memory, as Thucydides saith, but also driveth out every good intention, all motions and endeavors of well-doing; whereas Philosophy bindeth them fait with cords round about, that they cannot fir.

The lecond Oration.

The Summary.

Plutarch doth projecute in this Declamation, the Argument and Discourse begun in the former: the sum whereof is this, That the Vertue of Alexander surmounted his Fortune, which was always in manner contrary unto him. But before that he entreth into this matter, he opposeth unto the sufficiency and singular parts trary unto him. But before that he entreth into this matter, he opposeth unto the sufficiency and singular parts of this Prince, the hase demeaner and bruiss with any of certain other Kings and Potentates, adjoying over and besides thus much. Then allowed his exercises and employments, are prooffery one of his haughty courage and magnaminty. Then discounsed he particularly, in what account and reputation good Worknen were with Mexander, and whose his self-conceit was of his own works in comparison of theirs. Asserting he comain to see his he will be found, to be solvey thandy-work of Valor and Fortisted. In proceeding sorward, he saith, That sortine received more bothe very handy-work of Valor and Fortisted. In proceeding sorward, he saith, That sortine received more bother works and the self-consecution of the consideration of the soil cear and illustrate the former points and matters handled. And by the consideration of the coil carriage and government of many other princes, as the a soil he eines he wood beautiful suftre unto the Vertues of Alexander. which he decombount Princes, at by a foil, he giveth a most beautiful lustre unto the Vertues of Alexander, which be decyphereth in particular. This done, he answereth those, who objett that Fortune raised Alexander to that greatness. in particular. Introduced to can prefer to the reasons by thin produced, he disputely against Fortune her And to give the mightier force and weight to the reasons by thin produced, he disputely against Fortune her fell; wherethe examines his several exploits, wherein as Vertue is evidently seen to accompany and asset fell; wherethe examines his several exploit. And this doth be particularize at large. After this Digressian for Fortune to oppose her self and ressit him. And this doth be particularize at large. he cometh again to his precedent mauter, and bringeth out new proofs of the vertue and magnanimity of this ne conteto again to un precuent municity and the staying day; comparing him as a Paragon, with the mighty Monarch; even from his youthunto his dying day; comparing him as a Paragon, with the might mighty Monarch; even from his youthunto his dying day; comparing allo, that he furpaffish them all, Saget, and most valiant Warriors both of Pectia and of Greece; Shewing allo, that he furpaffish them all, ouget, and most variant reaction, sould return and Occess, societing upg to the supragree term also in Continency, Librality, Piety, Pradence, Justice, Beneficence and Valor. For the Inf point, be related the great jeopardy wherein Alexander was plunged one time among the rest, out of which, Vertue carifed him to retire fales, at it were, in despite of Fortune; which is the very conclusion of this Teatisf, confirming the principal intention of our Author, which is to prove that the forefaid Grandeur of Alexander ought not to be aferibed unto Fortune, but to Vertue.

The Fortune or Vertue of King Alexander.

The Second Oration.

E forgat yesterday (as it should seem) among other matters to say, that the age wherein E forgat yelterday (as it thould feem) among other matters to tay, that the age wherein Alexander lived was in this respect happy, for that it brought forth many excellent Airs, and as many great and singular wite: or rather it may be said, that this was not so much the good fortune of Alexander, as of those Coloning Artisas and rate Spirita, to have for their Witness and Specaror such a personage, who both knew best how to judge truly of good work-messing, and also was most able to reward the same as liberally. And verily to this purpose reported it is, that sometime after, in the age enfuing, when Archestratus a fine headed Poet and a plassant, that is measured to the same surpose of the same and a many standard any medicants of this to his defers, there came lived in great want and penury, for that no man made any reckoning of him to his defect, there came one unto him, and faid, Had it been thy hap Archefiratus, to have lived in the days of Alexander, he would for every verse of thine, have bestowed upon thee either Cyprus or Phanice. Certes, for mine own part, thus I conceive of it, that the Artificers and Workmen living in that age, became fo famous and excellent, not so much under Alexander, as by Alexander. For it is the good temperature of the weather, and subtilty of the ambient ayr, that causeth abundance and plenty of fruits: but the gracious countenance, the favor, honor, bounty and humanity of a Prince, is it that pro-but the gracious countenance, the favor, honor, bounty and humanity of a Prince, is it that pro-voketh and firreth up good Arts, yea, and advanceth excellent wirs: whereas contrartivite all the fame languisheth, decayeth, is extinguished and perisheth clean by the envy, avarice, spary pinching, and peevish frowardness of Rulers, and those in Authority. And here I must call to minde the report that goeth of Dionyfius the Tyrant, who hearing one day a famous Minfrel playing passing well upon the Lute, and as sweetly singing thereto, said openly, that he would bestow upon him for a reward a talent of silver. The morrow after comes this Musician to call for the money according to promise: Unto whom

The fortune or vertue of King Alexander.

Dionyfius made this auswer, Sirra (quoth he) yesterday as I took contentment by thee so long as I heard thee play and fing, fo I am fure I did thee a pleasure again in the hope of this promise: Thou were payed therefore prefently for the delight which thou gavest me, by the joy that thou receiveds from me: go thy ways therefore, thou hast thy reward already. Alexander, the Tyrant of Ptera (whom indeed I should call by this addition onely, Tyrant, and not stain and contaminate so good a name as Alexander, by stilling therewith so wicked a wretch:) This Tyrant, I say, while she beheld one day an excellent Player acting in a Tragedy, was so much moved with a certain tickling delight coming upon him, that his heart began to relent even upon a tender commiseration and pity: whereupon he fuddenly lefe the Theater, made hafte away, and went fafter than an ordinary pace until he was out of light, faying withal, thatit were a great indignity for him to be feen for to weep and thid tears, in compassion of the miseries and calamities of Queen Hecuba, or Lady Polyxena, who every day caused formany Citizens and Subces throats to be cut. This monstrous Tyrant was so mischievcusly bent, than he went within a little of punishing that excellent Actor most grievously, because he had mollified his hard heart, and made it melt like a piece of iron in the surnace. Archelaus King of Macedonie, seemed to be not very free of gift, whereupon Timotheus the Musician finging to the Hirp, would eftloons glance at him, and iterate this pretty (coff as the foot of his Song;

This earth-bred metal, filver bright You's praise Sir, as your whole delight.

Ateas a King of the Scythians, having taken prisoner in war, that famous Minstrel Ismenias, commanded him to found upon his Flute or Pipe, whiles he fate at dinner. Now when all the company befides wondred at his excellent mulick, and applauded him for his good playing, he himself sware a great oath, that he took more pleasure to hear his horse neigh, so unmusical were his ears, and so far removed from the Muses: so much also was his minde setupon the stable and manger, sitter indeed to hear Assably say, than Horses neigh. What honor then or advancement may a cunning Artizan, or so absolute a Mafter in mulick hope for at the hands of fuch Kings? Certes no more than from those who would feem themselves to be skilful, yea, and dare contend with Profession the sufficiency of their Art; and therefore upon envy or malice feek to overthrow and deprave those that indeed be excellent Artisls. Such an one was Diemfins abovenamed (whom here I mult bring in again) who caused the Poet Philoxenis to be cast into the Prison or Dungeon called Latomie, that is to say, the Quarries, because when Dionysius had put into his hands a Tragedy of his own making, commanding him to review and correct the fame, he dashed it out and interlined it all from the beginning to the end. And even Philip allo King of Macedonis, for that late it was tre by gave his minde to mufick; was in this behalf unlike himfelf, and not answerable to his greatness otherwise. Howbeit, upon an opinion that he had of his own skill that way, he would needs (as the report soes) enter into disputation with a professed Musician and Player of Instruments, and argue about the strokes and stops, points and notes, and such like terms, yea, and seem for sooth to control him inhis own Artswhereat the Minstrel smiling pleasantly upon him: God forbid Sir (quoth he) that you a King, should ever be so unfortunate, and at so low an ebb, as to have more skill in these matters than I. But Alexander knowing full well what things he should be a Spectator and Auditor of, as also what he ought himself to practise and execute with his own hand, studied continually to be expert and accomplished in seats of Arms, endeavoring, as the Poet Aschylus faith,

Most manfully bis standing, good to make : And terribly to force his fees to quake.

And this indeed was the Hereditary Art which he received by succession from his Ancestors Eacidas and Hercules: as for other Sciences, he honored them in other men, without any emulation at all for their profession: and as he highly commended any excellency or grace therein, so for no pleasure and delight that he took thereby, was he easily surprized with any affection for to follow the same. In his time there flourished two noble Tragedians above the rest, Thessalus and Athenodorus; who when they contended one against another for the prize, who could act the better, the Kings of Cyprus defrayed the charges belonging to this folemu spectacle and pageant; but the principal and most renowned Captains, were Judges to decide the quarrel. In the end, when Athenodorus was declared Victor; Alexander, who flood better affected to Theffalus: I would I had (quoth he) loft the one half of my Kingdom, fo I had not feen Theffalus take the foil; howbeit, he neither expostulated with the Umpiers, nor complained of their judgement; for howfoever he thought that himfelf ought in other respects to outgo all, yet he was to yield and give place to Justice. Among Comedians in those days, there was one Lycon a Scarphean: This Actor in playing his part before him in a Comedy, had interlaced handsomely a Verse, wherein he seemed cleanly to crave some reward : Alexander laughed at the conceit of the fellow, and gave him ten Tallents. Many excellent Harpers there were, and Players of the Lute, and one Aristonicus among others, who in a certain battel running into rescue and succor him, fought manfully, and there was flain, and fell dead at his foot: Alexander hereupon caufed his Statue to be made in brass, and to be set up in the Temple of Apollo Pythins, holding a Luce in the one hand, and a Lance in the other. In so doing he not onely honored the man, but also mufick, as being an Art which breedeth animolity in mens hearts, filling those with a certain ravishment of spirit and couragious heart to fight valiantly, who are naturally framed and bred up to action:

for even himself one day, when Antigenides sounded the battel with his flute, and singing thereto a military fong, called Harmation, was thereat fo much moved, and fet in fuch an heat by his warlike sune, that he flatted out of the place where he fate, and caught up the arms that hung up theseby, ready to brandish them and to fight, bearing witness thereby to the Spartans, chaunting thus;

There lived also in the time of Alexander, Apelles the Painter, and Lysippus the Imager: the former of these two, painted Alexander holding a thunderbolt in his band, but so exquisitely to the life, and fo like unto himself, that it was a common saying; Of two Alexanders, the one, King Philips son, was invincible; the other of Apilles drawing, was inimitable. As for Lysppus, when he had cast the first Image of Alexander, with his face up toward heaven, expressing thereby the very countenance of Alexander, who was wont fo to look, and withal, to turn his neck fomewhas at one fide; there comes me one, and fetteth over it this Epigram, alluding very prettily to the faid Pourtraicture:

This image here that stands in brass all bright, The Pourtraid is of Alexander, right: Up toward beaven, be both his eyes doth cast, And unto Tove feems thus to fpeak at laft : Thou Jupiter in beaven maift well be bold: Mine is the earth, by conquest I it bold.

And therefore Alexander gave commandment, that no other Brafa Founder, should cast his Image, but they Lyfippus: for he alone it was (as it should feem) that had the feat to represent his natural difposition in brase, and to express his versue answerable to the lineaments and proportion of his shape. As for others, how foever they might be thought to refemble the bentling of his neck, the cherrial call an amiable volubility of his quick eyes yet could they never observe and keep the virility of vifage, and amiable volubility of his quick eyes yet could they never observe and keep the virility of vifage, and Lyon-like look of his. In the rank of other rare workmen, may be ranged a famous Archive, named Stafferates, who would not feem to busiehimfelf in making any thing, that was either gallant and pleasant, or delectable and gracious to the eye; but intended some great matter, and such a piece of work, and of that argument, as would require no less than the riches and treasure of a King to furnilh and fet forth. This fellow comes up to Alexander, being in the high Countreys and Provinces of his Dominion, where before him he found fault with all his images, as well painted and engraven, as cast and pourtraied any way; saying, they were the hand-works of base minded and Mechanical as care and pourtraited any way, a syntage state of the majeries, know how, and do intend to found Artificers: But I (quoth he) if it may pleafe your Majeries, know how, and do intend to found and eftablish the similar de of your Royal Person, in a matter that is living and immortal, grounded upon termal roots, the weight and ponderosity whereof is immoveable, and cannot be shaken: For the Mountain Athat (queth he) in Thracia, whereas it is greates, and rifeth to a most conspicuous height; where the broad plains and high tops are proportionate to it felf every way; having in it, height; where the broad plains and high tops are proportionate to it felf every way; having in it, members, lims, joynts, diffances, and intervals, refembling for all the world, the form of man body, may be wrought and framed fo, as it would ferve very well both to be called, and to be indeed, the Statue of Alexander, and worthy his greatness: the foot and base whereof, shall south the Sea; in one of the hands comprehending and holding a great City peopled and inhabited by an infinite none of the Bands comprehending and nothing a great Chry peopled and inhabited by an inhabite number of meny and in the rights, a running River, with a perpetual current, which is pourcett, sait were, out of a great Pot into the Sea: As for all thefe perty Images and Puppers made of gold, braft, and ivory, these wooden Tables with Pictures, away with them all, as little pattery Pourcetts, which may be bought and fold, Thief-follen and melted, defaced and marred. Alexander having heard the may be bounded and tools, and the state of t of the outragious pride, infolent vanity and folly of one King already: and at for me, the Mountain Caucajus, the Hills Emodi, the River Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, shall be the Images and Statues to represent my acts. But set the case, I pray you, that such a piece of work had been made and finished as this great Architect talked of: is there any man, think you, feeing is in that form, disposition, and fashion, that would think it grew so by chance and adventure? No I warrant you. What say we now to his Image called Ceraunophorus, that is to fay, the Thunderbolt bearer? what fay we to anonow to its image cancer. Annoymous a tanget of the read of the rea we think it then possible, that a great personage, nay, rather the greatest that ever she world saw, was made and personage that ever she world saw, was made and personage that ever she world saw, was made and personage that ever she world saw, was made and personage that ever she world saw, was made and personage that ever she world saw, was provision of Arms, of money, of men, Cities, and Horses: All which things, bring peril to those than know not how to use them well; and neither honor and credit, nor puissance, but rather argue their feebleness and impuissance. For Antilibines faid, very well and truly, that we should wish unto our enemies all the good things in the world, fave onely valour and fortitude: for by that means they be not theirs who are in prefens possession of them, but become theirs who are the Conquerors. And this is the reason men fay, that nature bath set upon the head of an Hart for his desence, the most heartless and cowardly Beast that is, wonderful horns for bigness, and most dangerous by reason of their sharp and branching knags: teaching us by this example, that bodily strength and armor, serveth them in no flead, who have not the courage and resolution to fland their ground, and fight it out. And even thus we fee, that forcune many times by heaping upon heartlefs cowards, and witlefs fools, a great educe of riches and dominion, which they know not how to weld, and wherewith they difcredit themfelves, doth honor and grace vertue, as upon which onely dependeth all the puissance, all the worshios glory, and reputation of men; for if, as Epicharmus faith,

The minde it is that feeth clear, And tis the minde that eke doth hear, then all the reft are blinde and deaf, which be void of reason : for the senses seem verily to have their proper and peculiar functions. Now, that the minde is all in all, that the minde is available in all brings, that the mind difpofeth every thing in good order, that it is the mind which conquereth, which rolleth and reigneth over all; and whatfoever befide, blinde, deaf, and without life, do brinder, deprefe, and diffionor the poffeffors thereof, if vertue be away, may be proved and exemplified by the experience and courfe of worldly affairs: for by the fame patifiance and command, Semiramis being but a woman, rigged and manned Armadoes at Saa, leavied and armed main battels of Land Forces, built Babylon, fcoured and conquered all the coaft of the Red-sea, subdued and brought to her obedience the Arabians and Ethiopians : whereas Sardanapalus, a man born, fat within house at home. carding and spinning purple, tumbling and lying along, waltring among a fort of Concubines: And when he was dead, they made for him a Statue of stone, dancing by himself alone after the Barbarian fashion, and knacking (as it were) with his fingers over his head, like an Antique, with this Epigram

Eat, drink, the wanton Lecher play,

For nothing elfe is ought I sey.

Crates the Philosopher seeing upon a time within the Temple of Apollo Pythius at Delphi, the Image of Phyne the Courtezan, shrined all in gold, cryed out, Behold here stands the triumphant Trophic, over the loofe and lascivious life of the Greeks. But whosoever beholdeth the Life or Sepulture, whether you will (for in mine opinion there is no difference) of Sardanapalus, he may well and truly fay, Lothe Trophic of Fortunes goods. What then, shill we suffer Fortune after Sardanapalus to meddle with Alexander, and to challenge unto herself any part of his mightiness and puissance? That were no reason at all; for what gave she ever unto him, more than other Kings have received at her hands? whether it were armor, horfes, weapons, money, fouldiers, and a guard about their persons? Well, let her by these means make Ariddeus great if the can; let her magnific (I fay) by these means. Amasis, Ochus, Oarses, Tigranes the Armenian, and Nicomedes the Bithynian: of whom the one, to wit, Tigranes, flung down his Crown and Diadem at the feet of Pompeins, and shamefully lost his Kingdom, as a prey or escheat fallen into his enemies hand : the other, namely Nicomedes, having shaven his head, and wearing a cap upon it, declared himself thereby, tobe an affranchised Vastal of the Romans? What? Say we then, that Fortune maketh men Cowards, fearful, and base minded? Surely, it were no reason to impute Cowardize upon infortunity, no more than to attribute valour and wildom to prosperity. But well and truly may one say, that Fortune herself was grear, in regard of her Lord and Master Alexander: for in him she was glorious, invincible, and magnanimous; not proud nor infolent, but full of clemency and humanity: no fooner was the breath out of his body, but presently her power, that is to say, his Army and Forces, as Leosthenes said, wandring up and down stragling, and running upon it self, resembled that same Cyclops Polyphenius, who after his eye was out of his head, went groping all about, putting forth his hands before him, but not knowing where to lay them : For even the greatness of her pulffance, after he was once dead, went to and fro, wandring it wift not where, and flumbling ever and anon, wanting a Director and Governor, as in time of Anarchy, when there is no Soveraign Ruler known: or rather, it might be compared unto dead bodies, when the life is newly departed out of them. For like as the parts are not knit together, nor hold one to another any longer, but fall away one from the other, and loofely withdraw themfelves apart : every fo the Army of Alexander, after it had loft and forgone him, did no more but fprunt, pant, ftruggle and ftrive for life, tof and tumble to and fro, under the Perdiccaies, the Meleagers, the Scienci, the Antegoni, and I wot not whom, like unto fome small vital spirits, yet remaining hot, and bearing within the arteries here and there diforderly, and now and then like intermittent pulles, until fuch time as at the last it grew to putrefaction and corruption in manner of a dead caracle, and engen-deed worms cashing within it: i mean, such base Kings, degenerate Rulers and Captains who had no generality nor heart in them. Certes, Alexander himself in his life time rebuking Haphestion, when he quarreled with Craterus, tanted him, and took him up in this wife, What power haft thou of thy felf? what couldft thou do, and where wouldft thou be, if a man should take Alexander from thee? Semblably, I will not flick to fay thus unto the fortune of that time, What is thy greatness? what is thy glory? where is thy puiffance? where is thine invincible power, if one should bereave thee of Alexander? That is as much to fay, as if one should deprive thine Arms and Weapons, of skill and experience to use them , thy Riches, of Liberality ; thy Sumptuofity and Magnificence, of Temperance; thy Fights and Combats, of resolute Valour; thy Victories and Superiorities, of Mildeness and Lenity. Make any other great if thou canft, who bestoweth not his goods bountifully, who in the forefront of the Bartel hazzardeth not his own person hist before his Army, who honoreth not nor regardeth his friends, who taketh no pitty of his enemies captive, who is not in his pleafures continent, in his occasions and affairs vigilant, in his victories foon pacified, and casie to be compounded with, and last of all, who in his proprity and good fuccefs is not kinde and courteous. How can a man possibly be great, what power and authority so ever he have, if he be foolish, vicious, and wicked withal? for in one word, take vertue from a man otherwife fortunate, he is every way mean, and of base account; mean in his gifts and donations, by reason of nigardize; mean in his travels, in regard of his cowardize and tenderness; mean in the fight of the gods, because of his superstition; mean among good men, for his envy; mean with valiant warriors, in respect of his timorousness; and mean in the conceit of honest women, confidering his diffolute voluptuousness. For like as unskilful workmen, who set little statues upon great bases and large piedsals, shew thereby the smalness of their statues so much the more: even so when Fortuneralieth up a man of base minde into high place, and to an estate whrein he is to be seen of the whole world, she discoveres his wants, she discredite than dishonores him the rather, waving of the whole worth, means of the walls are underented and disking every way through his levity. So that, by this we mult confets, that greated lieth not in the bare profession, but in the well using of good things: For many times it falleth our, that very infants from their cradle, inherite the Realms and Seignories of their Fathers, like as Charillus did, whom Lycurgus his Uncle brought in his swadling bands into the Common Hall Phidition, where which is the Lords of Sparta were wontto dine together, fee him in the Royal Throne, and in the flead of himlelf, declared and proclaimed him King of Lacedemon. Now was not this Babe for all this, great: but he rather might be accounted a great person, who rendring unto the new born Infant his Fathers honor due unto him, would not intervert and derive it upon himself, and so defraud his Nephew thereof. As for Arideus, who could make him a great man, whom differing intruth nothing from a Babe, Meleager (wadled indeed and enwrapped onely within a purple Robe and Royal Mantle of Estate, and so enstalled him in the Throne of Alexander: wherein he did very well, to give the world to understand within a few days after, how men reign by vertue, and how by fortune : for he subrogated in the place of a true Prince that managed the Empire indeed, a very counterfeit Player and Actor of a Kings parts or to speak more truly, he brought a mute and dumb Diadem to walk through * Arifligh, the world for a time, as it were upon a Stage. The Comical * Poet faid;

A very woman may well a burden bear, If first a man upon ber do it rear.

But a man may contrariwise say, that a filly woman or a young childe may take up, yea, and charge upon the shoulders of another, a Seignory, a Realm, a great Estate and Empire, as Bagoas the Eunuch took and laid upon Oarses and Darius the Kingdom of the Persiana: Marry, when as one hath taken upon him a mighty power and domion, to bear, to weld and manage the same, and not under the weight and heavy load of affairs belonging thereto, to be overwhelmed, brused, or wrested awry: that is the act of a man endued with vertue, understanding and courage, such an one as Alexander was: howbeit some there be who reproach him that he loved wine too well, and would be drunk. But this great gift he had, that in his important affairs he was fober, neither was he drunk and overfeen, nor ever forgat himself, and grew to any outrage, for all the Puissance, Authority and Liberty that he had; whereof others when they had some part and little tafte, could not hold and contain themselves:

> No fooner are their purfes stuft With coyn; or they to honor broughts But they anon with pride are puit, And foon bewray that they be naught: They kick, they winfe, they fling and prance, None may fland fafely in their way, If Fortune once their house advance Some unexpected power to fray.

Clytus for having funk three or four Gallies of the Greeks, neer the Ille Amorgus, would needs be filled with the name of Neptune, and a three-tined Mace carried before him. Demetrius, upon whom Fortune had b:stowed a little skirt or lappet (as it were) which he tare from Alexanders Dominion, was well content to hear himseif called Jupiter, Kolascans, that is to fay, the Vawter. Cities f.nt unto him not Ambaffadors, but Theores, forfooth, that is to fay, especial persons deputed for to consult with the gods: And his answers to them, must be termed (I would not else) Oracles. And Lysimachus who held the coasts of Thracia, which was but the border or edge of Alexanders Kingdom, grew to that height of furly pride, and intollerable arrogancy, that he would break out into these words, Now the Biz ntines come to do homage unto me, feeing how I reach and touch the sky with my lance. At which for ech et his, Pasiades standing by, could not forbear, but say unto the company, Let us be gone, my Masters, with all speed, lest this man bore an hole in heaven with the point of his lance. But what should we speak more of these persons? who might be allowed in some fort to carry an haughty minde, and bear their heads aloft, in regard of Alexander, whose Souldiers they were? seeing that Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraelea, carried upon his Scepter as his device, the refemblance of lightning, and one of his fons he named x ex 1006, that is to fay, a Thunderbolt. And Denys the younger, called himfelf the fon of Apollo, in a certain Epigram to this effect :

Doris the Nymph, by Phechus did conceive,

And from them both my birth I do derive.

And in truth, Denys the elder, the natural father of this man, who put to death ten thousand of his own Citizens and Subjects (if not more) who for very envy betrayed his own brother into the hands of his enemics; who had not the patience to ftay for his own mothers death, an aged woman, and who by the course of nature, would have dyed within few days after, but smothered and stopped her breath; who also himself wrote in a Tragedy of his own making,
For why? know this, that Lordly Tyranny

The mother is of wrong and vilany, vet for footh, of three daughters which he had, named one Arete, that is to fay, Vertue; another, Sopbrofine, that is to fay, Temperance; and a third, Diccofine, that is to fay, Juffice. Some there were, who needs would be firnamed Euergete, that is to fay, Benefactors; othere, Seteres, that is to fay, Saviours. Some called themselves Callinici, that is to fay, Victorious; others, Megali, that is to fay, Great. And yet as glorious additions as they carried in their stiles, who is able to express in words, their marriages following thick one in the neck of another, frending the long day continually, like a fort of Stallions among a number of women, as if they had been a Stud of fo many Mares; their unkinde abusing of fair Boys, their violent rapes and enforcements of young Damosels, their drumming and taboring with a fort of effeminate and women-like wantons, their dice playing in the day time, their piping and founding the Flure in open Theaters, their nights spent in supers; and whole days in long dinners? But Alexander gas up, and sate to his dinner by the break of day, and went not to super before it was late in the evening; he defank and made good chear when he had first sacrificed to the gods; he played at dice with Midias, one time, while had a keyer upon him; his passimes and recreations were, to travel and march upon the way, and withal, to learn how to shoot an arrow, how to lance a dart, how to mount a chariot nimbly, and dismount again with facility. Roxane he espouled and wedded, onely for pure love, and to content his fancy and affection; but Statira the daughter of Darius he took to wife upon policy, because the state of his Kingdom and affairs required such a match; for expedient it was, thus to mix and unite two Nations together. As for other Ladies and women of Persia, he went as far beyond them in chassity and continence, as he did the Persian men in valor and fertitude; for he never would so much as fee one of them against her will; and those whom he faw he lefs regarded than fuch as he never fet eye upon: and whereas otherwife to all persons he was courteous and popular, to such onely as were fair and beautiful, he showed himself strange, and used them in tome fort proudly. At touching the wife of Darius, a Lady of typolling beauty, he would not endure for much at one word that tended to the praife thereof 5, yet, when his was dead, he performed the tunerals with fo fumptuous and Prince-like Oblequies, he mounted and bewailed her death fo pitioully, that as his kindencis in that behalf made the world mittruit and fuffect his challity, to his bountiful courtefie incurred the obloquy and imputation of injuffice. And verily, Darius was at the first moved to conceive jealousie and a finister opinion of him that way, considering he had the woman in his hands, and was belides, a gallant young Prince . for he also was one of them, who were perswaded that Alexander held the tenure of his mighty Dominion and Monarchy, by the goodness and favor of Fortune; but after he knew the truth once, upon diligent fearch and inquisition by all circumstances into the thing. Well (quoth le) the Rérains state I perceive is not utterly overstrown, neither will any man repute us plain cowards and effeminate persons, for being vanquissed to the same only of or mine own part, my sind, with and principal prayer must be gods is, that they would would file me fortunate fuccefs, and at the laft, an happy vidory of this war, to the end that I may furnious Alexander in beneficence; for an earnest defire Lhave and an estudiation to flow my fell more milde and gracious toward him, than he is to meward; but if all be gone with me and my house. then, O Impier; the Projector of the Perfiant, and ye, other titular gods and Patroni of Kings and Kings a what Victories are archieved by Verruga ther with the clattering of armor, right hardy and undaunted, as well as he, were Tarrias the fon of Dinoments, Ansigent of Pellen, and Philotas the fon of Parmenio: but against tickling pleasures, against the attractive allurements of women, against flattering filver and gold, they were no better, nor had more rule of themselves than flaves and captives. For Tarries at what time as Alexander unnor nau more rune of the Macedonians, and to make fatisfaction unto all those who had lens any money, fally belied himself, taying, he was in debt, and withal suborned and brought forth a any money, samy ones a many system and the same and the s felf away for very shame and compunction of heart, but that Alexander being advertised thereof pardoned his fault, yea, and permitted him also tokeep the filver fill, that he had disbursed for his counterfeit debt ; calling to minde, how at what time as his father Philip laid fiegge to the City Perintbus, the faid Tarrias in a skirmish was shoe into the eye, and would not suffer the same so be dref-fed, nor the shaft to be plucked forth, before the enemies were put to flight. Anigenes causing himself to be enrolled, and his name registred among others, who were sent back again from the Camp into Macedonie, by occasion of fickness or main, whereby they were not serviceable: being found afterward to all nothing, but to counterfeit ficknets, who otherwise was a good Souldier, and carried the marks of many a fear in his body to be feen, offended Alexander hereby; and when the King demanded the reason, why he had so done; he confessed by and by, that he was in love with a yong manuca mercanon way the purpoted to follow and accompany, being minded to go to the fa-woman named Telfipps, whom he purpoted to follow and accompany, being minded to go to the fa-coaff, for that he could not find in his heart to be far from her. Then Alexander asked him, to whom the wench appertained, and who was to be dealt with, forto make her flay : Antigenes answered, she was her own woman, and of free condition: Why then (quoth Alexander) let us perfivade her to tarry fill by fair promites, and good gifts; for in no wife force her we may. So eafie was he to pardon and bear with love, in any other rather than in himfelf. The first cause of the infortunate fall of Philotas the fon of Parmento, was in some fort his own intemperance : for there was a yong woman born in the City of Pella, named Antigona, who in the faccage of the City of Damascus, was taken Prisoner among other Captives, and indeed had been thither brought before by Autophradates, who furprized her at Sea, as the failed from the coaft of Macedonie, toward the Ific Samothrace: fair the was, and well-favored to fee to; and fo far had fine entangled Philotas with her love, after the came once to be acquainted with her, that being a main otherwise as hard as iron, and steel to the very back, the had so mollified and made him pliable, that in the midst of his pleasures, poor man, he was not the time to morning and the own heart, but lying open unto the woman, revealed many fecrets unto her, and mafter of himfelf and his own heart, but lying open unto the woman, revealed many fecrets unto her, and the fall foolish words in her baseing - For what had that Philip been (would be fornetimes fay) but for let fall foolish words in her baseing - For what had that Philip been (would be fornetimes fay) but for Parminio: and what were this Alexander here, without Philotas? what would become of his high addition, Jupiter Ammonius, where were those Dragons of his, if we were not well pleased with him? Antigona told these speeches unto another woman, onto of her familiar friends; and she reported them again to Graterus: Craterus brought Antigona heresis fecretly unto Alexander: and verily Alexander touched not her body, but abstained from her: howbeit, by her means, sounding Philotas, and coming within him, he discovered fully what he was: yet in seven years space and more, he never either at any feast where he drank wine liberally, and was thought otherwhiles to be drunk, made he shew of this suspicion conceived of him, or in his anger, being of nature hashy and cholerick; or to his friend Hephosison, unto whom he was wone to disclose all, and make parraker otherwise of his secrets: for one day by report, having opened a letter of fecrets, fent from his own mother, as he read it to himfell, Hephelion held his head close to, and read it genely together with him; neither had he the heart to forbid him: "onely after he had fuffered him to read it through, he took the fignet from his own finger, fet it to his mouth, as it were to feal up his lips, that he should say nothing. But if a man should go about to rehearfe at large all the notable examples, whereby it might be proved that this Prince used the greatness of his power exceeding well, and as most worthily become a King; his strength and voyce would fail him: for fay, that by the goodness and favor of Fortune he became great; yet greater he is, in that he used his fortune aright, and wisely as he should: and the more that a man excolleth his good fortrae, the more doth he amplific that vertue of his, for which he was worthy of

But now it is high time, that I should proceed to the beginning of his growth, and the first entry of his mighty power! wherein I confider and look every way about me, what act of fortune is therein, whereby men should suppose and maintain, that Alexandra arose to such greatnes? How now? Tell me, I besech you for the love of God, placed she him in the Regal Throne of Cyrus, without drawing a sword, without shirking one stroke, without bloodshed, without wounds, without a field ships, or exception of arise made? by the neighbing (for footh) of an horse, as sometime the did by this strict Daving; the son of Himselfer? Or was it some kinde husband won by the stattering persuasion of this wife, that crowned him King; like as the same Davins made Xerus King, induced by his wife Medica, in Subjects Royal Diadem came of it self to his very gates, as it came unto Paysini, by the timens of Bayar the Emuthy who did no more for it, but change and put off his Lexies Mandillon, put himself presently in the Royal Robe, and set upon his head the pointed Turbani, named Cydarii. Or all on a studently in the Royal Robe, and set upon his head the pointed Turbani, named Cydarii. Or all on a student by the studently in the Royal Robe, and the whole saxish; like as as Abbess' their Officers benefit of fortune; he beatsite the Monarch of the whole saxish; like as as Abbess' their Officers the Control of the substance of the substance of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers to the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers to the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers to the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers to the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Malex their Officers the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers to the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers the Control of the Whole saxish; like as a Abbess' their Officers the Control of the whereby men flould suppose and maintain, that Alexander arose to such greatness? How now?

Kings by the means of Fortune? This one example will tell you. The race of the Heraclide, descending lineally from Hercules, out of which they were wont at Argos from time to time to cleck their Kings, chanced to fail, and be utterly extinct: whereupon, when they had fent out to the Oracle of Ampelo, for to demand and enquire what to do in this case; this answer was made, That an Eagle should direct them what was to be done. Some few days after an Eagle was seen soaring aloft in the ayr, and at length to fettle upon the house of one named Ægon: and thus was Ægon declared for their ays, and at tengent of state upon the notine of one named Light and thus was Light detared for their King. Will you have another? He who reigned for the time in the City Paphos, was found to be wicked, unjult, violent, and a great oppression of his people; whereupon Alexander deposed him from his Regal State and Dignity, and when he had to done, fought for another to rule in his stead, out of the house and family of the Cinyrade, which was thought in manner to be worn out, and utterly extinct : howbeit, advertised he was, that there remained of that race no more but one obscure and poor man, of whom there was no reckoning in the world made; and he dwell in a certain garden in kegarded, where he lived in very mean effact. Preferrly he fent forth to feek for this man: they who were put in commission hereabout, found him there indeed, watering certain beds of Leeks, and such like worts and pot-herbs. The man was wonderfully troubled and afrighted to fee these Souldiers come toward him, and especially when they faid, that he must come and speak with Alexander the Kling: Thus was he brought unto him, in a simple thin linnen Wastecoat, and presently proclaimed King of Paphos, received the purple Royal Robe, and was reckined in the number of those who are called the Kings Minions: and his hanne was Alphorins. Lo how Fortune makes men Kings, onely by altering their robes, by permutation of their names, and changing their Copies a little, all on a fudden, quickly in a trice, with great facility, beyond all hope, and without any expectation at all. Come now unto Alexander, what great matter did he ever attain unto without his defert? what happed unto him without the sweat of his brows, nay without the effusion of his blood? what had he gratis, that he paid nos for ? what got he, that did not coft him pains and travel ? Drunk he hath of Rivers stained and coloured with blood; passed he hath over them upon bridge in ande of dead bodie; for very hunger he hath been glad to eat of grafe and green herbs, the first he could finde growing; he hath with much digging and searching, discovered nations baried under deep from, &cities lying in caves within the ground; alide he had upon Gas, warring and fighting against him and travelling over the dry fands of the Gedrosians and Arhachosians, he saw trees & plants growing within the sea, before any upon the and Now if a man might be allowed to address this speech unto Fortune, as unto 10 might be allowed to address this speech unto Fortune, as unto 10 might per allowed to address this speech unto Fortune, as unto 10 might per address the speech of Alexander, might not one if Ywhich & where was it that thou ever madest way for the affairs of Alexander? what forties wan he through thy layor, without the loss of blood? what city or towns did the thou called to be yielded unto him without a garrion? or what atmy, without the two propositions of the state of the speech of the spee whiter found he ever through thy grace any Kingt flugglih and floathful; any capitain careless and negli-gent; any warder or porter of the gates drowlife and fleepy? nay, he never met with river that had fourd passible, winter that was tolerable, or summer that was not painful and irksom. Go thy ways go, to Antiochus the fon of Seleucus ; to Artaxernes the brother of Cyringto Ptolemens Philadelphus. These were they, whom their fathers in their lifetime declared heirs apparent, yes, and crowned them Kings: their won fields and battels for which never eye shed it at: their keft holiday continually: these celebrated Bellival folemnities daily in theaters, with all manher of pomps and goodly fights: every one of their reigned in all profiperity, until they were very aged; whereas Alexander (if there were nothing elfe.) lo how his body is wounded and pictionly mangled, from the crown of his head, to the fole of this toos, galhed here, theuff in there, dry bearen, brufed and broken with all manner of hoffile weapons.

At the River Granicus, his Armet or Morion was cleft with a Curiface, as far as to the Hair of his head : before the Town of Gaza he was thou into the shoulder with a dart. In the Maragandians County this thin was wounded with a Javelin, infomuch as the greater bone thereof was fo broken and Inatiered, that it came out at the wound : in Hircania he gate a knock with a great stone belifide in his heek; which thook his head to, as that his eye fight was dimmed shereby, to at for certain day, he was afraid that he fhould have been flark blinde for ever; in a skirmilh with the Afficans, his ancle was wounded with an Indian dart; at what time when he faw is to bledd, he thirded third his Flatteress and Paralites, and flowing them the place, fmiled and faid, This is very blood indeed,

Meding them the place, imited and lated, a this is very blood indeed,

And not that burney, fay all what you will,

Mobil from the god, most blaffed, dath digital.

At the battel of Iffus his thigh was pierced with a tword, even by King Dartus himself, as Charge writeth, who came to close with him at hand fight. And Alexander Himself writing simply and the plain truth to Antipater, I my felf allo caught a flab with a short sword in my thigh, but thanked be God (quoth he) I had no great hurt thereby dither at the present or afterwards. Fighting against the Mullians, he was wounded with a dart two cubits long, that being divien through his Curace entred in as this break and come our scaling his made. Second his a Avitability hash left in writing. Having ne was wonned with a dart, two cooles long, that being driven through his curace entred in at his breath, and came out again at his neck, according as Arifobbilus, hath left in writing. Having paffed over the River Tanais, for to march againft the Scythians, when he had defeated them in battly, he followed the chale, and purfued them on horfe-back for a hundred and fifty fladia, notwithflanding all the while he was troubled with a foar lake or flux of the belly. Now truly, Fortune, much beholden is Alexander into thee for advancing his effacte: It this thy making of him great, by offering this that of being the account. fuffering him thus to be pierced thorow on every fide? Here is a fair upholding of him indeed to lay open thus all the parts of his body: clean contrary to that which Minerva did unto Menelaui, who with her hand turned afide all the shot of the enemies, and made them light upon his Armor, where it was most fure, and of the best proof, to wit, upon his Cuirace, his Bawdrick or Belt, or upon his Helmet; and by that means brake the force of the stroke before it could come to the bare body, fo as all the harm it could do, was but a little to rafe the skin, and let out some small shew, and a few drops or blood: but thou contrariwife, hast exposed his naked and unarmed parts, and those most dangerous to be wounded, caufing the shot to enter so far, as to go thorow the very bone, environing and hemming in his body round, befetting his eyes and feet, impeaching him for chafing his enemies, diverting the train of his victorice, and overturning all his hupes. Certes I am of this opinion, that there never was King who had Fortune more adverse and a shrewder stepdame than hesalthough she hath been cueft, envisus, and frightful enough to many besides: for whereas the hath fallen upon others violently like a Thunderbolt or shot of Lightning, whom she hath cut off and destroyed right our at once; her malice and hatred unto Alexander hath been cankred, obstinate and implacable, even, as it was before him unto Hercules. For what Typhons or monttrous Gyants of prodigious flature hath the not raised up as concurrents to fight with him? What enemies hath not she fortified & furnished against him with infinite store of Arms, with deep Rivers, with prerupt and craggy Rocks, or with extraordinary strength of most savage Beasts? Now if the courage of Alexander had not been undaunted, and the fame arising from exceeding great vertue, firmly grounded and fettled thereupon to en-counter fortune, how could it otherwise have been, but the same should have sailed and given over, as being wearied and toiled out with fetting fo many battels in array, arming his Souldiers fo daily, laying fiege fo many times unto Cities and Towns, chafing and pursuing his enemies so often, checked with so many revolts and rebellions, crossed so commonly with infinite Treasons, Conspiracites and Insurrections of Nations; troubled with such a sort of diff necked Kings who shook off the yoke of Allegeance? and in one word, whiles he conquered Battra, Maracanda, and the Sogdians, among faithless and treacherous Nations, who waited always to spy some opportunity and occasion to do him a displeasure, and who like to the Serpent Hydra, as fast as one head was cut off, put forth another, and so continually raised fresh and new wars? I shall seem to tell you one thing very strange and incredible, howbeit most true: Fortune it was, and nothing but Fortune, by whose malign and cross aspect, he went very neer of losing that opinion that went of him, namely, that he was the son of Jupiter Ammon. For what man was there ever extract and descended from the seed of the gods, who exploited more laborious, more difficult and dangerous combates? unless it were Hercules again the fon of Jupiter? And yet one outragious and violent man there was who fet him awork, enjoyning him to take fell Lions, to hunt wilde Bores, to chase away ravenous Fowls, to the end that he should have no time to be employed in greater affairs whiles he vilited the world, namely, in punishing such as Anteni, and in repressing the ordinary murders which that Tyrane Busiris, and such like, committed upon the persons of Guests and Travellers. But it was no other thing than vertue alone that commanded Alexander to enterprize and exploit such a piece of work as beseemed so great a King, and one derived from a Divine Race: the end whereof was not a mass of gold tobe carried along after him upon ten thou-fand Camels backs, nor the superfluous delights of Media, nor sumptuous and delicate Tables, not fair and beautiful Ladies, not the good and pleasant Wines of Calydonia, nor the dainty Fish of Hyrcania out of the Caspian Sea : but to reduce the whole world to be governed in one and the same order, to be obedient to one Empire, and to be ruled by the fame manner of life. And verily this defire was inbred in him, this was nourished and grew up with him from his very infancy. There came Ambaffadors upon a time from the King of Perfia to his father Philip, who at the fame time was not in the Countrey, but gone forth: Alexander gave them honorable entertainment very courteoully, as became his fathers son: but this especially was observed in him, that he did not ask them childish questions, as other Boys did, to wit, about golden Vines trailed from one tree to another, nor of the pendant Gardens at Babylon hanging above in the ayr, ne yet what Robes and sumptuous Habiliments their Kings did wear? But all his talk and conference with them, was concerning matters most important for the flate of an Empire: inquifite he was, what forces and power of men the King of Perfia could bring out into the field and maintain; in what ward of the battel the King himself was arranged when he fought a field: much like unto that Ulyses in Homers, who demanded of Delon (as touching Heller)

Which be the readiest and shortest ways for those who would travel from the coasts of the Mediterranian Sea up into the high Countreys? infomuch as thefe firangers, the Ambaffadors, wondred exceed-*For the father Philip departed this life, but presently his heart served him to pass over the Streights of Helle-Perhawas sport, and being already sed with his hopes, and soward in the preparation and provision of his voycalled the age, he made what speed he could to set soot into Asia. But see here how Fortune croffed his defigns: great King. The averted him quite, and drew him back again, raifing a thouland troubles and bufie occasions to flay and hinder his intended course. First the caused those barbarous Nations bordereng and adjoyning upon him, to rife up in Armes, and thereby held him occupied in the Wars against the Illyrians and Triballians: by themeans whereof, he was haled away as far as to Scythia, and the Nations inhabiting along the River Danubie, who diverted him clean from his affairs intended in the high Provinces of Asia. Howbeit having overrun these Countreys, and dispatched all difficulties with great perils, and most dangerous Battels, he set in hand again with his former enterprise, and made halte to his passage and voyage a fecond time. But lo, even there also Fortune excited the City of Thebes against him, and laid the War of the Greeks in his way to stop his expedition, driving him to extream streights and to a very hard exigent, by fire and fword to be revenged of a people that were his own Countreymen, and of the same Kinred and Nation, the iffue whereof was most grievous and lamentable. Having exploited this, he croffed the Seas as the last, furnished with provision of money and victuals, as Phylarchus writeth to Gerve for thirty daies and no longen, or an Aritholus reportecth, having only feventy talents of filver to defray the whole charges of the voyage. For of his own demain and possessing at home, as also of the Crown revenewes, he had bestowed the most part upon his friends and followers: only Perdiccas would receive nothing at his hands, but when he made offer to give him his part with the reft, demanded thus of him; But what referve you for your felf, Alexander? Who answered, My hopes. Why then (quoth he) I will take part thereof: for it is not reason that we should receive your goods, but wait for the pillage of Darius. And what were those hopes of Alexander, upon which he passed over into Asia? Surely not a power measured by the strong wals of many rich and populous Cities, not Fleets of ships failing through the mountains, not whips and fetters, testifying the folly and madneffe of Darbarous Princes, who thought thereby to punish and chastice the raging Sea. But for external means without himself, o resolution of prowesse in a small power of armed men well trussed. and compact together, an emulation to excell one another among young men of the fame age, a contention and strife for vertue and glory in those that were his minions about him: But the great hopes indeed and most affured were in his own person, to wir, his devout religion to Godward, the truffy confidence and affiance that he had in his friends, frugality, continence, bounty, contempt of death, magnanimity and refolution, humanity, courtefie, affable intertainment, a fimple nature, plain without plaits, not feigned and counterfeit, constancy in his counsel, celerity in his execution, foveraignty and priority in honour, and a resolute purpose to accomplish any honest duty and office. For Homer did not well and decently, to compose and frame the beautiful personage of Agamennen, as the pattern of a perfect Prince out of three images, after this manner,

For eyes and head, much like he was in fight

To Jove, who takes in lightning fuch delight : God Mars in walte and loines resembled be : In brest compar'd to Neptune be may be.

But the nature of Alexander (in case that God who made or created him, formed and compounded it of many vertues) may we not well and truly fay, that he endued with the courageous spirit of Cyrus. the fober temperance of Agefilaus, the quick wit and pregnant conceit of Themistocles, the approved skill and experience of Philip, the valourous boldnesse of Brasidas, the rare eloquence and sufficience of Rericles in State matters and politick Government? For to speak of those in ancient times, more consinent he was and chaft, than Agamemnon, who preferred a captive concubine before his own espoused and lawful wife: as for Alexander, he abiteined from those women whom he took prisoners in War. and would not touch one of them before he had wedded her : more magnanimous than Achilles, who for a little money yielded the dead corps of Hellor to be ranformed; whereas Alexander defraied great summes in the sunerals and interring of Daries body. Again, Achilles took of his friends, for the appealing of his choler, gifts and prefents after a mercenary manner : but Alexander enriched his very enemies, when he had gotten the Victory. More religious he was than Diomedes, a man who was evenuore ready to fight against the gods: whereas he thought all victory and happy successes by the grace and savour of the gods. Dearer he was to his neer kinsfolk and friends, and more entirely beloved than Vijles, whole mother died for forrow and griefe of heart: whereas when A-lexander died, his very enemies mother, for kinde aff. etion and good will died with him for company. In fumme, if it was by the indulgence of Fortune, that Solon established the common-wealth of Athens to well at home, that Miltiades conducted the Armies to happily abroad; if it was by the benefit and favour of Fortune, that Arifides was to just : then farewell vertue for ever; then is there no work at all effected by her; but only it is a vain name and speech that goeth of her, passing with fame show of glory and reputation through the life of man; seigned and devised by these practing So-philters, cunning Law-givers and Statists. Now if every one of these persons and such like, was poor brrich, feeble or frong, foul or fair, of long life or short, by the means of Fortune; again, in case each of them shewed himself a great Captain in the field, a great Politician or wife Law-giver, a great Governour and Ruler in the City and Common-wealth, by their vertue and the direction of reason within them; then confider (I pray you) what Alexander was in comparison of them all : Solon instituted at Athens, a general cutting off and cancelling of all debts, which he called Zara 28ma, which is as much to fay, as Adischarge of burdens; but Alexander out of his own purse paied all debts in the name of debtors, due unto their creditours. Pericles having imposed a tax and tribute upon the Greeks, with the money raised by that levy, beautified the Citadell or Castle of Athens with Temples and Chapels; whereas Alexander fent of the pillage and treasure which he gat from the Barbarians, to the number of ten thousand salents into Greece, with commandement to build therewish facred Temples to the honour of the gods. Brefides wan a great name and reputation of valour among the Greeks, for that he paffed from one end to another through his enemies Gamp, pitched along the Sea fide before the Town Methon : but that wonderfull leap that Alexander made into a Town of the Oxydaques, which to them that hear it, is incredible, and to as many as faw it, was mft fearfull; namely, at what time he cast himself from the battlements of the walls among his enemies, ready to receive him with Pikes, with Javelins, with Darts and naked Swords; whereto may a man compare, but unto a very flash of lightning breaking violently out of a Cloud, and being carried with the wind lighteth upon the ground, refembling a spirit or apparition resplendent all about with flaming and burning armours! informed as at the first fight, men that saw it were so affrighted, as they ran backward and fled : but that after they beheld it was but one man fetting upon many, then they came again, and made head against him. Here fortune shewed (no doubt) many plain and evident proofs of her speciall good will to Alexander; namely, first when she put him into an ignoble, base and barbarous Town, and there inclosed him sure enough within the walls thereof; then, after that those withour made hafte to refeue him, and reared their scaling ladders against the walls for to get over and come unto him, the caused them all to break and fall in pieces, whereby she overthrew & cast them down who were climed half way up : again, of those three onely whose hap it was to mount up to the top before the ladders brake, and who flang themselves desperately down, and stood about the King, to guard his person, the fell upon one immediately and killed him in the place, before he could do his Master any service : a second overwhelmed with a Cloud of Arrowes and Darts, was so near death, that he could do no more, but only see and feel. All this while, the Macedonians without, ran to the walls with a great noise and out-cry, but all in vain, for artillery they had none, nor any ordnance or engins of battery; onely they layed at the walls with their naked fwords and bare hands: and fo cameft they were to get in, that they would have made way with their teeth, if it had been possible. Mean while, this fortunate Prince, upon whom Fortune attended at an inch, ready now to accompany and defend him, you may be fure, as at all times elfe, was taken and caught as a wild beaft within Toiles, abandoned & left alone, without aid and fuccour, not I wis to win the City of Susa, or of Babylon, nor to conquer the Province of Battria, nor to feize upon that mighty body of King Porus for of great and renowned attempts, although the end alwaies prove not happy, yet there can redound no infamy. But to fay a truth, Fortune was in his behalf so spightfull and envious, but on the other side so good, and gracious to the Barbarians, to adverfe I fay the was to Alexander, that the went about as much as lay in her, to make him not only lofe his life and body, but also to forfeit his honour and glory: for if he had been left lying dead along the river Euphrates, or Hydaspes, it had been no great disafte and indignity: neither had it been fo dishonourable unto him, when he came to joyn with Darius hand to hand, if he had been maffacred among a number of great horfes, with the Swords, Glaives, and battel-axes of the Persans sighting for the Empire: no, nor when he was mounted upon the wals of Babylon, if he had taken the foil and been put by his great hope of forcing the City: for in that fort, loft Pelopidas, and Epaminondas their lives; and their death was rather an act of vertue, than an accident of infortunity, whiles they gave the attempt to execute fo great exploits, and to gain fo worthy a priz:. But as touching Fortune, which now we examin and confider; what piece of work effected fie? In a barbarous Country far removed, on the further fide of a river, within the walls of a base village in comparison, to shue up and inclose the King and Soveraign Lord of the earth, that he might perilh there finmefully, by the hands and rude weapons of a multitude of Barbarous Rafcalli, who should knock him down with Clubs and Staves, and pele him with whatfoever came next hand 3 for wounded he was in the head with a bill that clove his Helmet quite thorow, and with a mighty Arrow which one discharged out of a bow, his breast-plate was pierced quite thorow, whereof the fleil that was without his body weighed him down heavily : but the iron head which fluck fast in the bones about one of his Paps, was four fingers broad and five long. And to make up the full measure of all mischiess, whiles he desended himself right mansully before, and when the fellow who had shot the iorefaid Arrow adventured to approach him with his fword, to diffeatch him out right with a dead thruft, him he got within, & with his Digger gave him fuch a flab, as he layed him along and killed him out of hand : but see the malice of Fortune , there runs me forth out of a mil-house or bake-house there by, another Villain with a Pettle, and comming behind him, gave him fuch a fouce upon the very neck-bone, that he was aftonified therewith, and there lay along in a twoom, having loft his fight and other senses for a time. But Verrue it was that affisted him, which gave both unto himself a good heart, and also unto his friends firength, resolution and diligence to succour him: For Limnen, Piolemeus, and Leonnatus, with as many besides, as either had clambred over the walls, or broken thorow, came in and put themselves between him and his enemies: they with their valour were to him instead of a wall and rampier; they for meer affection and love unto their King, exposed their bodies, their forces and their lives before him, unto all dangers what loever. For it is not by Fortune, that there be men who voluntarily present themselves to present death, but it is for the love of Vertue; like as bees having drunk (as it were) the amatorious potion of naturall love and affection, are alwaics about their King, and flick close unto him. Now say there had been one there without the danger of shot, to have seen this fight at his pleasure, would not he have said, that he had beheld a notable combat of fortune against vertue? wherein the Barbarians by the help of Fortune prevailed above their defertie the Greeks by means of Vertue relifted above their power : and if the former get the upper hand, it would be thought the work of For use and of some maligne and envious Spirit; but if these become superiour, Vertue, Fortitude, Faith and Friendship should carry away the Honour of Victory; for nothing else accompanied Alexander in this place. As for the reft of his Forces and Provisions, his Armies, his Horfes, and his fleets, Fortune fee the wall of this vile Town between him and them. Well, the Macedonians in the end defeated these Barbarians, beat the place down over their Heads, and rased it quite, this to be an abrupt breach of this Oration, and nor a perfect conclusion.

The Summary.

He Wisedom and Learning of the Egyptians bath been much recommended unto us by ancient Writers, and not without great good cause: considering that Egypt bath been the Source and Fountain from whence have stored into the world arts and liberall sciences, as a man may gather by the testimony of the first Poets and Philosophers that ever were: But time, which consumeth all things, hath hereft us of the knowledge of such wisdom: or if there remain still with us any thing at all, it is but in fragments and pieces scattered here and there, whereof many times we must divine or guests, and has is all but in recommers and pieces [cattered nere man carefull to preserve all goodly and great things, hath by the means of this discounts touching lise and Oil-ris, manuained and kept entire a good part of the Egyptians dollrine which he is not content to set down liserally and there an end, but hath adjoyned thereto also an interpretation thereof, according to the myfiicall sense of the lsake Priests ediscovering in sew words an instinte number of secrets hidden under ridiculous and montrous fables, in fuch fort, as we may call this treatife a commentary of the Egytians Theologie and Philosophy. As for the contents thereof, a man may reduce it into three principall parts: In the first, which may serve instead of a preface, be yeeldeth a reason of his enterprise, and upon the consideration of the rasure, vesture, continence, and abitinence of Ilis Priests, there is an entry made to the rehearfall of the fable concerning 1fit and Oficial But before he toucheth it, he sheweth the reason why the Egyptians have thus darkly enfolded their divinity. Which done, he commeth to describer in particular the said sable, relating it according to the baseletter: which is the second part of this book. In the third he expoundesh the sable it sals : and first discovereto the principles of the Said Egyptian Philosophy, by a fort of Temples, Sepulchres, and Sacrifices. Afterwards having refused certain contrary opinions, he freaketh of Damons, ranging life, Olicis, and Typoon, in the number of them. After this Theologicall exposition, be considered the fable according to naturall Philosophy a meaning by Osicia theriver Nelus, and all other power of moisture what sever: by Typhon, Driness: and by Isis that mature which preserveth and governeth the world. Where he maketh a comparison between Bicchies of Greece, and Olisis of Egypt, applying all unto naturall causes. Then expoundeth he the sable more exactly and in particular manner; conferring, this interpretation thereof with that of the Stoicks, whereupon be doth accommedate and fix all to the courfe of the Moon, as she groweth and decreaseth, to the vising also and inandation of Nilus, making of all the former opinions a certain mixture, from whence he draweth tho emplication of the Fable. By occasion whereof, be entreth into a disputation as touching the principles and beginnings of all things, fetting down twain, and alleging for the proof and confirmation of his speech, the restimons of the ancient Mages and Philasophers : which done, he entreth into a discourse of Osirie, Isie, and Typhon, referring and reducing all into Physicks and Metaphsiycks, with a certain conference or comparison of Places dollaine with that of the Egyptians, which maketh him take inhand a particules Treastife of matter, form, the Idea, of generation also and corruption. Having thus examined and discussed the Egyptians Theology, and Philosophy, he arisoth to the more hidden and secret mysteries of the Mack Priests, and then descendeth again to the consideration of natural causes, especially of the state of the Moon, and drawing compendiously into one word, all his precedent discourse, he declareth what we ought to understand by the, Olicis, and Typhon. Consequently he adjoynesh three observations, to make this treatise more pleasant and profitable: withdrawing thereby the Reader, and plucking him back both from supersistion and Atheism. Then having condemned the Greeks for being taint with the same folly that the Egyptians were addicted to, he broacheth many opinions concerning the transformation of the Paguns gods inte fundry forts of beafts; discovering thereby the dotage and foolery, arising from this argument and matter most corupily understood: and stretching the same yet farther, be rendresh a reason of that bonour which the Egyptians did to such creatures : whereupon he would not have us in any wife to rest, but rather to look into the divinity represented by them. And for an end be entreth into an allegoricall discourse, of the habitments, perfumes, and divers odoriferous confedions made every day in the Temple of liss : but more especially be treateth of one named Cyphi : wherein there be to the number of fixteen ingredients : which composition they use in their very drink, observing the ein as in all the rest of their superstitions, a million of ceremonies, whereof be doth particularize especially in the third part of this discourse, event the very end thereof. All the pre-mises being reduced to their right use, do show the vanity of men abandoned and given over to their own sense; and prove that all their sufficiency is nothing but blockish folly, and their intelligence a dark and mirk night, when the brightnesse and light of Gods Word doth fail them. For the more appearance they have both of celestiall and also buman wisedom, be more appeared their blind superstition in such fort, as instead of resting upon the Creatour, they remain fixed upon the Creatures, and have a longing and languishing desire after discourses void of true inftructions and confolations: which ought to incite fo much the more all Christians to make great account of the effectuall grace offered unto them in the meditation and practice of true Philosophy, as well usturall as divine.

Of I sis and Osiris.

EN that are wife, or have any wit in them (O Clea) ought by prayer to crave all good things at the hand of the gods : but that which we mott wish for, and defire to obtain by their means, is the very knowledge of them, fo far forth as it is lawfull for men to have: for that there is no gift either greater for men to receive, or more magnificall and befeming the gods to give, than the knowledge of the truth: for God besteweth upon men all things else, where of they stand in need, but this he reserved to himself, and keepeth for his ownuse. Neither a the godhead and divine power in this regard counted happy and bleffed, because it possesses a great quantity of Gold or Silver, nor pullfant in respect of thunder and lightning, but for prudence, and wifedons. And verily of all those things which Homer hath well delivered, this simply is the best and most elegant speech, when as touching Jupiter and Neptune, he faith thus :

> The felf same parents they both bad, one native foil them bred, But Tupiter the elder was, and had the wifer head 3 whereby he affirmetir, that the preeminence and rule of Jupiter, being the elder, was more venerable, facred and fuller of Majethy, for his knowledge and wifedom. And of this Opinion I affure you am I, that the Beatitude and Felicity of eternall life, which Jupiter enjoyeth, conflicts herein , that he is ignorant of nothing that is done : as also, that immortality, if it be despoiled of the Knowledge and Intelligence of all things that be, and are done, is not life indeed, but bare time. And therefore we may very well fay, that the defire of deity and divinity is all one with the love of truth, and especially of that truth which concerneth the nature of the gods; the study whereof, and the fearching after such Science, is as it were a profession and entrance into Religion, yea, and a work more holy than is the Vow or Obligation of all the Chaffity and Purity in the world, or than the Cloyfter or Sanctuary of any Temple whatfoever: right acceptable alfois this * Goddeffe whom you ferve, confidering that the is most wife, and full of Knowledge according as the very derivation of her name doth imply, that Skill and Cunning appertuncth unto her more than to any other : for Ifis is a meer Greek word; like as Typhon alfo the very adverfary and enemy opposite unto this Goddesse, as one pussed up and swollen by his ignorance and er-ror, dissipating, defacing, and blotting out the facted Word and Doctrin, which this Goddesse collectch, composeth, and delivereth unto those who are initiated and professed in this divine religion, by a continual precise observance of a sober and holy life, in abstaining from many mean, in depriving them-Celves of all fleshly pleasures, for to repress lust and intemperances, and in being acquainted long before to abide and endure within Temples and Churches, hard and painful fervices performed unto the godit of all which abilinences, paines, and fufferances, the end is the knowledge of that first Prince and Lord, or an which administration only by intelligence and underflanding, whom the Goddel's exhorteth to fearch & feet after, as converting and companying with her. And verily the name of her Temple, doth manifully promife an intelligence or knowledge of that which is, for I fion it is called, which is as much to fay, as *of whom to by, for that, if we enter into that facred place & holy religion of this Goddels, with realon * Impor- & devotion, as we ought to do, we shall attain to the understanding of all things what sever. Moreover, ting the knowlege many have written, that the is the daughter of Mercury, others of Prometheus, of which is reputed the Author of Wifedom and Providence, and the other, namely Mercury, the inventor of which is reputed the Author of Mercury is the inventor of which is regarded Monfiek. And hereupon it is the in the City Herman and Monfiek. Grammar and Musick. And hereupon it is, that in the City Hermopolis, they call the former of the Muces, both Ifis, and also Justice; as being Wiscdom her felf, (according as bath elsewhere been faid) and shewing divine things to them who are justly surnamed Hierophori, and Hieroptoli, that is to fay, religious, and wearing the habits of holineffe and religion. And these be they that carry in their mind, and keep enclosed as within a box or casket, the holy doctrine of the gods, pure and cleansed from all superstition and affected curiosity: who also of that opinion which is held of the gods, declare some which are obscure and dark, others also which be clear and lightsome; like as be those which are reported as touching their holy and religious habit. And therefore whereas the religious priefls of Ifis. after they be dead, are thus clad with these holy habilliaments; it is a mark and signe witnessing unto us, that this facred doctrine is with them, and that they be departed out of this world into another, and carry nothing with them bus it: for neither to wear a long beard, nor to put on a frize rugge and course gabardine (dame Clea) makes a Philosopher; no more doth the surplice and linnen vestions. ment or shaving, an Iliaque priest. But he indeed is a priest of Isis, who after he hath seen and received by law and cuftom, those things which are shewed and practiced in the religious ceremonies about these gods, searcheth and diligently enquireth, by the means of this holy doctrine, and discourse of reason, into the truth of the said ceremonies. For very sew there be among them, who understand and know the cause of this ceremony, which is of all other the smallest, and yet most commonly observed; namely, why the Isaque priests shave their heads, and wear no haire upon them; as also wherefore they go in vestments of Line? And some of them there be, who care not at all for any knowledge of such matters : yet others fay, they forbear to put on any garments of wooll, like as they do to eat the fielh of those sheep which carry the said wooll, upon a reverence they bear unto them : semblably, that they cause their heads to be shaven in token of dole and forrow likewise that they wear surplices and vestments of linnen, in regard of the colour that the flower of line or flax beareth, which refembleth properly that celefial azure-sky that environeth the whole world. But to fay a truth, there is but one cause indeed of all: for lawfull it is not for a man who is pure and clean, to touch any thing (as Plato faith) which is impure and unclean. Now it is well known, that all the superfluities and excrements of our food and nourishment, be foul and impure, and of such be engendred and grow, wooll, hair, shage and nailes: and therefore a meer ridiculous mockery it were, if when in their expiatory fanctifications and divine fervices, they caft off their hair, being shaven and made smooth all their bodies over, they should then be clad and arraied with the superfluous excrements of beasts : for we must think that Hefiodus the Poet when he writeth thus, teachesh us, that we ought first to be cleaned and purified, then to folemnic festivall holy-daies, and not at the very time of celebration and performance of holy rites and divine service, to use such cleaning and ridding away of inperfluous excrements. Now the herb Line groweth out of the earth which is immortally bringeth forth a fruit good to be eaten, and furnisheth us wherewish to make fimple, plain, and slender vestment, which litteth light upon his back, that weareth it, is me for all stations of the year; and for all others, (as men say) least breedeth lice or vermine; whereof sam to discourse else where. Now these Isiaque priests so much abhorre the nature and generation of all superfluities and excrements, that they not noly refuse to eat most part of Pulse, and of flesh meats, Mutton and Porks for that Sheep and Swine breed much excrement, but also upon their dates of sandification and expiatory solemnities, they will not allow any sale to be eaten with their viands; among many other reasons, because it whetteth the appetite, and giveth an edge to our stomack, provoking us to eat and drink more liberally: for to fay as Ariflagoras did, That falt was by them reputed unclean, because when it is congealed and grown hard, many little animals or living creatures, which were caught within it, die withall, is a very foolery. Furthermore, it is faid, that the Epygtian priess have a certain pit or well apart, out of which they water their Bull or Beef Apis : and be very precife in any wife not to les him drink of Nilus, not for that they think the water of that river unclean, in regard of the Crocodiles which are in it, as some be of opinion (for contrariwise, there is nothing so much honoured among the Egyptians as the River Nilus) but it seemeth that the water of Nihis doth fatten exceeding much, and breed flesh over fast, and they would not in any case that their Apis should be fat, or themselves groffe and corpulent : but that their fouls might be clothed with light, nimble, and delicate bodies to do as the divine part in them flould not be opprefied or weighted down, by the force and ponderofity of that which is mortall. In Heliopsis, which is the City of the Sun, those who serve and minister anto their god, never bring wine into the Temple, as thinking it not convenient in the day time to drink in the fight of their Lord and King : otherwise the priests drink thereof, but sparily: and besides many purgatious and explations they have, wherein they ab-stein wholly from wines and during those dates, they give themselves wholly to their studies and meditations, learning and teaching holy things: even their very Kings are not allowed to drink wine their fill, but are stinted to the gage of a certain measure, according as it is prescribed in their holy writings, and those Kings also were priests, as Hecataus writeth. And they began to drink it after the daies of King Pfammetichus; for before his time they drank it not at all, neither made they libaments thereof unto their gods, supposing it not acceptable unto them; for they took it to be the very bloud of those Gy.

ants which in times past warred against the gods; of whom after they were slain, when their bloud was mixed with the earth, the Vine-tree sprang: and this is the cause, say they, why those who be drunk, lose the use of their wit and reason, as being full of the bloud of their progenitours. Now that the Egyptian priefts both hold and affirm thus much, Eudoxus hath delivered in the fecond book of his Geography. As concerning fishes of the sea, they do not every one of them abstein from all indifferently ; but some As concerning mines or the ica, they do not every one or them abitem from an indimerent july form forbar one kind, and form another; as for example, the Oxyrynchites will cat of none that it also with an hook; for adoring as they do, a film named Oxyrynchos, they are in doubt and fear left the hook fould be unclean, if haply the faid fish fwallowed it down with the bair. The Stenites will not touch the fish Phagrus, for it should seem that it is found, what time as Nilus begins to flow; and therefore the faid fifth by his appearing, fignifieth the rifing and inundation of Nilus, whereof they be exceeding joyous, holding him for a certain and fure messenger. But the priests abstein from all filhes in generaland whereas upon the ninth day of the first moneth, all other inhabitants of Egypt, feed upon a certain broiled or rofted fish before their doors; the priefts in no wife tafte thereof; marry they burn fishes before the gates of their houses; and two reasons they have: the one holy, fine and subtile, which I will deliver hereafter : as that which accordeth and agreeth very well to the facred discourses as touching Ofiris and Typhon : the other plain, vulgar and common, represented by the fish, which is none of the viands that be necessary, rare and exquitite, according as Homer beareth witnesse, when he brings not in the Pheacians delicate men and loving to feed daintily, nor the Ithacestans, Islanders, to eat fish an their feafts: no nor the mates and fellow travellers with Ulyffer, during the time of their long Navigation and Voyage by S:4, before they were brought to extream neeeflity. To be brief, the very Selit felf they think to be produced a part by fire, without the bounds and limits of nature, as being no portion not element of the world, but a firange excrement, a corrupt superfluity, and unkinde malady : For nothing abfurd and against reason, nothing fabulous and superflictions, (as some untruly think) was inserted or served as a facred signe in their holy ceremonies, but they were all markes grounded upon causes and reasons moral, and the same profitable for this life, or else not without some historical or natural elegancy. As for example, that which is faid of the Onion; for that Dillys the foster-father of Iss, fell into the River of Nilus, and was there drowned, as he was reaching at Onions and could not come by them, it is a meer fable and carryeth no fence or probability in the world : but the truth is this, the priests of Isis hate the Onion and avoid it as a thing abominable, because they have observed, that it never groweth nor thriveth well to any bigneffe but in the decrease and wain of the Moon : Neither is it meet and fit for those who would lead an holy and sanctified life, or for such as celebrare folemn feafts and holidaies, because it provoketh thirst in the former; and in the other causeth tears, if they feed thereupon. And for the fame reason they take the Sow tobe a prophane and unclean beast, for that ordinarily she goeth a brimming and admitteth the Bore, when the Moon is past the Full: and look how many drink of her milk, they break out into a kinde of leaprofie or dry skurf all over their bodies. As touching the tale which they infer, who once in their lives do facrifice a Sow when the Moon is in the Full, and then eat her flesh: namely that Typhon hunting and chasing the wilde fwine at the Full of the Moon, chanced to light upon an atk or coffin of wood, wherein was the body of Ofiris, which he difmembred and threw away by piece-meal, all men admit not thereof, fuppoling that it is a fable, as many others be milheard and millinderflood. But this for certain is held, that our ancients in old time so much hated and abhorred all excessive delicacy, superfluous and costly delights and voluptions pleafures, that they faid within the Temple of the City of Thebes in Egypt delights and voluptions pleafures, that they faid within the Temple of the City of Thebes in Egypt delights and execrations against there flood a square column or pillar, wherin were engraven certain curses and execrations against their King Minis, who was the first that turned and averted the Egyptians quite from their simple and frugal manner of life, without money, without sumptuous fare and chargeable delights. It is said alfo that Technatis the father of Bocchoreus, in an expedition or journey against the Arabians, when it charmeed that his carriages were far behinde and came not in due time to the place where he incamped, was content to make his supper of what soever he could get, and so to take up with a very small and fimple pittance, yea and after supper to lie upon a corfe and homely pallet, where he slept all and impre pittanes, yea and a tier imprer to ite upon a corte and itomery paints, which made in high an right very foundly, and never a worke; whereupon, he ever after loved fobriety of life and frogality, and curfed the forefaid King Mini: which maledition of his being by the priefts of that time approved, he caiffed to be engraven upon the pillar abovefaid. Now their Kings were created either out of the order of their priefts, or elfe out of the degree of Kinghts and Warriours; for that the one effate was honoured and accounted noble for valour, the other for wifdome and knowledge. And look whomfoever they chofe from out of the order of Knighthood, presently after his election he was admitted unto the College of priests, and unto him were disclosed and communicated the feerets of their Philofophy, which under the veil of fables and dark speeches couched and covered many mysteries, through which the light of the truth in some sort though dimly appeareth. And this themselves seem to signific and give us to understand, by setting up ordinarily before the porches and gates of their Temples, certain Sphinger: meaning thereby, that all their Theology containeth under anigmatical and covert words, the fecrets of wildome. In the City of Sain, the image of Minerva which they take to be Ifis, had such an inscription over it, as this: I am all that which hath been, which is, and which shall be, and never any man yet was able to draw open my veil. Moreover many there be of opinion, that the proper name of Jupiter in the Egyptians language is Amoun, of which we have in Greek, derived the word Ammon: whereupon we furname Jupiter, Ammon: but Manethos who was an Egyptian him-felf of the City of Sebenna, supposeth that by this word is signified, a thing hidden, or occultation:

and Hecateus the Abderite affirmeth, that the Egyptians used this tearm among themselves, when they called one unto another, for it was a vocative word, and for that they imagined the Prince and Sovetaign of the gods to be the same : that Pan, that is to say an universall nature, and therefore unseen hidden and unknown, they prayed and besought him for to disclose and make himself known unto shem, by calling him Amoun. See then, how the Egyptians were very strict and precise, in not profaning them, by cating inin Amount et all in ow the Egyptians were very little and precine, in not promiting their wifedom, nor publishing that learning of theirs which concerned the gods. And this the greatest Sages and most learned Clerks of all Grece do testifie, by name, Solon, Thales, Plato, Eudoxai, Pythagorai; and as some let not to say, Lycurgus himself; who all travelled of a deliberate purpose into Egypt, for to confer with the Priefts of that Country. For it is conffantly held that Endoxus was the auditour of Chomupheus the Priest of Memphis, Solon of Souchis the Priest of Sais, Pythagorasof Oenupheus the Priest of Heliopolis. And verily this Pythagoras last named, was highly escened among those men, like as himself had them in great admiration, in fo much ashe of all others feemed most to imitate their manner of myfical speaking under covert words, and to involve his doctrine and sentences within figurative and aniamaticall words: for the characters which are called Hieroglyphicks in Egypt, be in manner all of them, like to these precepts of Pythagoras: Eat not upon a stool or chair; Sit not over a bushell; Plane no Date tree ; Stir not the fire in the house, nor rake into it with a sword. And me thinks, that whereas the Pythagoreans call Unity, Apollo; Two, Diana; the number of feven, Minerva; and the first cubick; Neptune ; this refembleth very neer , that which the Egytians confecrate and dedicate in their Temples, and agreeth with that which they do and write. For their King and Lord Ofiris, they depains and pourtray, by an eye and a Scepter: and some there be, who make this interpretation of the name Ofiris, as if it fignified, having many eyes, for that Os in the Egyptian tongue, betokeneth many, and Iri, aneye. As for heaven, they describe by a young countenance, by reason of the perpetuity thereof, whereby it never waxeth old. And Iri, they fet out by an heart, having under it an hearth with fire burning upon it. In the City of Thebes there flood up certain Images without hands, resembling Judges; and the Chief or President among them, was blindfolded or hoodwincked, to give us to understand, that Justice should neither be corrupted with bribery, nor partiall and respective of persons. In the signet or seal ring of their martial and military men, there was engraven the portracture of the great Fly called the Bettil because in that kinde there is no semale, but they be all males : they blow or cast their seed in form of pellet or round ball, under dung; which they prepare to be a place, not for their food more, than for their brood. When foever therefore you shall hear the Egyptians tell tales of the gods, to wit, of their vagrant and wandring perigrinations, or of their diffmembrings, and other fuch like fabulous fictions, you must call to mind, that which you have before faid; and never think that they mean any fuch thing is or hath been done according to that literall sense : for they do not say, that Mercury properly is a Dog, but forasmuch as the nature of this beast is to be wary, watchfull, vigilant, and wise, able to diffinguishby his taking knowledgede and semblance of ignorance, a friend and familiar from an enemy and stranger: therefore (as Plato faith) they attributed and likened him to the most cloquent of all the gods. Neither do they think, when they describe the Sun, that out of the bark of the tree Lotusthere ariseth a babe new born; but in this wise do they represent unto us the Sun rising, giving thus much to understand covertly, that the light and illumination of the Sun proceedeth out of the waters of the Ga: for even after the fame manner the most cruell and terrible King of the Persians, Ochus, who put so death many of his Nobles and Subjects, and in the end slew their Beef Apis, and eat him at the feast, together, with his friends, they called The fword; and even at this day, in the register and catalogue of their Kings, he goeth under that name; not fignifying thereby his proper fubflance; but to expresse his hard and fell nature, his mishievous disposition, they compared him to a bloody instrument and weapon made to murder men. In hearing then and receiving after this manner, that which shall be told unto you as touching the gods after an holy religious manner, in doing also and observing alwaies diligently the accustomed rites, ordained for the facred service of the gods, and believing firmly, that you can not perform any facrifice or liturgy more pleafing unto them, than to fludy for to have a found and true opinion of them : by this means you shall avoid superstition, which is as great a fin as impiety and Atheism. Now the fable of Isis and Osiris, is as briefly as may be, by cutting off many superfluous matters that serve to no purpose, delivered in this wife: It is faid, that dame Rhea, at what time as Saturn lay fecretly with her, was espied by the Sun, who cursed her; and among other maledictions, prayed that the might not be delivered, nor bring forth Child, neither in any moneth or year: but Mercury being inamoured of this goddesse, companied likewise with her; and afterwards, as he played at Dice with the Moon and won from her the seventieth part of every one of her illuminations, which being all put together, make five intire dayes, he added the fame unto the three hundred and three score dayes of the year; and so those od dayes the Egyptians docall at this present, the dayes of the Epact, celebrating and solemnizing them as the birth-dayes of their gods: for that when the full time of Kbea was expired, upon the first day of them was Osiris born; at whose birth a voice was heard, That the Lord of the whole world now came into light: and some say, that a certain woman named Panyle, as the went to fetch water for the Temple of Jupiter in the City of Thebes, heard this voice, commanding her to proclame aloud, That the Great King and Benefadour Ofiris was now born : also, for that Saturn committed this Babe Ofiris into her hands for to be noursed, therefore in honuur of her there was a festivall day solemnized, named thereupon Panyla, much like unto that which is named Phallephoria unto Prispus. On the second day she was delivered of Aroveris, who is Apollo, whom some likewise call the elder Orus. Upon the third day she brought forth Typhon, but he came not at the just time nor at the right place, but brake thorow his mothers fide, and iffued torth at the wound. On the fourth day was Isis born, in a watery place called Panbygra. And the fifth day she was delivered of a Nephibe, who of some is named also Teleure and Ve-* Or Nop nus; others call her Nice. Now it is faid, that the conceived Ofiris and Aroveris by the Sun, Ifis by Mercury, Typhon and Nephibe by Saturn, which is the cause that the Kings reputing the third of these intercalar daies to be defasterous and dismall, dispatched no affairs thereupon, neither did they cherish themselves by meat and drink or otherwise, untill night: that Nephthe was honoured by Typhon; that Iss and Ofiris were in love in their mothers belly before they were born, and lay together secretly and fealth; and some give out, that by this means Aroveris was begotten and born, who by the Egyptians is called Orus the elder, and by the Greeks, Apollo. Well, during the time that Office reigned Kingin Egypt, immediatly he brought the Egyptians from their needy, poor and favage kinde of life, by teaching them how to fow and plant their grounds, by chablishing good Laws among them, and by shewing how they should worship and serve God. Afterwards, he travelled throughout the World, reducing the whole Earth to civility, by force of armes leaft of all, but winning and gaining the most Nations by effectual remonstrances and sweet perswasion couched in songs, and with all manner of Musick. whereupon the Greeks were of opinion, that he and Bacebus were both one. Furthermore, the tale goes, that in the absence of Ofiris, Typhon stirred not, nor made any commotion, for that Ifis gave good order to the contrary, and was of sufficient power to prevent and withfland all innovations; but when he was returned, Typhon complotted a conspiracy against him, having drawn into his consederacy seventy two complices, besides a certain Queen of Ethiopia, who likewise combined with him, and her name was Alo. Now when he had fecretly taken the just measure and proportion of Ofiris body, and caused a coffer or hutch to be made of the same length, and that most curiously and artificially wroughs and fet out to the eye, he took order, that it should be broughe into the Hall, where he made a great feast unto the whole company. Every man took great pleasure with admiration, to behold such a singular exquifit piece of work; and Typhon in a merriment, flood up and promifed that he would beflow it upon him, whose body was meet and fit for it: hereupon, all the company one after another assaud whose body would fit it; but it was not found proportionate nor of a just fize to any of all the reft: at length, Ofiris gat up into it, and layed him there along; with that, the conspiratours ranto it, and let down the lid and cover thereof upon him, and partly with nailes, and partly with melted lead which they powred aloft, they made it fure enough; and when they had so done, carried it forth to the river fide, and let it down into the fea, at the very mouth of Nilus named Tamiticus; which is the reason, that the said mouth is even to this day odious and execrable among the Egyptians, insomuch as they call it Cataphyston, that is to fay, Abominable, or to be spit at. Over and besides, it is said, that this fell out to be done upon the feventeenth day of the moneth named Athyr, during which moneth, the Sun entreth into the fign Scorpious, and in the eight and twentieth year of Ofiris reign : howbelt, others affirm, that he lived in deed, but reigned not fo long. Now the first that had an inckling and in-telligence of this hainous act, were the Panes and Satyres inhabiting about Chennis, who began to whifper one unto another, and to talk thereof; which is the reason, that all sudden tumults and troubles of the multitude and common people, be called Panique affrights. Moreover, it followeth on in the tale, that Iss being advertised hereof, immediatly cut off one of the tresses of her hair, and put on mourning weeds in that place which now is called the City Coptus, in remembrance thereof; how foever others fay, that this word Copies, betokeneth Privation, for that towler in Greek, fignifieth as much as to deprive. In this doleful habit the wandred up and down in great perplexity to hear tidings of Ofiris, and whomfoever the met withall, the failed not to enquire of them; and the miffed not fo much as little children playing together, but asked them, whether they had feen any fuch coffer: at length, file light of those children who had feen it indeed, and they directed her to the mouth of the river Nilus, where the complices and affociates of Typhon had let the faid veffel into the fea. And ever fince that time, the Egyptians are of opinion, that young children have the gift of revealing secrets, and they take all their words which they pass in play and foort, as offer and prefages, but especially within the Temples, what matter foever it be that they prattle of. Moreover, when Iss understood that Osiris fell in love with her fifter Nephrhys, thinking she was Iss and so carnally companyed with her, and withall, found a good soken thereof, to wit, a chaplet or garland of Melilos which he had left with Nephthe, the went for to feek her babe (for prefently upon the birth of the infant, for fear of Typton fie hid it) and when with much ado and with great pains taken, Ifis had found it, by the means of certain hounds which broughe her to the place where he was, the reared and brought it up, in fuch fort, as when he came to some bignesse, he became her guide and squire, named Anubis, who also is said to keep the gods, like as dogs * Or Isme guard men. After this, the heard news of the forefaid coffer, and namely, that the waves of the fea had fuch fhrub by tides caft it upon the coaft of Bybins, where, by a billow of water it was gently brought close to the foot of a shrub or plant called. * Erice: now this Erice or Tamarix in a small time grew to fair, and foread forth fo large and big branches with all, that it * compaffed, enclosed and covered the faid coffer all over, fo as it could not be seen. The King of Byblus wondring to see this plant so big, caused the translate branches to be lopped off, that covered the forefaid coffin not feen, and of the trunck or body thereof, this, as if made apillar to sustain the roof of his house: whereof Isis by report being advertised by a certain diclosed with a contract of the heavy and in diffrest; pitiously weeping to her selfineither spake she a word unto any creature, only the the plant. Queens waiting maids and women that came by, the faluted and made much of, plaiting and broiding

the treffes of her hair most exquisitely, and casting from her into them a marvellous sweet and pleasant fent issuing from her body, whiles the dreffed them. The Queen perceiving her woman thus curiously & trimly fer out, had an earnest defire to fee this stranger, as well for that the yeelded such an odoriferous fmell from her body, as because she was so skilfull in dressing their heads : so she for the woman, and being grown into some samiliar acquaintance with her, made her the Nurse and governesse of her young son: now the Kings name was Malcander, and the Queenes, Astarte, or rather Saosis, or as some will have it, Nemanous, which is as much to fay in the greek tongue, as Athenais. And the speech goes; that Is suckled and noursified this infant, by putting her finger instead of the breast-head or nipple, in to the mouth thereof; also, that in the night scason she burnt all away that was mortall of his body; and in the end, was her felf metamorphized and turned a Swallow, flying, and lamenting after a moaning manner about the pillar aforesaid, untill such time as the Queen observing this, and crying out when the faw the body of her child on a light fire, bereaved it of immortality. Then Ifis being discovered to be a goddese, craved the pillar of wood : which she cut down with facility, and took from underneath the trunk of the Tamarix or Erice, which she anointed with perfumed oile, and enwrapped within a linnen clorh, and gave it to the Kings for to be kept : whereof it commeths that the Byblians even at this linnen clorth, and gave it to the range for to be nept. which the Temple of Ifis. Furthermore, it is day reverence this piece of wood, which lieth confecrate within the Temple of Ifis. Furthermore, it is a few that the state of the state o faid, that in the end fine * light upon the coffer, over which she wept and lamented somuch, that the youngeft of the Kings fone died for very pitty of hersbut the her felf accompanied with the eldeft of them. together with the coffer, embarked, took fea and departed. But when the river Phedrus turned the wind formewhat roughly, about the dawning of the day, Is was so much displeased and angry, that the dried it quite. And so soon as the came unto a solitary place, where the was by her self alone, the open'd the coffer, where finding the corps of Ofiris, the laid her face close to his, embraced it and wept. Herewith came the child fortly behind and espied what the was doing: whom when the perceived, the looked back, calling an uncoward eye, and beheld him with fuch an angry afpect, that the poor infant not able to endure to terrible a look, died upon it. Some (ay it was not to; but that he fell into the (ca, in manner a foresaid, and was honoured for the Goddess fake, and that he is the same whom the Egyptians chane ac their feasts, under the name of Maneros. But others give out, that this child was named Palestinus, and that the City Pelusium was built in remembrance of him by the Goddess Isis, and so took the name after him; and how this Maneros whom they fo celebrate in their fongs, was the first inventor of Musick. Howbeit others there are again, who affirm that this was the name of no person, but a kinde of dialect or language, proper and agreeable unto those who drink and banquet together, as if a man should say, In good hour & happily may this or that come. For the Egyptians were wont ordinarily to use this tearm Maneros in such a sense: like as no doubt the dry sceletos or dead corps of a man which they used to carry about and shew in a bierre or coffin at the table, was not the representation or memorial of this accident which befell unto Ofiris, as some do imagine, but served as an admonition to put the guests in mind to be merry & take their pleasure, & joy in those things weh were present; for that soon after they should be like unto it. This I say was the reason that it was brought in at their feasts and merry meetings. Furthermore, when Ifis was gon to fee her fon Horus, who was foftered & brought up in the City Butus and had laid the forefaid coffer with Ofiris body out of the way, Typhon fortuned as he hunted in a clear moon-fine night to mece-with it, and taking knowledge of the body, cut it into fourteen pieces & flung them here and there one from another: which when Isis underflood, the searched for them in a Bote of Punt made of papyr reed, all over the mores and marishes: whereof is comes that the Crocodiles never huttthose who fail or row in veffels made of that plane, whether it be that they are affraid of it, or reverence it for this Goddeffe fake, I know not. And thus you may know the reason, why there be found many sepulchres of Ofiris in the Country of Egypt, for everas she found any piece of him, she caused a Tomb to be made for it: others say no : but that she made many images of him, which she left in every City, as if she had bestowed among them his very body indeed : to the end that in many places he might be honoured: and that if haply Typhon when he fought for the true Sepulchre of Ofiris, (having vanquished and overcome Horus) many of them being reported and shewed, he might not know which was it, and so give over seeking sarther. Over and besides, the report goes, that Iss found all other parts of Osiris body but onely his privy member, for that it was immediately cast into a River, and the Fishes named Lepidotus, Phagrus and Oxyrynchus devoured it: for which cause Isis detesteth them above all other Fishes: but instead of that naturall part, she made a counterfeit one, called Phallus, which she consecrated : and in the honour thereof the Egyptians hold a solemn feast. After all this it followeth in the Fable , that Ofiris being returned out of the infernall parts. appeared unto Horus, for to exercise, instruct and train him against the battell: of whom he demanded what he thought to be the most beautifull thing in the world : who answered, To be revenged of the wrong and injury which had been done to a mans Parents. Secondly, what beaft he thought most profitable to go into the field withall : unto whom Horus should make answer, The horse: whereat Ofiris marvelled, and asked him why he named the Horse, and not the Lyon rather : Because (quoth Horus) the Lyon serveth him in good stead, who stands upon his own guard and defence onely, and hath need of aid : but the Horse is good to defeat the enemy quite, to follow him in chase, and take him pritoner. When Ofiris heard him fay to, he took great pleafure and contentment herein, judging hereby that his Son was sufficiently appointed and prepared to give battell unto his enemies. And verily it is faid that among many that daily revolted from Typhon and fided with Horus, even the very concubine of Tybon named Thueris was one, who came unto him: 8, when a certain * Serpent followed after 8s .

d after & * Ophis purfued purfued her, the same was cut in pieces by the guard about Horse: in remembhance whereof, at this very day they bring forth a certain cord, which likewise they chop in pieces. Well, they say the battell continued many dayes: but in the end Horse had the victory: As also that Isis having Typhos perisoner fast bound in her hands, kilked him not: but looked him and let him go: which Horse not able to endure with patience, laid violent hands upon his Mother; and plucked from her head the roiall croament that she had thereon: instead whereof, Mercury, for ona morion made in masher of a Cowas head. Then Typhos called Horse judicially into question, charging him that he was a Bastard, but by the help of Mercury who pleaded his cause, he was judged by the gods, legitimate: who allow in two other battels vanquished Typhose. And more than, all this, the tale saith, that Isis after death, was with Child by Ofris, by whom the had Helitomenus and Happerates who wanted his nether parts. Thus you see whate be in manner all the principall points of his fable, setting assess who wanted his nether parts. Thus you see whate be in manner all the principall points of his fable, setting assess and the summer of the principall points of his fable, setting assess and the wholed and affirm such sables as these couching the blessed and immortall nature, whereby especially we conceived in our mind the deity, to be true, and that such things were really done or happed so indeed, as Eschylus faith, I need not say unto you, for that you hate and detest those enough already of your felt, who conceive to barbarous and abfurd opinions of the gods. And yet you fee very well that these be not narrations like unto old Wives tales, or yain and foolish fictions, which Poets or other idle writers device out of their own fingers ends, after the manner of Spiders, which of themselves without any precedent, and subject matter, spin their threds, weave and fleetch out their webbs : for evident it is that they contain some difficulties, and the memorialls of certain accidents. And like as the Mathematicians fay, that the rainbow is a representation of the Sun, and the same distinguished by fundry colours, by the refraction of our eye-fight against a cloud even so this fable, is an appearance of some doctrine or learning, which doth reflect and fend back our understanding, to the consideration of some other truth; much after the manner of facrifices, wherein there is mingled a kinde of lamentable dole, and forrowfull heavinetfe. Semblably, the making and disposition of Templas, which in some places have fair open Isles and pleasant allies open over head : and in other, dark Caves, Vaults, and Shrouds under the earth, resembling property Caves, Sepulchers, or Charnell Vaults, wherein they put the bodies of the dead; especially the opinion of the Ostririans: for albeit the Body of Ofiris, be faid to be in many places, yet they name haply Abydus the Town, or Memphis a litele City, where they affirm that his true Body lieth, in such fort, as the greatest and wealthieft perfons in Egypt usually do ordain and take order, that their bodies be interred in Abydus, to the end they may lie in the same Scoolchre with Ofiris: and at Memphis was kept the Beef Apis, which is the image and figure of his Soul, and they will have his body also to be there. Some likewise there be, who interpret the name of this Town, as if it should fignifie the baven and harbour of good men: others, that it betokeneth the Tomb of Ofirit: and there is before the Gate of the City, a little life, which to all others is inaccessible, and admitteth no entrance, insomuch, as neither sowles of the air will there light, nor fiftes of the fea approach thither; onely at one certain time, the Priefs may come in, and there they offer facrifices, and prefent oblations to the dead, where also they crown and adora with flowers the monument of one Methids, which is overshadowed with a certain plant, greater and taller than any Olive tree. Eudorous writeth, that how many sepulchers soever there be in Egypt wherein the corps of Ofiris should lie, yet it is in the City Bussian; for that it was the Country and place of hit nativity: so that now there is no need to speak of Taphesiris, for the very name is self faith enough, signifying as is doth, the Sepulture of Ofiris. Well, I approve the cutting of the Wood, and enging of the Linnen, the effusions also and sunerall libaments there performed, became there be many mysteries mingled among. And so the Priess of Egypt affirm, that the bodier not of these gods onely, but also of all others, who have been ingendeed, and are not incorruptible, remain among them where they were honoured and reverenced; but their Souls became stars, and shine in heaven : and as for that of Ifis, it is the same which the Greeks call Gyon, that is to say, the Dog-star, but the Egyptians Sothis: that of Orms is Orion, and that of Typhon, the Bear. But whereas allother Cities and States in Egypt contribute a certain tribute imposed upon them, for to pourtray, draw and paint such beasts as are honoured among them, those onely who inhabite the Country Thekais, of all others give nothing thereto, being of opinion, that no mortall thing, subject to death, can be a god; as for him alone, whom they call Cnepb, he was never born, so shall be never dye. Whereas therefore many such things as these, be reported and shewed in Egypt, they who think, that all is no more but to perpetuate and eternize the memory of marvellous deeds and strange accidents of some Princes, Kings, or Tyrants, who for their excellent vertue and mighty puissance, have adjoyard to their own glory, the authority of deity, unto whom, a while after, there befell calamities; use herein a very cleanly shift, and expedite evasion, transferring handsomely from the gods unto men, all sinister infamy that is in these sables, and help themselves by the restimonites which they finde and read in Histories : for the Egyptians write, that Mercury was but small of flaturel, and flender limmed: that Typon was of a ruddy colour; Orus white; Ofiris of a blackish hew, as who indeed were naturally men. Moreover, they call Ofiris, Captain or Generall, Canobus pilos or governor of a thip, after whose name they have named a flar : and as for the thip which the Greeks name Argo, they hold that it was the very refemblance of Ofiris ship, which for the honour of him, being numbred among the stars, is so situate in heaven, as that it moveth & keepeth his course not far from that ol Orion, and the Cyon or dog. ftar; of weh twain, the one is confecrate unto Horns, the other to Ifis. But I fear me, that this were to ftir and remove those facred things which are not to be touched and medled withall, & as much as to fight against, not continuance of time onely & antiquity, as Simonides faith, but also the religion of many sorts of people & nations, who are long since possessed with a devotion toward these gods: I doubt (I say) left in sodoing they fail not to transfer so great names as these outof heaven to earth, & fo go very near and miffe but a little to overthrow and abolish that honour and belief, which is ingenerate and imprinted in the hearts of all men, even from their very first nativity: which were even to fet the gates wide open for a multitude of Miscreants & Atheists, who would bring all divinity to humanity, and deity to mans nature; yes and to give a manifelt overture & liberty for all the Impostures and Jugling calls of Euemerus the Meffenian, who having himself council and deviced the originals of fables, grounded upon no probability nor subject matter, but even against the course of reason & nature, fored & scattered abroad throughout the world all impiety, transmuting & changing those whom we repute as gods, into the names of Admiralis, Captains, Generalls, & Kinge, who had lived in times past, according as they fland upon record, by his faying, written in golden letters, within the City * Panchon, * Or Pan (which never Grecian nor Barbarian fave himfelf faw) as having failed unto the countries of the Pan. chan or chonians and Triphylians; nations for footh that neither are, nor ever were in this world. And yet verily, Panthains a great name there goeth among the Affyrians, of the worthy and renowned acts of Semiramitias also in Egypt of Sefastris. As for the Phrygians, even at this day they term noble exploits and admirable enterprifes, by the name Manica, of one of their ancient Kings, whom they called Manis, who in his times was a most prudent and valiant Prince, and whom others named Masdes. Cyrus led the Persi ine, & Alexander the Macedonians, with conquest still & victory, from one end of the world in manner to another: and yet for all these brave acts, no otherwise renowned they are, nor remembred, but onely for puissant and good Kings : and fay, there were haply some of them who upon an over-weening and high conceit of themselves, helped forward with youth, and want of experience, as Plate faith, and whose minds were puffed up and inflamed with pride and vainglory, took upon them the furnames of gods, and had Temples founded in their names, yet this glory of theirs lasted but a while, and soon after being condemned by the posterity, of vanity, and arrogancy together, with impiety and injustice, and now as fugitive flaves that may be brought back again where ever they be found, they are haled and pulled away from their Temples and Altars, and nothing remaineth for them but their tombs & fepulchaes : and therefore that old King Antigonus, when a certain Poet named Hermodotus, in his verses called him the Son of the Sun, yea and a god; Well quoth he,my groom that daily voideth my close stool, knowes no fuch mater by me. Lysippus also the Imager did very well to reprove Apelles the painter, for that, when he drew the picture of Alexander, he portraied him with lightning in his hand; whereas Lyfippus put in his hand a launce, the glory & renown whereof, as due & proper unto him, yea, & beseeming his person ir ded, no time nor age should ever be able to abolish. In weh regard, I hold better with them who think that the things which be written of Typhon, Ofiris, and Ifis, were no accidents or pallions incident to gods or to men; but rather to some great Damons : of which mind were Pythagorus, Plate, Xenowates, & Chrysippus, following herein the opinions of the ancient Theologians, who held, that they were far ftronger than men, & that in puissance they much furmounted our nature : but that divinity we hathey had, was not pure & simple; but they wer compounded of a nature corporal& spiritual, capable of pleasure, of grief, and other passions, & affections, which accompanying these mutations, trouble some more, others lefs. For in thefeDæmon, there is like, as also among men, a diverfity & difference of vice & of vertue, For the acts of Giants & Titans, so much chanted in every greek song, the abominable deeds likewise & practices of one Saturn, the reliftance also of Python against Apollo, the founds of Bacchus, & the wandrings of Ceres, differ in no respect from the accidente of Ofiris and Typhon, & of all other such like fabulous tales, web every man may hear as much as he lift as also what soever lying covered and hidden under the veil of myflicall faerifices and ceremonies, is kept close not uttered nor shewed to the vulgar people, is of the fame fort. And according hereto, we may hear Homer how he calleth good men and fuch as excel others. diverily, one while foundiar, that is to fay, like unto the gods; otherwhile, a retition, that is to fay comparable to the gode: sometimes 8:00 , 273 units' $ xorras, that is to fay, having their wildom & counsel from the gods. But the denomination or addition drawen from the Damons, he ufeth commonly as well to the good as the bad; indifferent to valiant Persons and to Cowards: to a timorous and seasful souldier thus:

Were quickly gone, like smoak which mounting high, Into the air, doth vanish by and by;

The Greeks why doest thou so much fear?

Giving us hereby thus much to understand, that the Dzmons have a mixt nature, and a will or affection which is not equal, nor alwates alike. And hereupon it is, that Plato verily attributed unto the Olympian and celestial gods, all that which is dexterous and odde: but unto the Dzmons, what foever is sinister and even. And X-secrets holdeth, that those daies which be unlucky and dismal, toose festival solemnities likewise, which have any beatings or knocking and thumping of breasts, or fasting, or otherwise any cursed speeches and fishly words, are not meet for the honour and worship or fasting, or otherwise any cursed speeches and fishly words, are not meet for the honour and worship cither of gods or of good Dzmons; but he supposed that there be in the air about us, certain natures great and puissant; showbeit, shrewd, malicious and unsociable, which take some pleasure in such matters; and when they have obtained and gotten so much to be done for their sake, they go about no matters; and when they have obtained and gotten so much to be done for their sake, they go about no farther mischief, nor wait any shrewder turnes; whereas constrainties, both Hesiadus calleth the pure and holy Dzmons, such also as be the good angels and keepers of men,

And Plate also termeth this kinde of Dzmons or Angels, Mercurial, that is to say, expositours or interpretours, and ministerial, having a middle nature between gods and men, who as mediators, present the prayers and petitions of men here unto the gods in heaven, and from thence transmit and convey unto usupon earth, the oracles and revelations of hidden and stuture things, as also their donations of goods and riches. As for Empedacles, he saith, that these Dzmons or Fiends, are punished and tormented for their fins and offences which they have committed, as may appear by these his verse:

The feathem caft #p, of the earth, even to the outward face:

The earth them fends unto the beams of never-tired Sun,

The Sun to air, whence first they came, doth sing them down aron:

Thus posted to and fro, twist sas beneath, and heav'ns above,

not one yet doth them dove.

untill fuch time as being thus in this Purgatory chaffiled and cleanled, they recover again that place, estate and degree which is meet for them and according to their nature: These things and such like for all the world they fay, are reported of Typhon, who upon envy and malice committed many outrages, and having thus made a trouble and confusion in all things, filled fea and land with wofull calamities and miferies, but was punished for it in the end. For Ifis the wife and fifter of Ofiris in revenge plaguand minercisp used pulming and reprefling his fury and rage: and yet neglected not lie the travels and pains of her own which the endured, her trudging also and wandring to and fro, nor many other acts of great wildome and proweffe luffered the to be buried in filence and oblivion : but inferting the fame among the most holy ceremonies of facrifices, as examples, images, memorials and resemblances of the accidents happing in shole times, the confectated an enfignement, infruction and confolation of piety and devout religion to godward, as well for men as women afflicted with miferies. By reason whereof the and her husband Ofiris of good Damons were transmuted for their vertue into gods, like as afterwards were Hercules and Bacchus, who in regard thereof, and not without reason, have honours decreed for them both of gods and alfoof Dzemons intermingled together, as those who in all places were puissant, but night powerfull both upon and alfo under the earth. For they fay that Serapis is nothing elfe but Pluts, and Ifs the same that Proferpina, as Archemachus of Eubas and Heraclitus of Pontus tellific, and he thinketh that the Oracle in the City Canobus, is that of father Dis or Pluto. King Prolemeus furnamed Soter, that is to fay, faviour, caused that huge statue or colosse of Pluto which was in the City Simps; to be taken from thence, not knowing, nor having fem before of what form and shape it was, but only that as he dreamed he thought that he saw Strapis, commanding him withall speed possible but only that as he dreamed he thought that he saw Strapis, commanding him withall speed possible to transport him into Alexandria. Now the King not knowing where this flatue was, nor where to finde it, in this doubtfull perplexity related his vision aforesaid unto his friends about him, and chanced to meet with one Sosibius a great traveller and a man who had been in many places, and he said that in the Oly of Sinope he had Gen fuch a flattue as the King described unto them. Whereupon Prelemans sent Stellar and Disnyssus, who in long time, and with great travel, and not without the especial grace of the divine providence, stole away the said colosse and brought it with them: Now when it was come to Alexandria and there feen, Timosbeus the great Cosmographer and Antiquary, and Manesbon of the Province Sebennius, gueffed it by all conjectures to be the image of Pluto, and namely by Cerberus the Helldog and the Dragon about him, perfwading the King that it could be the image of no other god but of Serapis. For it came not from thence with that name; but being brought into Alexandria, it took the name Serapit, by which the Egyptians do name Pluto. And yet Heraclisus verily the Naturalist faith, that Hades and Dionylus, that is to fay, Pluto and Bacchus, be the fame. And in truth when they aredisposed to play the sools and be mad, they are carried away to this opinion. For they who suppose that Hades, that is to say, Pluts, it said to be the body, and as it were the sepulchte of the soul, as if it feemed to be foolish and drunken all the while she is within it, me thinks they do allegorize but

And better it were yet to bring Ofiris and Baschus together, yea and to reconcile Sarapis; unto Ofiris, in saying that after he hath changed his nature, he became to have this denomination And therefore this name Sarapis is common to all, as they know very well who are professed in the facred religion of Ofiris. For we ought not to give ear and credit to the Books and Writings of the Phrygians, wherein we find, that there was one Charops: the Daughter of Hercules, and that of I/aringing a Son of Hercules was engendred Typhon: neither yet to make account of Phylarchus who writeth, that Bacchus was the first, who from the Indians drave two Becfs, whereof the one was named Apis, the other Ofiris: That Sarapis is the proper name of him who ruleth and embellisheth the univerfall world, and is derived of the word Sairein, which some say, significth as much as to beautific and adorn. For these be absurd toyes delivered by Phylarchus: but more monstrous and senselesses. are their absurdities who write, that Sarapis is no god, but that it is the Coffin or Sepuchre of Apis, that is so called: as also that there be certain two leaved brasen Gates in Memphis, bearing the names of Leibe and Cocytus, that is to say, Oblivion and Wailing, which being set open when they inter and buty Apis, in the opening make a great found and rude noise: which is the cause that we lay hand upon every Copper or brafen veffell when it refoundeth fo, to flay the noyfe thereof. Yet is there more appearance of truth and reason in their opinion, who hold that it was derived of these very verifications which significant to move, as being that which moveth the whole frame of the world. The Priests for the most part hold, that Sarapis is a word compounded of Ofiris and Apis together, giving this exposition withall and teaching us, that we ought to beleeve Apis to be an elegant image of the Soulof Ofiris. For mine own part, if Sarapis be an Egyptian name, I suppose that that the tokeneth, joy and mirth: And I ground my conjecture upon this, that the Egyptians ordinarily call the feath of joy and gladnesse, termed among the Athenians Charmofyna, by the name of Sairei. For Plato himself faith, that Hades which signifieth Pluto, being the Son of Aidos, that is to fay, of Shamefaftneffe and Reverence, is a mild and gracious god to those who are toward him. And very true it is, that in the Egyptians language, many other proper names are fignificant, and carry their reason with them: as namely that infernall place under the Earth, into which they imagine the Souls of the dead do desend after they be departed, they call Amenhee, which term is as much to say, as taking & giving; but whether this word be one of those, which in old time came out of Greece and were transported thither, we will consider and discusse better hereaster ! Now for this present let us prosecute that which remaineth of this opinion now in hand, "For Ofiris and Ifi of good Damons were translated into the number of the gods: And as for the phisfance of Tybon opperfied and quelled, howbeit panting as yet at the last gasp and striving as it were with the pangs of death, they have certain Ceremonies and Sacrifices, to pacific and appears. Other Feats also there be again on the contrary side. wherein they infult over him, debale and defame him what they can'. In fo much a smen of a ruddy colour they deride & make of them a laughing flock. And as for the inhabitants of Copto, they use at certain Feast to throw an Ass headlong down from the pitch of an high rock, because Typhon was ruddy and of a red Affes colour. The Bufiritans and Lycopolites forbear to found any Trumpers, because they refemble the braying of an Affe: and generally they take an Affe to be an unclean beaft and demonicall, for the refemblance in hiew that it hath with him: and when they make certain Cakes in their Sacrifices of the moneths Payni and Phaophi, they work them in paftry with the print upon them of an Affebound. Also in their solemn Sacrifice to the Sun, they command as many as will be there to worship that god, not to wear any brooches or jewels of gold about their bodies, nor to give any Meat or Provander unto an Affe what need foever he have thereof. It feemeth alfo, that the Pythagoreans themselves are of opinion, that Typhon was some fiend or demonicall power: for they fay that Typhon was born in the even number of fix and fifty: again, that the triangular number or figure, is the puissance of Pluto, Bacchus, and Mars: of the quadrangle, is the power of Rhea, Venus, Certs, Vefta, and Juno: that of twelve angles belongeth to the might of Jupiter: but that of fifty fix angles is the force of Typhon, as Eudoxus hath left in writing. But the Egyptian fippofing that Typhon was of a reddish colour, do kill for Sacrifice unto him, Kine & Oxen of the same colour, observing withall to precifely, that if they have but one hair black or white, they be not facrificeable : for they think fuch Sacrifices not acceptable, but contrariwife displeasant unto the gods, imagining they be the bodies which have received the Souls of lewd and wicked persons, transformed into other Creatures. And therefore after they have curled the head of fuch a Sacrifice, they cut it off and caff it into the River, at least waies in old time : but now they give it unto strangers. But the Ox which they mean to facrifice indeed, the Priests called Sphragifie, that is to fay, the Scalers, come and mark it with their Seal, which as Caffor writeth, was the image of a man kneeling, with his hands drawn back and bound behind him, and having a fword fet to his throat: Semblably they use the name of an Affe alfo, as hath been faid, for his uncivill rudenesse and insolency, no lesse than in regard of his colour, wherein he resembleth Typhon; and therefore the Egyptiam gave unto Ochus a King of the Perfiant, whom they hated above all others as most cursed and abominable, the surname of Asse: whereof Ochus being advertised and saying withall, This Affeshall devour your Ox; caused presently their Bees Apis to be killed and facrificed, as Dinon hath left in writing. As for those who say, that Typhon after he had loft the field, fled fix daics journy upon an Affe back, and having by this means escaped, begat two Sons, Hierofolymus and Judeus, evidens is is herein that they would draw the flory of the Jewes into this fable. And thus much of the allegoricall conjectures which this tale doth afford. Bus now from another head, let us (of those who are able to discourse somewhat Philosophically and with reason) V v v 💌

confider first and formost such as deal most simply in this behalf. And these be they that fay, like as the Greeks alegorize that Saturn is time, Juno the air, and the generation of Vulcan, is the transmutation of Air into fire; even so they give out that by Ofiris the Egyptians mean Nilm, which lieth and keepeth company with Isis, that is to say, the Earth: That Typhon is the Sea, into which Nilms falling loseth himself, and is dispatched here and there, unlesse it be that portion thereof, which the Earth receiveth, and whereby it is made fertill. And upon the River Nilus there is a facred lamentation, even from the dayes of Saturn: wherein there is lamenting, how Nilus springing and growing on the even from the cayes of a latin .

Her hand, decayeth and is loft on the right: For the Egyptians do think, that the east parts where the day appeareth, be the forefront and face of the World, that the North part is the right hand, and the South part the left. This Nilus, therefore arifing on the left hand, and loft in the Sea on the right hand, is faid truly to have his birth and generation in the left fide, but his death and corruption in the nano, mano truy to nave us out any grant and g tome and frost of Typhon. And among truce timing which are interacted and rotoleden this is one, that no Salt be used as the board; by reason whereof they never salure any Pilots or Sailors, for that they keep ordinarily the Sea, and get their living by it. This also is one of the principall causes, why keep ordinarily the Sea, and get their living by it. This also is one of the principal causes, why keep ordinarily the Sea, and get their living by it. This also is one of the principal causes, why they about Fishers in such that the principal causes, who is also the principal causes. The such that the such principal causes of the such that the such and also the such that the such as the such that the such as the such that the such as the such as the such that the such as the engraven, an Infant, an old Man; after them a Falcon or fome fuch Hauk, and close thereto a Fish, and last of all a River-Horse: which Hieroglyphicks, do symbolize and signific thus much in effect. O all ye that come into the World, and go out of it: God hateth shamelesse injustice. For by the Hauk they underfland God, by the Fish Hatred, and by the River-Horse impudent Violence and Villany, because it is said that he killeth his Father, and after that, forceth his own Mother and covereth her. And semblably is should seem, that the saying of the Pythagoreans, who give out that the Sea is a tear of Saturn, under covert words do mean, that it is impure and unclean. Thus have I been willing by the way to allege thus much, although it be without the train of our Fable, because they fall within the compaffe of a vulgar and common received History. But to return to our matter: the Priefls, as many as be of the wifer and more learned fort, understand by Offris, not only the River Nilus, and by Typhon the Sca: but also by the former, they fignifie in one word and fimply, all Vertue and power that produceth moifture and Water, taking it to be the materiall cause of generation, and the nature generative of feed: and by Typhon they reprefent all deficeative Vertue, all heat of fire and drineffe, as the very thing that is fully opposite and adverse to humidity: and hereupon it is, that they hold Typhon to be red of hair and of ikin yellow: and by the same reason they willingly would not encounter or meet upon the way men of that hew, no nor delight to speak unro such. Contrariwise they feign Ofiris to be of a black colour, because all Water, causeth the Earth, Clothes and Clouds, to appear black with which it is mingled. Also the moliture that is in young folk maketh their hair black; but grilled hoariness, which seemeth to be a baleyellow, cometh by reason of siccity unto those who be past their flower, and now in their declining age : also the Spring time is green, fresh, pleasant, and generative : but the latter scason of Autumn, for want of moisture, is an enemy to plante, and breedeth diseases in man and beaft. To speak also of that Ox or Beef named Mneuis, which is kept and nourished in Heliopolis at the common charges of the City, confecrated unto Ofiris, and which fome fay, was the fire of Apis; black he is of hair, and honoured in a second degree after Apis. Moreover, the whole Land of Egypt is of all others exceeding black, such a black I mean, as that is of the eye, which they call Chemia, and they liken it to the heart; for hot and moift it is, and inclineth to the left and South paris of the Earth, like as the heart lieth most to the left fide of a man. They affirm alfo, that the Sun and Moon are not mounted upon Chariots, but within Barges and Boats continually do move and fail as it were round about the World; giving us thereby covertly to understand, that they be bred and nourished by moisture. Furthermore, they think, that Homer (like as Thales also) being taught out of the Egyptian learning, doth hold and set down this position, That Water is the element and principle that engenderethall things: for they say, that Offrisis the Ocean, and Ifis, Tetbys, as one would say, the Nourie that suckleth and seedeth the whole World. For the Greeks call the ejaculation or casting forth of naturall feed, Anwie, like as the conjunction of male and female Zuwoja : likewise 185, which in Greek fignifieth a Son, is derived of the word of, that is to fay, Water, and of at betokeneth also to rain. Moreover, Bacchus they furname Hyes, as one would say, the Lord and Ruler of the moift nature; and he is no other than Ofiris. Futhermore, whereas we pronounce his name Ofiris, Hellanicus putteth it down Hyfris, faying, that he heard the very Priests themselves of Egypt to pro-nounce it fo. And thus verily calleth he the said god in every place, not without good shew of reafon, having regardunto his nature and invention. But that Office is the same god that Bacchus, who should in all reason better know than your self (O Cless) considering that in the City of Delphi you are the Miftreffe and Lady Prioreffe as it were of the religious Thyades, and from your infancy have been a Votary and Nun confecrated by your Father and Mother to the service of Ofiris. But if in regard of others, we must allege testimonies, let us not meddle with their hidden secrets; howbeit, that which the there, we must along terminonies, act in not measure with users in dual interest; in owners, that which the Prieffs do in publick when they inter Apis, having brought his Corps in a Boat or Punt, different notas all from the Ceremonies of Bacchu: for, clad they be in Stags skins, they carry Javelins in their hands, they keep a loud crying, and of shaking their Bodies very unquietly, much after the manner of those who are transported with the fanatical & facted sury of Bacchus. And what reason else should then be, that many Nations of Greece pourtray the flatue of Bacchus with a Bulls head? and the Dames among the Elians in their prayers and invocations do call unto him, befeeching this god to come unto them with his bulls foot? yea and the Argives commonly furname Bacchus Bugenes, which is as much to fay, as the fon of a Cowsor engendred by a Bull: and that which more is they invocate and call up on him out of the water with found of Trumpets, casting into a deep gulf, a Lamb, as to the Portier, under the name of Pylaochos. Their Trumpets they hide within their Javeline, called Thyrifaccording as Socrates hath written in his books of facted Geremonies. Moreover, the Tyrannicall acts, and that whole, entire and facred night, accord with that which is reported as touching the dismembring of Ofiris, and the refurrection or renovation of his life : in like manner, those matters which concern his buriall. For the Egyptians shew in many places the sepulchres of Ofiris; and the D. Iphians think, they have the bones and reliques of Bacchus among them, interred and bestowed near unto the Oracle: and his religious Priests cel brate unto him a secret sacrifice within the Temple of Apollo, when the Thyades who are the Prieftelles begin to chant the founet of * Licuites. Now that the Greeks are of opinion, that Bac. * One of the Friedrics of the Control of the figure only, but also of every other nature which is moiff the furand liquid, the testimony of Pindarus is sufficient, when he saith thus : Bacchus

Taking the charge of trees that grows Doth cause them for to bud and blow : The verdure fresh, and beauty pure Of lovely fruits he doth procure.

And therefore it is, that those who serve and worship Oficis are fleeightly forbidden and charged, not to destroy any fruitfull Tree, nor to stop the head of any Fountain. And not onely the River Nilus, but all water and moisture whatsoever in generall, they call the effl sence of Ofiris: by reason whereof, before their facrifices they carry alwaies in procession a Pot or Pitcher of Water, in honor of the

They describe also a King and the Southern or Meridionall Climat of the World, by a Figetree leaf, which Fig-leaf fignifieth the imbibition and motion of all things : besides, it seemeth naturally to resemble the member of generation. Also, when they solemnize the scalled Panylitia, which as before hath been faid, was instituted in the honour of Priapus, they show and carry about in procession an image or statue, the genitall member whereof, is thrice as big as the ordinary; for this god of theirs is the beginning of all things; and every such principle, by generation multiplieth it felf. Now, we are wont moreov r to fay, Thrice, for many times, to wit, a finite number for an infinite; as when we use the word Telo Manages, that is to fay, Thrice happy, for the most happy; and Three bonds, for infinite; unlesse peradventure this ternary or threefold number was expressy and properly chosen by our ancients. For the nature of moisture being the principle that engendreth all things, from the beginning hath ingendred these three elements or primitive bodies , Earth, Air , and Fire. For that branch which is fet unto the fable, to wit, that Typhon flung the genitall member of Ofiris into the River, that Ifis could not finde it, but canfed one to be made to refemble it, and when the was provided thereof, ordained that it should be honoured and carried in a solemn pomp; tendeth to this, for to teach ut, that the generative and productive vertue of god, had moisture at the first for the matter, and by the means of the faid humidity, was mixed with those things which were apt for generation. Another branch there is yet, growing to this Fable, namely, that one Apopis brother to the Sun, warred apainst Jupiter; that Ofiris aided Jupiter, and helped him to defeat his enemy; in regard of which merithe adopted him for his Son, and named him Diony sus, that is to say Bacchus. Now the Mythology of this fable, as it evidently appeareth, accordeth coverely, with the truth of Nature: for the Egyptians call the winde Jupiter, unto which nothing is more contrary, than ficcity, and that which is firy: and that is not the Sin, although some consanguinity it hath unto it: but moisture comming to extinguish the extremity of that driness, fortifieth and augmenteth those vapors, which nourish the wind and keep it in force. Moreover, the Greeks confecrate the Ivy unto Bacchus, and the same is named among the Egyptians, Chenofiris, which word, (as they fay) fignificth in the Egyptian tongue, the plant of Ofiris : at leastwife Ariston who involled a colony of the Athenians, affirmeth that he light upn an epiftle of Anaxarchue, wherein he found as much; as also, that Bacchus was the Son of a water Nymph, Naias. Other Egyptians also there be, who hold, that Bacchus was the Son of Ilisa and that he was not called Ofiris, but Arfaphes, in the letter Alpha, which word fignificth proweffe or valour. And thus much giveth Hermeus to understand, in his first book of Egyptian acts; where he faith allo, that Ofiris by interpretation, is as much, as * flout, or mighty. Here I forbear to allege *"ubeys Mnasus, who referreth and ascribeth unto Epaphus, Bacchus, Osiris, and Serapis. 1 overpass Anticlides likewife, who affirmeth, that Ifis was the Daughet of Prometheus, and matried unto Bacchus. For the very particular properties that we have faid were in their feafts and facrifices, yeeld a more clear evidence and proof, than any allegations of witneffes whatfoever. Also they hold, that among the flars, the dog or Sirius was confecrate unto Ifis, the which flar draweth the water. And they honour the Lion, with whose head having the mouth gaping and wide open, they adorn the Doores and Gates Of their Temples, for that the River Nilus rifeth,

> So foon as in the circle Zodiacke, The Sun and Leo fign, encounter make.

And as they both hold and affirm, Nilus to be the effluence of Ofiris, even to they are of Opinion, that the Body of Ifis is the Earth or Land of Egypt; and yetnot all of it, but so much as

Nelius overfloweth, and by commixtion maketh fertile and fruitfull: of which conjunction, they fay, that Orns was ingendred, which is nothing else but the temperature and disposion of the Air, nourishing and maintaining all things. They fay also, that this Orus was nourished within the Mores near unto the City Butus, by the Goddesse Latona: for that the earth being well drenched and watered, bringeth forth and nouritheth vapors, which overcome, extinguish, and repress (nothing so much) great ficeity and drineffe. Furthermore, they call the Marches and borders of the Land, the confines also of the coasts which touch the sea, Nephthys: and this is the reason why they name Nephthys, Teleutea, that is to fay, finall or last; and say that she was married unto Tython. And when Nilus breaketh out and overturneth his banks fo, as he approacheth these borders, this they call the unlawfull conjunction or adultery of Ofiris, with Nephthys, the which is known by certain plants growing there, among which is the Melilot : by the teed whereof, faith the tale, when it was feed and left behind, began Typhon to perceive the wrong that was done unto him in his marriage. And herenpon they fey, that Orus was the legitimate Son of Isis, but Anubis was born by Nephthys in bastardy. And verily in the succession of Kings they record Nephthys married unto Typhon, to have been at first barren. Now if this be not meant of a Woman, but of a Goddeffe, they understand under these anigmaticall speeches, a Land altogether barren and unfruitfull, by reason of hardnesse and siff solidity. The lying in wait of Typhon to Surprite Ofiris, his usurped rule and tyranny, is nothing else but the force of drineffe, which was very mighty, which diffipated also and spent all that humidity that both engendreth and also encreaseth Nilas to that height. As for that Queen of Ethicpia, who came to aid and affift him, the betokeneth the Southerly winds, comming from Ethiopia: for when these have the upper hand of the E efian winds, which blow from the North , and drive the clouds into Ethiopia, and to hinders those showers and gluttof rain which powre out of the clouds, and make the River Nilus to swell: then Tipton, that is to say, Drought, is said to win the better, and to burn up all, and so having gotten the mastery clean of Nilus, who by reason of his weaknesse and seeblenesse, is driven in, and forced to retire a contrary way, he chafeth him, poor and low into the fea. For whereasthe Fable faith, that Ofiris was flut fast within an Ark or Coffer, there is no other thing fignified thereby, but this departure back of the water, and the hiding thereof within the lea : which is the cause also, that they say Ofiris went out of sight in the moneth Athyr, and was no more seen; at what time as when all the Etefian winds are laid and given over to blow, Nilus returneth into his chanell, leaving the land discovered and bare. And now by this time as the night groweth longer, the dark-nesse increaseth, like as the force of the light doth diminish and is impaired: and then the Priessamong other ceremonier, testifying their fadnesse and heavy cheer, bring forth and shew a Beef with golden hornes, whom they all cover with a fine veil of black filk, thereby to represent the heavy dole and mourning of the Goddeffe for Ofiris: (for thus they think, that the faid Beef is the image of Ofiris: and the vestment of black aforesaid, testifying the earth, doth fignific Isis) and this shew exhibit they four daics together; to wit, from the seventh unto the tenth following: And why? Four things there be for which they make demonstration of grief and forrow : the first is the River Nilus, for that he feemeth to retire and fail: the fecond are the North-winds, which now are husht and still, by reason of the Southern-winds, that gain the mattery over them: the third is the Day, for that now is wax:th shorter than the night : and last of all, the discovering and nakedness of the earth, together with the develting of trees, which at the very fame time begin to fied and lose their leaves. After this, upon the ninteenth day at night, they go down to the sea side, and then the Priests revested in their facred Stoles and Habits, carry forth with them, a confecrated Cheft, wherein there is a veffell of gold, into which they take and powre fresh and potable water; and with that, all those who are present setup a note and shout, as if they had found Ofiris again : then they take a piece of fatty and fertile earth, and together with the water, knead and work it into a paste, mixing therewith most precious odors, perfumes and spices, whereof they make a little image in form of the Moon croiffant, which they deck with Robes and adorn, shewing thereby evidently that they take these gods to be the substance of Water

Of Isis and Osiris.

Thus when Ilis had recovered Oliris, nourithed Orus, and brought him up to some growth, so that he now became strengthened and fortified, by Exhalations, Vapors, Mists and Clouds, Tiphen verily was vanguished howbeit, not slain, for that the goddesse, which is the Lady of the Earth, would not permit and fuffer, that the power or nature which is contrary unto moisture, should be utterly abolished onely the did flacken and let down the vehement force thereof, willing that this combat and firife should still continue; because the world would not have been entire and perfect, if the nature of fire had been once extinct and gone. And if this go not current among them, there is no reason and probability, that any one should project this affertion also, namely, that Typhon in times past overcame one part of Ofiris: for that in old time, Egypt was fea : whereupon it is, that even at this day, within the mines wherin men dig for metals, yea, and among the mountains, there is found great store of sea fish. Likewise, all the Fountains, Wells, and Pits (and those are many in number) carry a brackish, faltish and bitter water, as if some remnant or residue of the old sea were reserved, which ran thither. But in process of time, Orus subdued Typhon, that is to say, when the seasonable raine came, which tempered the excessive heat, Nilus expelled and drave forth the fea, discovered the Champian ground, & filled it continually more & more by new deluges and inundations, that layed some still unto it. And hereof, the daily experience, is presented unto our eyes; for we perceive even at this day, that the overflowes and rising of the River, bringing new mud, and adding fresh earth fill by little and little, the sea giveth place and retireth: and as the deep in it is filled more and more, fo the superficies riseth higher, by the continual thelves that the Nile cast sup; by which means, the Sea runneth backward: yea, the very isle of Pharos; which Homer knew by his days to lie far within the Saa, even a days failing from the continent and firm land of Egypt, is now a very part thereof: not for that it removed & approached neerer and neerer to the Land; but because the Sea which was between, gave place unto the River that continually made new Earth with the mud that it brought, and so maintained and augmented the main Land. But these things resemble very near, the Theologicall interpretations that the Stoicks give out: for they hold, that the generative and nutritive Spirit, is Bacehus; but that which striketh and divideth; is Hercules; that which receiveth, is Ammon; that which entreth and pierceth into the earth, is Ceres and Proferpina; and that which doth penetrate farther and paffe thorow the Sea, is Neptune. Others. who mingle among naturall causes and reasons, some drawn from the Mathematicks, and principally from Aftrology, think that Typhon is the Solar Circle or Sphere of the Sun; and that Ofiris is that of the Moon; inafmuch as the Moon hath a generative and vegerable light, multiplying that fweet and comfortable moisture which is so meet for the generation of living Creatures, of Trees and Plants: but the Sun having in it a pure firy flame indeed without any mixture or rebatement at all, heateth and drieth that which the earth bringeth forth, yea, and whatfoever is verdant and in the flower ; info-much as by his inflammation he caufeth the greater part of the earth to be wholly defert and inhabitable, and many times subdueth the very Moon. And therefore the Egytians, evermore name Typhon, Seth, which is as much to fay, as ruling Lordly, and oppressing with violence. And after their fabulous manner they fay, that Hercules sitting as it were upon the Sun, goeth about the world with him; and Mercury likewise with the Moon: by reason whereof, the works and effects of the Moon resemble those acts which are performed by Eloquence and Wisedom: but those of the Sun are compared to fuch as be exploited by force and puiffance. And the Stoicks fay, that the Sun is lighted and fee on fire by the Sea, and therewith nourified: but they be the Fountains and Lakes which find up unto the Moon a mild, sweet and delicate vapor. The Egyptians seign, that the death of Ofiris hapned on the seventeenth day of the moneth, on which day, better than upon any other, she is judged to be at the full, and this is the reason why the Pythagoreans call this day, The obstraction, and of all other numbers they most abhor and detest it: for whereas sixteen is a number quadrangular or foure-square, and eighteen longer one way than another; which numbers onely of those that be plain, happen for to have the ambient unities, that environ them, equall to the spaces contained and comprehended within them; seventeen, which falleth between, separateth and disjoyneth the one from the other, and being cut into unequall intervalle, distracteth the proportion sesquioctave. And fomethere be who fay, that Ofiris lived, others that he reigned, eight and twenty year: for fo many lights there be of the Moon, and so many days doth she turn about her own Circle: and therefore in those Ceremonics which they call The Sepulture of Ofiris, they cut a piece of Wood, and make a certain Coffin or Case in manner of the Moon Croiffant, for that as she approacheth near to the Sun, she becommeth pointed and cornered, untill in the end she come to nothing, and is no more seen. And as for the difmembring of Ofiris into fourteen pieces, they fignific unto us underthe covert veil of these words. The days wherein the faid Planet is in the wane, and decreafeth even unto the change, when the is renewed again. And that day on which the first appeareth, by passing by and escaping the raies of the Sun, they call an unperfect good : for Ofiris is a doer of good : and this name fignifieth many things, but principally an active and benchicial power, as they fay: and as for the other name Omphis, Herman faith, that is betokeneth as much as a Benefactor. Alfo, they are of opinion, that the rifings and inundations of the River Nilus, answer in proportion to the course of the Moon; for the greatest height that it groweth unto in the Country of Elephanine, is eight and twenty cubits; for fo many illuminations there be, or days, in every revolution of the Moon : and the lowest gage about Mendes and Xois , fix cubits , which answereth to the first quarter : but the mean between, about the City Memphis, when it is just at the full, cometh to fourteen cubits, correspondent to the full Moon. They hold moreover, Apis to be the lively image of Ofiris, and that he is engendered and bred at what time as the generative light descendeth from the Moon and toucheth the Cow defirous of the male; and therefore Apis resembleth the formes of the Moon, having many white spotsobseured and darkened with the shadowes of black. And this is the reason, why they solemniz: a feast in the new Moon of the moneth Phamenoth, which they call The ingreffe or entrance of Ofiris to the Moon; and this is the beginning of the Spring season: and thus they put the power of Ofiris in the Moon. They say also that Ifis (which is no other thing but generation) lieth with him ; and fo they name the Moon, Mother of the world; faying, that the is a double nature, male and female; female, in that the doth conceive and is replenished by the Sun : and male, in this regard that the fendeth forth and sprinkleth in the Air, the feeds and principles of generation: for that the dry diffemperature and corruption of Typhon, is not alwaies superiour, but often times vanquished by generation, and how soever sied it be and bound, yet it rifeth fresh again, and fighteth against Orus, who is nothing else but the terrestrial World, which is not altogether free from corruption, nor yet exempt from generation. Others there be, who would have all this fiction coverely to represent no other thing but the Ecclipses: for the Moon is Ecclipsed, when she is at the full directly opposite to the Sun, and cometh to fall upon the shadow of the Earth: like arthey say, Ofiris was put into the Chest or Coster above said. On the other side, she seemeth abolish the Sun, no more then Isis doth kill Typhen: but when Nephibys bringesh forth Ana-Uuuu 3 bis, Ifis putteth her felf in place : for Nephilys is that which is under the earth and unften; but Ifis that which is above, and appeareth unto us : and the circle named Horizon, which is common to them both, and parteth the two Hemispheres, is named Anubis, and in form resembleth a Dogg : for what a Dogg feeth as well by night as by day: fo that it should feem, that Anubis among the Egyptians hath the like power that Proferpina among the Greeks, being both celelestiall and terrestriall. Othersthere be, who think, that Anubis is Saturn, and because he is conceived with all things, and bringeth them forth, which in Greek the word xuen, tignificth, therefore he is named Kum, that is to fay a Dogg. So that there is fome hidden and myfticall fecret in it, that caufeth fome, even fill to reverence and adore A Dogg: for the time was, when more worthip was done unto it in Egypt, than to any other beaft; but after that Cambyfes had killed Apis, cut him in pieces, and flung the fame here and there, no pearly but after that Campyon has hinter by the context of the context Creature would come near to rath thereof, fave the Dogge only; whereupon he loft that prerogative and preeminence to be more honoured than other Beatles. Others there are, who would have the shadow of the earth, which causeth the Moon to be ecclipsed when she enereth into it, to be named Typhon. And therefore me thinks, it were not amiffe to lay, that in particular there is not any one of these Expositions and Interpretations perfect by it self and rights but all of them together carry fome good construction : for it is neither Drought alone, nor Winds nor S:a,ne yet darkneffe ; but all that is noisome and hurtfull whatsoever, and which hath a speciall part to hurt and destroy, is called Typhon. Neither must we put the principles of the whole World into Bodies that have no Life and Soul, as Democritus and Epicarus do: nor yet let down for the Workman and Framer of the first matter, a certain reason and providence, without quality (as do the Stoicks;) (uch a rhing as both a substitute before and above all, and commandeth all: for impossible it is, that one sole cause, good or backbould be the beginning of all things together; for God is not the cause of any evill, and the coagmemation of the world bendeth contrary waites, like as the composition of a Lute or Bow, as Heraclitus faith, and according to Euripides,

No things can be by themselves good or bad: That thines do well, a mixture mult be had.

And therefore this opinion to very auctent, is descended from Theologians and Law-givers, unto Poets and Philosophers, the certain authour and beginning whereof, is not yet known: howbeir, fo firmly grounded in the perswasion and belief of men, that hard it is so suppresse or abolish the same; so commonly devulged not onely in Conferences, Disputation, and ordinary speches abroad, but also in facrifices and divine ceremonies of gods service, in many places, as well-among Barbarians as Greeks, to wir, that neither this World flotesh and waveth as adventure, without the government of Providence and Reason, nor Reason only it is that guideth, directeth, and holdeth it (as it were) with certain Helmes or bits of Obcifance, but many things there be confused and mixed, good and bad together: or to speak more plainly, there is nothing here beneath that nature produceth and bringeth forth, which of it self is pure and simple: neither is there one Drawer of two Tune, to disperse and distribute abroad the affairs of this world, like as a Taverner or Viorner doth his Wines or other Liquors, brewing and tempering one with another. But this life is conducted by two Principles and Powers, adverse one unto another; for the one leadeth to the right hand directly, the other contrariwise turneth us aside and putteth us back : and so this life is mixt, and the very World it self, if not all throughout, yet at leastwife, this beneath about the earth, and under the Moon, is unequall, variable, and subject to all mutations that possibly may be. For if nothing there is , that can be without a precedent cause, and that which of it self is good can never minister any cause of evill; necessary it is, that nature bath some peculiar cause and beginning by it felf, of good as well as of bad. And of this opinion are most part of the Ancients, and those of the wifest fort. For some think there be two gods as it were of a contrary mystery and profession; the one author of all good things, and the other of bad. Others there be who call the better of them God; and the other Damon, that is to fay, Devill, as Zoroastes the Magician did, who by report, was five thousand years before the war of Troy. This Zoroastes (I say) named the good god Oromazes, and the other Arimanius. Moreover, he gave out, that the one resembled light, more than any sensible thing else whatsoever: the other darknesse and ignorance: and also that there is one in the midds between them, named Mithres: (and hereupon it is, that the Persians call an Intercessor or Mediator, Mitbres.) He teacheth us also to facrifice unto the one of them, for petition of good things, and for thankelgiving : but to the other, for to divert and turn away finister and evill accidents. To which purpose they used to flamp in a morter a certain herb which they call Omomi , calling upon Pluso and the darkneffe: then they temper it with the blood of a Woolf, which they have killed in facrifice: this done, they carry it away, and throw it into a dark corner, where the Sun never fhinesh.

For this conceit they have, that of Herbs and Plants, some appertain unto the good god, and others to the evill Damon or Devill. Semblably of living Creatures, Dogs, Birds, and land Urchins, belong to their good god : but those of the Water, to the evill fiend. And for this cause they repute those very happy, who can kill the greatest number of them. Howbeit these Sages and wise Men report many fabulous things of the gods : as for example, that Oromanes is engendred of the clearest and purel light, and Arimanius of deep darkneffe : also that they war one upon another: And the former of these * That is created fix other gods, the first of Benevolence; the fecond of Verity; the third of good Discipline * That is and publick Law; and of the rest behind, one of Wiscom, another of Riches; and the fixth, which also rimaniat, is the last, the maker of joy for good and honest deeds. But the *latter produceth as many other in number, concurrents as it were of adverse operation to the former above named. Atterwards when Oromazes had augmented and amplified himself three simes, he removed as far from the Sun, as the Sun is diffant from the Earth, adorning and embellishing the Heavens with Stars; and one Star above the reft he ordained to be the Guide, Miftriffe, and Overfeer of them all, to wit, Sirius, that is to fay, the Dog-star. Then, after he had made four and twenty other Gods, he inclosed them all within an Egg. But the other, brought forth by Arimanius, who were also in equal number, never ceased un-till they had pierced and made a hole into the said smooth and polished Egg: and so after that, evill things became mingled pell-mell with good. But there will a time come predefinated fetally, when this Arimanius, who brings into the world Plague and Famine, shall of necessity be rooted out and utterly destroyed for ever, even by them; and the Earth shall become plain, even, and unisorm: neither shall there be any other but one life, and one Common wealth of men, all happy and speaking one and the same Language. Theopompus also writeth, that according to the wife Magi, these two gods mult for three thouland yeers, conquer one after another, and for three thouland yeers be conquered again by turns: and then for the space of another three thousand yeers, levie mutuall wars, and fight battels one against the other, whiles the one shall subvert and overthrow that which the other hath see up: untill in the end Pluto (kall faint, give over, and perifh: then shall men be all in happy estate; they shall need no more food, nor cast any shadow from them; and that god who hath wrought and effected all this, shall repose himself, and rest in quiet, not long (I say) for a god, but a moderate time as one would fay for a man taking his fleep and reft. And thus much as touching the fable devifed by the Migi. But the Chaldwans affirm that of the gods, whom they call Planets or wandring Stars, two there be that are beneficiall and doers of good; two again mischievous and workers of evill; and three there are of a mean nature and common. As for the opinion of the Greeks, concerning this point, there is no man I suppose ignorant thereof: namely, that there be two portions or parts of the world, the one good alotted unto Jupiter Olympius, that is to fay, Celeftiall; another had, apperating to Pluto, infernall. They fable moreover, and feign, that the goddeffe Harmmans, that is to fay, Accord, was engendered of Mars and Venus: of whom, the one is cruell, grim, and quartellous; the other mild, lovely, and generative. Now confider the Philosophers themselves, how they agree herein : For Heraclins directly and difertly nameth war, the Father, King, and Lord of all the world; faying, that Homer when he wisheth and prayeth,

Both out of Heaven and Earth to banish war, That God and Men no more might be at jar, wift not how (ere he was aware) he curfed the generation and production of all things, which indeed have their effence and being by the fight and antipathie in nature. He was ignorant that the Sun would not paffe the bounds and limits appointed unto him; for otherwise the furies and curfed tongues which are the Ministrelles and Coadjutteffes of Juftice would find him out. As for Empedocles, he faith, that the beginning and principle which worketh good, is Love and Amity, yea, and otherwhiles is called Harmony by Merop: but the cause of evill, Malice , Hatred, cankered spight, Quarrell, Debate, and bloody fight.

Come now to the Pythagoreans, they demonstrate and specific the same by many names : for they call the good principle, One, finite, permanent or quiet, straight or direct, odd, quadrat or square, right and lightfome : but the bad, twain, infinite, moving, crooked, even, longer one way more than another, unequall, left and dark, as if these were the Fountains of generation. Anaxagiras calleth their the Mind or Understanding and Infinity. Aristosis termeth the one Form, the other Privation. And Plats under dark and covert termes hiding his opinion, in many places callets the former of the few contrary principles, The Same, and the Latter, The other: But in the Bookes of his Lawes, which he wrote when he was now well stept in years, he giveth then no more any obscure and ambiguous names, neither describeth he them symbolically and by ænigmaticall and intricate means, but in proper and plain terms, he saith, that this work is not moved and managed by one sole cause, but haply by many, or at leastwife no fewer than twain; whereof the one is the Creatour and worker of good, the other opposite unto it and operative of contrary effects. He leaveth also and alloweth a third cause between, which is neither without Soul nor reasonlesse, ne yet unmoveable of it felf, as somethink, but adjacent and adherent to the other twain, howbeit inclining alwaics to the better, as having a defire and appetite thereto, which it purfueth and followeth, as that which becreafter we will deliver shall show more manifestly, which Treatife shall reconcile the Egyptian Theology with the Greeks Philosophy, and reduce them to a very good concordance: for that the Generation, Composition, and Constitution of this World is mingled of contrary powers, howbeit the same not of equall force : for the better is predominant : but impossible it is that the evill should utterly perish and be abolished, so deeply it is imprinted in the Body, and so far inbred in the Soul of the universall World, in opposition alwaics to the better, and to war against it. Now then, in the Soul, Reason and Understanding, which is the Guide, and Mistresse of all the best things, is Ofiris. Also in the Earth, in the Winds, in Water, Sky and the Stars, that which is well ordained, stayed, disposed and digested in good fort, by temperate Scasons and Revolutions, the same is called the defluxion of Ofiris, and the very apparent image of him: Contrariwite, the passionate, violent, unreasonable, brutish, rash and foolish part of the Soul, is Typhon: Semblably in the bodily nature, that which is extraordinarily adventitions, unhollom and difeated, as for example, the troubled air and tempetious indispositions of the weather, the obscuration or Ecclipse of the Sun, the defict of the Moon and her occultation, be as it were the excussions, deviations out of course, and disparations: and all of them be Tythens; as the very interpretation of the Egyptian word fignifieth no leste: for Typhon they name Serb, which is as much to fay, as violent and oppressing after a Lordy manner. It importeth also many times reversion, and otherwhiles an insultation or supplantation. Moreover some there be who say, that one of Typhons familiar friends was named Behaon. But Manethos affirmeth, that Typhon himself was called Bebon, which word by interpretation is as much as cohibition, reftraint or impeachment, as if the pulffance and power of Typhon were to flay and withfland the affairs that are in good way of proceeding, and tend as they should do, to a good end. And hereupon it is that of tame Beafts they dedicate and attribute unto him, the most groffe and indecible of all others, namely an Affe : but of wild Beafts the most cruell and savage of all others, as the Crocodiles and River hortes. As for the Affe, we have spoken before of him. In the City of Mercury, named Hermupelis, they shew unto us the image of Typhen, pourtraied under the form of a River-horse, upon whom sitted an Hauk, sighting with a Street. By the feresaid Hosse they re, present Tython: and by the Hank, the power and authority which Tython having gotten by force maketh no care oftentimes both to be troubled and also to trouble others by his malice. And therefore, when they folemnize a facrifice, the feventh day of the moneth Tybi, which they call the comming of Iss out of Phanicia, they devise upon their hallowed Cakes for facrifice, a River-horse, as if he were tied and bound. In the City of Apollo, the manner and cuftom confirmed by Law was, that every one must eat of a Crocodile : and upon a certain day they have a folemn chase and hunting of them, one must cat of a Grocounte. In appear and then cash them all before the Temple. and they say, when they kill as many of them as they can, and then cash them all before the Temple. that Typhon being become a Crocodile hath escaped from Orus: attributing all dangerous wicked Bafts, all hurtfull plants and violent passions unto Typhou, as if they were his works, his parts or motions. Contrariwis: they pourtray and depaint unto us Ofiris, by a Scepter and an Eye upon it: meaning by the Eye Forefielt and Providence, by the Sos pier authority and puiffance: like as Homer nameth Inprese who is the Prince, Lord and Ruler of all the world, Hypatos, that is Soveraign, and Meffor, that is, Foresceing: siving us to understand, by Soveraign, his supream Power, by foreseeing his Prudence and Wildom. They represent Ofiris also many times by an Hauk, for that the hath a wonderfull clear and quick light, her flighcalfo is as fwilt, and the is wont naturally to fulfain her felf with very little food. And more than that (by report) when the flight over dead bodies unburied, the cafteth mould and earth upon their Eyes. And look whenfoever fle flieth down to the River for to drink fhe fetteth up her featheis straight upright, but when she hath drunk she layeth them plain and even again, by which it appeareth that fate she is and hath cleaped the Crocodile: For if the Crocodile seize upon her and catch her up, her pennach abideth fliff and upright as before. But generally throughout wherefoever the image of Officis is exhibited in the form of a man, they pourtray him with the natural I member of generation fliff and firaight, prefiguring thereby the generative and nutritive vertue. The habiliment also, where-* Or Fire, with they clad his images is bright, shining like fire: For they repute the * Sun to be a body representing the power of goodness, as being the visible matter of a spiritual and intellectual substance. And therefore their opinion deserveth to be rejected who attribute unto Typhonihe fol zere of the Sun, confidering that unto him properly appertaineth nothing that is resplendent, healthfull and comfortable, no disposition, no generation or motion which is ordered with measure or digested by reason: But if either in the air or upon the earth there be any unscasonable disposition of winds, of weather, or water, it hapneth when the primitive cause of a disordinate and indeterminate power commeth to extinguisa the kinde vapors and exhalations. Moreover in the facred hymns of Oficis, they invocate and call upon bim who lieth at repose hidden within the armes of the Sun. Also upon the thirtieth day of the moneth Epithy, they folemnize the feaft of the Nativity or birth of Orus Eyes: at what time as the Sun and Moon be in the same direct line : 28 being perswaded that not only the Moon but the Sun also is the Eye and light of Horus: Likewise upon the twentie eighth day of the moneth Phaopi, they celebrate another feast of the Suns basons or staves, and that is after the Æquinex in Autumn, giving covertly thereby to underfland, that the Sun hath need of an appuy or supporter to rest upon and to strengthen him, because his heat then begins to decay and languish sensibly, his light also to diminish and decline obliquely from us. Moreover about the Solstice or middle of Winter, they carry about his Temple seventimes a Cow: and this procession is called the feeking of Ofiris, or the Revolution of the Sun, as if the goddeffe then defired the waters of Winter: And so many times they do it, for that the course of the Sun, from the Winter Solftice unto the Summer Solftice is performed in the seventh moneth. It is faid moreover, that * Horus the Sun of Isis was the first who facrificed unto the Sun, the fourteenth day of the * Or Orus, month, according as is written in a certain book as touching the Nativity of Horus: howfoever every day they offer incense and sweet odors to the Sun three times: First at the Sun Rifing, Rosin: Secondly about Noon, Myrrh: And Thirdly at the Sun Setting, a certain composition named Kiphi. The mysticall meaning of which Persumes and Odors, I will hereafter declare: but they are persuaded that in all this they worship and honor the Sun. But what need is there to gather and collect a number of such matters as these ? seeing there be some who openly maintain that Offris is the Sun, and that the Greeks call him Sirius, but the Article which the Egyptians put before, to wit, [O] is the cause that so much is not evidently perceived; as also that Isis is nothing else but the Moon: and of her images those that have horns upon them, signifie no other thing but the Moon Croissant: but such as are covered and clad in black, betoken those days wherein she is hidden

ordarkened, namely, when the runneth after the Sun: which is the reason that in love matters they invocate the Moon. And Eudoxus himself saith, that Isis is the president over amatorious folk. And verily in these ceremonies there is some probability and likelihood of truth. But to say that Typhon is the San, is to abfurd, that we ought not fo much as give car to those who affirm to. But return we now to our former matter. For Isis is the feminine part of nature, apt to receive all generation, upon which occasion called the is by Plato, the Nurse, and Pandeches, that is to say, capable of all: yea and the common fort name her Myrionymus, which is as much to fay, as having an infinite number of names, for that the receiveth all formes and shapes, according as it pleaseth that first reason to convert and turn her. Moreover, there is imprinted in her naturally, a love of the first and principal I effence, which is nothing else but the soveraign good, and it she desireth, seeketh, and pursueth after. Contrariwise, she flieth and repelleth from her, any part and portion that proceedeth from ill. And howfoever she be the subject matter, and meet place apt to receive as well one as the other, yet of it felf, enclined the is alwaies rather to the better, and applieth her felf to engender the fame, yea, and to diffeminate and fow the defluxions and fimilitudes thereof, wherein the t keth pleasure and rejoyceth, when the hath conceived and is great therewith, ready to be delivered. For this is a representation and description of the substance engendred in matter, and nothing else but an imitation of that which is. And therefore you may fee it is not besides the purpose, that they imagine and devise the Soul of Ofiris to be eternall and immortall : but as for the body, that Typhon many times doch tear, mangle, and abolish it, that it cannot be seen : and that Isis goeth goeth up and down, wandring here and there, gathering together the dimembred pieces thereos, for that which is good and spirituall, by consequence is not any water subject to change and alteration; but that which is sensible and material doth yeeld from it felf certain images, admitting withall and receiving fundry proportions, forms, and similitudes, like as the prints and stamps of scales set upon wax, do not continue and remain alwales, but are subject to change, alteration, disorder, and trouble, and this same was chased from the superior region, and sent down hither, where it fighteth against Horus whom Isis engendred fensible, as being the very Image of the spiritual and intellectuall world. And hereupon it is, that Typhon is faid to accuse him of Bistardy, as being nothing pure and sincere, like unto his father, to wir, Reason and Understanding; which of it self is simple, and not medled with any possion: but in the matter adulterate and degenerate, by reason that it is corporall. Howbeit, in the end the victory is on Mercuries side, for he is the discourse of reason, which testifieth unto us, and sheweth, that nature hath produced this world materiall metamorphozed to the spirituall form . for the nativity of Apollo, engendred between Isis, and Osiris, whiles the gods were yet in the belly of Rhea, symbolizeth thus much, that before the world was evidently brought to light and fully accomplished, the matter of reason, being found naturally of it self rude and unperfect, brought forth the first generation: for which cause they say, that god being as yet lame, was born and begotten in darkness;, whom they call the elder Horus. For the world yet it was not, but an image onely and defign of the world, and a bare fantafie of that which should be. But this Horus here is determinate, definite and perfect, who killeth not Typhon right out, but taketh from him his force and puiffance that he cando little or nothing. And hercupon it is, that (by report) in the City Copius, the image of Horus holdeth in one hand the genitall member of Typkon: and they fable besides, that Mercury having berest him of his sinewes, made thereof strings for his harp, and so used them. Hereby they teach, that reason framing the whole world, set it in tune, and brought it to accord, forming it of those parts which before were at jar and discord: howbeit removed not, nor abolished altogether the pernicious and hurrfull nature, but accomplished the vertue thereof. And therefore it is, that it being feeble and weak, wrought also (as it were) and intermineled or interlaced with those parts and members which be subject to passions and mutations, causeth Eurhquakes, and Tremblings, excessive Heats, and extreme Drinesse, with extraordinary Winds in the Air, besides Thunder, Lightnings, and sirry Tempess. It impoisoneth moreover the Waters and winds, insetting them with Pestilence, reaching up and bearing the head alofe, as far as to the Moon, obscuring and darkning many times even that which is by nature clean and shining. And thus the Egyptians do both think and say, that Typhon sometime strook the Eye of Horus, and another while plucke it out of his head and devoured it, and then afterwards delivered it again unto the Sun. By the firiking aforefaid, they mean anigmatically the wane or decrease of the Moon monethly: by the totall privation of the Eye, they understand her ecclipse and defect of light : which the Sun doth remedy by relumination of her straight waies, as soon as the is gotten past the shade of the earth. But the principal & more divine nature is composed and consisteth of three things, to wit, of an intellectuall nature, of matter, and a compound of them both, which we call the world. Now, that intellectuall part, Plato nameth Idea, the pattern also of the Fathers: as for matter, he tearmethit a Mother, Nurie, a foundation also and a plot or place for generation; and that which is produced of both, he is wont to call the iffue and thing procreated. And a man may very well conjecture, that the Egyptians compared the nature of the whole world, especially to this, as the fairest triangle of all other. And Plats in his books of Policy or Common-wealth, feemeth also to have used the same, when he composeth and describeth his nuptiall figure: which triangle is of this sort: that the fide which maketh the right angle, is of three, the basis of four, and the third line called Hypotinusa of five, æquivalent in power to the other two that comprehend it: fo that the line which directly falleth plumb upon the bale, must answer proportionably to the male; the base to the female, and the Hypotinusa to the iffue of them both. And verily, Ofiris representeth the beginning and principle: Ifis that which receive it; and Horus the compound of both. For the number of three is the fift od and perfect the quaternary is the first square or quadrat number, composed of the first even number, which is two and the refembleth partly the Ficher, and in part the Mother, as confifting both of two and three, And it shall seem also that the very name IIa, which is the universall world, was derived of IIan, that is to fay, five, and so in Greek  " na' oak, in old time signified as n uch as to number : and that which more is, five being multiplyed in it felf, maketh a quadrat number, to wit twenty five, which is just as many letters as the Egyptians have in their Alphabet, and to many yeers Apis alfo lived. And as for Horus, they uled to call him Kaimin, which is as much to fay, as feen, for that this world is fenfible and visible. Is likewise is sometime called Mouth, otherwhiles Athyri or Methyer. And by the first of these names, they fignific a Mother : by the second, the fair house of Horus, like as Plate termeth it to be the place capable of generation : the third is compounded of Full and the cause: for Matter is full of the world, as being maried and keeping company with the first principle, which is good, pure and beautifully adorned. It should feem haply also, that the Poet Hesiodus, when he saith, that all things at the first, were Chaos, Earth, Tartarus, and Leve, groundeth upon no other principles than those, which are fignified by these names, meaning by the Earth Isis; by Love Ofiris; and by Tarearus Typhon; as we have made de nonstration. For by Chaos it seems that he would understand some place and recepticle of the wor'd. Moreover, in some fort these matters require the fable of Plate, which in his book incituled Symp fium, Socrates inferred, namely, wherein he fetteth down the generation of Love: faying that Penia, that is to fay, Poverty, desirons to have Children, went and lay with Pores, that is to fay, riches, and Il pt with him, by whom the conceived with Child, and brought forth Love: who naturally is long and variable; and begotten of a Father who is good, wife, and all-fufficient; and of a Mother who is poor, needy, and for want, defirous of another, and evermore feeking and following after it. For the forefaid Paras, is no other, but the first thing amiable, defireable, perred and fufficient. As for Penia, it is matter, which of it felf is evermore bare. needy, wanting that which is good, whereby at length the is conceived with Child, after whom the hath a longing delire, and evermore ready to receive fomewhat of him. Now Horus engendred besween them (which is the world) is not eternall, nor impassible, nor incorruptible, but being evermore in generation, he endeavou orh by viciflitude of mutations, and by periodicall passion, to continue alwaies young, as if he should never die and perish. But of such fables as these we must make use, not as of reasons altogether really subfifting: but so as we take out of each of them, that which is meet and convenient to our parpofe. When as therefore we fay Matter, we are not to rely upon the opinions of fom. Philosophers, and to think it for to be a body without foul, without quality, continuing in it selfidle, and without all action whatsoever; for we call oil the matter of a perfume or ointmeut; and gold the matter of an image or statue, which notwithstanding is not void of all similitude: and even so we say, that the very soul and understanding of a man, is the matter of Vertue and of Science, which we give unto reason, for to bring into order, and adorn. And fome there were, who affirmed the mind or understanding to be the proper place of forms, and air were, the express mould of intelligible things : like as there be Naturalists who hold, that the feed of a woman hath not the power of a principle serving to the generation of man, but flandeth inflead of matter and nourishment onely : according unto whom, we also being grounded herein, are to think that this goddesse having the fruition of the first and chief god, and conversing with him continually, for the love of those good things and vertues which are in him, is nothing adverse unto him, but loveth him as her true spouse and lawfull Harband : and like as we say, that an honest wife who enjoyeth ordinarily the company of her Husband , loveth him never the leffe, but hath fill a mind unto him; even so giveth not she over to be enamoured upon him, although she be continually where he is, and replenished with his principall and most sincere parts. But when and whereas Typhon in the end thrufteth himself between, and setteth upon the extream parts, then and there she feemeth to be fad and heavy, and thereupon is faid to mourn and lament, yea and feek up certain reliques and pieces of Ofiris, and ever as the can find my, the receiveth and arrayeth them with all diligence, and as they are ready to perish and corrupt, she carefully tendeth and keepeth them close, like as again she produceth and bringe in sorth other things to light of her felf. For the reasons, the ldzz and the influences of God, which are in Heaven and amongst the Stars, do there continue and remain: but those which be diffiminate among the sensible and passible bodies, in the Earth and in the Sea, diffufed into the plants and living Creatures, the same dying and being buried, do many times revive and rife again fresh by the means of generations. And hereupon the fable faith thus much more that Typhon. cohabiteth and lyeth with Nephilys, and that Ofiris also by stealth and secretly, keepeth company with her: for the corruptive and defiroying power, doth principally possessed the extream parts of that matter which they name Nephitys and death: and the generative and preserving vertue, conferrethinto it little feed, and the same weak and feeble, as being marred and destroyed by Typton: unlesse it be fo much as Ifis gathereth up and faveth, which the also nouritheth and mantaineth. But in one word, and to speak more generally, he is still better, as Plato and Aristotle are of opinion: for the naturals puissince to engender and to preserve, moveth toward him as to a substance and being: whereas, that force of killing and destroying moveth behind, toward non subsistence : which is the reason, that they call the one Isis, that is to say, a motion animate and wise; as if the word were derived of which fignifieth to move by a certain science and reason, for a barbarous word it is not. But like as the generall name of all gods and goddeffes, to wit, Theos, is derived of and To Start, that is to fay, of visible, and and also the Egyptians, have called this goddeffe sion, and Ifis, of intelligence and motion together Semblably Plate faith, that in old time, when they faid Ifia, they meant Ofia, that is to fay, facred; like as Noefis alfo & Phronefis, quafi of soes; that is to fay, the stirring & motion of the Understanding, being carried & going forward : & they imposed this word owners, to those who have found out and discovered Goodness and Vertue: but contrariwife, have by reproachful names noted fuch things as impeach hinder and flay the courte for fastoral chings, binding them fo, as they can not go forward, to wit, see le, Vice, areale, Indigence, bindie, Cowardife, and 'aria, Grief, as if they kept them from live, or ites, that is to fay, free progresse and proceeding forward. As for Ofirris,a word it is composed of on and hes, that is to fay, holy and facred; for he is the common reason or Idea, of things above in Heaven, and beneath : of which, our ancients were wont to call the one fort, ises, that is to fay, facred; and the other wis, that is to fay, holy. The reason also which sheweth celestial things, and such as move upward, is called Anubis, & otherwhiles Hermanubis, as if the one name were meet for those above, & the other for them beneath : whereupon they facrificed unto the former a white Cock, & to the other a yellow or of faffron colour; for that they thought those things above, pure simple and shining; but those beneath, mixed of a medly colour. Neither are we to marvail, that these terms are disguised to the fashion of Greek words; for an infinite number of more there be, web have been transported out of Greece with those men who departed from thence into exile. & there remain untill this day as ftrangers without their native Country; whereof some there be which cause Poetry to be flandered, for calling them into use, as if it spake barbarously, namely, by those who term fuch Poesicall and obscure words, Glottas. But in the Books of Hermes or Mercury, so called, there is written by report, thus much concerning facred names, namely, that the power ordained over the circular motion & revolution of the Sun, the Egyptians call Horus, & the Greeks Apollo : that weh is over the wind, some name Ofiris, others Sarapis, and some again in the Egyptian language Sothi, which signifirth as much as conception or to be with Child : and thereupon it is, that by a little deflection of the name, in the Greek tongue that Canicular or Dog-fiar is called Kow, which is thought appropria ateunto Iss. Well I wor, that we are not to firive as touching names, yet would brather give-place unto the Ezyptians about the name Sarapis than Offris; for this is a meer Greek word, whereagthe other is a stranger: but as well the one as the other fignifieth the same power of Divinity. And hereto accordeth the Egyptian language; for many times they term Ifis by the name of Minerva, which in their tongue fignificth as much, as I am come of my fell. .: And Typhon, as we have already faid, is not med Seth, Bahon, and Smy, which words betoken all, a violent stay and impeachment, a contrariety and a diversion or turning aside another way. Moreover, they call the Loadstone or Sideritis, the bone of Horus; like as Iron, the bone of Typhon, as Manethos is mine Author : for as the Iron feemeth otherwhiles to follow the faid Loadstone, and suffereth it self to be drawn by it, and many times for it again, returneth back and is repelled to the contrary : even to, the good and comfortable motion of the World endued with reason, by perswasive speeches doth convert, draw into it, and mollisse that hardnesse of Typhon: but otherwhiles again, the same returneth back into it self, and is hidden in the depth of penury and impossibility. Over and besides, Eudoxus faith, that the Egyptians devile of Jupipiter this fiction, that both his legs being so grown together in one, that he could not go at all, for very same he kept in a defert Wilderness. Dut Jij, by cutting and dividing the same parts of the body, brought him to his found and upright going again. Which Fable giveth us covery thus to understand, that the Understanding and Reason of God in it self going invisibly, and after an unseen manner, proceedeth to generation by the means of motion. And verily, that brasen Timbrel which they founded and rung at the Sacrifices of Ifis, named Siftrum, sheweth evidently, that all things ought oning, that is to fay, to bestir and shake, and never cease moving, but to be awakened and raised, as if otherwise they were drowsie, lay affeep and languished: for is faid that they turn back and repulse Typhon with their Timbrels aforefaid, meaning thereby, that whereas Corruption doth bind and flay nature, generation again unbindeth and setteth it a work by the means of motion. Now the said Siftrum being in the upper part round, the curvature and Absis thereof comprehendeth four things that are stirred and moved: for that part of the World which is subject to Generation and Corruption, is comprehended under the sphere of the Moon, within which all things move and alter by the means of the four Elements, Fire, Earth, Water and Air. Upon the Absis or rundle of the Sistrum toward the top, they engrave the form of a Cat with a mans face; but beneath, under those things which are thaken, one while they engrave the vilage of Ifis, another while of Nephthys; fignifying by thefe two faces, Nativity and Death : for these be the motions and mutations of the Elements. By the Cat, they understand the Moon, for the variety of the skin, for the operation and work in the night season, and for the fruitfulneffe of this Creature : for it is faid, that at first she beareth one Kieling, at the second time two, the third time three, then four, afterwards five, and fo to feven; fo that in all the bringeth forth 28. which are the dayes of every Moon. And howfoever this may feem fabulous, yet for certain it is true, that the appulsor fights of these Cats are full and large when the Moon is at full ; but contraniwife, draw in and become smaller as the Moon is in the want. As for the visage of a man, which they attribute unto the Cat, they represent thereby the witty subtilty and reason about the mutations of the Moon. But to knit up all this matter in few words, reason would, that we should think neither the Sun nor the Water, neither Earth nor Heaven to be Isis or Ofiris; no more than exceeding Droughts extream Heat, Fire and Sea, is Typhon: but fimply, whatfoever in fuch things is out of measure and extraordinery either in exceff: or defect, we ought to attribute it unto Typhon: contratiwife, all that is well disposed, ordered, good and profitable, we must believe it to be the work verily of I_{fis} , but the Image, example and reason of O_{firis} ; which if we honour and adore in this fort, we shall not fin or do amiffe: and that which more is, we shall remove and flay the unbelief and doubtfull ferripulofity of Endoxes; who asked the reason, why Ceres had no charge and superintendence over Love matters, but all that care lay upon Ifis, and why Bacebus could neither make the River Nilus to swell and overflow, nor govern and rule the dead: for if we should allege one generall and common reason for all, we deem these gods to have been ordained for the portion and dispensation of good things, and whatfoever in nature is good and beautifull, it is by the grace and means of thefe deities; * Starfur whiles the one yeeldeth the first principles, and the other receiveth and * distributeth the same: by read, due fellows; whether they delight in the change and variety of the air, according to the feafons of the year, that is to one the procreation of fruits, or in the feedness and applying thereto what supports that been delivered of these gods; wherein they take pleasure, saying, that Ofiris is interred, when the fourt. And herenpon it is faid, that Ifis when the perceived her felf to be conceived and with Child, hang, eth about her neck a prefervative the fixth day of the moneth Phaophi, and is delivered of Harpocrates about the Solftice of Winter, being as yet unperfect, and come to no maturity in the prime of the first flowers and bude; which is the reason that they offer unto her the first fruits of Lentils new sprung, and folemnize the Featt and Holidaies of her Childbirth and lying in after the Equinox of the Spring: for when the vulgar fort hear this, they reft herein, take contentment, and believe it firaightwaies, draw. ing a probability for beleef, out of ordinary things which are daily ready at hand. And verily, herein there is no inconvenience, if first and formost they make these gods common, and not proper and peculiar unto the Egyptians, neither comprile Nilus only and the Land which Nilus watereth, under these rames, nor in naming their Mecres, Lakes and Lotes, and the nativity of their gods, deprive all other men of those great gods, among whom there is neither Nilus, nor Butus, nor Memphis; yet nevertheless acknowledge and have in reverence the goddesse Isis and other gods about her, of whom they have learned not long fince to name fome with the Egyptian appellations : but time out of mind they knew their vertue and power, in regard whereof they have honoured and adored them. Secondly, which is a far greater matter, to the end they should take heed and be affraid, left ere they be aware, they diffelye and diffipate these divine powers in Rivers, Winds, Sowing, Plowing and other passions and alterations of the earth; as they do, who hold, that Bacebus is Wine, Vulcan the flame of Fire, and Proferpina (as Gleambes faid in one place) the Spirit that bloweth and pierceth thorow the fruits of the Earth. A Poet there was, who writing of Reapers and Mowers, faid: What time young men their hands to Cercs put,

And her with book; and fithes by piecemeal cat.

And in no respect differ they from those, who think the Sailes, Cables, Cordage and Anchor, are the And in no respect titles tay, are the Pilot; or that the Goblet and po-tion Cup, the Prisanc or the Mede and honised water, in the Physician. But verily in fo doing, they imprint abfurd and blafphemous opinions of the gods, tending to Athelim and implety, attributing the names of gods unto natures and things fenfeleffe, liveleffe and corruptible, which of necessity men use as they need them, and cannot chuse but mar and deftroy she same. For we must in no wife think that these very things be gods; for nothing can be a god which hath no Soul, and is subject to man and under his hand: but thereby we know, that they be gods who give us them to use, and for to be perdurable and sufficient : not these in one place, and those in another, neither Barbarians nor Greeks, neither Meridionall nor Septentrionall; but like as the Sun and Moon, the Heaven, Earth, and Sea are common unto all, but yet in divers places called by fundry names: even fo of one and the fame intelligence that ordereth the whole World, of the fame providence which difpenfeth and gowereth all, of the ministerial powers subordinate over all, fundry honors and appellations according to the diversity of Laws have been appointed. And the Priests and religious, professed in such commitments and solven and Sacraments, some obscure, others more plain and evident, to train our Undermonies, use Mysteries and Sacraments, some obscure, others more plain and evident, to train our Undermonies, use Mysteries and Sacraments, some obscure, others more plain and evident, to train our Undermonies, use the same statement of the same stateme monies are myneries and some mentions of the first state of the first Quavernire, have run before they could take heed, upon the rock of impiety. And therefore, it behovein us in this case especially to be inducted by the direction of Philosophy, which may guide us in the holy Contemplations, that we may worthily and religionly think of every thing said and done; or the end, that it betall not unto us a unto Theodorus, who said, that the doctrin which he tended and reached out with the right hand, some of his Scholars received and took with the left; even so, by taking in a wrong fenfe and otherwife than is meet and convenient, that which the Laws have ordained touching Fealts and Sacrifices, we grolly offend. For, that all things ought to have a reference unto reason, a man may see and know by themselves: for celebrating a Fealt unto Adressy the mineteenth day of the first moneth, they eas hony and figs, saying withall, this Mos, Sweet is the trath. As to that Phyladery or preservative, which they feing 1/3 to wear when the is with Child, by instead pretation it fignifieth, A true voice. As for Harpocrates, we must not imagin him to be some young god, and not come to rive years, nor yet a man: but he is the superintendent and reformer of mens Language as touching the gods, being yet new, unperfect, and not diffinct nor articulate; which is the reason, that he holdeth a scal-ging before his mouth, assa fign and mark of taciturnity and filence.

Alfo in the moneth Mefori, they represent unto him certain kinds of Pulse, saying withall, The tongue is Fortune: The tongue is Dæmon. Now of all Plants which Egypt bringeth torth, they consecrate the Peach-tree unto him especially, because the fruit resembleth an Heart, and the leaf a Tongue: For of all those things which naturally are in man, there is nothing more divine than the Tongue and Speech, as touching the gods principally, neither in any thing commeth he nearer unto heatitude: and therefore I advise and require every man who repaireth hither and commeth down to this Oracle, to entertain holy thoughts in his heart, and to utter feemly words with his tongue, whereas the common fort of people in their publick feafts and folemn proceffions do many ridiculous things no swithflanding they proclame and pronounce formerly by the voyce of the Cryer and Bedle in the beginning of such folemnities, tokeep filence, or fpeak none but good words: and yet afterwards they cease not but to give out most biaspemous speeches, and to think as basely of the gods. How then shall men behave and demean themselves in those heavy and mournfull secrifices from whence all mirth and laughter is banifled, if it be not lawfull either to omit any thing of the accustomed and usuall Ceremonies, or to confound and mingle the opinions of the go ds with aburd and faile suspicions? The Greeks do many semblable things unto the Egyptians even in manner at the very same time: For at Atless in the feaft called The snopkoria to the honour of Ceres, the Women do fait, fitting upon the ground: And the Bootians make a rifling and removing of the houses of Achea, naming this feast 4 and that is to fay, odious: as if Geres were in heavineffe and forrow for the descent of her Daughter Proferpina into Hell: and this is that moneth wherein the Stars called Pleiades appear, and when the hubandmen begin to fow, which the Egyptians name Athyr, the Athenians Pyanepsion, and the Becotians Damatrios, as one would say Gerealis. And Theopompus writeth, that the people inhabiting Westward, do both think and also call the Winter Saturn, the Summer Venus, and the Spring Proferpina: and that of Saturn and Venus all things be ingendered. The Phrygians also imagining that God (leepeth all Winter, and lieth awake in the Summer; thereupon celebrate in one season, the season of lying in bed and sleeping; in the other of experrection or waking, and that with much drinking and belly cheer. But the Paphlagonians say, that he is bound & kept in ward as a Prisoner during Winter, and in the Spring inlarged again and fet at liberty when he beginneth to flir and move. Now the very time giveth us occasion to suspect, that the heavy countenance and austerity which they show, is because the fruits of the earth be then hidden : which fruits our Ancients in times past never thought to be gods, but the profinable and necessary gifts of the gods, availing much to live civilly, and not after a lavage and beautly manner. But at what time of the year as they faw the fruits from the trees to fall and fail at once; and those which themselves had sowen, with much ado, by little and little opening and cleaving the earth with their own hands and so covering and hilling the same, without any affured hope what would betide thereupon, and whether the same would come to any proof and perfection or no, they did many things like unto those that commit dead bodies to the earth, and mourn therefore. Moreover, like as we fay, that he who buieth the books of Plato, buieth Plato: and who is the actour of Menanders Comedies, is said to act and play Menander : Semblably, they did not spare and forbear to give the names of the celestiall gods unto their gifts and inventions, honouring the fame with all reverence, for the use and need they had of them. But they who come after, taking this grofly and foolishly, and upon ignorance unskilfully returning upon the gods the accidents of their fruits; not only called their prefence and fruition, the nativity of the gods; and their ablence or want of them, the death and departure of the gods; but also beleeved so much, and were perswaded fully so: In such wise as they have filled themselves with many absurd, lewd and confused opinions of the said gods. And yet verily, the error and absurdity of their opinions they had evidently before their eyes presented by Xenophanes the Colophonian, or other Philosophers after him, who admonished the Egyptians, that if they reputed them gods, they should not lament for them : and if they mourned, they should not take them for gods: as also it was a ridiculous mockery, in their lamentations to pray unto them for to produce new fruits and bring them unto perfection for them, to the end that they might be confumed again and lamented for. But the case stands not so: for they bewail the fruits that are gone and spent, but they pray unto the gods, the Authors and givers thereof, that they would wouchfafe to bellow upon them new, and make them grow in supply of those which were perished and lost. Right well therefore was it said of the Philosophers, that those who have not learned to hear and take words aright, receive also and use the things themselves amisse: as for example, the Greeks who were not taught nor accustomed to call the satures of brasse and stone, or painted images, the statues and images made to the honour of the gods, but the gods themselves : and afterwards were so bold, as to say, that Lachares despoiled and stripped Minerva out of her clothes, and that Dionysius the Tyrant polled A. pollo who had a perruke or bush of golden hair; also that Jupiter Capitolinus during the civill wars was burnt and confumed with fire. And thus they fee not, how in so doing they draw and admit falle and erroneous opinions which follow upon fuch manner of speeches. And herein the Egyptians of all other Nations have faulted most, about the beasts which they honour and worship. For the Greeks verily in this point both believe and also speak well, saying that the Dove is a bird facred unto Venus, the Dragon to Minerva, the Raven or Crow to Apollo, and the Dog to Diana, according to that which Euripides faid;

But the Egyptian, at leaflwife the common fort of them, worthipping and honouring these very beath as if they were gods themselves, have not onely perferred with laughter and ridiculous mockery their Leiturgy and divine service, (for Ignorance and Folly in this case is the leaft fin of all others) but also there is crept into the midft of men a frong opinion, which hath fo far possession the simple and weaker fort, as that it bringeth them to meer superfittion. And as for such as be of more quick and witty capacity, & who befides are more audacious, those it drives headlong into beafily cognitations and Abelifical discourses: And therefore I hold is not amiffe, curforily and by the way to annex hereto such things as carry some probability and likelihood with them. For to say, that the gods for sear of Zyphon were turned into these Creatures, as if they thought to hide themselves within the bodies of the black Storks called Ibides, of Doggs and Haukes, passeth all the monstrous wonders and sictions of tales that can be devised. Likewise to hold, that the Souls of those who are departed, so many as remain fill in being, are regenerate again onely in the Bodies of these beasts, is as absurd and incredible as the other. And as for those who will seem to render a civill and politick reason hereof; some give ous that Osiris in a great expedition or voyage of his, having divided his army into many parts (such as in Greek are called waxe and week, that is to fay, bands and companies) he gave unto every of them for their feverall enfignes the portractures and images of beafts: and each band afterwards honoured their own and had in reverence as some holy and sacred thing. Others affirm, that the Kings who succeeded after Oficis, for to terrific their enemies went forth to battell, carrying hefore them, the heads of fuch beatls made in gold and filver, upon their armes. Some there be again, who allege, that there was one of these their subtile and fine-headed Kings, who knowing that the Egyptians of their own nature were lightly disposed, ready to revolt and given to change and innovations, also that by reason of their great multitude, their power was hardly to be restrained and in manner invincible, in case they joyned together in counsel, and drew joyntly in one common line, therefore he fowed among them a perpetuall superfittion, which gave occasion of differetion and enmity among them, that never could be appeafed : For when he had given commandement unto them, for to have in reverence those beafts which naturally disagreed and warred together, even such as were ready to cat and devour one another, whiles every one endeavoured alwaies to fuccour and maintain their own, & were moved to anger if any wrong or displeasure were done to those which they aff. Red ; they fell together themselves by the ears ere they were aware, and killed one another, for the enmity and quarrell which was between those beafts whom they adored, and so softered mutuall and mortall hatred. For even at this day, of all the Egyptians the Lycopolitans onely, cat Mutton, beceause the Woolf whom they adore as a god is enemy unto sheep. And verily in this our age, the Oxyrinchites, because the + Cynopolites, than is to say, the inhabitants of the City Cynopolis, cat the Fish named Oxyrinchos, that is to fay, with the sharp beck, the Dogg, whenfoever they can intrap or catch a Dogg, make no more ado but kill him for a Sacrifice and eat him the Dogg, whenfoever they can intrap or catch a Dogg, make no more ado but kill him for a Sacrifice and eat him when they have done. Upon which occasion having levied war one against the other, and done much milchief reciprocally, after they had been well chassisfed and plagued by the Romans, they grew to Attonement and Composition. And for as much as many of them do Gy, that the Soul of Typhon, departed into these beafts, it feemeth that this fiction importeth thus much, that every brutish and beastly nature, commeth and proceedeth from some evill Dæmon, and therefore to pacific him that he do no mischief, they worship and adore these beafts. And if peradventure there happen any great Drought or contagious Heat which causeth pesilent Maladies or or ther unufuall and extrordinary Calamities, the Priess bring forth some of those Beasts which they serve and honour in the dark Night, without any soyle, in great silence, menacing them at the first, and putting them in fright. Now if the Plague or Calamity continue full, they kill and facrifice them, thinking this to be a Punishment and Chastisement of the said evil Damon, or elsa some great expiacion for notable sine and transgressions. For in the City verily of Idithya, as Manethes maketh report, the manner is to burn men alive, whom they called Typhonii: whose ashee when they had boulted through a tamife, they scattered abroad, untill they were reduced to nothing; But this was done openly at a certain time in those dayes which are called Cynades or Canicular. Mary the immolation of these beatts, which they accounted facred, was performed secretly and not at a certain time or upon prefixed dayes, but according to the occurrences of those accidents which hapned. And therefore the common people neither knew nor faw ought, but when they folemnize their Obsequies and Funeralls for them, in the presence of all the people they shew some of the other beatls and throw them together into the Sepulchre, supposing thereby to vex and gall Tophen, and to repreff: the joy, that he hath in doing mischief. For it feemeth that Apis with some other few beafts was confecrated to Ofiris: howfoever they attribute many more unto him. And if this be true, I fund pose it importeth that which we seek and search all this while, as touching those which are confessed by all, and have common honours; as the forefaid Stork Ibis, the Hauk and the Babian or Cynecephalus, yea and Apis himself, for so they call the Goat in the City Mendes. Now there remainesh the utility and fymbolization hereof: confidering that fome participate of the one., but the most part of both-For as touching the Goat, the Sheep and the Ichneumon, certain it is, they honour them for the ufe and prefit they receive by them: like as the inhabitating of Lemnor honour the birds called * Corydali,

* Larkes because they finde out the Locust nests and quash their eggs. The Thessalians also have the or Leve great account, because whereas their Country is given to breed a number of Setpents, the faid Storks when they come, kill them up all. By reason whereof they made an Edict, with an intimation, that whosoever killed a Stork should be banished his Country. The Serpent Affis also, the Wezill and the Fly called the Bettill they reverence, because they observe in them I wot not what have thender 1mages (like as in drops of water we perceive the refemblance of the Sun) of the divine pe wer. For many there beeven yes, who both think and fay, that the Male Wezill engendereth with the Fomale by her ear, and that the bringeth forth her young at the mouth: which synbol zeth 25 they fay, and re pre-senteth the making and generation of speech. As for the Bettile, they hold, that throughous all their kinde is no Female, but all the Males do blow or cast their feed into a certain globus or round matter in form of balls, which they drive from them and roll to and fro contrariwaits, like at the Sun; when he moveth himself from the West to the East, seemeth to turn about the Heaven clean contrary. The affair also they compare to the planet of the Sun, because he doth never age and wax old, bite moveth in all facility, readineffe and celerity without the means of any inftrumenes of motion. Neither is the Crocodile fer fo much by among them, without some probable cause : For they fay that in some respect he is the very image representing God: as being the only Creature in the world which hath no tongue: for as much as divine speech needeth neither voice nor tongue :

But through the paths of Justice walks with Hill and filent pace , Directing right all mortall things, in their due time and place.

And of all beafts living within the water, the Crocodile onely (as men fay) hadrover his eyes a cerrain thin film or transparent web to eover them, which commeth down from his forehead in fiell foreas that he can fee and not be feen, wherein he is conformable and like unto the fovereign of all the gods. Moreover look in what place the Female is discharged of her frawn, there is the utmost mark and limit of the rifing and inundation of Nilus: for being not able to key their tgs in the water, and affraid withall to fit far off, they have a most perfect and exquilite forefight of that which will be; insomuch as they make use of the Rivers approach when they lay : and whiles they fit and cove, their eggs be preferred dry, and are never drenched with the water. A hundred eggs they lay, in fo many dayes they hatch, and as many years live they, which are longest fixed : And exists the first and principall number that they use who treat of celestiall matters. Moreover, as touching those beatls which are honoured for both causes, we have spoken before of the Dogg: but the Ibis or black Stork, b. fides that it killeth those Serpents whose prick and sting it deadly, she was the first that taught us the use of that evacuation or clenting the Body by Clystre, which is so ordinary in Physick : for perceived file is to purge, clenfe, and mundifie her felf in that fore: whereupon the most religious Priests, and those who are of greatest experience, when they would be purified, take for their holy water to sprinkle themselves with , the very same out of which the Ibis drinketh, for the never drinks of impoisoned and infected water, neither will the come near unto it. Moreover, with her two Legs frauding at large one from the other, and her bill together, the maketh an absolute triangle with three even fid. s, befides, the variety and speckled mixture of her plume, consisting of white feathers and black, representeth the Moon when she is past the full. Now we must not morvail at the Egyptians, for pleasing and contenting themselves in such slight representations and similitudes, for even the Greeks themselves as well in their Pictures as other Images of the gods, melted and wrought to any mould, used many times such resemblances: for one statue in Creta they had of Jupiter without ears, because it is not meant for him who is Lord and Governour of all, to have any instruction by the hearing of others. Unto the image of Pallas, Phidias the Imager fet a Deagon; like as to that of Venus in the City of Elis a Tortoile: giving us by this to understand, that Maidens had need of guidance and good custody and that Married Women ought to keep the house and be filent. The three forked Mace of Nepinne, fignifieth the third place, which the S:a and Element of water holdeth, under Heaven and Air; for which cause they called the Sea Amphivite, and the petty sea gods Tritons. Also the Pythagoreans have highly honored the numbers and figures Geometricall, by the gods names : for the triangle with three equali fides they called Pallas, born out of Jupiters brain, and Tritegenia, for that it is equally divided with three right lines, from three angles drawn by the Plumb. One or unity they named

As well for bis persirafive grace, as plain simplicy, That doth appear in youthfull face, and this is unity.

Two, they termed Contention and Boidneffe : and three Justice. For whereas to offend and be offended, to do and to fuffer wrong, come the one by excelle, and the other by defect, Just remaineth equally between in the mids. That famous quaternary of theirs, named Terrallys, which confide the of four nines, and amounted to thirty fix was their greated Outh, to rife in every man mouth, and they called it the World, as being accomplished of the first four even numbers, and the first four odd, compounded into one together. If then the most excellent and best renowned Philosophers. perceiving in things which have neither Body nor Soul, some type and figure of deity, have not thought it good to neglect or despite any thing herein, or pass it over with due honor, I suppose we ought much leffe to to do in those properties and qualities which are in natures sensitive, having life, and being capable of pussions and affections, according to their inclinations and conditions. And therefore we must not content our felves and rest in the worshipping of these and such like beasts, but by them adore the Divinity that shineth in them, as in most clear and bright Mirrors, according to Xxxx 2 nature, reputing them alwaics as the instrument and artificiall workmanship of God, who ruleth and governeth the univerfall world : neither ought we to think, that any thing void of life, and deflitute of fenfe, can be more worthy or excellent than that which is indued with life and fenfes; nonotalthrough a man hung never for much Gold or a number of rich Emraulds about it: for it is neither co-lours nor figures, nor pollified bodies, that deity doth inhabit in: but whatfoever doth not particlpate life, nor is by nature capable thereof, is of a more base and abjed condition than the very dead. But that nature which liveth and feeth, which also in it felf hath the beginning of motion and know-But that nature which liveth and teetth, which also in a terr nath the beginning of motion and know-ledge of that which is proper and mere, as also of that which is frange unto it, the fame (I fay) hath drawn some influence and portion of that wife providence, whereby the univerfall world is governed, as Herselius, faith. And therefore the deity is no leffe represented in such natures, than in works made of brasse and stone, which are likewise subject to corruption and alteration, but over and besides, they are naturally voide of all sense and understanding. Thus much of that opinion, as touching the

Moreover the habiliments of Isis, be of different tinctures and colours: for her whole power consistent and is imployed in matter which receive thall formers, and becomment all manner of things, to and keep them to meangurys that its distance of maging the strength of the str item orten. But the lightning, officeth it felf unto the foul but once, for to be touched and feen. And therefore Plato & Arifole call this part of Philosophy Examinute, for that those who discourse of reason, therefore Flato & Arithmetal time part of Filiotopay Employs, for that time wood income of realon, have paffed beyond all matters (ubject tomingled & variable opinions), leap at length to the contemplation of this first principle, which is simple, and not material: and after they have in some fort attained to the pure and sincere truth of its, they suppose that their Philosophy as now accomplished its come to finall perfection. And that we the Priefis in these days are very precise & warry to shew, keeping it hidden and secret with so great care and diligence, allowing not so much as a sight thereof secrety and by the way: also that this good raigneth and ruleth over the dead, and is no other than he whom the Greeks name Hades and Plato: the common people not understanding how this is true, are much troubled; thinking it very frange that the holy and sacred Offris should dwell within or under the earth, where their bodies lie who are thought to be come unto their sinal lend. But he verily is most far removed from the earth, without stain or pollution, pure and void of all subfance or nature, that may admit that he can propose the proposed of the company of the careful proposed of the careful propos death or any corruption whatfoever. Howbeit the Souls of men, fo long as they be here beneath clad within bodies and passions, can have no participation of God, unless it be so much only as they may attain unto the intelligence of by the study of Philosophy, and the same is but in manner of a dark may attaintuget the interingence of by the many or rindoupny, and the tame is but in manner of a dark dream. But when they shall be delivered from these bonds, and passe into this holy place, where there is no passe, nor passes before: then, the same God is their Conductor and King: then they cleave unto him, as much as possibly they can: him they contemplate and behold without satiety: desiring that Beauty, which it is not possible for men to utter and expresse: whereof according to the old tales, the man and the same interior and and behold the same and the same interior and and behold the same and the same interior and and behold the same and t If was alwaies inamoured: and having purfued after it untill the enjoyed the fame, the afterwards became replenished with all Goodneffe and Beauty that here may be engendered. And thus much may fuffice for that fenfe and interpretation which is most beforeming the gods. Now if we must besides fpeak as I promised before, of the incense and odors which are burnt every day : let a man consider first in his mind and take this with him, that the Egyptians were men evermore most studious in those matters which made for the health of their bodies, but principally in this regard, they had in recommendation those that concerned the Ceremonies of divine service in their sanctifications, and in their ordinary life and conversation; wherein they have no leffe regard unto wholsomenesse than to holineffe : For they think it neither lawfull nor befeeming to ferve that effence which is altogether pure, every way found and impolluted, either with Bodies or Souls corrupt with inward fores, and subject to fecret maladies. Seeing then, that the Air, which we most commonly use, and within which we al-The water mainters. Seeing uses, tracture rary which we more commonly tile, and within which we alwaise converfe, is not evermore alike disposed nor in the fame temperature; but in the night is thicknown and made groffe, whereby it compreffeth and draweth the body into a kinde of sadnesse and pensiveness, as if it were overcast with dark mist and weighed down: Is so soon as ever they be up in the morning, they burn incense by kindling Rosin, for to clense and purise the air by this rarefaction and sublization, awaking as it were and raising by this meanes, the inbred spiritus of our Bodies which were languishing and drowsit: for that in this odor there is a forceable verture which wehemently striketh upon guilhing and drowle: for that in this odor there is a forecasive verue which venemently trikkingon the fenses. Again, about Noon, perceiving that the Sun drawth forcibly out of the earth by his heat, great quantity of strong vapours, which be intermingled with the air, then they burn Myrrh: For the heat of this aromaticall gum and odor is such, as that it dissipateth and dispatcheth whatsoever is gross, thick and muddy in the air. And verily in the time of Petitence Physicians think to remedy the same by making great fires, being of this opinion, that the slame doth substillate and raresse the air: which is effected no doubt the better in case they burn fweer wood, as of the Cyprefs trees, of Juneper, or * Pitch-tree. And hereupon reported it is that * # da any the Phylician Acron, when there reigned a grievous Plague at Albens, wan a great name and reputation, by caufing good fires to be made about the fick persons; for he saved many by that means. And on, by caping good free to be made about the new perions; for he laved many by that means. And Arthale writeth, that the (weet fents and good (wells of Perfumes, Oyntments, Flowers, and fragiant Medows, ferve no left for health than for delight and pleafure. For that by their heat and milduness they gently diffolive and open the fubfiance of the brain; which naturally is cold, and, as it were, congeled.

Again, if it be to that the Egyptians call Myrrb, in their Language Bal, which if a man ingeled. general signifieth as much as the disculling and chasing away of idle talk and raving; this also may serve terpret, ingninen as much as the uncuming and coming away or one tank and raving this allo may ferre for a teltimony to confirm that which we say. As for that Composition among them named Cyphi, is a Confection or Mixture receiving fixteen Ingredients. For there jenter into it, Honey, Wine, Raisins, Cyperous, Rosin, Myrth, Afpalathus and Scieli. Moreovers, the sweet rulh Schanos, Bittmen, Moss, and the Dock: Besides two forts of the Juniper Berrier, the greater and the less, Cardanam, Moss, and the Dock: Besides two forts of the Juniper Berrier, the greater and the less, Cardanam, Moss, and the Dock: Besides two forts of the Juniper Berrier, the greater and the less, Cardanam, Moss, and the Dock: momum and Galamus. All these species are compounded together, not at a venture, and as it cometh into their heads: but there be read certain facred writings unto the Apothecaries and Perfumers, all the while that they mix them. As for this number, although it be quadrate, and made of a fquare, and onely of the numbers equal, maketh the space contained within, equal to his circumference, we are not to think that this is any way material to the vertue thereof: but most of the simples that go to this Composition being Aromatical, cast a pleasant breath from them, and yield a delectable and wholesome vapor, by which the ayr is altered : and withal, the body being moved with this evaporation, is gently prepared to repote, and taketh an attractive temperature of fleep, in letting flack at d unbinding the bonds of cares, weariness and forows incident in the day time, and that without the unbinding the bolds of cases, washing and forost into the first and drunkenness: polishing and fmoothing the imaginative part of the bain which receiveth dreams in manner of a mirror, causing the same to be pure and near, as much, or rather more, than the found of Harp, Lute, Viol, or any other instruments of Musick; which the Pythagoreansufed for to procure fleep, enchanting by that device, and dulcing the unreasonable part of the soul which is subject to passions. For sweet Odors, as they do many times excite and stir up the fense when it is dull, and beginneth to fail : so contratiwise, they make the same as often drowfie and heavy, yea, and bring it to quietnes, whiles those Aromatical smells by reason of their smoothness are spread and disfused in the body: According as some Physicians say, that sleep is engendred in us, when the vapour of the food which we have ecceived, ereepeth gently along the noble parts and principal bowels, and as it toucheth them, caufeth a kind; of tickling which lulleth them affeep. This Gybi they use in deink, as a Composition to stason their cups, and as an optiment besides: for they hold, that being taken in drink, it sources the guts within, and maketh the belly laxative: and being applied outwardly, as a liniment, it mollifieth shebody. Over and above all this, Rosin is the work of the Sun: but Myrrh they gather by the Moon light, out of those Plants from which it doth diffil. But of those simples whereof Cyphi is compounded, some there be which love the night better, as many, I mean, as be nourilhed by cold winds, shadows, dews and moisture: For the brightness and light of the day is one and fimple: and Pindarus faith, that the Sun is feenthrough the pure and folitary syr: whereas the ayr of the night is a compound and mixture of many lights and powers, as if there were a confluence of many feeds from every flar running into one. By good right therefore they but these simple Persumes in the day, as those which are engendred by the vertue of the Sun: But this being mingled of all forts, and of divers qualities, they fet on fire about the evening, and beginning of the night.

Of the Oracles that have ceased to give Answer.

The Summary.

THE Spirit of Error halb endeavored always and assailed the bist he can, to maintain his Power and Do-minion in the world, having after the revolt and fall of Adam, hen furnished with inframents of all forts, to Tyrannize over his Slaves. In which number we are to range the Oracles and Predictions of certain Idols erected in many places by bis instigation; by means whereof, this sworn enemy to the glory of the true God, hath much prevailed. But when it pleased our heavenly Father to give us his Son for to be our Saviour. who descending from beaven to earth, took upon him our humane nature, wherein he sustained the pain and punishment due for our fints, to deliver us out of hell, and by vertue of his merits, to give us entrance into the Ringdom of heaven, the truth of his grace being published and made known in the world by the preaching of the Apoliles and their faithful Successors; the Devil and his Angels, who had in many parts and places of the tor sepostus and weer fattoful ouveyors; toe Devu and ors sangers, woo was an many parts and pace of the world abused and deceived poor Idolaters, were forced to acknowledge their Soveraign, and to keep silence and suffer bim to fresh unto those whom he meant to call unto Salvation, or else to make them unexcusable, if they refused to hear his voyce. This cessation of the Oracles put the Priests and Sacrificers of the Painims to great trouble, and wonderful perplexity, in the time of the Roman Emperors: whiles some imputed the cause to this, others to that. But our Author in this Treatise discourset upon this Quotion, seewing thereby, crets of God. For all the speeches of the Philosophers, whom he bringeth in hereas Interlocutors, are meer tales and fables devised for the nonce, which every Christian man of any mean judgement will at the first fight condemn. Tet thus much good there is in this discourse, that the Epicureans are here taxed and condemned in fundry passages. As touching the Contents of this Conference, the occasion thereof ariseth from the speech of Demetrius and Cleombrotus, who were come unto the Temple of Apollo: for the one of them having reof Demetrics and Chemical was made of Jupiter Ammon, movet thereby a farther define of Diffutation;

but before they enter into it, they continue still the former speech, of the course and motion of the Sun. After wards, they come to the main point; namely, Why all the Oracles of Greece (excepting that onely of Le-wards, they come to the most of many, Plateniades a Cynique Philosopher answereld, That the wickedness of badia) Ceasses 12 miles to the most of Plateniades a Cynique Philosopher answereld, That the wickedness of men is the cause thereof. Ammonius contrarins seat the cause the Wars which had consistent with the cause the war which had consistent with the cause the war which had consistent with the cause the war which had consistent with the war which had consistent with the cause of the cause o Pilgrims that used to resort unto the said Oracles. Lamprias proposeth one opinion, and Clcombrotus inferring another of his, fall into a Discourse and Common-place as touching Damoni, whom he verily rangeth between gods and men, disputing of their nature, according to the Philosophy of the Greeks. Then be proveth.

that these Damons have the charge of Oracles, but by reason that they departed out of one Country into another, or dyed, these Oracles gave over. To this purpose be telleth a notable tale as touching the death of the great Pan, concluding thus, that feeing Damons be mortal, we ought not to wonder at the cessation of Oracles. After this, Ammonius consutet the Epicureans, who hold, That there be no Damons. And upon the confirmation of the former Positions, they enter tegether into the examination of the opinions of the

on the confirmation of the former refixion; host the Worlds, to with whether they be many or infinite; growing to this refolution after long dispute, that there he many, and namely, to the number of fixed done, Demetrius reviving the principal qualition, movethalfo a new one, Why the Damons have this power to speak by Oracles? Unto which there be many and divers answers made, which determine all in one to speakoy craucis. One more than the Platonitis Philosophy, of the Principal, Efficient, and Final caufe of these things that are efficient and Final caufe of these things that are efficient gradients, and particularly of Divinations and Predictions: for mbich, he make the occurrence of the control of th cur, the Earth, the Sun, Exhalations, Damons, and the Soul of man. Now all the intention and drift of Plutarch groweth to this point, That the Earth being incited and moved by a natural vertue, and that which is proper unto it, and in no wife divine and perdurable, bath brought forth certain powers of Divination:

That these Inspirations breathing and arising out of the Earth, have touched the understandings of men with such efficacy, as that they have caused them to foresee future things afar off, and long ere they havned;

yea, and have addressed and framed them to give answer both in verse and prose. Item, That like as there be certain grounds and lands more fertile one than the other, or producing some particular things according to the divers and peculiar property of each: There be also certain places and tracts of the world endued with this temperature, which both ingender, and also incite these Embusiack and Divining Spirits. Furthermore, that this pullance is meer divine indeed; howbeit, not perpetual, eternal, ummoveable, nor that which is for ever perdurable: But by process and succession of time, doth diminish and decay by little and little, untill at length, through age, it confumeth to nothing. Semblably, that this great number of Spirits are not engendred incession, neither proceed they forward, or retire back continually; but this vertue of the Earth

engenates may be better the movest of in self-in certain Revolutions, and by that means is enchassed and puffed up: And after that in time it hatb gathered abundance of new vapors, it fills to be cause and holes so ful, until they discharge and fend them up again. Whereupon it cometo to pass, that the exhalations stirred in the faid caves, and de-

firons to iffue forth, after that they have been beaten back again, violently affail the foundations, and fir the

Temples built upon them, in such fort, as being shaken, as it were, by earthquakes, more or less in one place temples bults upon soem, in juce you; as any property and party or a very up cus voquancis, more or igs in one place than another, according to the overtwest and pallages made for the exhalation, they finde illustrough the streights, break forth with forcible violence, and to produce the for Oracles. In fun, the intention and minde of Plutarch is to prove, that the beginning, progrefs, and tend of the for Oracles proceed all from natural castles, to wit, the exhalations of the Earth. Wherein he is fully and gross deceived, considering that face Oracles in

To Wit the cavantium of the Devil, who hath kept an open shop there of imposture, accessing the most borrible scaucements that can be devised. For mine own part, I impute this whole distance of Plucacch unto the sportance of the true God, the very mother of this despite, which bringes borth e his present effects of the true for which better the state of the despite of the true for which bath by the Pagans, for to darken the replendent light of that great King of the world and his trush which bath disciffed and brought to nothing all the subtil devices of Satan, who triumphed over all Greece by the means alse life and or orgon to normal of the series of bis Oracles. Thus after large discourses upon these matters, Plutarch concluded the whole Disputation; the Conclusion whereof, he enricheth with an accident that held unto the Prophetess of Delphi: where a man.

may evidently see the imposture and fraud of Devils, and of malicious Spirits (and those be the Damons which

Of the Oracles that ceased to give Answers.

Here goeth a Tale, my friend Terentius Prifcus, that in times past certain Eagles, or else Swans. flying from the utmost ends of the earth opposite one unto the other, toward the midft thereof, encounted and met together at the very place where the Temple of Apollo Pythius was built, even that which is called Omphalos, that is to fay, the Navil. And that afterwards, Epimenides the Phæstian being defirous to know whether this Fable was true, fought unto the Oracle. for to be refolved : but having received from the god a doubtful and uncertain answer; by reason thereof made thefe verfes :

> Now fure in mids of Land or Seas there is no Navil (uch; Or if there be, the gods it know : men must not see so much.

And verily the god Apollo chaftifed and punished him well enough, for being so curious as to search into the tryal or proof of an old received Tale, as if it had been some antique Picture. But true it is, that in our days, a little before the Solemnity of the Pythique games, which were held during the Magistracy of Calliftratus, there were two devout and holy Personages, who coming from the contrary ends of the earth, met together in the City of Delphi : the one was Demetrius the Grammarian, who came from as far * Britain, minding to return unto Tarfus in Cilicia, the City of his nativity; and the other, Cleam. That is to bress the Lacdemonian, who had travelled and wanted long time in £2pps, within the Troglody. [27, E14] tique Province, and failed a good way up into the Red-Sea, not for any Traffique er Negotiation of Merchandize, but onely as a Traveller that defired to fee the world, and to learn new fashions abroad. For having wherewith fufficiently to maintain himfolf, and not caring to gather more than might feive his own turn, he employed that time which he had, this ways, and gathered together a certain history, as the subject matter and ground of that Philosophy, which proposed for the end thereof (as he himfelf faid) Theologie. This man having not long before been at the Temple and Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, made semblance as if he wondered not much at any thing he faw there; onely he reported unto us a firange thing, worth the observation, and better to be considered of, which he learned of the Priefts there, as touching the burning Lamp that never goeth out: for by their faying, every year is spendeth less oyl than another. Whereby they gather certainly (quoth he) the inequality of the years, whereby the latter is evermore shorter than the former : for great probability there is, that seeing less oyl is consumed, the time also is in proportion so much less. Now when all the company there present made a wonder hereat, Demetrius among the rest made a very jest of it, and said it was a meer mockery to fearch into the knowledge of matters to high, by such slight and small presumptions; for this was not, as Alcens faid, to paint a Lyon by measure of his claw or paw, but to move and alter heaven, and earth, and all the world, by the conjecture onely of a weik and lamp; yea, and to overthrow at once all the Mathematical Sciences. It is neither fo nor fo, good Sir, quoth Gleombrotus; for neither the one nor the other will trouble these men. For first, they will never yield and give place unto the Mathematicians in the certitude of their proofs; for sooner may the Mathematicians misreckon the time, and miss in their calculation and accounts, in such long motions and revolutions so far remote and distant, than they fail in the measure of the oyl which they observe continually, and mark most precisely, in regard of that which they see so strange and against all discourse of reason. Again, not to grant and allow (O Demetrius) that petty/things may many times ferve for figns and arguments of great important matters, would hinder and prejudice many Arte, confidering that it is as much as to take away the proofs from many demonstrations, conclusions and predictions. And verily, even you that are Grammarians, will seem to verifie and avow one point which is not of the least consequence; namely, that those Heroick Princes and Worthics, who were at the Trojan war, used to shave their hair, and keep. the skin smooth with the razor; because, forsooth, in reading of Homer, you meet with some place where he maketh mention barely of the razor. Semblably, that in those days men used to put forth their money upon usury, for that in one passage the said Poet writteh thus:

> Whereas my debt is neither new nor small: But as days come and go, it * grows withal.

Meaning by the verb openas, that his debt did grow unto him by the interest for use. Furthermore. because ever and anon the same Homer attributeth unto the night, the Epithete boh, which signifieth Quick and sharp; you Grammarians are much affected to this word, saying, He understandeth thereby, that the shadow of the earth being round, groweth point-wife or sharp at the end, in manner of a Cone or Pyramis. And what is he, who fanding upon this point, that small things may not be the proofs and figns of greater matters; will approve this argument in Phylick: namely, that when there is a mulcitude of Spiders fees, it doth prognoficate a peffilent Summer: or in the Spring feason, when the leaves of the Olive tree refemble the Crowsfeet ? Who (I fay) will ever abide to take the measure of the Sunsbody, by Clepfydres or Water-dials, with a gallon or pinte of water? or that a Tyle-formed Tablet, making a sharp angle by the plumb, enclining upon a plain superficies, should shew the just measure of the elevation of pole from the Horizon, which always is to be seen in our Hemifphere? Lo, what the Priests and Prophets in those parts may allege and say. And therefore we ought to produce some other reasons against them, in case we would maintain the course of the ought to produce to the other state of the Sun one Sun to be constant and unvariable, as we hold here in these Countreys. And not of the Sun onely, (cryed out with a loud voyce Ammonius the Philosopher, who was then in place) but also of the whole heaven, which by this reckoning cometh in question. For if it be granted, that the years decrease: the race of the Sun which he runneth between the one Tropique and the other, must of necessity be cut shorter, and taketh not up so great a part of the Horizon, as the Mathematicians for down; but that it becometh shorter and less, according as the Southern or Meridional parts be contrafted, and gather always toward the Septentrional and Northern. Whereupon it will enfue, that tracted, and gather always toward the Septemerional and evolution. Whereupon it will efflue, that our Summer will be shorter, and the temperature of the ayr by confequence colder; by reason that she Sun turneth more inwardly, and describeth greater Parallels, or Equidifiant Circles, than those be about the Tropicks, at the longest and shortest days of the year. Moreover, this would follow here upon, that the Gnomons in the Dials at Sysne in Egypt, will be more shadowled; at the Summer Tropick or Solitice: and many of the fixed Stars will run under one another; some also of them will be forced for want of room to run one upon another, and be hudled pell-mell together. And will be lorected for want of 100m to 1 min one agon another hand per man logistist. Indifferent find far hold their own, and keep their ordinary courfes, the Sun onely observeth no order in his motions, they cannot allege any cause that should so much as halten his moother than the course of the tion alone among fo many others as there be, but they shall trouble and disquiet most of those things which are seen evidently above: and namely, those generally which happen unto the Moon in regard of the Sun. So that we shall have no need of those, who observe the measures of oyl, for to prove the diverfity of the years; because the Eclypses both of the Moon and Sun will sufficiently shew if there be any at all, for that the Sun shall many times meet with the Moon, and the Moon reciprocally fall as often wirhin the shadow of the earth: so as we shall need no more to display and discover the vanity and fallity of this reason. Yea, but I my self (quoth Chowbrotus) have seen the said measure of oyl, for they showed many of them unto me; and that of this present year when I was with them, appeared to be much less than those in the years past. So that Ammonius made answer in this wife : And peared to be much the than those in the years pair. So that Ammonia made answer in this wife: And how is it that other men who adore the inextinguible fires, who keep and preferve the fame religiously for the space of an infinite number of years, one after another, could not as well perceive and observe fo much? And fay that a man should admit this report of yours to be true, as touching the meafures of the oyl: were it not much better to ascribe the cause thereof unto some coldness or moisture of the ayr; or rather contrariwise to some dryness and heat, by reason whereos, the fire in the Lamp being enfeebled, is not able to spend so much nutriment, and therefore hath no need thereof? For I have heard it many times affirmed by some, That in Winter the fire burneth much better, as being more fronger and more fortified, by reason that she heat thereof is drawn in, more united and driven closer by the exterior cold : whereas great heats and droughts do weaken the strength thereof, so as it becometh faint, loofe, and raw, without any great vehenency and vigour; nay, if a man kindle it againft the Sun-shine, the operation of it is less, hardly catcheth it hold of the wood or fewel, and more flowly confumeth it she fame. But most of all, a man may lay the cause upon the oyl it self; for it goeth not against reason to say, that in old time the oyl was of less nutriment, and stood more upon the waterifh substance than now it doth, as pressed out of Olives which grew upon youg trees: but afterwards being better concocked, and riper in the fruit, coming of Plants more perfect and fully grown in the same quantity, was more effectual, and able longer to nourish and maintain the fire.

Thus you see how a man may salve and save that supposition of the Ammonian Priess, although is feen very strange and wonderfully extravagant. After that Ammenius had finished his speech. Nay, rather (quorh 1) Cleombrotus, I befeech you tell us somewhat of the Oracle: for there hath gone a great name, time out of minde, of the Deity refident there; but now it feemeth that the reputation thereof is clean gone. And when Cleombrotus made no answer hereto, but held down his head, and cast his eyes upon the ground. There is no need (quoth Demetrius) to demand or make any question of the Oracles there, when as we fee the Oracles in these parts to fail, or rather indeed (all fave one or two) brought to nothing. This rather would be enquired into, what the cause should be, that generally they all do cease? For to what purpose should we fpeak of others, considering that Baotis it self, which heretofore in old time resounded and rung again with Oracles, now is quite void of them, as if the springs and sountains weredryed up, and a great siccity and drought of Oracles had come over the whole Land? For there is not at this day, go throughout all Baotia (unless its be onely in Lebadia) one place where a man may, would be never fo fain, draw any divination, what need foever he bath of any Oracle : for all other parts are either mute; or altogether desolate and forlom. And yet in the time of the Medes War, the Oracle of Prous Apollo was in great request, and that of Amphiar aus was in no less reputation; for both the one and the other was fought unto. And in that of Ptous Apollo, when the Prieft or Prophet who served in the Oracle, used the Rollian Language, and made answer anto those who were sent thinter by the Barbarlans, infomuch as none of the affistants understood one word, this Enthulialm or Divine inspiration, covertly gave thereby thus much to understand, that these Oracles pertained nothing unto the Barbarians, neither were they permitted to have the ordinary Greek Language at their command. As for that of Amphiaraus, the scream who was thither sent, falling fleep within the fanctuary, thought as he dreamed, that he faw and heard the minister of the god, as if with his word and voice he fremed at the first to drive him out, and command him to d part forth of the Temple, faying, that his god was not there; but afterwards to thrust him away with both his hands : but in the end, feeing that he flaid fill, took up a great stone, and therewish smote him upon the head. And verily all this answered just to that which afterwards befell, and was a very prediction and denunciation of a future accident : for Mardanius was vanquished not by the King himself, but ! the Tutour and Lieutenant of the King of Lacedæmon, who at that time had the conduct and command of the Greeks army; yea, and with a stone felled to the ground, according as the Lydian servant aforesaid imagined in his fleep that he was smittten with a stone. There sourished likewise about the same time the Oracle of Tegyra, where the report goeth that the god Apollo himfelf was born: and verily two rivers there are that run near one to the other, whereof the one fome at this day call Phania, that is to fay, the Dite-tree; the other Elea, that is to fay, the Olive-tree. At this Oracle, during the time of the Medes war, when the Prophet Echecrates there ferved, god Apollo answered by his mouth, that the Greeks should have the honour of the victory in this war, and continue superior. Also in the time of the Peloponnesiaque war, when the Delians were driven out of their Island, there was brought unto them an answer from the Oracle at Delphi; by vertue whereof, commanded they were, to search and seck our the place where Apollo was born, and there to perform certain facrifices : whereat, when they marvelled, and in great perplexity demanded again, whether Apollo were born any where elfe, but among them? the Prophetesse Pythia added moreover and said. That a Crow should tell them the place. Whereupon these Deputies who were sent unto the Oracle, in their return homeward chanced to pass through the City Charonea, where they heard their Holleffe in whose house they lodged, talking with iome Paffengers and Gueffs, (who were going to Tegyra) as touching the Oracle, and when they departed and took their leave, they faluted her, and bad her farewell in these terms: Adieu dame Coron, for that was the Womans name, which fignifieth as much as Crow. By this means they understood the meaning of the foresaid Oracle or answer of Pythia: and so when they had sacrificed at Tegyra, not long after they were restored and returned into their native Country. Moreover, there were other apparitions befides of Oracles, more fresh and later, than those which we have alleged; but now they are altogether ceased : so that it were not amisse, considering that we are met near unto Apollo Pythius, for to inquire into the cause of this so great change and alteration. As we thus communed and talked together, we were now by this time gone out of the Temple, so far as to the very gates of the Gnidian hall: and when we were entered into it, we found those friends of ours fitting there within, whom we defired to meet withall, and who attended our comming. Now when all the reft were leafure, and had nothing elfeto do (being at fuch a time of the day) but either to anoint their bodies, or elfe to look upon the Champions and Wreftlers, who there exercifed themselves; Demetrius after a smiling manner began and faid:

What? were I lest to tell a lie, Or make report of truth shall I?

It feemeth as far as I can perceive, that you have in hand no matter of great confequence : for I faw you fitting at your case, and it appeareth by your cheerfull and pleasant looks, that you have no busic thoughts hammering in your heads. True it is indeed (quoth Heracleo the Megarian :) for we are not in a ferious argument anddifp station about the verb Bando, whether in the Future tenie it should lose one of the two Landses? neither reason we about these two comparatives 200, and Binno, (that is to fay, Worle and Better) of what Politives they should come? nor of what Primitives these two Surpers latives zeres, and Bianson, (that is to fay, Worlt and B.ft) be derived ? For these questions and such like, are those that make men knit and bend their browes: but of all other matters we may reason and Philosophiz: well enough and quietly, without making any furrowes in our foreheads, and looking with an auftere and foure Countenancefor the matter upon the company prefent with us. Why then (quoth Demetrius) admit and receive us into your fociety, and together with us, entertain the question alfo, which erewhile was moved among us, being as it is, meet for this place, and in regard of god Apollo, pertinent unto us all as many as we be: but I befeech you of all loves, let us have no frowning nor knitting of browes whiles we reason upon the point. Now when we were see intermingled one with another, and that Demetrius hath propounded the forefaid question, immediately Didymus the Cynique Philoofopher, furnamed Planteiades, started up, and stood upon his feet; and after he had flamped with his staff twice or thrice upon the floor, cried out in this manner: O God! Come you hither with this question indeed, as if it were a matter so hard to be decided, and had need of some long and deep inquificion? for a great marvail no doubt it is, if feeing so much sin and wickednesse is spred over the face of the VVhole world at this day, not only shame and just indignation or Nemelis (according as Hefiodus prophecied before) have abandoned mans life; but also the Providence of God being dillodged and carrying away with it all the Oracles that be, is clean departed and gone for ever: But contrariwise I will put forth unto you another matter to be debated of, namely, how it comes to paffe, that they have not rather already given over every one? and why Hercules is not come again, or fome other of the gods, and hath not long fince plucked up and carryed away the three-footed table and all, being fo full ordinarily of shamefull, vilanous and impious demands, proposed there daily to Apollo? whiles some prefer matters to him as a Sophister, to trie what he can say; others ask him concerning Treasure hidden; some again, would be resolved of succession in Heritages, and of incessuous and unlawfull Marriages? Infomuch as now Pythagoras is manifeftly convinced of error and lefing, who faid, that men were then beft, and excelled in goodnesse, when they presented themselves before the gods: for such things as it would well before to hide and conceal in the presence only of fome ancient personage, (I mean the soul maladics and passions of the Soul) the same they discover and lay abroad naked before Apollo. And as he would have gone forward fill, and profecuted this theam. both Heracless plucked him by the Cloak, and I alfo (who of all the Company was most familiar and inward with him) Peace (quoth I) my good friend Plantiadas, and ceafe to provoke Apolo against you : for a cholerick and teffic god he is, and not mild and gracious; but according as Pindarus faid very well:

Misdeem'd he is, and thought amisse: To be

And were he either the Sun, or the Lord and Father of the Sun, or a substance beyond all visible. natures, it is not like and probable, that he would disdain to speak any more unto men at this day living, of whose Generation, Nativity, Nourshment, Being, and Understanding, he is the caule and author: neither isit credible, that the Divine Providence, which is a good, kinde, and tender Mother, produceth and preserveth all things for our use, should shaw her self to be malicious, in this matter onely of Divination and Prophecie; and upon an old grudge and rankor, to bereave us of that which at first she gave us, as if forfooth even then when Oracles were rife in all parts of the world, there was not in fo mighty a multitude of men, the greater number of wicked. And therefore make Pythick truce (as they fay) for the while with vice and wickednesse, which you are ever wont to chaflice and reboke in all your speeches, and come and sit down here by us again, that together with us you may fearch out some other cause of this generall Ecclipse and Cessation of Oracles, which now is in queftion : but withall remember that you keep this god Apollo propitious, and move him not to wrath and displeasure.

But these words of mine wrought so with Planetiades, that without any word replying, out of the doors he went his wayes. Now when the Company fat still for a prety while in great filence, Ammonias at length directing his speech to me : I beseech you (quoth he) Lampries , take better heed unto that which we do, and look more nearly into the matter of this our diffrutation, to the end that we clear not the god altogether, and make him to be no cause at all that the Oracles do cease. For he who attributeth this Ceffation unto any other traufe than the Will and Ordinance of God, giveth us occasion to suspect him also, that he thinketh they never were nor be at this present by his disposition, but rather by fome other mean: for no other cause and pullance there is, more noble, more mighty, or more excel-lent, which might be able to destroy and abolish Divination, if it were the work of God. And as touching the discourse that Planetiades made, it pleaseth me never a whit : neither can lapprove thereof, as well for other causes, as for that he admitteth a certain inequality and inconstancy in the god. For one while he maketh him to deteft and abhor Vice, and another while to allow and accept thereof: much like unto some King or Tyrant rather, who at on: gate driveth out wicked persons, and receiving them in at another doth negotiate with them. But feeing it is fo, that the greatest work which can be, sufficient in it felf, nothing superfluous, but fully accomplished every way, is most beferming the dignity and majety of the gods, let this principle be supposed and layed for a ground, and then a man in mine epinion may very well fay, that of this general defect & common scarcity of men, which evill seditions and wars before time have brought generally into the world , Greece hath felt the greatest part : infomuch as at this very day, hardly is all Greece able to make three thouland men for the wars, which are no more in number than one City in times past (to wit, Megara) fet forth and fent to the battell of Platea : and therefore, whereas the god Apollo in this our age hath left many Oracles, which in ancient time were much frequented, if one should infer hereupon and fay, that this argueth no other thing but that Grace is now much depopulate and dispeopled, in comparison of that which it was in old time, I would like well of his invention, and furnish him sufficiently with matter to discourse upon. For what would it boot, and what good would come of it, if there were now an Oracle at Tegyre, as sometime there was, or about Proum? whereas all the day long a man shall paradventure meet with one, and that is all, keeping and feeding Cattell there. And verily it is found written in histories, that this very place of the Oracle where we now are, which of all others in Greece is for Antiquity right ancient, and for Reputation most noble and renowned, was in times past for a great while defert and unfrequented; nay unacceffable altogether, in regard of a most venimous and dangerous beast, even a Dragon which haunted it. But those who write this, do not collect hereupon the Ceffation of the Oracle aright, but argue clean contrary: for it was the foliunde and infrequency of the place that brought the Dragon thirter, rather than the Dragon that caused the said desert solitarines, But afterwards when it pleased God, that Greece was fortified again and replenified with many Cities and this place well peopled and frequented, they used two Prophetesses, who one after the other in their course descended into the Cave and there fat ; yea and a third there was befides chosen, as a fuffragane or affiftant to fit by them and help if need were : but now there is but one Propheteffe in all, and yet we complain not; for the only is sufficient for all commers that have any occasion to use the Oracle. And therefore we are in no wise to blame or accuse the god: for that Divination and Spirit of Prophecie which remaineth there at this day, is fufficient for all, and sendeth all Suters away well contented, as having their full dispatch and answer for what foever they demand. Like as therefore Agamemon in Hower had nine Heraults or Criess about him, and yet hardly with them could be contain and keep in order the affembly of the Greeks being so frequent as then it was; but now within these few dayes, you shall hear the voice of one man alone able to refound over the whole Theater, and to reach unto all the people there contained : ever fo, we must think, that this Divination and Spirit of Prophecie in those dayes used many Organs and voices to speak unto the people, being a greater multitude than now there be. And therefore we should on the other fide rather wonder, if God would suffer to run in vain like waste water, this propheticall Divination: or to refound again, like as the defert Rocks in the wide Fields and Mountains ring with the resonance and ecchoes of herd mens hollaing, and beasts bellowing. When Ammonius had thus faid, and I held my peace, Cleombrotus addreffing his speech unto me: And grant you indeed (quoth he) thus much, that it is the god Apollo, who is the Author and Overthrower also of these Oracles? Not fo, answered I, for I maintain and hold, that God was never the cause of abol shing any Oracle of Divination whatfoever: but contrariwife, like as where he produceth and prepareth many other things for one use and behoof, nature bringeth in the corruption and utter privation of some; or to say more truly, matter being it felf privation, or subject thereto, avoideth many time and diff dveth that which a more excellent cause hath composed : even so I suppose there be some other causet, which darken and abolish the vertue of Divination, considering that God bestoweth upon men many fair and goodly gifes, but nothing perdurable and immortall; in fuch fort as the very works of the gods do die, but not themselves, according as Sephecks saith. And verily the Philosophers and Naturalists, who are well exercised in the knowledge of Nature and the primitive matter, ought indeed to scarch into the substance, property and puissance of Oracles, but to reserve the origin ill and principall cause for God, as very meet and requisite it is that it should so be. For very foolish and childish it is that the God himfelf, like unto those Spirits speaking within the bellies of poff ff. d felks, such as in old time they called Engastrimythi, and Eurycless, and be now termed Pythons, entred into the bodies of Prophets, spake by their mouthes, and used their tongues and voices as Organs and instruments of speech: for he that thus intermedleth God among the occasions and necessi ies of men, maketh no spire as he ought of his majefly, neither carrieth he that respect as is meet, to the preservation of the dignity and greatnesse of his power and vertue. Then Cleombrotus: You say very well and truly (quoth he:) but for as much as it is a difficule matter to comprise and define in what manner, and how far forth, and to what point we ought to imploy this Divine Providence: in my conceit, they who are of this mind, that fimply God is the cause of nothing at all in the world, and they again, that make him wholly the Author of all things; hold not a mean and indifferent course, but both of them miffe the very point of decent mediocity. Ceres as they fay palling well, who hold that Plato having invented and devised that element or fubject, upon which grow and be ingendered qualities, the which one while is called the primitive matter, and otherwhile Nature, delivered Philosophers from many great difficulties: even to me thinks, they who ordained a certain kinde by themselves of Dæmons, between God and men, have associated masny more doubts and greater ambiguities by finding out that bond and link (as it were) which joyneth us and them together in fockety: Were it the opinion that came from the ancient Migi and Zoroafies, or rathera Thracian Doctrine delivered by Orpheus; or else an E syptian or Phrygian tradition, as we may conjecture by feeing the facrifices both in the one Country and the other: wherein, among other holy and divine Geremonies, it seemeth there were certain doleful ceremonies of mourning and sorrow intermingled, favouring of morrality. And verily of the Greeks, Homer hath used these two names indifferently, terming the Gods Damons, and the Damons likewife Gods. But Hefiodus was the first who purely and diffinctly hath fet down four kindes of reasonable natures, to wir, the Gods: then the Damons, and those many in number and all good: the Heroes and Men; for the Demi-gods are ranged in the number of those Heroick worthies. But others hold, that there is a transmutation as well of Bodies as Souls: and like as we may observe, that of earth is ingendered Water, of Water Air, and of Air, Fire, whiles the nature of the Substance still mounteth on high : even so the better Souls are changed, first from Men to Heroes or Demi-gods, and afterwards from them to Dæmons, and of Dæmons some sew after a long time, being well refined and purified by vertue, came to participate the Divination of the gods. Yet unto some it befalleth, that being not ablt to hold and contain, they the the state of the gods. fer themselves to slide and fall into mortall bodies again, where they lead an obscure and dark life, like unto a smoaky vapour. As for Hispains, he thinketh verily, that even the Demonsalso, after certain revolutions of times, shall dye: for speaking in the person of one of their Nymphs called Natadas, covertain ly and under anigmaticall terms he designeth their time, in this wife :

Nine * ages of men * in their flower, doth live The * railing Crow: four times the Stags Surmount The life of Crowes : to Ravens doth nature give, A three fold age of Stags by true account : One Phanix lives as long as Ravens nine: But you fair Nymphs, the danghters verily Of mighty Jove and of nature divine,

But they that understand not well, what the Poet meaneth by this word hera, make the totall sum of this time to amount unto an exceeding great number of yeers. For in truth it is but one yeer and no more. And to by that reckoning, the whole arifeth in all to nine thousand seven hundred and twenty yeers just; which is the very life of the Damon. And many Mathematicians there be, by whole computation it is leffe. Bur more than fo Pindarus would not have it, when he faith, that she Nymphs

age is limitted equal to Trees, whereupon they be named Hamadry ades, as one would fay living and dying with Okes. As he was about to fay more, Demetrius interrupted his freech, and teking the words out of his mouth: How is it possible (quoth he) O Clembrotus, that you should make good and maintain, that the Poet called the age of man, a year only and no more? for it is not the space either of his slower and best time, nor of his ged age, according as some read it in Hessadus: for as one reads kinner, that it to say, flourishing; so, another readeth progress, that it to fay, aged. Now they that would have it to be kinner, but down for the age of man, thirty years, according to the opinion of Herselius, which is the very time that a Father hath begotten a Son able to beget another of his own: but such which is the very time that a Father hath begotten a Son able to beget another of his own: but such a follow the reading that hath progress, attribute unto the age of man an hundred and eight years, faying, that four and fifty is the just moity or one half of a mass life: which number is composed of an unity; if the two firth plains, two squares, and two outbuses: which numbers leave a slow ook to the procreation of the Soul which he describeth. But it seemeth verily, that Hessadus by these words covertly displained that general conflagration of the VOrled; at what time, it is very pobable, that the Nymphs together withfull humors and liquid matters shall perish:

Those Nymphs I mean, which many a tree and plant In forrests fair and goodly groves do bant; Or near to firings and river streams are seen, Or keep about the medowes gay and green.

Then Ckembrotus: I have heard many (quoth he) talk hereof, & I perceive very well how this conflagratition which the Stoicks have devised, as it hath crept into the Poems of Heraclitus and Orpheus, and fo perverted their Verses: so it hath ceifed upon and caught hold of Hesiodus, and given a perverse interpretation of him as well as of others. But neither can I endure to admit this confummation and end of the world, which they talk of, nor any fuch impossible matters; and namely, those speeches as touching the life of the Crow and the Stag or Hinde, which yeers, if they were summed together, would grow to an excessive number. Moreover, a yeer containing in it the beginning and the end of all things which the seasons thereof do produce, and the earth bring forth, may in my opinion not impertinently be called And, that is to fay, the age of men: for even your selves confesse, that Hesiodus in one paffage called mans life Ana. How fay you, is it not fo? Then Demetrius avowed as much. This alfo (quoth Cleombrotus) is as certain, that both the measure, & also the things which be measured, are called by one and the same names : as it appeareth by Cotyla, Chenix, Amphora and Medimnus. Like as therefore we name Unity, a number, which indeed of all numbers is the leaft measure and beginning only of them: femblably, Hefiodus termed Year the age of man, for that with it principally we meafure his age, and so communicate that word with the thing that it measureth: as for those numbers which they make, there is no singularity at all or matter of importance in them as touching the renowned numbers indeed. But the number of $720, hath a speciall ground and beginning, as being composed of the four first numbers arising in order from one : and the same, added together or multi-*Taurabe the just sum of the number before named. Now if *these be reduced into triangles five times, they make the just sum of the number before named. But as touching these matters, what need 1 to contend with Terranger. Demetrius? for whether there be meant thereby a longer time or shorter, a certain or uncertain, where-Ta. I ful in Hefiodus would have the foul of a Dæmon, to change, or the life of a Demi-god or Heros to end, it ped this skilleth not; for he proveth nevertheleffe that weh he would, & that by the evidence of most ancient and place. Some wife witneffes, that there be certain natures neuter and mean (as it were) fituate in the confines between to fet all gods and men, and the same subject to mortall passions, and apt to receive necessary changes and mustrait read gods and men, and the same subject to mortall passions, and apt to receive necessary changes and mutations: which natures according to traditions and examples of our forefathers, meet it is that we call Tels Tel. Damons, and honor them exceedingly. And to this purpose, Xenocrates one of the familiar friends pandwre: of Plate, was wont to bring in the demonstration and example of triangles, which agreed very well to but not the prefer matter in hand; for that triangle which had * three fides and apple agreed to compared the present matter in hand: for that triangle which had * three fides and angles equall, he compared unto the nature divine and immortall; that which had * all fides unequall, unto the humane and morone nor the other tall nature; and that which had * two equall and one unequall, unto the nature of the Dæmons: for attain to the first is every way equall, the second on every side unequall, and the last in some sort equall, and in the point other unequall, like unto the nature of the Damons, having humane passions and affections, yet with-Fer admit all, the divine power of some god. But Nature her self hath proposed unto us sensible figures and that the four first fimilitudes visible above; of gods verily the Sun and other Stars; but of mortall men, sudden lights and flashes in the night, blazing Comets, and shooting of Stars: for unto such Euripides compared numbers added or them, when he faid :

Who was erembile andlately in the floure, Of his fresh youth, all sudden in an hour, Became extinct (as star which seemes to fall Fromskie) and into air sens breath and all.

the same reduced into a triangle (or take three times) amount to 240: and it brought into a triangle or multiplyed by three, grow to 720: yet the 9000. remain full, unless we go this way to work: first multiply 40. started that is to say, sive times, and you shall have 200. multiply it by five, it coment to 1000. bring it to one triangle, it is 3000. and let the same be multiplyed by another, maketh 9000. * Instance, * reaches, * Instances,*

Now for a mixtbody, representing the nature of Damons or Angels, there is the Moon : which they feeing to be so fubject to growing and decreasing, yea and to perishing altogether, and departing out of fight, thought to accord very well, and to be sortable unto the mutability of the Dzmons kind. For which cause, some have called her a terrestriall Star; others an Olympian or celestiall earth; and there' be again who have named her The heritage and possession of Proferpina, both heavenly and earthly. Like as therefore, if one took the air out of the world, and removed it from between the Moon and the Earth, he should dissolve the continuation, coherence and composition of the whole universall frame, by leaving a void and empty place in the midft, without any bond to joyn and linck the extremes together: even fo, they who admit not the Nation and kind of the Damons, abolith all communication, conversand conference between gods and men, confidering they take away that nature which serveth as a truchman, Interpreter, and minister between both, as Plato said:or rather they would driveus to confound and huddle together, yea and to jumble all in one, if we came to intermingle the divine nature and delty among human passions and actions, and so pluck it out of heaven, for to make it intermeddle in the negocies and affairs of men; like as they fay, the wives of Theffalie draw down the Moon from heaven. Which devise and fiction hath taken root, and is believed among women, by reafon that Aglaonica, the daughter of Agetor (by report) being a wise Dame, and well seen in Aftrology, made semblance and perswaded the vulgar fort, that in every Ecclipse of the Moon, the used always some Charms and Enchantments; by vertue whereof, the setched the Moon out of Heaven. As for us, give we no ear and credit unto them who fay, there be some Oracles and divinations without Deity, or that the gods regard not facrifices, divine fervices, and other facred ceremonies, exhibited unto them: neither on the other fide let us believe, that God is present to intermeddle or employ himself in person, but betaking and referring that charge unto the Ministers of the gods, as it is meet and just; like as if they were deputies, officers, and secretaries: let us constantly hold, that those be the Damons which are their espies and escouts, going too and fro throughout all parts, fome to overfee and direct the facrifices, and facred rites and ceremonies performed to the gods: others to chaffice and punish the enormous and outragious offences and wrongs committed by men : and others there are belides, of whom the Poet Hefiodus speaketh most reverently, saying:

Giving us by the way thus much to understand, that to do good and be beneficiall is a royall office and function: for a difference there is, and fundry degrees there be in the gifts and wretues of Damons, like as among men. For in some of them there remain fill/certain finall reliques (and the same very feeble and Cearce sensible) of that passionate and sensitive part of the soul which is not reasonable, even as a very excrement and superstainty left behind of the rest: but in other again, there abideth a great deal, and the same hardly to be extinguished, whereof we may see lively the works and evident cokens in many places, diffeminate in some sacrifices, seasts and ceremonite celebrated unto them; yea, and in the tales reported by them. Howbeit, as touching the mysteries and sacred services (by which and through which a man may more electly perceive than by any other means whatsever; the tracnature of the good;) I will not speak a word; let them lye close and hidden still for me, as Herebustais that his that so to certain selfituall solumities and sacrifices, which archeld as dismall, unfortunate and heavy dayes; when sometimes they use to ear aw flesh, and tear human bodies piece-meal; or otherwhile to saft and knock their brests; and in many places utter most filthy and beastly words during the facrifices;

Wagging their heads in frantick wife, With strange all-arms and hideous cries;

I will never believe that this is done for any of the gods:but will fay rather, it is to avert the ire and appeale the fury of fome malign devils. Neither carrieth it any likelihood and probability, that ever any god would require men to be facrificed unto them, as they were in old time: or fland well pleafed with any fuch facrifices. Neither was it for nought that Kings and great Captaines gave their own Children thus to be flain; yea, and with their own hands killed them for facrifice: but we are to believe that it was to turn away and divert the rankor and wrath of fome perverfe fpirits and malicious fends, or to fatisfic fuch hurtfull devils; yea, and to fulfill the violent, furious and tyrannicall links of fome, who either could not, or would not enjoy them with their bodies, or by their bodies. Bus like as Hercules befieged the City of Oechalia, for a Virgins fake who was within: even fo thefe powerful and outragious fends, demanding some humane foul clad and compassed within a body; to be given unto them, and yet not able to infill their luft by the body; bring Pefilience, Famine, Dearth, and sterility of the ground upon Cities, raise Wars and civill diffentions, untill such time as they come to have and enjoy that which they loved: and some do clean contrary; as it was my han 30 so observe in Gandir, (where I ahode a long time) how they celebrated a certain monstrous Feast, in which they made shew of an headlesse mans lmage, saying it was Malus, the Father of Meriones: for having forced or defloured a Nymph, he was afterwards found without an head. Moreover, what ravishment for ver, what wandring voyages, what occultations, llights, banishments, ministerits and services of the gods be reported and fung in fables or hymnes, certes they be all of them no passions and accidents that befell to gods indeed, but to some Demons, whose fortunes were recorded in memoriall of their vertee and puissance: neither meant the Poet Assessing (,a god) when he said:

Apollo chaft, who now is fled, And out of heaven hanished; Not Admetus in Sophoesles; My chausting Cock that crows so shrill, Hath raised him and brought to mill.

Also the Divines and Theologians of Delphi, are in a great error, and far from the truth, who think, that sometimes in this place, there was a combat between Apollo and a Dragon, about the hold and possession of this Oracle. They are to blame also, who suffer Poets and Oratoure, striving one against another in their Theatres, to act or relate such matters ; as if of purpose and expresly they contradicted and condemned those things which themselves perform in their most facred folemnities. Hereat, when Philippus wondered much (for the Historiographer of that name was prefent in this company and demanded withall, what divine rites and ceremonies they might be, which were contradicted and teftified against by these who contended in the Theaters? Marry even those (quoth Cleambrotus) which concern this very Oracle of Delphi, and by which this City not long fince hath admitted and received into the facred profession of holy mysteries, all the Greeks without Thermopyle, and excluded those that dwel as far as the vale of Tempe. For the tabernacle or cottage there of boughs which is erected & fet up every ninth yeer, within the Court-yard of this Temple) is not a representation of the Dragons Cave or Den, but rather of some Tyrants or Kings House : as also the assault or surprise thereof in great filence, by the way called Dolonia. Likewise, that a little after they bring thither a Boy who hath both Father and Mother living , with Torches light burning : and when they have fet the faid Tabernacle or Tent on Fire, and overthrown the Table, run away as hard as they can through the dores of the Temple, and never look behind them. And finally, the wanderings of this Boy in divers placct, and his fervile miniferies, together with the expiatory facrifices and ecremonies about Toupe, move suspicion that there should be represented thereby some notorious outrage, and audacious safe perpetrated there in old time. For it were a meer mockery (my friend Philippus) to fay, that Apollo for killing the Dragon, fled as far as to the utmost Coasts and Marches of Greece, for to be purified and affoiled : alfo, that he offered thereon certain expiatory libations and effutions, and performed all fuch duties and services which men do, when they would appeale the wrath and indignation of such Dzmons and curst fiends, whom we call Alastoras and Palamneos, as one would say, Therevengers of fuch enormities and crimes as could not be forgotten, and those who bare still in mind some old fine, and purfued the same. As for that tale, which I my felf of late have heard as touching this flight and banishment, it is wonderfull strange and prodigious: but if it contain some truth among, we must not think, that it was a small and ordinary matter that befell in those dayes about the faid Oracle. But for fear I might be thought as Empedocles sometimes said,

Suffer me I befeech you to make a convenient end here of my light discourses. For now are we just com: fo far, as we may also be bold after many others to affirm and pronounce, that seeing the Dzmons ordained for the prefidence and superintendence of prophecies and Oracles do fail, of necessity these Oracles also and divinations must cease with them; & when they be fled and gone, or change their residence, it cannot chuse but the former places must lose their propheticall power and vertue : also, that when after long time they be returned thither; the faid places will begin again to figerak and found, like unto Inftruments of Mofick; namely, if they be prefert who have the skill to handle and use them accordingly. After that Cleombrotus had thus discoursed: There is not (quoth Heracton) any one of this company that is a prophane miscreant and infidell, not professed in our religion, or who holdeth any opinions as touching the gods, discordant from us. Howbeir, let us take heed our selves, O Philippus, lest ere we be aware, we do not in our discourse and disputation put down fume erroneous suppositions, and such as may make great ground-works of impiety. You say very well (quoth Philip) but what point is it of all those that Cleombrotus hath put down, that is so offenfive and feandalizeth you most? Then Heracleon: That they be not gods indeed who are the presidents of Oracles (because we ought to believe of them, that they be exempt from all terrestriall affaires) but that they be Damons rather, or the Angels and Ministers of the gods; in my conceit is no bad nor impertinent supposall: but all at once and abruptly, by occasion of Empedacles his verses, to attribute unto these Demons crimes, plagues, calamities, transgressions, inquietudes and errours sent from the gods above, and in the end to make them for to dye, as mortall men; this I take to be formewhat to prefumptuoufly spoken, and to smell of barbarous audacity. Then Cleombrotus asked Philippus, who this young man was, and from whence he came? And when he had heard his name and his Countrey, he answered in this wife: We are not ignorant our selves (O Heracleon) that we are fallen into a speech favouring formewhat of abfurdity : but a man cannot possibly discourse of great matters, without he lay as great foundations at the beginning, for to proceed unto probability and prove his opinion. And as for your felf, you are not aware, how you overthrow even that which you grant : for confesse you do, that there be Damons; but when you will needs maintain that they be neither lewed nor mortall, you cannot make it good that they be at all. For wherein I pray you do they differ from gods, in cale they be in substance incorruptible, and in vertue impassible, or not subject to fin ? Hereupon Heracleon, when he had mused with himself, not saying a word, and studied what answer to make, Cleombrotus went on and faid: It is not Empedocles who hath given out there were evil! Dæmons, but Flato also himself, Xenocrates also, and Chrysippus; yea and Democritus when he wished and prayed that he might meet with lucky images, both knew and gave us (no doubt) thereby to understand, that he thought there were others of them crooked and sheewd, and such as were badly afficked and had evill intentions. But as touching the death of fuch, and how they are mortall, I have heard it reported by a Man who was no Fool nor a vain lying Person: and that was Epither fer the Father of Emilianus the Oratour, whom some of you (Idare well say) have heard to plead and declame. This Epitherfer was my Fellow-citizen, and had been my Schoolmaster in Grammar, and this narration he related: That minding upon a time to make a voyage by fea into Italy, he was imbarqued in a Ship fraught with much merchandize, and having many paffengers befide aboord. Now when it drew toward the Evening, they hapned (as they faid) to be calmed about the Ill:s Echinades; by occasion whereof their Ship hulled with the tides, untill at length it was brought near unto the Islands Faxe, whiles most of Passengers were awake, and many of them still drinking after Supper: but then, all on a fudden there was heard a voce from one of the Islands of Paxe, calling aloud unto one Thainus; infomuch as there was not one of all our company but he wondred thereat. Now this Thanns was a Pilot, and an Egyptian born : but known he was not to many of them in the Ship by that name. At the two first calls, he made no answer; but at the third time he obeyed the voice, and answered : Here I am. Then he who spake, strained his voyce and said unto him : When shou are come to  Some Palades, publish thou and make it known: That the Great Pan is dead. And as Epitherses made report take it to profile tool and make it known: That he offers I am a dead. I had a sphery is no a discourse ke a place unto us, as many as heard this voyce were wonderfully amazed thereas, and entred into a discourse ke a place and disputation about the poynt, whether it were best to do according to this commandement, or rather to let it paffe, and not curiously to meddle withall; but neglectit. As for Thamus, of this mind shallowes. he was, and refolved: If the wind ferved, to fail by the place quietly and fay nothing; but it the winds were laid, and that there enfued a calm, to crie and pronounce with a loud voyce that which he heard. Well, when they were come to Palodes aforefaid, the winde was down, and they were becalmed, to that the Sea was very still without Waves. Whereupon Thamus looking from the pour of the Ship toward the Land, pronounced with a loud voice that which he had heard, and faid : The Great Pan's dead. He had no fooner spoken the word, but there was heard a mighty noyse, not of one but of many together, who seemed to grown and lament, and withall to make a great wonder. And as it falleth commonly out when as many be prefent, the news thereof was foon fored and devulged through the City of Rome, in fuch fort as Tiberius Cefar the Emperour fent for Thamus: and Tiberius verily gave fo good credit unto his words, that he fearched and enquired with all diligence who that Pan might be. Now the great Clerks and learned men (of whom he had many about him) gave their conjecture that it might be he, who was the Son of Mercury by Penelope. And verily Philippus had fome of the company present to bear witnesse with him, such as had been Emilianus Scholars & heard as much Then Demetrius made reports that many little D: ferts and desolate Isles there were lying dispersed and scattering in the sea about Britain, like unto those which the Greeks call Sporades; whereof fome were named the Isles of Dæmons, and Heroes or Demi gods : also that himself by commission and commandement from the Emperour, sailed toward the nearest of those deser-Illes for to know and fee somewhar; which he found to have very few inhabitants, and those all were by the Britainer, held for facrofainct and inviolable. Now within a while after he was arrived thither. the air and the wether was mightily troubled, many portentous fignes were given by terrible tempelis and flormes, with extraordinary Winds, Thunders, Lightnings, and fiery impressions: but after that these tempests were ceased, the Islanders affored him, that one of these Demons or Demi-gods (who furmounted the nature of man) was departed. For like as a Lamp (fay they) or Candle, fo long as it burneth light offendeth no body; but when it is put out or goeth forth, it maketh a flink offenfive unto many about it : even to these great Souls, whiles they shine and give light, be milde, gracious. and harmleffe; but when they come to be extinct or to perifh, they raise (even as at that present) outragious tempefts, yea and ofcentimes infect the air with contagious and peftilene maladies. They reported moreover, that in one of those Islands Briareus kept Saturn prisoner in a found fleep (for that was the device to hold him captive) about whose person there were many other Dæmons of his train & his fervicours Gleombrotus then taking occasion for to fpeak: I am able my felf allo (quoth he) to allege many such examples if I list; but it may suffice for this present matter in hand, that this is nothing contrary nor opposite unto that which by us hath been delivered. And verily we know full well, that the Stoickshold the same opinion not only of Dæmons that we do, but also of the gods : that there being so great a mulcitude of them, yet there is but one alone immortall and eternall; whereas all the reft had their beginning by Nativity, and shall have an end by Death. And as for the Scoffe, Scorne and Mockeries that the Epicureans make, we ought not to regard them, nor be affraid of them : for soundacious they are, that they use the same even in Divine Providence, terming it a very Fable and Oldwives Tale. But we contraissife hold, that their infinity of Worlds is a Fable indeed: as afforo fay, that among those ininumerable Worlds, there is not so much as one governed by reason or the Providence of God; but that all things were first made and afterwards maintained by meer chance and fortune. Cerces, it is be lawfull to laugh, and that we must needs make game in matteu or Philosophy, we should rather mock those who bring into their disputations of naturall questions, I wot not what Deaf, Blind, Damb and inanimate Images; remaining I know not where, and continuing in appearance infinite revolutions of years, wandring round about and going to and fro: which far they, iffue and flow from bodies partly yet living, and partly from those who long ago were dead burnt, yea and rotten and putrified to nothing. These men (I say) we should do well to laugh at who draw fuch ridiculous toics and vain shadowes as these, into the serious disputations of nature.

Meanwhile forfooth, offended they are and angry, if a man should say there be Damens : and that not only in nature but in reason also it standeth with good congruity, they should continue and en-* Or The dure a long time. These speeches thus passed, Ammonius began in this wife: * Cleombrous in mine ophraftus opinion (quoth he) hath speken very well: and what should impeach us, but that we may admit seme read and receive his sentence, being so grave as it is, and most beseeming a Philosopher? For reject it once. we shall be forced to reject also and denie many things which are, and usually happen, whereof no certain cause and reason can be delivered: and if it be admitted, it draweth after it no train and con-sequence of any impossibility whatsoever, nor of that which is not subsilient. But as touching that one point, which I have heard the Epicurcans allege against Empedocles, and the Damons which he bringeth in, namely: That they cannot possibly be happy and long lived, being evill and finfull as they are, for that vice by nature is blind, and of it fell falleth ordinarily headlong into perils and inconviences which destroy the life; this is a very fortish opposition; for by the same reason they must confesse, that Epicurus was worse than Gorgias the Sophister; and Metrodorus, than Alexis the Comicall Poet: for this Poet lived twice as long as Metrodorus; and that Sophister, longer than Epicurus, by a third part of his age. For it is in another respect, that we say Vertue is puissant, and Vice seeble, not in regard of the lasting continuance or dissolution of the body: for we see that of Beasts there be many dull flow and blockish of spirit; many also by nature libidinous, unruly and disordered, which live longer than those that are full of wit, wily, wary and wife. And therefore they conclude not aright, in faying, that the divine nature enjoyeth immortality, by taking heed and avoiding those things that be noy some and mischievous. For it behooved, in the divine nature which is bleffed and happy, to have fet down an impossibility of being subject to all Corruption and Alteration, and that it flandeth in no need of care and labour to maintain the faid nature. But peradventure it feemeth not to fland with good manners and civility, to dispute thus against those that are not present to make answer for themseves: it were meet therefore, that Cleombrotus would resume and take in hand that speech again, which he gave over and layed aside of late, as touching the departure and translation of thef: Damons from one place to another. Then Cleombrotus: Yes mary, quoth he: but I would marvell, if this discourse of mine would not seem unto you much more absurd than the former delivered already: and yet it seemeth to be grounded upon naturall reason, and Plate himself hath made the overture thereto, not absolutely pronouncing and affirming so much; but after the manner of a doubtfull opinion and under covert words, casting out a certain wary conjecture tending that way, although among other Philosophers it bath been disclaimed and cryed out against. But for a smuch as there is fet a Cup on the boord, full of reasons and tales mingled together, and for that a man shall hardly meet in any place again with more courteous and gracious hearers, among whom he may passe and put away fuch narrations, as pieces of foren coine, and strange mony : I will not think much to gratific you thus far forth, as to acquaint you with a narration that I heard a stranger and a Barbarian relate; whom Cafter many a journey made to and fro for to finde him out, and much mony given by me for to hear where he was) I met with at length by good hap, near unto the Red-fea. His manner was to speak and converse with men but once in the year 3 all the rest of his time (as he said himself) he spent among the Nymphs, Nomades and Demons. Well, with much ado I light upon him, I communed with him, and he used me courteously. The fairest man he was to see to, of all that ever I set eye on : neither was he subject to any disease: once every moneth he fed upon a medicinable and bitter fruit of a certain herb: and this was the fare he lived upon. A good linguist he was, and used to speak many languages; but with me he ralked commonly in Greek, after the Dorick Dialect. His speech differed not so much from Song and Meetre: and whenfoever he opened his mouth for to fpeak, there iffued forth of it to fweet and fragrant a breath, that all the place about was filled therewith, and smelled most pleasantly. As for his other learning and knowledge, yea, the skill of all histories, he had the same all the year long: but as touching the gift of Divination, he was inspired therewith one day every year, and no more; and then he wens down to the Sea fide and prophecied of things to come: and thither reforted unto him the Princes and great Lords of that Country, yea and Secretaries of forein Kings who there attended his comming at a day prefixed: which done, he returned. This personage then attributed unto Damons the Spirit of Divination and Prophecy: most pleasure took he in hearing and speaking of Deephi: and look what fover we hold here as touching Bacchus, what adventures befell unto him, and what Sacrifices were performed by us in his honour, he had been enformed thereof, and knew all well enough, faying withall: That as these were great accidents, that hapned to Damons; so likewise was that, which men reported of the Serpent Python : whom he that flew, was neither banished for nine years, nor fled into the valley of Temps, but was chased out of this world, and went into another; from whence (after nine revolutions of the great years) being returned all purified and Phabus indeed, that is to fay, clear and bright, he recovered the superintendance of the Delphick Oracle, which during that while was left to the custody of Themis. The same was the cause (said he) of Titons and Typhons.

For he affirmed, they were the battels of Dæmons against Dæmons: the flights and banishments also of those who were vanquished : or rather the punishments inflicted by the gods upon as many as had committed fuch outrages as Typhon had done against Ofiris, and Saturn against * Calus or the heaven: whose * or Car honours were the more obscure or abolished altogether, by reason that themselves were translated into lum nonderworld. For I understand and hear, that the Solymians who border hard upon the Lycians, highly honoured Saturn when the time was: but after that he having slain their Princes, Arsalus, Drus, and Trofebius, fled and departed into some other Countrey (for whither he went they knew not) they made no more any rekoning of him: but Arfalus and the other, they termed by the name of Sclerei, that is to fay, fevere gods: and in truth, the Lycians at this day, as well in publick as private, utter and recite the form of all their curses and execuations in their names.

Many other semblable examples a man may draw out of Theologicall writings, as touching the gods. Now if we call some of these Damons by the usuall and ordinary names of the gods; we ought not to marvell thereat (quoth this stranger unto me:) for look unto which of the gods they do retain, upon whom they depend, and by whole means they have honour and puissance; by their names they love to be called: like as here among us men, one is called Jovius of Jupiter; another, Palladius or Atheneus of Minerva; a third, Apollonius of Apollo; or Dionysius and Hermans of Bacchus and Mercury; And verily, some there be who although they be named thus at aventure, yet answer very fitly to such denominations ; but many have gotten the denominations of the gods, which agree not unto them, but are transposed wrong and misgiven. Herewith Cleombrotus panied : and the speech that he had delivered semed very strange unto all the company. Then Heracters demanded of him, whether this doctrine concerned Plato? and how it was, that Plato had given the overture and beginning of such matter? You do well (quoth Cleombrotus) to put me in mind hereof, and to reduce it into my memory. First and formost therefore, he condemneth evermore the infinity of worlds: marry about the just and precise number of them he doubteth: and howsoever he seems to yeeld a probability and apparence of truth unto those who have set down five, and attributed to every element one; yet himself flicketh fill to one, which feemeth indeed to be the peculiar opinion of Plato : whereas other Philofophers also have alwayes mightily feared to admit a multitude of worlds ; as if necessary it were, that those who flayed not by the means of matter in one, but went out of it once, could not chuse but fall presently into this indeterminate and troublesome infinity. But this your stranger, (quoth I) determined he nothing of this multitude of worlds, otherwife than Plate did ? or all the whiles than you converfed with him, did you never move the question thereof unto him, to know what his opinion was thereof? Think you (quoth Cleombrotus) that I failed herein, and was not (how/oever otherwife I behaved my felf) a diligent Scholar and affectionate Auditor of his in these matters, especially feeing he was so affable, and shewed himself so courteous unto me? But as southing this point, he saids That neither the number of the worldswas infinit, nor yet true it was, that there were no more but one, or five in all: for there were 183, and those ordained and ranged in a form Triangular; of which Triangle, every side contained threescore worlds; and of the three remaining still, every corneer thereof had one : that they were fo ordered , as one touched and intertained another round, in manner of those who are in a ring dance : that the plain within the Triangle, is as it were the foundation and altar common to all the worlds, which is called The Plain or Field of Truth: and within it lie immoveable the defignes, reasons, forms, idea and examples of all things that ever were or shallbe : and about them is eternity, whereof time is a portion, which as a riveret, runneth from thence to those things that are done in time. Now the fight and contemplation of these things was presented unto the souls of men, if they lived well in this world, and that but once in ten thousand yeers: as for our mysteries here beneath, and all our best and most facred ceremonics, they were but a dream in comparison of that spectacle & holy ceremonies. Moreover, he said: That for the good things there, and for to enjoy the fight of those beauties, men employed their study in Philosophy here; or elfe all their pains taken was but in vain, and their travell loss. And verily (quoth be) I heard him discourse of these matters plainly and without any art, no otherwise than if it had been some Religion wherein I was to be professed, in which he instructed me without using any proof and demonfiration of his doctrine. Then I (turning to Demetrius) called unto him, and asked what were the words that the woers of Penelope spake, when they beheld with admiration Ulysses handling his bow? And when Demetrius had prompted unto me the verse out of Homer : Surely (quoth I) it comes into my mind to fay the very fame of this stranger: * On one,

not of bowes, as he faid of Uhffes, but of fentences, refolutions and discourses of Philosophy: he hath that it to been conversant, I say, no doubt in all manner of literature: and I warrant von no stranger nor Busha. By a humbeen conversant, I say, no doubt in all manner of literature: and I warrant you, no stranger nor Barba-ter. tian born, but a Grecian, thorowly furnished with all knowledge and doctrine of the Greeks. And verily, this number of the worlds whereof he talketh, bewraicth not an Egyptian nor an Indian, but favoureth of some Dorlan out of Sicile, and namely, of Petron, born in the City of Himera, who wrote a little Book of this argument; which I have not read my self, neither do I know whether it be now extant : but Hippys the Rhegine (of whom Phanias the Ereffian maketh mention) writeth, that this was the opinion and doctrine of Petron ; namely, that there were 183 worlds, which raught one another in order and train : but what he meant by this Reaching one another in order or train, hee declared not; neither annexed he any other probable reason thereof. Then Demetrius : And what likelihood or probability (quoth he) may there be in fuch matters, confidering that Plato himfelf alleying no argument or conjecture that carrieth with it any thew of truth and reason, hath by that meanes overthrown that opinion? And yet (quoth Heracleon) we have heard you Grammarians fay, than Homer was the first Author of this opinion, as if he divided the universall frame of All into five worlds: to wit, Heaven, Water, Air, Earth, and Olympus : of which, he leaveth two to be common, namely, Earth, to All beneath; and Olympus, to All above : but the three in the midft between them, he attributeth unto three gods. Semblably, it feemeth that Plato alloting unto the principall parts and members of the faid univerfall nature, the first forms and most excellent figures of the bodies, called shem five worlds; to wit, of the Earth, the Water, the Air, the Fire, and finally, of that which comp: chendeth the other : and that he called the form of Dodecaedron, that is to fay, with twelve bases or faces, which amply extendeth it felf, is very capable and moveable, as being a figure proper and meen for the animal motions and revolutions of the foules. What need we at this prefent (quoth Demetrins) to meddle with Homer? we have had fables enough already, if that be good. As for Plato, he is far enough off from naming those five different substances of the world, five worlds; considering that even in that very place where he disputeth against those who maintain an infinit number of worlds, he affirmeth there is but one created by God, and beloved by him, as his onely begotten child, composed of all nature, having one entire body, sufficient in it self, and standing in need of nothing else. Whereupon a man may very well wonder and think it ftrange, that having himfelf delivered a truth, he should give occasion to others thereby, to take hold of a false opinion, and wherein there is no anparence of reason. For, if hee had not fluck hard to this unity of the world, in some fort he might have laid the foundation for those who hold them to be infinite; but that he should precisely affirm there were five, and neither more nor fewer, is exceeding abfurd, and farre from all probability; unleffe haply, you (quoth he, casting his eye upon me) can fay formewhat to this point, How now (quo h I then) are you minded thus to leave your first disputation of Oracles, as if it were fully finished and ended, and to enter upon another matter of such difficulty? Nay (quoth Demetrius) we will not paffe it over so; but this here that presenteth it self now, and takethus as it were by the hand, we cannot put by : for we will not dwell long upon it, but onely touch it fo, and were by the mans, we cannot prove you we want not used not appear to be only out one; out in reason handle it by the way, as that we may find out fome probability, and then will we prefently return unto our former quellion proposed in the beginning. First and formost therefore, I say: The reasons which permit us not to allow an infinite number of worlds, impeach us not, but that we admit more than one. For as well in many worlds as in one, there may be divination, there may be providence, and the least intercurrence of fortune : but the most part of the greatest and principall things shall have and take their generations, changes and mutations ordinarily : which cannot possibly be in that infinity of worlds. Over and besides, more consonant it is to reason, and accordeth better with the nature of God, to say, that the world is not created by him, one onely and solitary: for being (as he is) perfectly and absolutely good, there is no vertue wanting in him, and least of all others that which concerneth justice and amity; which as they be of themselves most beautifull, so they are best befitting the gode. Now such is the nature of God, that he hath nothing either unprofitable or in vain and without use : and therefore needs there must be beside and without him, other gods and other worlds, unto whom and which he may extend those sociall vertues that he hath. For neither in regard of himfelf, nor of any part in him, needeth he to use justice, gracious favour and bounty, but unto others. So that it is not likely that this world floteth and moveth without a friend, without a neighbour, and without any fociety and communication, in a valt and infinit voidnesse; especially feeing we behold how nature encloseth, environeth, and comprehendeth all things, in their severall genders and diffind kinds, as it were within veffels or the husks and covertures of their feeds. For look throughout the univerfall nature, there is nothing to be found one in number, but it hath the notion and reason of the effence and being thereof, common to others : neither hath any thing such and such a denomination, but beside the common notion it is by some particular qualities diffind from others of the same kind. Now the world is not called so in common : then must it be fuch in particular : and qualified it is in particular, and diffinguished by certain differences, from other worlds of the same kind, and yet hath a peculiar form of the own. Moreover, confidering there is in the whole world, neither man alone, nor horse, nor star, ne yet God or Dæmon solitary : what should hinder us to fay, that nature admitteth not one onely world, but hath many? Now if any man shall object unto me and fay, that in nature there is but one earth, or one fea : I answer, that he is much decoived and overfeen, in not perceiving the evidence that is of fimilar parts: tor we divide the earth into parts fimilar, that is to fay, of the femblable and the fame denomination, like as we do the fea alfo; for all the parts of the earth are called earth, and of the fea likewife : but no part of the world is world, for that it is composed of divers and different natures. For as touching that inconvenience which some especially fear, who spend all matter within one world, lest forsooth if there remained any thing without, it should trouble the composition and frame thereof, by the jurres and refishances that it would make ; furely there is no tuch cause why they should fear ; for when there be many worlds, and each of them particularly having one definit, and determinate measure and limit of their subflance and matter, no pare thereof will be without order and good disposition, nothing will remain superfluous, as an excrement without, to hinder or impeach ; for that the reason which belongeth to each world, being able to rule and govern the matter that is allotted thereto, will not fuffer any thing to go out of course and order, and wandring to and fro, for to hit and run upon another world; nor likewise that from another ought should come for to rush upon it, because in nature there is nothing in quantity infinit and inordinate, nor in motion without reason and order. But say there should happly be some deflux or effluence that passeth from one world to another, the same is a brotherly sweet and amiable communication, and such as very well agreeth to all : much like unto the lights offars, and the influences of their temperatures, which are the cause that they thenselves do joy in beholding one another with a kind and favourable aspect; yea and yeeld unto the gods, which in every flar be many (and those good) meanes to intertain and imbrace one another most friendly. For in all this, verily, there is nothing impossible, nothing fabulous nor contrary unto reason : unleffe paradventure some there be who will suspect and fear the reason and sentence of Aristotle, as confonant unto nature. For if as he faith, every body hath a proper and naturall place of the own; by reason thereof necessarily it must be, that the earth from all parts should tend toward the midst, and the water afterwards upon it, ferving (by means of their weight and ponderofity) instead of a foundation to other elements of a lighter substance. And therefore (quoth he) if there were many worlds, is would fall out oftentimes that the earth should be found situate above air and fire, and as often under them : likewise the air and fire sometime under, otherwhiles in their naturall places, and again in others contrary to their nature. Which being impossible, as he thinketh, it must follow of necessity. that there be neither two nor more worlds, but one alone, to wit, this which we visibly see composed of all forts of substance, and disposed according to nature, as is meet and convenient for diversity of bodies. But in all this there is more apparent probability than verity indeed. For the better proof hereof, consider I pray you my good friend Demetrius, that when he saith, among simple bodies some bend directly to the midst, that is to say downward : others from the midst, that is to say upward : and a third fort move round about the midft and circularly : in what respect taketh hee the midft ? Certain it is, not in regard of voidnesse, for there is no such thing in nature, even by his own opinion : again, according unto those that admit it, middle can it have none, no more than first or last : For these be ends and extremities: and that which is infinite must consequently be also without an end. But suppose, that some one of them should enforce us to admit a middle in that voidnesse; impossible it is to conceive and imagine the difference in motions of bodies toward it : because there is not in that voidnesse any puissance attractive of bodies; nor yet within the same bodies, any deliberation or inclination and affection to tend from all fides to this middle. But no less impossible is it to apprehend, that of bodies having no foul any should move of themselves to an incorporali place, and having no difference of fituation; than it is that the fame should draw them or give them any motion having no difference or incuration; that this middle ought to be underflood not locally but cor-porally, that is to fay not in regard of place, but of body. For, feeing this world it an union, or maffe compounded of many bodies different and unlike conjoined together; it must need be, that their diversities engender motions different and unlike conjoined together; it must need be, that this, that every of the 6 bodies changing tubstance, change their place also withall. For the subtili-zation and carefaction distributes thround about the matter which a field from the midst and ascendesh on high: contraristic, condensation and construction depressed and driveth it. downward to the ording a contrative, condemation and comparion apprenting and criveth it downward to the middle. But of this point, we need not diffeourle any more in this place. For what cause for every man shall suppose to produce such passions and mutations, the same shall contain in it is severall world; for that each of them hath an earth and sea of the own), each one hath ser own proper middle, ar also passions and alternations for bodies, see section that her own proper middle, ar also maintaineth every one in their place and being. For that which is without, whether it have nothing at all, or elle an infinite voidneffe, middle can it afford none, as we have faid before : Bit there being many worlds, each of them hath a proper middle a parts in fach fort, as in every one there shall be mo-tions proper unto bodies, fome falling down to the mids, others mounting aloft from the mids, others moving round about the midfl, according as they themselves do diffinguish motions. And hee who would have; that there being many middles; weightly bodies from all parts shoutdrend unto one alone; many very well be compared unto him, who would have the blodd of many mid to run from all parts into one vein; likewife that all their brains should be contained within one and the same mentbrin'or pannicle; supposing it a great inconvenience and absurdity, it of natural brodges all that are folid be not in one and the same place; and the rare also in another. Absurd is he that thus saith; and no leffe soolid were the other, who thinketh much and is offended, if the whole should have all pirte, in their order, range and situation traturall. For it were a very groffe absurdity for a man to lays there were a world; which had the Moon in it fo fituate, as if a man should carry his brain in his heeles, and his heare in the temples of his head : but there were no abfurdity nor inconvenience ; if in letting down many diffinct worlds and those separate one from another, a man should diffing if h with all and Gifferate their parts. For inverty of them, the earth, the feat and the skie, full be for placed and flustein their natural feats, as it inverted and spectained: and each of those world full have firesten, afterious, circular, and a centre fir the midfl; not in regard of a field they world not of that which is without, but in it felf and in refiget of it felf. And as (b) the fippolision which for this world, it without the world, it cannot be imagined how possibly it? Hould either felf or move? I for how can it. hang fill, feeing is is ponderous and weighty? or more toward the midft of the world a willier heavy bodies confidering is is neither part of its nor counted in the fubilistic effects?

Asconcerning that earth which is contained in another world and fall bound, we need not to make doubt and question, how it should not fall down hither by reason of the weight, nor be plucked away from the whole; seeing as we do, that it hath a naturall strength to contain every part thereof. For if we shall take high and low, not within and in respect of the world, but without forth, we shall be driven unto the same difficulties and diffresses, which Epicurus is fallen into, who maketh his little Atomes or indivisible bodies to move and tend toward those places which are under foot : as if either his voidnesse had seet, or the infinity which he speaketh of, permit a man to imagine either high or low. And therefore some cause there is to marvell at Chrysippus, or rather to enquire and demand what fansie hath come into his head, and moved him to fay, that this world is feated and placed directly in the midfl;& that the fubftance thereof, from all eternity having taken up and occupied the place of the midfl, yet nevertheleffe it is fo compact and tied together that it endureth alwayes, and is (as one would fay) immortalized : for fo much hath he written in his fourth Book et sware, that is to fay, wound say) inmost action (to no purpose) of a middle place in that wast emptiness: and yet more abfurdly attributing unto that middle (which is not, nor bath any substitence) the cause of the worlds continuance and flability; especially having written thus much many times in other places, that the fubliance is governed and maintained partly by the motions tending to the widfl, and partly by others from the midft of it. As for other oppositions besides, that the Stoicks make, who is there that fear-eth them? as namely, when they demand, How it is possible to maintain one fatall necessity, and one divine providence? and how it can otherwise be, but that there should be many DIES and ZENES, that is say, Joves and Jupiters, if we grant that there be many worlds: For to begin withall, if it be tout is say, journal of the many fuch Joves and Jupiters, their opinions verily be far more abfurd: an inconvenience, to allow many fuch Joves and Jupiters, their opinions verily be far more abfurd: for they devife an infinit fort of Suns, Moons, Apollosi, Dianes and Neptunes, in innumerable convertions and revolutions of worlds. Moreover, what necessity is there, to enforce us to avow many Jupiters, if there be many worlds? and not rather, in every of them a feverall god, as a foveraign governor and ruler of the whole, furnished with all understanding and reason, as he whom we surname the Lord and Father of all things? Or what should hinder, but that all worlds might be subject to the providence and deftiny of fupiter: and he reciprocally have an eye to overfee all, to direct, digest and conduct all, in ministring unto them the principles, beginnings, feeds and reasons of all things that are done and made? For it being so that we do see even here many times, a body composed of many o-ther diffine bodies; as for example, the affembly or congregation of a City, an Army, and a daunce; in every one of which bodies there is life, prudence, and intelligence, as Chrystpus thinketh impossible it is not likewise, that in this universall nature, there should be ten, lifty, yea and a hundred worlds, ufing all one and the same reason, and sorrespondent to one reginning. But contrariwise, this order and disposition is best beseeming the gods. For we ought not to make the gods like unto the Kings of a fwarm of Bees, which go not forth, but keep within the hive 3, nor to hold them enclosed and imprisoned (as it were) rather, and shue up fast within Matter, as these men do, who would have the gods prinoned an weet returns and interest and supposing them to be powers of waters and of fire to be certain habitudes or dispositions of the airs and supposing them to be powers of waters and of fire instituted and mixed within, make them to artic and be engendized together with the world, and so afterwards, to be burnt likewise withit, not allowing them to be loose and at liberty, like as Coatchmen and Pilots are ; but in manner of Statues or Images are fet fast unto their Bases with Nailes, and fodered with Lead : even fo they enclose the gods within bodily matter, and pin them hard thereto; tout to with Lead . even to they entire the goal which to only instead, and put that had territory, fo as being joynted (as it were) fore unto it, they participate there with all changes and alterations, even to finall corruption and diffolution. Yet is this opinion and more grave, religious and magnificent, in my conceit: to hold that the gods be of themselves free, and without all command of any other power. And like as the fity light Caffor and Pollux succour those who are toffed in a tempel, and by their comming and prefence,

and not failing themfelves, nor partaking the fame perils with the Mariners, but onely appearing in the air above, fave those that were in danger, a even so the gods for their pleasure go from one world to another, to visite them; and together with nature, rule and govern every one of them. Fog spater verily in Homer, cast not, his eyes far from the City of Troy, either into Thraciae, or the Nomades and vagrant Scythians along the river Her or Danabe: but the true Inpiter indeed hath many fair passages beforeining his Majelty out of one world into another, neither looking into the infinit voidnesse without, nor beholding himself and puthing else, as some have thought; but considering the deeds of men and of gods, the motions also and resploitions of the State in their spazes. For surely, the Deity is not offended with variety, nor hatechmutacious: but saketh much pleasure therein, as a man may guestle by the circuitions, conventions and changes which appear in the heaven. I conclude therefore, that the infinity of worlds is a very insplection and false conceit, such as in no wife will bear and admit any god, but employeth fortune and chance in the managing of all things; but sontrariwise, the administration & providence of a gertain quantity and determinate number of worlds, fermeth unto me neither by majestly and worthinesse inferior a nor fur ravell more, laborious, than that which is employed and refusioned to the direction of one alone; which is transformed, senewed & metamorphozed (as it were) an infinit ore of times. After I haddelivered this speech, I pauled and hely my pace. Then Philippersu. making no long stay 2. A for mig. I will not greatly five nor stand upon it (quoth he) whether the truth be soon characters.

dance of one onely world, how is it, that we make him to be Creator of five worlds, neither more nor left? and what the peculiar and speciall reason is of this number to a plurality of worlds, rather than of any other, I would more willingly know, than the occasion or cause, why this Mot [E1] is so consecrated in this Temple. For it is neither a triangular, nor a quadrar, nor a perfect, no yet a cubique number: neither seemeth it to represent any other elegancy unto those, who love and effects such the culations as a these.

And as for the Argument inferred from the number of Elements, which Plate himfelf obscurely and under covert tearms touched, it is very hard to comprehend; neither doth it carry and thew any probability, whereby he should be induced to conclude, and draw in a consequence: that like it is confidering in matter there be ingendered five forts of regular bodies, having equall angles, equal fides, and environed with equall (uperficies; there should semblably of these five bodies, be five worlds made and formed, from the very first beginning. And yet (qnoth I) it should seem that Theodorus the Soliane expounding the Mathematick of Plato, handled this matter not amiff., nor mifinterpreteth the place; and thus goeth he to work : The Pyramis, Octa dron, Dodecaedron, and Icolaedron (which Plato fetteth down for the first Bodies) are right beautifull all, both for their proportions, and also for their equalities: neither is there left for nature any other, to devife & form better than they, or indeed answerable and like unto them. Howbeit they have not all either the same constitution, nor the like original : for the least verily and smallest of the five is the Pyramis; the greatest and that which consistent of most parts, is Dodcaadron; and of the other two behind, the Icosaedron is bigger by two fold and more, than Octaedron, if you compare their number of triangles. And therefore impossible it is, that they should be all made at once of one and the same matter; for the small and subtile and such as in composition are more simple than the rest, were more pliable no doubt, & obedient unto the hand of workmen. who moved and formed the matter, and therefore by all confequence fooner made and broughs into subsistence, than those which had more parts and a greater mass; of bodies: of which, and namely of fuch as had more labourious making, and a bufier composition, is Dodecaedron. Whereupon it falleth necessarily, that Pyramis onely was the first body: and not any of the other, as being by nature created and produced afterwards. But the remedy and means to falve and avoid this abfurdity alfo, is to feparate and divide the matter into five worlds: for here the Pyramis came forth first; there the Ocasedron, and elfewhere the Icolaedron; and in every of these worlds, out of that which came first into effe, the reft drew their originall, by the concretion of parts, which caufeth them all to change into all, according as Plate doth infinuate, diffeouring by examples in manner throughout all; but it thall suffice us briefly to learn thus much. For Air is ingendered by the extinction of Fire: and the same again being subtilized and rarefied, produceth Fire. Now in the feeds of these two, a man may know their passions, and the transmuations of all. The seminary or beginning of Fire is the Pyramis, compoled of four and twenty first triangles, but the leminary of the Air is Octaedron, confishing of triangles of the same kinde, in number forty eight. And thus the one Element of Air, standeth upon two of Fire, composed and conjoyned together: and again, one Body or Element of the Air, is divided and parted into twain of fire: which becomming to be thickned and conflipate more fill in it felf, turneth into the form of Water; in fuch fort as throughout, that which cometh first into light, giveth alwaics a ready and case generation unto all the rest, by way of change and transmittation: and so, that never remaineth folitary and alone which is first; but as one mass, and constitution hath the primitive and antecedent motion in another of originall beginning: so in all there is kept one name and denomination. Now furely (quoth Ammonius) it is floutly done of Theodorus, and he hath quit himfelf very well, in fetching about this matter fo indultrioully. But I would much marvell if these presuppofitions of his making, do not overthrow and refute one another: for he would have, that these five worlds were not composed all at once together; but that the smallest and most subtile which required least workmanship in the making, came forth first: then as a thing consequent, and not repugnant as all, he supposeth that the matter doth not thrust forth alwaier, into effence, that which is most subtile and simple; but that otherwhiles the thickest, the most groff, and heaviest parts, shew first in generation. But over and besides all this, after a supposal made, there be five primitive Bodies or Elements. and confequently thereupon five Worlds; he applyeth not his truth and probability but unto four only For as touching the Cube, he subtracteth and remove this quite away, as they do who play at nine holes, and who trundle little round ftones: for that fuch a square and quadrat body every way is first turally unfit, either to turn into them, or to yeeld them any means to turn unto it, for that the indicate angles of which they be composed, are not of the same kinde: for all the rest do in a common consist of a demi-triangle, as the base; but the proper subject whereof this Cube particularly standethe is the triangle Hoccees, which admitteth no inclination unto a demi-triangle, nor pullibly can be concorporate or united to it. Now if it be fo, that of those five Bodies there be consequently five Worlds, and that in each one of those Worlds the beginning of their generation and conflicutions is that Body which is first produced and brought to light; it would come to passe, that where the Cubo cometh forth first for the generation of the rest, none of the other Bodies can possibly be there for a smuch as the nature of it is not to turn or change into any one of them. For I let paffe here to allege, that the Element or principle whereof Dodecaedron is composed, is not that triangle wich is called Scalenon, with three unequall fides, but some other as they say, however Plato bath made his Pyramis, Octaedron, and Icosaedron of it: And therefore (quoth Ammenius, Imiling thereat) either you mult diffolve these objections, or else allege some new matter as touching the question now presently in hand. Then answered I: For mine own part allege I am not able at this time any thing that carrieth more probability: but peradventure it were better for a man to yeeld reasons of his own opinion rather, than of anothers. To begin again therefore I say, that nature being parted and divided at the first in two parts, the one sensible, murable, subject to generation and corruption, and variety every way; the other spirituall and intelligible, and continuing evermore in one and the ann vartety every many; the definition of the state of th choler and anger, if a man allow not the passible and corporall nature wholly united and concorporate in it felf, without dividing or separating it into many parts. For more meet it were yet, and reasonable, that natures permanent and divine should cohere unto themselves inseparably, and avoid as much as is possible all distraction and divulsion: and yet this force and power of The Other, medling also even with these, causeth in spiritual and intellectuall things, greater difficiations and dissinisting form and effectively reason, than are the locall distances in those corporall natures. And theriore Plate confuting those who hold this position, that all is one, affirmeth these five grounds and principles of all, to wit, Effence and Being, The Same, The Other, and after all, Motion, and Station. Admit these five, no marvail is it, if nature of those five bodily Elements hath framed proper figures and reprefentations for every one of them, not fimple and pure, but fo, as every one of them is most participant of each of those properties and puissances. For, plain and evident it is that the Cube is most meet and fortible unto flation and repose, in regard of the stability and stedy firmitudes of those broad and flat faces which it hath. As for the Pyramis, who feeth not and acknowledgeth not incontinently and the nature of fire, ever moving in those long and flender fides and fharp angles that it hath? Also the nature of Dodecaedron apt to comprehend all other figures, may seem properly to be the image representing Ens , or That which is , in respect of corporall effence. Of the other twain, Icofaedron resembleth The Other, Or Diverse: but Octaedron, hath a principle reserence to the form of The Same. And so by this reckoning, the one of them produceth forth Air, capable of all substance in one form; and the one other exhibited unto us Water, which by temperature may turn into all forts of qualities. Now if so be that nature requireth in all things and throughout all, an equal and uniform distribution, very probable it is, that there be also five worlds, and neither more nor fewer, than there be moulds or patterns: to the end that each example or pattern may hold the first place and principall puissance ineach world, like as they have in the first constitution and composition of bodies. And this may fland in some fore for an Answer, and to satisfic him who marvaileth, how we divide that nature which is subject to generation and alteration, into so many kinds; but yet I beseech you, consider and weigh with men more diligently this argument. Certain it is , that of those two first and supream principles, I mean Unity, and Binary, or Duality; this latter being the Element and originall primative of all deformity, disorder and confusion, is called Infinity: but contrariwise the nature of Unity, determining and limiting the void infinity, which bath no proportion nor termina-tion, reduceth it into a good form, and maketh it in some fortcapable and apt to receive a denomination, which alwaies accompanieth sensible things. And verily these two generall principles shew themselves; first in number, or rather indeed to speak generally, no multitude is called number, until fuch time as Unity coming to be imprinted as the form in matter, cutteth off from indeterminate infinity, that wich is superfluous, here more and there lesse; for then each multitude becommeth and is made mumber, when as it is once determined and limited by Unity: but if a man take Unity away, then the indefinity and indeterminate Duality, coming again in place to confoundall, maketh it to be without Order, without Grace, without Number, and without Measure. Now considering it is fo, that the form is not the destruction of matter, but rather the Figure Ornament and Order thereof; it must needs be, that both these principles are within number, from which proceedeth the chief dissimilitude and greatest difference. For the indefinite and indeterminate principles, to wit, Quality, is the author and cause of the even number : but better, to wir Unity, is the Father (at one would fay) of the odd number; fo as the first even number is two, and the first odd number three, of which is compounded five, by conjunction common to both, but in the own puiffance odd. For it behoved and necessary it was, in as much as that which is corporall and sensible for composition fake, is divided into many parts by the power and force of The Other, that is to fay, of Divertity, that it should be neither the first even numbers nor yet the first uneven or odd, but a third consisting of both: to the end that it might be procreate of both principles, to wit, of that which ingendreth the even number, and of that which produceth the odd; for it could not be, that the one should be parted from the other, because that both of them have the nature and puissance of a principle. These two principles then being conjoinst together, the better being the mightier, is opposed unto the indeterminate infinity, which divideth the corporall nature; and fo the matter being divided, the Unity interpoling it felf between, impeacheth the univerfall nature, that it was not divided and parted into two equal portions: but there was a plurality of worlds caufed by The Other, that is to fay, by Diversity, and difference of that which is infinite and determinate; but this plurality was brought into an odd and uneven number, by the vertue and puissance of The Same, and that which finite, because the better principle suffered not nature to extend farther than was expedient. For if one had been pure and simple without mixture, the matter should have had no separation agail; but in as much as it was mixed with Duality, which is a divisive nature, it hath received indeed and suffered by this means separation and division : howbeit, stayed it hash in good time, because the odde was the matter and tuperiour over the even. This was the reason that our ancients in old time were wont to use the verb Pempaseithais when they would fignific to number or to reckon : And I think verily that this word and that is to fay, All, was derived of Pente, that is to fay, Five, and not without good reason, because that five is compounded of the two first numbers; and when other numbers afterwards be multiplied by others, they produce divers numbers: whereas five if it be multiplied by an even number and doubled, bringeth forth Ten , a perfect number ; but if by the odde, it representeth it felf again. Here I omit to fave that it is composed of the two first quadrate numbers, to wit of Unity and Four ; and that it is the first number which is equivalent to the two before it, in such fort as it compoundeth the sairest triannet training age of those that have right angles, and is the first number that containets the fedural teral proportion. For happy these reasons be not well suitable nor proper unto the discourse of this present matter; but this rather is more convenient to allege, that in this number, there is a naturall vertue and faculty of dividing, and that nature dividerh many things by this number. For even in our own felves she hath placed five exterior fentes, as also five parts of the foul, to wit, naturall, fentitive, concupifcible, iralcible, and reasonable : likewise somany fingers in either hand. Also the genitall seed is at the most distributed into five portions : for in no History is it found written, that a woman was delivered of more than five Children at one birth. The Egyptians also in their Fables do report, that the goddeffe Rhes brought forth five gods and goddeffes : fignifying hereby under covert words, that of one and the same matter five worlds were procreated. Come to the universall fabrick and frame of nature, the earth is divided into five zones : the Heaven also in five Circles, two Arctiques, two Tropicks, and one Equinoctiall in the midft. Moreover five revolutions there be of the Planets or wandring Stars : for that the Sun, Venus, and Mercury run together in one race. Furthermore the very world it felf is composed harmonically respective to five. Like as even among us our musicall accord and concent conflict of the politure of five tetrachords, ranged orderly one after another, to wit, of Hypates, Mcles, Synnemenz, Diezeugmenz, and Hyperbolizze likewife. The intervals likewife in Song which we use, be five in number, Dress, Semitonion, Tonus, Triemitonion, and Dittonon. So as, it feemeth that nature taketh more pleasure in making all things according to the number of five, than after a Spl zericall or round form ; as Ariftotle writeth. But what is the cause will some one fay, that Plato hath reduced the number of five worlds to the five primitive figures of regular bodies. faying, that God in ordaining and describing the whole world used the Quinary construction? and yet aherwards having proposed the doubtfull question of the number of worlds (to wit, whether we should hold, there was but one, or rather that there were five in truth?) he sheweth plainly that his conjecture is grounded upon this very argument. If therefore we ought to apply the probability to his mind and opinion, then of necessity with the diversity of these figures and bodies there must ensue prefernly a difference also of motions, according as he himself teacheth, affirming: Whatsoever is subtilized or thickned, with the alteration of substance, changeth withall the place. For so, if of the air is ingendred fire, namely when the Octaedron is diffolved and parted into Pyramides : and contrariwise air of fire being driven close and thrust together into the force of octaedron : it is not possible that it should be in the place where it was afore, but flie and run into another, as being forced and driven out of the former, and so fight against what soever standeth in the way and maketh resistance. And yet more fully and evidently declareth he the same by a similitude and example of such things, as by fans or fuch like instruments whereby Corn is cleanfed and shaken our, or winowed and tryed from the reft : faying, that even so the elements shaking the matter, and likewise shaken by it, went alwayes to bring like to like, and some took up this place, others that, before the universall world was of them composed as now it is. The generall matter therefore being in such estate then (as by good likelihood All must needs be where god is away) presently the first five qualities, or rather the first five bodies, having every one of them their proper inclinations and peculiar motions, went apart: not wholly and altogether, nor severed sincerely asunder one from another, for that when all was hudl d pel-mell consuffelly, such as were surmounted and vanquished, went evermore even against their nature with the mightier and those which Conquered. And therefore when some were haled one way, and others carried another way, it hapned that they made as many portions and diffinctions in number, just as there were divers kindes of those first bodies : the one of fire, and yet the fame not pure, but carrying the form of fire : another of a celestiall nature, not sincere heaven indeed, but flanding much of the sky : a third of earth, and yet not fimply and wholly earth, but rather earthly. But principally, there was a communication of air and water, as we have faid heretofore, for that these went their wayes filled with many divers kinds. For it was not God who feparated and disposed the substance, but having found it for ashly and consusedly dissipated of it fells and each part carried diversly in so great disorder, he digested and arranged it by Symmetry and competent proportion. Then, after he had fet over every one, Reason as a guardian and governess, he made as many worlds as there were kinds of those first bodies subsistent. And thus let this discourse for Ammonius fake, be dedicated as it were to the grace and favour of Plato. For mine own part, I will never stand for precifely upon this number of worlds:marry of this mind I am rather, that their opinion who hold that there be more worlds than one (howbeit not infinit but determinate) is not more abfurd than either of the other, but founded upon as much reason as they : seeing as I do, that Matter of the own nature is spred and diffused into many parts, not refting in one, and yet not permitted by reason, to run in infimitum. And therefore, especially here (if else where) putting our selves in mind of the Academy and the precepts thereof, let us not be over-credulous, but as in a flippery place reftrain our affent and belief: onely in this point of infinity of worlds, let us stand firm and see we fall not, but keep our selven upright. When I had delivered these reasons abovesaid: Believe me (quoth Demetrius) Lamprias glaveth us a good and wife admonition, For

as Euripides faith: but of their deeds and works, when we prefume and dare pronounce of fo high and great matters, as it we knew them certainly. But as the man himself faid even now, we must recall our speech unto the argument which was first proposed. For that which heretofore hath been faid, namely that the Oracles are become mute, and lye fill without any validity, because the Dæmons which were wont to govern them, be retired and gone, like as Instruments of Musick yield no sound and harmony when the Musicians handle them not: this (1 say) giveth occasion to move another question of greater importance, as touching the cause and power, by which the Dæmons use to make their Prophets and Prophetesses to be ravished with an Enthusiasm or divine Fury, and full of santaficall Visions. For it is to no purpose to say, that the Oracles are filent, because they be abandoned and forsaken of the Dæmons 3 unlesses when the Oracles are filent, because they be abandoned and forsaken of the Dæmons 3 unlesses when the Oracles are filent, because they be abandoned and they set them a work, and cause that no speak and prophesie. Then Ammonius taking his turn to speak as Think you (quoth he) that these Dæmons be called any thing else,

Than spirits clad with substance of the air, Which walk about the earth, now here now there, as faith Heffodus? For it seemeth unto me, that look how one man differeth from another, playing either in a Comedy or a Tragedy: the same difference sheweth in the foul, which is arrayed and clothed within a body during this life. There is nothing therefore herein, either strange or without apparence of reason, if soules meeting with other souls, imprint in them Visions and Fansies of sure things: like as we also shew many accidents done and past, yea and foretell and prognosticate of such as are to come, not all by lively voyce, but some by Letters and Writings, nay by touching onely and the regard of the eye; unlesse peradventure, you have somewhat else (ô Lamprias) to say against this. For it was not long fince told us, that you had much disputation and conference with certain straners in Lebadia; but he who related this news unto us, could not call exactly to mind what talk paffed between you. Mirvell not thereat (quoth 1:) for many affairs and occurrents fell out at once between, by occasion that the Oracle was open, and a facrifice folemnized, which caused our speeches to be dispersed, distracted and scattered disordily. But now (quoth Ammonius) your Auditors be at good leasure, willing also to ask questions and to learn, not delirous to contest and contradict in a litigious and quarrelfome humor; before whom you may have good leave to speak what you will, and for that liberty of speech have pardon at their hands and be held excused, as you see. Now when the rest of the company invited and exhorted me likewise, after some pause made and silence for a while, I began again in this manner: Certes (quoth I,) O Ammonias, it fortuned fo, I wot not how, that even your felf gave the overture and first occasion of those discourses which then and there were held. For if Damons be spirits and souls separate from bodies, and having no fellowship with them (as your self faid, following herein the divine Poet Hefiodus, who calleth them,

why deprive we those spirits and souls which are within the bodies, of this same puissance, whereby the Damons are able to foresee and foresell things to come? For it is not like, that the souls acquired any new propriety or power, when they have abandoned the bodics, wherewith they were not endued before: but think we must that they had the same parts and faculties alwayes, although worse I must needs fay, when they be mix d with bodies. And some of them verily appear not at all, but be hidden: others are but obscure and seeble, such as heavily and flowly perform their operations (much like unto those who see through a thick mist, or move in some moist and waterish substance) desiring greatly to be cured, and to recover that faculty which is their own : to be discharged also and cleaned of that which hindreth and defraudeth them of it. For the foul, even while it is bound and tyed to the body, hath indeed a power to foresee and know future things: but blinded it is with the terrestrial mixture of corporall substance; for that, like as the Sun becommeth not then to be cleer, and not afore, when he is past the clouds; but being of himself alwayes shining, he seemeth unto us dark and troubled through a mift : even so the soul, getteth not then a new power of divination and prophecie, when the departeth out of the body, as if the were escaped out of a cloud; but having the same before, is dimused and obscured by the commixtion and consuston with that which is mortall and corruptible. Neither ought we to make a wonder hereat, and think it incredible, feeing as we do (if there were nothing else in the soul) how that faculty which we call Memory, is equipollent and answerable in an opposit respect unto the puissance of divination; and considering the great effect thereof, in preferving and keeping things path, or rather indeed keeping them whiles they be. For to fay truly, of that which is once passed nothing remaineth nor subfifteth in esse, were they actions, words, or passions: for all things be transitory and passe away as soon as they are, because time, in manner of a current or fream, carrieth all away before it: but this memorative faculty of the foul catching hold thereof I know not how, and flaying it for slipping away, giveth an imagination of effence and being, to those things, which in truth are not. For the Oracle verily which was given to the Theffalians as touching the City Atras, willed them to utter and speak

But memory is unto us the hearing of the deaf, and the fight likewife of the blinde; in fuch fort, as no marvel is in (as I have already faid) if our foul in retaining fill things which are no more, doth anticlear many of those allo, which are not yet. And faich objects indeed concern it rather, and therewith is it affected more. For the bendeth and inclineth towards things that are to come: whereas of fuch as be already paft and come to their end, the is freed and delivered, but only that the remembersh them. Our fouls then having this puiffance in them inbred and natural, though feeble, obscure, and hardly able to expresse and represent their imaginations; yet neverthelesse fome of them shew and put them forth many times in dreams, and in certain facred ceremonies and mysferies; namely, when the body is well purified, or receiveth a fit emperature therefore, or else for that reasonable, and speculative faculty being then freed from the cares of things present, joyneth with the unreasonable and imaginative part, and turneth it to think upon the future. For I approve not that which Euripides skith:

but he verily who is directed by the reasonable and intelligent part of the soul, and solloweth the conduct and leading thereof by all probability. Now that power or faculty of Divination (like unto a pair of blank writing Tables, wherein there is nothing written) void of reason, and not determinate of it self, but only apt and meet to receive fansies, affections, and presentions, without any discourse of reason, or ratiocination, hitteth upon that which is to come, at what time as it is most removed from that which is prefent; and in this extalle is it transmuted, by a certain temperature and disposition of the body, which we call Enthusias or inspiration. Now such a disposition as this, many times the body of it self hath; but the Earth putteth forth and yiedeth unto men the sources and sountains of many other powers and faculties: fome of which transport them out of their wits, bringing maladies, contagions, and mortalities: others again be formetime good, kinde, and profusels, as they know full well who make experience thereof. But this fpring, this winde, or Prophetical spirit of Divination, is most Divine and holy, whether it arise and breath up alone by it self through the Air, or be drawn up with some liquid humour. For coming once to be infused and mixed within the body, it causeth a strange temperature and unusal disposition in the souls: the property whereof, a right hard matter it is to declare exactly, and expresse certainly; but a man in reason may attain thereto by conjecture fundry waies: for by heat and dilatation, it openeth (I wot not what) little holes, by which in all likelihood the imaginative faculty is fet on work about future things; much like as wine which working and boiling in the body fumeth up, and among others motions, it revealeth and discovereth many hidden fecters. For the fury of Bacchus and of drunkennesse, if we may believe Euripides, containeth much Divination : when the foul being enchafed and enflamed, expelleth all fear, which humane wifedom bringeth in, and by that means many times averteth, and quencheth the Divine infoiration. And here-withall a man may allege very well, and not without great reason, that sicetty coming intermingled with heat, subtilizeth the spirit, and maketh it pure, and of the nature of fire (for according to Heraclius, the foul it felf is of a dry conflitution :) whereas humidity doth not only dim the fight, and dull the hearing, but also being mingled with the air, and touching the superficies of mirrours, dusketh the brightnesse of the one, and taketh away the light of the other. On the contrary side, it is not impossible that by some refrigeration and condensation of this spirit, after the manner of the tincture and hardness of iron, this part of the foul which doth prognosticate, should see it felf and get a pertect edge. And like as Tinne being melted with Brasse (which of it felf-is a metal in the Orr, rare, spongtous, and full of little holes) doth drive it neerer, and maketh it more massic and solid, and withall, caufeth it to look more bright and resplendent : even so, I see no inconvenience to hinder, but that this Prophetical exhalation having some congruence and affinity with the souls, should fill up that which is laxand empty, and drive it close together more inwardly. For many things there be, that have a re-ference and congruity one unto the other: thus the Bean is fortable unto the purple dye; Sal nitre likewife helpeth much the tindure of a rich fearlet or crimfon colour, if it be mixed therewith, according also as Empedocles said:

And with the flower of Saffron red, Fine Flax and Silk are coloured.

And we have heard you freak (good friend Demerius) of the River Cydnus, and the facred cutting Knife of Apollo in Tarfus; and namely, how the faid River only clenfeth that Iron whereof the Knife is made, neither is there any other water in the World able to foour that Knife I like as in the City O-lympia, they temper the affies that comesh of the facrifices, with the water of the River Alphrus, and make thereof a mortar, wherewith they palifter the Alart there; but if they affay to do it with the water of any other River elfe, it will not flick to, nor binde one jot. No marvet therefore it is, if the Earnh fending up out of it many exhalations, these only are found to transport the fouls with an Enthuliasm or Divine fury, and represent the imaginations and fansies of future things. But without all question and contradition, the report that goeth of the Oracle in this place, accordeth well to this purpote. For it is faid, that this Prophetical and Divining power here, thewed it falf first, by occasion of a certain ror its tails that the changed here to fall; who thereupon began to cast forth certain fanatical cries and voices, as if he had been possessed with such a Divine inspiration. Whereof the neighbours and those that came about him, at first made no account; but afterwards, when they saw that it fell out so indeed. as he had foretold, they had the man in great admiration: and the greatest Clarks and Wifest men of all the Delphians, calling to remembrance his name, gave out that it was Coretas. So that, it feemeth to me, that the foul admitteth this temperature and mixtion with this Prophesical Spirit, as the fight of the eye is affected with the light. For albeit the eye hath naturally a property and power to fee, yet the same is not effectual without the light : even so the soul having this puissance and faculty, to foresee future things, like unto the eye had need of some proper and convenient thing to kindle it as it were, and fet an edge upon it. And hereupon it is, that many of our ancients have thought Apollo, and the Sun, to be one and the famegod. They also who know what this beautiful and wife proportion is, and withall do honor it: look what reference or respect there is of the body to the foul, of the fight to light, and of the * understanding to the truth ; the fame force and power they effeemed there is of the derstand. Suns power unto the nature of Apollo: saying, that he is the iffue and geniture proceeding from Apollo who is eternal, and who continually bringeth him forth. For like as the one kindles, bringeth forth and flirteth up the visual power and vertue of the sense : even so doth the other by the Prophetical vertue of the foul. They therefore who thought that it was one and the felf-same god, by good right dedicated and confecrated this Oracle unto Apollo, and unto the Earth : judging, that the Sun it was which wrought that temperature, and imprinted this disposition in the Earth, whereof arose this Prophetical evaporation. And verily as Hefiodus upon good confideration, and with much more reason than fome Philosophers, called the Earth,

The ground-work fure Of all nature:

even to we deem it to be eternal, immortal, and incorruptible : marry of the vertues and faculties which are in it, we hold that fome fail in one place, and others breed a new and engender in another: and great probability there is, that there be transmutations and changes, from one place to another, and that fuch revolutions as thele, in the course and processe of long time, turn and return circularly often in it; as a man may conjecture, and certainly collect by such things as manifestly do appear. For in divers and fundry Countries, we fee that Lakes and whole Rivers, yea and many more Fountainer and Springs of hot waters, have failed and been quite loft, as being fled out of our fight, and hidden within the Earth; but afterwards in the very fame places they have in time shewed themselves again, or elfe run hard by. And of metal Mines, we know that some have been spent clean and emptied. as namely, those of Silver about the Territory of Attica : semblably the veines of Braffe Oar in Eu-424, out of which they forged fometime the best Swords, that were hardned with the tincure of cold water ; according to which the Poet Asfchylus faid ;

He took in hand the keen and douty blade, Which of Eubean feel fometime was made.

The Rock also and Quarry in Caryilia, it is not long fince it gave over to bring forth certain ball or bostoms of fost stone, which they use to spin and draw into thread, in manner of Flax : for I suppose that some of you have seen Towels, Napkin, Nets, Caules, Kerchiefes and Coiles woven of such thread, which would not burn and confume in the fire, but when they were foul and foiled with occupying folkflung them into the fire, and took them forth again clean and fair : but now all this its quite gone, and hardly within the faid delf shall a man meet with fome few hairy threads of that matsets running here and there among the hard flones digged out from thence. Now of all these things driftotle and his Sectaries hold : That an exhalation within the Earth, is the only efficient caufe, with which of necessity such effects must fail and passe from place to place; as also otherwhiles, tried again therewith. Semblably are we to think of the spirin and exhalations Prophetical which iffue our of the Earth ; namely, that they have not a nature immortal, and fuch as cannot age or want old, but subject to change and alteration. For probable it is, that the great glutter of Rain and extraordinary flouds, have extinguished them quite, and that by the terrible fall of Thunder-boules the places were finiteen, and they with all diffinated and dispatched; but principally, when the ground hath both linker with Earthquakes, and thereupon settled downward and salten in, with trouble and consussion of whatfoever was below; it cannot chuse but such exhalations contained within the hollow caves of the Earth, either changed their place and were driven forth, or utterly were ftifled and choaked. And to in this place also, their remained and appeared some tokens of that great Earth quake, which overthrew the City and staied the Oracle here : like as, by report in the City Orchomenos, there was a Plague which fwept away a number of people; and therewith the Oracle of Tirefias the Prophet, failed for ever, and to continue that this day mute and to no effect. And whether the like befell unto the Oracks which were wone to be in Cilicia, at we hear fay, not man can more certainly enform us than you Demermin Then Demetrius .: How things fland now at this prefent, I wot not; for I have been a Traveller and out of my native Country a long time, as ye all know : but when I was in those parts, both that of Mopfus, and also the other of Amphilochus, flourified and were in great request. And as for the Oracle of Mosfus, I am able to make report unto you of a most strange and wonderful event thereof, for that I was my self present. The Governour of Cilicia is of himself doubtful and wavering, whether there be gods or no? upon infirmity, as I take it, of miscredance and unbelief (for otherwise he was a naughty man, a violent oppressour, and scorner of religion.) But having about him certain Epicureans, who flanding much upon this their goodly and beautiful Physiology for footh (as they term it) or else all were marred, scoff at such things; he sent one of his affranchised or freed servants unto the Ocacle of Moplus indeed, howbeit, making semblance as if he were an espial, to discover the Camp of of his Enemies : he fent him(I fay) with a letter furely fealed, wherein he had written without the privity of any person whatsoever, a question or demaund to be presented unto the Oracle. This messenger, after the order and custom of the place, remaining all night within the Sanctuary of the Temple, sell there affeep, and rehearfed the morrow morning what a dream he had; and namely, that he thought he faw a fair and beautiful man to present himself unto him, and say unto him this only word Black, and no more : for presently he went his way out of his fight. Now we that were there, thought this to be a foolish and absurd toy, neither wist we what to make of it. But the Governour aforesaid was much afionied thereat, and being stricken with a great remorfe and prick of conscience, worshipped Moplus, and held his Oracle most venerable; for opening the letter, he shewed publickly the demand contained therein, which went in thesewords: Shall I sacrifice unto thee a white Bull, or a black? informech as the very Epicureans themselves who conversed with him, were much abalted and ashamed. So he offred the facrifice accordingly, and ever afterwards to his dying day honoured Mopfus right devoutly.

Demetrius having thus faid, held his peace: but I defirous to conclude this whole disputation with fome corollary, turned again and cast mine eye upon Philippus and Ammonius who sat together. Now they feemed as if they had formwhat to fpak unto me, and thereupon I flaied my felf again. With that, Ammonius : Philip (quoth he) O Lamprias, hath somwhat yet to say of the question which hath been all this while debated. For he is of opinion, as many others befide him are, that Apillo is no other god than the Sun, but even the very same. But the doubt which I move, is greater and of more important matters. For I wot not how crewhile, in the train of our discourse, we took from the gods all Divination and ascribed the same in plain termes to Damons and Angels: and now we will seem to thrust them out again from hence, and to diffeize them of the Oracle and three-footed Table of which they were possessed; conferring the beginning and principal cause of Prophecie, or rather indeed the very substance and power it felf, upon windes, vapoure, and exhalations. For even those temperatures, hears, tinctures, and confolidations (if I may fo fay) which have been calked of, remove our minde and opinion farther off fill from the gods, and puts into our heads this imagination and conceit of fuch a

The earth must needs bring forth grasse, this is flat, Will she or nill she, and feed my castel fat.

This only is the difference, because he saith not that he sacrificed his beasts unto the gods, but unto himself and his belly, the greatest of all the Damona: but we both sacrifice and also powre forth our prayers unto them, for to have their answer from the Ocacles : and to what purpose I pray you, if it be true, that our own fauls bring with them a Prophetical faculty and vertue of Divination, and the cause which doth excite and actuate the fame, be fome temperature of the air, or stather of winde ! What means then, the facred inflitutions and creations of these religious Prophetesses ordained for the pronouncing of answers ? And what is the reason that they give no answer at all, unlesses the holf or facrifice to be killed, tremble all over even from the very feet, and shake whiles the libarrenes and effutions of hallowed liquors be powred upon it? For it is not enough to wag the head, as other beafts do which are flain for facrifice, but this quaking, paneing and fhivering must be throughcut all the parts of the body, and that with a trembling noise. For if this be wanting, they say the Oracle giveth no answer, neither do they so much as bring in the religious Priestesse Pythia. And yet it were probable that they should both do and think thus, who attribute the greatest part of this Propheticall inspiration, either to God or Damon, But according as you say, there is no reason or likelihood thereof: for the exhalation that arifeth out of the ground, whether the beaft tremble or no, will alwaies if it be present, cause a ravishment and transportation of the spirit, and evermore dispose the foul alike, nor onely of Pythia, but also of any body else that first commeth or is presented. And thereupon it followeth, that a meer folly it is, to employ one filly woman in the Oracle, and to but her to it (poor foul) to be a Votary and live a pure maiden all the daies of her life; fequefired from the company of man. And as for that Coretas, whom the Delphians name to have been the first that chapting to fall into this chink or creweste of the ground, gave the banfel of the vertue and property of the place, in mine opinion he differed nothing at all from other Goatherds, or Shepherds, nor excelled them one whit : at least wife if this be a truth that is reported him, and not a meer fable and vainfiction, at I suppose it is no better. And verily when I consider and discourse in my self, how many good things, this Oracle hath, been canfe of unto the Greeks, as well in their Wars and Martial affairs, as in the foundations of Cities, in diffrences of Famine, and Peffilence; me thinks it were e yety, indignisy and unworthy pars, to attribute the invention, and originall thereof unto meet Fortupe and Chance, and not unto God and Divine Providence. But upon this point, I would galdly, O. Lamprias, (quoth he) have you to dispute and discourse a little how say you Philippus, may it please Zzzz 2

you to have patience the while? Most willingly (quoth Philippus) for my part: and so much I may be bold also to promise in the behalf of all the company, for I fee well that the question by you proposed hath moved them all. And as for my self (quoth 1) O Philippus, it hath not only moved, but also as bash:d and dismaied me, for that in this so notable Assembly and Conference of so many Worthy personages, I may seem above mine age, in bearing my self and taking pride in the probability of my words, to overthrow or to call into question any of those things, which truly have been delivered, or religiously believed as touching God and Divine matters. But fasisfic you I will, and in the defence of my felt produce for my witnesse and advocate both, Plate. For this Philosopher reproved old A-HEXAGORAS, in that being to much addicted too natural causes, and entangled with them 3 following also and pursuing alwaics, that which necessarily is effected in the passions and affections of natural boand purtuing atwares, that which rectainly is directed in the purtuing are done, and difficient cauties, for which and by which, things are done, and those are indeed the better cautes, and principles of greater importance: whereas himself either before, or else most of all other Philosophers hath profecuted them both: attributing unto God the beginning of all mon or an other runotopiers man portection and most accommon of an other runotopiers man portection and most depriving in the mean while the matter of those causes which are things wrought by reason is and not depriving in the mean while the matter of those causes which are necessary unto the work done: but acknowledging herein, that the adorning & dispose of all this World sensible, dependent not upon one simple cause alone, as being pure and uncompound, but was engendred and took Essens; when matter was coupled and conjoyred with reason. That this is 60, do but confider first, the works wrought by the hand of Artisans: as for example, (nos to go farther for the matter) that fame foot here and Bais to much resource, of the flanding Cup, among other ornament and oblations of this Temple (which Herodotus called, Hypecriteridies) this hath for the material cause verily, Fire, Iron, the mollifying by the means of Fire, and the tincture or dipping in water, without which this piece of work could not possibly have been wrought. But the more principal cause and miffresse indeed, which moved all this, and did work by all these, was Art and Reason applied unto the work. And verily we fee that over fuch pieces, whether they be Pictures or other Representations of things, the name of the Artificer and Workman is written, as for example :

This pidure Polygnome drew, of Troy wonlong beforn, Who father had Aglaophon, and was in Thalos born.

And verily he it was indeed anyon fee, who painted she destruction of Troy: but without colours ground, confused and mingled one with another, impossible had it been for him to have exhibited sinh a Picture, so fair and beautiful to the eye as it. If then some one come now and will needs made with the material cause, fearching into the alsewitons and mutations therefor particularizing of Sinopre mixed with Ochre, or Cerusse with black, doth he impair or diminish the glory of the Painter Polycians? He also, who discourseth how Iron is hardned, and by what means mollised: and how being made fost and tender in the fire, it yieldeth and obeyeth them who by beating and knocking drive it out in length and breadth: and afterwards being dipped and plunged into fress was still by the assume that the fire he had the state of the state

Jove is the first, the midst, the last: all things of him depend: By him begin they, and proceed; in him they come to end.

After other necessary and natural causes they never sought farther, nor came neer unito them; which the modern Philosophers who succeeded after them and were named Naturalists, took a contraity course, and turning clean aside from that mole excellent and Divise principle, as Geribed all unto bodies, and it wot not what percussions, mutations and temperatures. And thus it is come to passe, that as well the one fort as the other, are in their opinions desertive and come short of that which they should. For as these either of ignorance know not, or of negligence regard not to set that which they should. For as these either of ignorance know not, or of negligence regard not to set the other before, leave out the material cause, of which; and the informeral means, by which things are tion. But he who first manifelty outched both causes, and coupled with the reason that freely worketh and more this matter which meetifacily is subject and sufferent; he (I say) for hundred and us, answerth all caluminations, and putted by all sufmises and sulptions what forcer. For we between the Divisition either of God, or of reason. Spr as much as we great unto it for the subject matter, the foul of many and and for an instrument and plectre (as is were) to set is awork, we allow a spirit or winde, and an whalation Enthusiaftick. First and formoft, the Earth it is that engendreth fuch exhalations : then, that which giveth unto the Earth all power and vertue of shis temperature and mutation is the Sun, who (as we have learned by tradition from our forefathers) is a god. After this we adjoyn thereto, the Damons as superintendants, overseers and keepers of this temperature (as if it were some Harmony and confonance) who in due and convenient time let down and flack, or elfe fet up and flretch hard the vertue of this exhalation : taking from it otherwhiles the over-active efficacy that it hath to torment the foul and transport it befide it felf: tempering therewith a motive vertue without working any pain, or hurs and damage to them that are inspired and possessed therewith. Wherein me thinks, we do nothing that feemeth either abfurd or impossible : neither in killing facrifices before we come to move the Oracle, and adorning them with Coronets of flowers, and powring upon them facred liquors and libations, do we ought that is contrary to this discourse and opinion of ours. For the Priests and Sacrificers, and who foever have the charge to kill the beaft, and to powre upon it the holy libations of Wine or other liquors; who also observe and consider themotion, trembling and the whole de-Wine or other requors; who are observe an commet themoton, temoring and the whole demeanor thereof, do the fame for no other end or cause but to have a signe, that God giveth car unto their demannd. For necessary is is that the beast faccificed unto the gods be pure, sound, entire, immaculate, and uncorrupt both in soul and body. And verily, for the body is isno hard matter to judge and know the marks: as for the soul they make an experiment, by setting before Bulls, meal; by prefenting unto Swin, cich-peafe: for if shey will not fall to, not taft thereof, it is a certain token that they benot right: For she Goat, cold water is the trial. Now if the beaft make no flow and femblance of being moved or affected, when as the faid water is powred aloft on it, be fure the foul thereof is not disposed as it ought to be by nature.

Now, fay it go for current and be constantly believed, that it is an undoubted and infallible figne, that the God will give answer, when the hoft or facrifice thus drenched doth fir; and contrariwife, that he will not answer, if the beaft quetch not : I fee nothing herein repugnant unto that, which we have before delivered. For every natural power produceth the effect for which it is ordained, better or worfe, according as the time and feafon is more leffe convenient : and probable it is, that God giveth us certain fignes, whereby we may know when the opportunity is paff. For mine own part, I am of this mind, that the very exhalation it felf which arifeth out of the Earth, is not alwaies of the fame fort; but at one time is flack and feeble, at another firetched out and firong. And the argument which maketh me thus to judge, I may eafily confirm and verifie by the testimony of many strangers, and of all those Ministers who serve in the Temple. For the chamber or room, wherein they are set and give attendance who come to demand the answer of the Oracle, is filled thorow (not often, nor at certain set times, but as it falleth ous after some space between) with so fragrant an odour and pleasant breath, as the most pretious Ontments and sweetest Persumes in the World can yield no better. And this arifeth from the Sanctuary and Vault of the Temple, as out of some Source and lively Fountain: and very like it is, that it is heat, or at leastwife some other puissance, that seendeth it forth. Now if peradventure, this may feem unto you not probable nor to found of truth : yet will year leaftwise confesse unto me, that the Propheteffe Pythia hath that part of the foul, unto which this winde or Propheticall spirit approacheth, disposed sometime in this fort and otherwhiles in that, and keepeth not alwaies the same temperature, as in Harmony immutable. For many troubles and passions there be that policife her body, and enter likewife in her foul, fome apparant; but more fecret and unfeen: with which she finding her self seized and replenished, better it were for her not to present and exhibit herselfto this divine inspiration of god, being not altogether clean and pure from all perturbations; like unto an instrument of Musick well set in tune and sounding sweetly, but passinate and out of order, For neither wine doth surprise the drunken man alwaies alike, and as much at one as one time as as another; nor the found of the Flute or Shaulme affecteth after one and the fame fort at all times, him who naturally is given to be foon ravished with divine inspiration : but the same persons are one time more, and another while leffe transported beside themselves; and drunken likewise, more or leffe. The reason is, because in their bodies there is a divers temperature; but principally, in imaginative part of the soul, and which receive the images and fantasses, is possessed by the body, and subject to change with it, as appeareth evidently by dreams: for fometimes there appear many visions and fantica of all forts in our fleeps; otherwhiles again, we are free from all such illusions, and rest in great quietnesse and tranquillity. We our felves know this Cleon here of Danlia, who all his life time (and many years he lived never (as he laid himfelf) dreamed nor faw any vision in his sleep ; and of those in former times, we have heard as much reported of Thrasymedes the Horreian. The cause whereof, was the temperature of the body : wheras contrariwise it is feen, that the complexion of Melancholick persons is apt to dream much, and subject to many illusions in the night; although it seemeth their dreams and visions be more regular, and fall out truer than others, for that such persons touching their imaginative faculty with one fansie or other, it cannot chuse but they meet with the truth otherwhiles: much like as when a man shoots many shafts, it goeth hard if he hit not the mark with one. When as therefore the imaginative part and the propheticall faculty is well disposed and surable with the temperature of the exhalation, as it were with some medicinable potion, then of necessity there must be engendred within the bodies of Prophets and Enthuliasm or Divine fury : contrartivise, when there is no fuch proportionate disposition, there can be no prophetical inspiration; or if there be, it is fanaticall, unscasonable, violent and troublesome; as we know, how of late it befell to that Pythias or Prophetelle, who is newly departed. For there being many pilgrims and ftrangers come from forein parts to confult with the Oracle, it is faid, that the hoft or beaft to be facrificed, did endure the first libaments and liquors that were powred upon it, never flirring thereat nor once quetching for the matter : but after that the Priefts and Sacrificers powred fill, and never gave over to cast liquor on, beyond all measure; at length (after great laving and drenching of it) hardly and with much adoe it yielded and trembled a little. But what happed hereupon to the Propheteffe or Pythias aforefald? Went the did indeed down into the cave or hole, against her will (as they faid) and with no alacrity at all: but incontinently, when the was come up again, at the very first words and answers that the pronounced, it was well known by the horsnesse of her voice, that the could not endure the violence of possessions. on, being replenished with a malign and mute spirit, much like unto a ship carryed away under full failes with a bluftering gale of winde. Infomuch as in the end being exceedingly troubled, and with a fearful and hideous cry, making hafte to get out, the flung herfelf down, and fell upon the carth: fo that not only the forefaid pilgrims fled for fear, but Nicander also the High-priest, and other Sacrificers and religious Ministers that were present. Who notwithstanding afterwards taking heatt unto them, and entring again into the place, took her up lying fill in an excafe befides hereld; and in very truth, the lived not many dates after. And therefore it is, that the faid Pythias keepeth her body pure and clean from the company of man, and forbidden the in to converte or have commerce all her life time with any stranger. Also, before they come to the Oracle, they observe certain signes; for that they think it is known unto the God, when her body is prepared and disposed to receive (without danger of her person) this Enthusiam. For the force and vertue of this exhalation, doth not move and incite all forts of persons, nor the same alwaies after one manner, nor yet as much at one time as at another ; but giveth only a beginning, and fetteth to (as it were) a match to kindle it, as we have faid before ; even unto those only who are prepared and framed aforehand to fuffer and receive this alteration. Now this exhalation (without all queflion) is Divine and Celefial; howbeit for all that, not such as may not fail and sease, not incorruptible, not subject to age and decay, nor able to latt and endure for ever: and under it, all things fuffer violence, which are between the Earth and the Moon, according to our doctrine : however others there be who affirm, that those things also which are above, are not able to refift it; but being wearied an eternal an infinite time, are quickly changed and renewed (as one would fay) by a fecond birth and regeneration. But of these matters (quoth 1) advise you I would and my felf also, eftsoones to call to mind, and consider often this discourse, for that they be points exposed to many reprehensions, and fundry objections may be alleged against them. All which, the time will not fuffer us now to profecute at large: and therefore let us put them off unto another opportunity, together with the doubts and queftions which Philippus moved as touching Apollo and the Sun.

What fignifieth this word E I, engraven over the door of Apollo's Temple in the City of Delphi.

The Summary.

Mong infinite testimonies of the sury of malign Spirits and evill Angels (who having been created at first good, kept not their original, but sell from the degree and state of happinesse, wherein continue by the grace and savour of God the good Angels, who minister and attend upon toolge who sell-treevie the inheritance of Salvation and everlating life) these may be reckoned for the chief and principally the substratuce of Salvation and everlating life) these may be reckoned for the chief and principally the substratuce of Salvation and everlating life) these may be reckoned for the chief and principally the substrated by men: and sain would they be set in the theorem of him, who having impersioned and tied them fall in a deep dangeon, with the chain of darknesse, reserve them to the jud sement of that greating Doom. And so say proceeded they in pride and presument, as to cause themselves to be slited by the mome of God's vea, and to be admend with those titles, which are due and appetrain unto the Bernall, their 80-variety according as the infinite numbers of Idals spanning in all parts, and sensity stranged every according as the infinite numbers of Idals spanning in all parts, and sensity stranged with the substrated when the substrate the bomages of an infinite manufacture of the substrate
Bake by these Oracles. But his 'audacious pride, together with most intolerable impudence, buth appeared in the inscription of this bare word, El, upon the porch of the Temple of Apollo in Delphi, in that he pretended title, and claimed thereby (according to the last interpretation thereof in this present discourse) to put himself in the place of the eternal God : who only is, and giveth Bring unto all things. And that which worse is, the blindnesses was so borrible, even of the wisest Sages, that this opinion but been seated in their heads whiles this Tyrant possesses in such fort, as they took pleasure to suffer themselves so to be couzened by him. But bereby good cause have we to praise our God, who bath discovered and laid open to us such impofures, and maketh his Majesty known unto us by his word, to be the only true and eternal Deity ; in adoring and worshiping whom, we may safely and truly say E 1, that is to say, Thou art : as contrariwise, the deceitful wiles and illusions of Satan and his complies, do declare him fearful and borrible the judy ment of God is woon fact rebellious spirits. Now if some over buste and curious bead, will here dispute and reason against the justice of him who is the disposer of all things, and enterprise to controule that eternal wisdom which governeb the World, for having mercy upon fuch as it pleafeth him, and fuffering to fall from so excellent an estate the Apostatate and disobedient Angels, and yet permitting them to have such a powerful hand over the wost part of Adams children's me answer in one mond : Man, what art thou, that thus will plead against God? shall the thing formed, fay unto him who formed it, Why halt thou made me for Hath not the Potter full power to make of the same maffe of earth or clay, one veffel for honour, and another for dishonour? The judgments of God are unsearchable, they have neither bottom nor brink t the riches of his misdom and knowledge are in-Crutable, and beyond all computation: his maies are hidden and impossible to be found out, If then there be any place in the consideration of the fecrets of God, where we ought to be retentive, wary and discreet it is in this. where every man bath just occasion to think upon this notable lesson and advertisment : Not to presume for to how over and above that which he should, but to be wife unto sobriety: and that no man ought to be puffed up with pride, but rather to fear. Moreover, as touching the contents of this discourse, the Author baving used an honest and decent Preface, Saith in general: That by this present inscription, Apollo intended to make himself known, and to incite every man to inquire into time. But berein the enemy of mankinde sheweth his audacity and boldnesse sufficiently, as also how he deludeth and mocketh his slaves; in that after he had deprived them of right and found judgment, he stirreth them up to know, who ke is : which is as much as if one should pluck out the eyes, and cut in twain the Ham-strings of a Traveller or Waisaring man; and then hid him seek out his way, and go onward on his journy. Now he brings in sour divers personages, delivering their minds as touching this Mot, Et. Lamptian opining in the first place, thinketh that the first and principal wife Sages of Greece devised it, for that they would be known and discerned from others. Amand principal topic angle of Meece acological, in that they would be found another income monitus (could), referret b and applicit is to the Wilders and Questions of those who responsible to Cracka. Theon the third, attributeth this mystery unto Logick, and doth all that possibly be can to maintain his apprise. Eustrophuse the Mathematician speaking unthe sources place, and seconded by Plutarch, Philophysical bat large upon the number of 5. represented by the letter E: he discours that and vunneth brongh all the Mathematicky, and divers parts of Philosophy, and all to approve and make good his conceit: but his drift and end is, to show under the mysical sense for insubsets, the persential of his Apollo, which he draws the and fetcheth allo from the confideration of his titles, epithets and attributes. But Ammonius gathering together their voices, and closing or stopping up the disputation, seemeth to hit the mark; proving by most froug and larned reasons, that Apollo would by this word instruct pilgrims, how they ought to falute and call him, to wit, in saying thus, El: that is to say, Thou art be: which is opposite unto that salutation which this salse god (usurping the name of the true Jehovah, or alwaies Existent) greeteth men with, in setting just before their eyes, in the entry and forefront of his Temple, thefe two words, Trud. on war: that is to fay, Know thy felf. Having enriched this with two evident proofes, the one taken from the uncertain condition of creatures; the other from the firmitude and true estate or being of the Creator; be exhorteth bis fellows to lift up themselves to the contemplation of the Essence of God, and to bonour the Sun, his expresse Image. Which done, he refuteth certain contrary opinion: and after a new confirmation of his discourse, he endeth where he first began; to wit, that the knowledge of God and our selves, are opposite in such sort, as yet neverthelesse they must meet and concurre in us. But all the application of this discourse unto Apollo (whom you must take for the very Devill) in 10 wife it sit and agreeable. And berein a man may feel better yet, what madualle and folly it the wifedom of man: and in how thick and palpable darknesse they go groping with their bands before them, who are no otherwise guided than by the discourse of their own reason. Which teachethus once again to adore the secrets of God: to recognize and apprehend his mercies in the matter of our Salvation : to dread also bis justice, which sheweth it self in the deplorable and piteous blindueffe of fo many Nations ; even from whe time that fin first entred into the World, unto this present day.

Light of late in my reading (friend Sarapion) upon certain prety [lambique] verfei, not unclogarely endited, which Dicarebus supposets that the Poet Euripides delivered unto King. Archilant, to this effect:

No gifts will I to you present,
Since poor I am, and wealth you have:
Lest I for folly, of you be shent,
Or by such giving seem to crave.

For he, who of that little means which he hath, bestoweth some small present upon them that are rich's poff ffe much, gratifieth them nothing at all, nor deferveth any thanks and that which world is because no man will believe that he giveth (be it never fo little) for nothing, he incurreth the fufoicion and obloquie of being cautelous, illiberal, and simply naught. But forasmuch as the gifts that be in the nature of filver, gold and temporal goods, be in regard of beauty and liberal courtefie, far inferiour so those which go in the kind: of good letters, and proceed from learning : it flandeth well with his nefty, both to give fuch, and also to demand the like of those who receive the fame. And therefore, in fending prefently unto you, and for your take unto thole friends about you in thole parts, certain discourses gathered together as touching the Temple and Oracle of Apollo Pythini, as an offering of first fruits; I confesse that I expect from you others again, both more in number and better in value. confidering that you live in a great City, have more leafure, and enjoy the benefit of more books, and all'fort of Scholallical conferences and learned exercises. And verily it seemeth, that our good and kinde Apollo doth indeed remedy, ease and assoil the doubtful difficulties ordinarily incident to this life of ours, by giving answer unto those who repair unto his Oracle : but such as concern matter of dearning, he putteth forth and propoleth himself unto that part of our minde, which naturally is given to Philosophize and fludy wildom, imprinting therein a coverous delire to know and understand the truth : as may appear by many other examples, and namely, in this petty mor, Eli confecrated in his Temple. For it is not like, that it was by meer chance and adventure, nor by a Lottery (as it were) of letters shuffled together, that this word alone should have the preeminence with this god, as to preecde and go before all others; ne yes that it should have the honour to be confectated unto God, or dedicated in the Temple as a thing of special regard for to be seen and beheld : but it must needs be, that either the first learned min (who at the beginning had the charge of this Timple) knew some particular and exquifite property in this word, or elfe used it as a device to symbolize some matter of singularity, or coverely to fignific a thing of great configuence. Having therefore many times before, cleanly put by & avoided, or paffed over this question proposed in the Schools for to be discussed and discourse fed upon; of late I was furprized and fet upon by mine own children, upon occasion that I was debating with certain ftrangers, at defirous to fatisfie them! whom being ready to depart out of the City of Delphi, it was no part of civility either to detain long, or altogether to reject, having so earnest a mind to hear me fay fomwhat. When therefore, as we were fet about the Temple, I began partly to look unto some things my felf, and partly to demand and enquire of them; I was put in mind and admonished by the place and matters then handled, of a former question which before-time (when New paffed thorow these parts) I heard Ammenius to discourse, and others besides, in this very place; and as couching a question of the same difficulty, likewise propounded. For, considering that this god Apollo's no leffe a Philosopher than a Prophet, Ammonius then delivered, that in regard thereof the furnames might very well be fitted and applied, which were attributed unto him very rightly and with good reafon; thewing and declaring, that he is Pythius, a Queflionist to those who begin to Lyan and enquire; Delius and Phanaus, that is to fay, clear and lightform unto such as have the truth a little shining and appearing unto them; Ismenius, that is to say, skilful and learned unto as many as have attained unto knowledge already; and Leschenorius, as one would say, Eloquent or Discourfing, when they put their Sciences in practice and make use thereof, proceeding for to confer, diffute and discourse one with another. And for that it appertaineth unto Philosophers, to enquire, admire and cast doubtes, by good right the most part of divine matters belonging to the gods, are couched and hidden under dark enigms and covert speecher, and thereupon require that a man should demand, why? and whether? as also to be instructed in the cause. As for example, about the maintenance of the and whether? as allo to be intructed in the cause. As for eximple, about the maintenance of the immortall or eternal first, Why of all kindes of wood they burn the First only? Alio, Wherefore they never make any perfume but of the Laurell? Likewife, What is the reason, that in this Temple there by no more but two Images of two definitions of stall Sisters, named Parke, whereas in all places effectively the three of them? Semblably, What sindule the treating, that no woman (what force the be) is permitted to have access unto a his Oracle for counsell or resolution? Again, What is the reason of that fabrick or three-sooted Table? and such other matters which invite, allure and draw thos: who are not altogether witlesse, void of sense and reason, to ask, to see and hear somewhat, yea and to dispute about them, what they should mean? And to this purpose, do but mark and consider these inscriptions standing in the forestront of this Temple: Know thy self, and Nothing too much: what anumber of questions and learned disputations they have moved: also, what a multitude of goodly discourse have sprung and proceeded from such writings, as out of some seed or grain of corn. And this will I say unto you, that the matter now in question, is no less festile and plentistic, than any

When Ammonius had thus faid, my brother Lamprias began in this wife : And yet (quoth he) the reason which we all have heard as touching this question, is very plain and short. For reported it is, that those ancient Sages or Wise men, who by some are named Suphisters, were indeed of themselves no more than five to wit, Chilon, Thales, Solon, Bras and Pittachs. But when first Cleobulus the Tyrant of the Lindians, and then Periander the Tyrant likewife of Cariuth (who had nother of them any one for of vertue or wiledom) by the greatnesse of their power, by the number of their friends, and by many benefite and demerite whereby they obliged their adherents, acquired torcibly this repuration, in despite of all they usurped the name of Sager: and to this purpose caused to be spred sowen and divulged throughous all Greece certain odde fentences and notable fayings, 48 well as those of the others, wherewith the former Sages above named were discontented. Howbeit for all thir, these five Wifemen would in no hand discover and convince their vanity, nor yet openly contest and enter into terms of quarel with them about this reputation ne yet debate the matter against formighty personages, who had fo great means of countenance in the world ; but being affembled upon a time in this place; after conference together they confecrated and dedicated here the letter [E] which as it flandeth figh in the order of the Alphabet, to in number it fignifieth five : as if they tellified and depoted here before the god, that they were but five; protesting that the fixth and seventh they rejected and excluded out of their fociety, as who had no right to belong unto them. Now that this conjecture is not befide the purpole, a man may know, who hath but heard them freak who have the charge and fuperintendance of this Temple; namely, how they call that EI, which is weitten in gold, the EI of Livia Augusta the Empresse and wife of Augustus Cafar : the other in braffs, the El of the Atherians : and the first, which is most ancient, and for the matter and substance thereof no better than tue in wood, at this very day they name, the E I of the Sages; as being dedicated not by one of them alone, but by all together. Hereat Ammonius pleasantly smiled, as supposing this to be the proper and peculiar conceit of Lamprias himself, howsoever he seemed to father it upon others, feigning that hoheard it else where, to the end that he might not be called to account, and put to the maintenance and dofence thereof. Then another of the company who were there present, said that this was much like unto a foolish toy which a Chaldean stranger, and by profession an Astrologer, not long saccests broch. That seven letters there were for sooth in all the Asphabet, which were vocall and of themselves rendered a voices like as feven Sars there were in the Heaven, which had their proper motions aparts at liberty, and not bound and linked to others. Also that among those vocall letters or vowels, E was the fecond; even as the Sun of all the Planets was next unto the Moon : and that all the Greeks in manner, with one accord, hold Apollo and the Sun, to be both one. But this, when all is done, favoureth altogether of his counting table of judicial Astronomy, and of his triviall discourfing head. Moreover it feemeth that Lamprias taketh not heed, but ere he is aware, flirreth up all those who have the charge of the Temple, against this reason of his. For there is not a man in all the City of Delphi, who knoweth ought of that which he hath faid, but they allege the common opinion, and that which runneth current throughout the World, which is: That it is neither the outward form and thew, nor the found; but the very Mot only as it is written, containeth fome fecret fignification; for it is as the Delphians do conceive, of it. And with that the high priest Nicander himself (who was present) said, that this EI is the form and manner that they ule, who come to confult with the god Apollo, and to conver their questions unto him : and ordinarily, it carrieth the first place in all their interrogatories. For usuall it is with them thus to demaund: El pandount; El pandount; &c. that is to say, if, or whether they shall have Victory? if they shall Marry? if it will be expedient for them to go to Sea? if they were best to Til the Ground? or if they should do well to make a Voyage and Travel into forcin parts? And herein the God (who is wife and learned, mocking the Logicians, bidding them farewell who hold, that of this particle or Conjunction El, that is to fay, If, and of what Subjunctive proposition foever following after it, nothing can be made, nor Categorically affirmed) both underflandeth all interrogations annexed unto El, as real things in effe, and so accepteth of them. And for as much as this EI is proper for an interrogation proposed unto him as a Divinor or Prophet: and commenticis with us, by it to pray unto him, as to a god; they think that this word E I is of no leffe validity to pray and wish by, than it is to demand or ask a question : for every one that prayeth, useth ordinario lythis form : EI openor, that is to fay, O if it might please God. And thus Archilechus wrote:

E I de, qua Monto Rega Noassant sizes:

O if my luch and hap were fuch,

As Neobules hand to touch.

And it is faid, that in the adverb of withing EIOE, which fignifieth, would God; the second sylfables, is an adjunction idle and superfluous, for that EI alone fignifieth as much: like as the in this verse of the Poet Sophron:

aua rixem bir Schadia: Desirous also in their need Of children, for their joy and meed :

as also in Homer

Os Bin và oir syd Xuon phács : As I will now, even thee difgrace, And feil thy strength in present place.

Where 64 fignifieth just nothing. Thus you fee, how in this little word El there is an optative power fufficiently declared. When Nicander had delivered these words, Theon (for I presuppose you know him, being a familiar friend of ours) demaunded of Ammonius, whether Logick might have the liberty to speak in her one defence, being thus wronged and troden under foot? when Ammonius willed him to speak hardly, and to say all that he could, and for to help her out of the mire : Certes, quoth he then, there he many Oracles which bear witneff: and evidently flew, that god Apollo is a most skilful Logician. For in some sort it belongeth to one and the same Artist, both to move doubtful ambiguities, and also to assoil and clear the same. Moreover, according as Plate said, that there being in old time an Oracle given unto the Greeks, that they should double the Altar within the Temple of Delos, (which is a piece of work for an expert Geometrician to perform, and who had the very habit and perfection of that Art) it was not that indeed which the god commanded the Greeks to do, but he enjoyned them to fludy Geometry: even fo, in giving otherwhiles ambiguous answers, and doubtful Oracles, he recommended thereby and augmenteth so much the more, the credit of Logick, as being a Science right necessary for as many as would gladly understand his speech. Now in Logick this Conjunction El, that is to fay, If (which is so apt to continue a speech and proposition) hath a great force, as being that which giveth form unto that proposition, which is most agreeable to difcourse of reason and argumentation. And verily of this nature be all these Hypothetical propositions, copulative, disjunctive, &c. And who can deny it? confidering that the very brute beafts themselves have in some fort a certain knowledge and intelligence of the subsistence of things: but Nature hath given to man alone the notice of confequence, and the judgment for to know how to differn that which followeth upon every thing. For, that it is light, the very Wolves, Dogs, and Cocks do perceive : but that, if it be day of necessity it must make the air light, there is no creature fave only man, that knoweth: for he alone hath intelligence of the beginning and of the end, of the antecedent and the confequent, of the proceeding and finishing of things: as alfoof the coherence and bringing together of both ends and extremes, of the conference of one to another; what habitude, correspondence, or difference there is between : and this is it, whereof all demonstrations take their chief original and beginning. Now fince it is fo, that all Philosophy whatsoever, confifteth in the knowledge of the truth; and the light which cleareth the truth, is demonstration; and the beginning of demonstration, is the coherence and knitting of propositions together : by good right that power which maketh and maintaineth this, was dedicated and confecrated by the Sages and Wife men unto this god, who above all others loveth the truth. Again, this god is a Divinor and Prophet; but the Art of Divining is as touching future things, by the means of fuch, as are either prefens orpast. For as nothing is done or made without cause; so there is nothing foreknown without precedent reason: but forasmuch as all that is, dependeth and followeth upon that which hath been: and confequently all that shall be, hath a fute and dependence of that which is, by a certain continuity, which proceedeth from the beginning to the end; he who hath the skill to fee into causes, and by natural reason how to compose and joyn them together, knoweth and is able to discourse

What things are now, what shall hereafter come, As also what are past, both all and some;

according as Homer faith : who very well and wifely fetteth in the first place the present, then the future, and that which is past. For of the prefent dependeth all Syllogism and reasoning, and that by the vertue and efficacy of a conjunction : for that if this thing be, such a thing went before: and converfum, if this be; that shall be. For all the artificial feat and skill of discourse and argument, is the knowledge of confequence, as hath been faid already : but it is the fenfe, that give h anticipation unto the discourse of reason. And therefore although haply it may seem to fland little with decent honesty, we I will not be affraid to affirm that this Reason properly is the Tripode or three-footed table, as one would say, and Oracle of truth: namely, when the Disputer supposets a consequence upon that which was premifed and went before : and then afterwards affuming that which is extant and fublishent, cometh in the end to induce and infer a final conclusion of his demonstration. Now if it be fo, that Apollo Pythius, as the report goeth, loveth Mufick, and be delighted in the finging of Swans, and found of Lute and Harp; what marvel is it then, if for the affection that he beareth unto Logick, he likewise ems brace and love that part of speech, which he seeth Philosophers most willingly and oftenest touse? Hercules before that he had loofed the bands wherewith Prometheus was tied, and having not as yet conferred and talked with Chiron and Atlant two great Sophisters and professiours of disputation, but be-lag a young man still, and a plain Becotian, abolished all Logick at first, and Cossed at this little Mot E1: but soon after seemed as if he would pluck away by sorce the three sooted Table of Apollo, yea and contest with the god, about the Art of Divining; for that together with age and process of time he proceeded so far, as that he became by that means a most skilfull Prophet, and as subtile and excellent a Logician. When Theon had made an end of this speech, Eustrophus the Athenians, as Itake it, directed his words unto us and faid : See you not how valiantly Theon defendeth the Art of Logick, and hath in manner gotten on the Lions skin of Hercules? It is not therefore decent, that we who in one word refer all affairs, all natures and principles joynedly together, as well of divine as of humane things into number, and making it the Author, Maffer, and Ruler even of such matters as fimply are most fair and precious, should fit still and say never a word : but rather for our part, offer the fruits of the Mathematicks unto god Apollo. For we say and affirm that this letter E, of it felf. neither in puissance, nor in form, ne yet in name and pronunciation, hath any thing in it above other letters : howbeit we think, that preferred it hath been before all the reft, in this regard, that it is a character and mark of the number five, which is in all things of greatest vertue and validity, and is named Pemptas. Whereupon our Sages and great Clarks in times past, when they would expresse the verb foo number] used Pempazein, as one would say, to count and reckon by fives. And verily Eustrophus in faving thus, addressed his speech unto me, not merrily but in good earnest, for that I was very affectionate and much addicted then unto the Mathematicks; but yet io, as in all things I observed and kept fill the old rule, Too much of nothing, as being a Scholar of the Academy School. I answered therefore, that Eustrophus had folved paffing well the difficulty of the question by this number. For feeing it is fo (quoth I) that number in generality is divided into even and odde, Unity is in power and efficacy common to them both : in such fort, as being put unto the even, it maketh it odde; and likewife added to the odde, caufeth the fame to be even. Now the beginning and ground of even numbers is Two; and of odde, Three is the first of which being joyned together is engendred Five, which by good right is highly honoured, as being the first compound of the first simple numbers, whereupon it is worthily name Talus, that is to fay, Marriage; because the even number hath some resemblance to the F-male, and the odde, a referrence to the Male. For in the sections and divisions of numbers into equal parts, the even is altogether clean parted and severed asunder, leaving a certain void space between the parts, as a beginning of capacity apt to receive somwhat more : contrariwise in the odde number, if a man do as much by it, and cut it into two numbers, there remaineth alwaies somewhat in the midst between, sit for subdivision, yea and generation of new numbers : whereby it appeareth that more generative it is than the other. And whenfoever it cometh to be mixed with the other, it carrieth the preeminence, and is master alwaies, but never mastered. For what mixture soever you make of them twain, you shall never come thereby to an even number : but mix and compose them as often and in what manner you will, thereshall artife alwaies thereof an odde number. And that which more is, both the one and the other added to it felf, or compounded with it felf, the weth the difference that is between them. For never shall you fee an even number joyned with another that is even, to produce an odde; for itsgoeth not out of his proper nature, as having not the power to beget any other than it felf, to feeble it is and imperfect ; but odde numbers coupled and mingled with others that be odde, bring forth many even numbers, to powerful it is to engender every way. As for all the other properties and different puilfunces of numbers, the time will not now ferve to discourse throughly of them all. But hereby you fee, wherefore the ancient Pythagorean Philosophers called throughly of them all. Dat nercoy you see whether it was a street of the first Female. The same also is Five, the Marriage; as being compounded of the first Male and of the first Female. The same also is fometime named Nature; for that being multiplied by it felf, it falleth out fill to determine in . it fell. For like as Nature taking a grain of Wheat in the nature of feed, and fo diffufing it, produceth maketh many forms and divers kindes of things between, through which the past th and proceedeth, untill at 25. last the bringeth her work to an end; and when all is done showeth a corn of Wheat again, rendring the first beginning, in the end of all : even so, when other numbers multiply themselves, and end by growing and multiplication in other numbers, only five and fix, if they be multiplied by themselves, do bring forth and regenerate likewise themselves : for fix times fix, maketh thirty fix; and five times five, arifeth to twenty five. But take thus much withall again, that fix doth this but once and after + That is one manner only, when of it felf it becometh that * four fquare number : but unfo five the fame be- to fay, 36 falleth, when it is multiplied by it felf; and besides particularly, it hath this property, that by asidis made of 4 tion of it felf it produceth also it self, in as much as it maketh ten; which it doth alternatively, and nines. hold:th on this course in infinitum, as far as any numbers will extend: so as this number resembleth. that principle or first cause, which doth conduct and govern this Universal World. For like as it, of the own felf preferveth the World; and reciprocally, of the World returneth into it felf, according as Heraclitus faid of the Fire :

Hugis कंग्यम्बंदिनमा, नर्मानः स्रेके माँह वेस्कृतकाः

Fire into all things first doth turn, And all things shall to fire return:

like as Gold is exchanged for Wares, and Wares for Gold : even fo the meeting of five with it felf, was Aunthowfoever it be, can engender and bring forth nothing either imperfect or ftrange, but all the changes southere that it hath, be limitted and certain. For either it begetteth it felf, or elfe produceth ten; that is to upon a finally and forther than the control of the changes (ay, that which is proper and familiar, or elfo perfect and accomplished.

Now if a man should come unto me and demand: What is all this (good Sir) unto Apello? I will describe answer again : That this concerneth not Apollo alone, but * Bacchus also, who hath no leffe to do with work. the City of Delphos, nor is of leffe authority there, than Apollo himfelf. For we have heard the which is Tirtologians (partly in verse and partly in prose) sing and say, That this god being of his own nature not to the incorincorruptible and immortal: yet, I wot not by what sentence and reason satal he is transmuted and changed in many forts. Sometime he is all on a light fire, and causeth all things to be of the same nature, and like unto all things: otherwhiles most variable, in all manner of forms, passions and puisfances all different, and becometh (as now he is) the World; fo called by a most common and best known name. But the Sages and Wifer fort, willingly to conceal and keep these secrets hidden from common people, name this mutation and change of his into fire, Apollo; fignifying thereby, a kinde of fole unity whereunto it reduceth all things, and negation of plurality: and Pbabus likewife; betokening thereby his purity and electrical from filth and pollution. As for his convertion into windes, water, earth, flars, and into fundry kinds of plants and living creatures, together with the order and disposition thereof, such as we see ; all this passion (I say) and mutation, they covertly do signific under the name of a certain distraction and dismembring and in these regards, they call himself Diony [us, Zagreus, Nytlelius, Isodetes. They exhibit also and counterfeit I wot not what deaths, deftructions and difparitions; regenerations also, and refurrections : which be fables all, and anigmatical fixions, devised for to represent the foresaid mutations. And verily, to Bacchus they do chant in their songs certain Dithyrambick ditties and tunes, full of passion and change, with motions and agitations to and fro. For according as A chylus faith.

But unto the other (that is to fay, Apollo) they fing the Paan, which is a fetled kinde of fong, and Mufick modest and sober. Moreover, in all their Pictures and Portraitures of Images and Statues, they make Apollo alwaies with a young face and never aging : but the other, to wit, Bacchus, they represent in many shapes, and as many forms and vitages. And in one word, to the one they attribute a constancy uniform and evermore the same, a regular order, a serious and fincere gravity : but unto the other, mixed sports, games, wantonnesse and insolency; in sum such a gravity as is interlaced with sury, madnesse and inequality: they invocate and call upon him by the name of Bacchus Enius:

Bacchus (I fay) furnamed Enius,

noting hereby not unfuly and without good purpose that which is proper to the one and the other mueation. But for that the time of the revolutions in these changes is not equal and alike, but of the one (which is called Coros, and fignifieth plenty or fatlety) longer; and of the other (named Chresmosine, which betokeneth want and necessity) shorter : observing even herein the proportion, they use the canticle Pasn, during all the reft of the year, in their facrifices : but in the beginning of Winter, they flir up the Dithyrambe, and down goeth Parn; and so invocate this god for three moneths space in stead of the other, supposing that there is the same proportion of the conflagration of the World to the reftoring and reparation thereof, as is of three to one. But peradventure we have dwelt longer upon this point than we should, considering the time: howbeit this is certain, that they attribute the number of five unto this god Apollo, as proper and peculiar unto him; faying, that one while it begetteth it felf by multiplication, as fire; and another while maketh of it felf ten, as the World. Moreover, think we not, that this number hath no fociety with Mufick, which is fo agreeable unto this god, as nothing fo much? Certes, Harmony is (to fay at once) occupied most of all about accords, which we call Symphonies: and that those are in number five, and no more, reason proveth, and experience will convince it to be so, even unto him who shall make the trial, either with strings or pipe-holes, by the very sense of hearing only, without any other reason. For all these accords take their generation by proportion on meaning only, wantout any transfer of the Mufick or Symphony Disteffaron, is Epitrics or Sequitertial, that is to fay, the whole and a third part over: of Diapente, Hemolios or Sequialteral, that is to fay, the whole and half as much more: of Diapafon, duple: of Diapafon with Diapente together; riple; and of Dif-diapafon, quadruple. And as for that which the Muficians bring in over and above the fe, to wit, Diapaton and Diatestaron (for so they name it) they are not worthy to be admitted and received; as transcending all mean and measure to gratific for soon the the unreasonable pleasure of the ear against all proportion, and breaking as it were the ordinance of the Law.

To let paffe therefore the five positures of the Tetrachords, as also the first five Tones, Tropes, Changes, Notes, or Harmonies, (call them what you will) for that they change and alter by fetting up or letting down the ftrings, more or leffe, or by ftreining or eafing the voice; all the reft are confidered as Bales and Trebles. For see you not that there being many, or rather infinite intervals, yet five there be only used in song; namely, Diesie, Hemitonium, Tonos, Trisemitonion, and Diconos? Netther is there any space or interval greater or leffe in Voices, distinguished by Base and Treble, high and low, that can be expressed in song. But to passe by many other such things (quoth I) only Plate I will allege, who affirmeth, that there is indeed but one World : marry if there were more in number, and not the same one alone; it must needs be that there are five in all, and not one more. But grant that there be no more in truth than one, as Aristotle holdeth ; yet fo it is, that the same scemeth to be composed and coagmented in some fort of five other Worlds: wherefore one is that of Earth, another of Water, the third of Fire; the fourth of Air; as for the fifth, some call it Heaven, others light, and some again, the Sky; and there be, who name it a quint-effence : unto which only it is proper and natural (of all other bodies) to turn round, not by violent force, nor otherwise by chance and aventure. Plato therefore observing and knowing well enough, that the most beautifull and perfect figures of regular bodies which be in the World and within compaffe of Nature, are five in number (namely, the Pyramis, the Cube, the Octaedron, Icolaedron and Dodecaedron) hath very fitly appropriated and attributed each of these noble figures unto one or other of those first bodies. Others there be also who apply the faculties of the natural Senfes, which likewife be in number five, unto the faid primitive bodies : to wit, Touching, which is firm, folid and hard, to Earth; Tafting, which judgeth of the qualities of Savors by Touching without the Martin Hearing, to the Air, for that the Air being beaten upon is the voice and found in the Ears of the other twain, Smelling hath for the object Sent or Odour, which being in manner of a perfume, is engendred and elevated by Heas, and therefore holdeth of the Fires as for the Sight, which is clear and bright, by a certain affinity and confanguinity which it hath with the Heaven and with Light, hath a temperature and complexion mingled of the one and the other: neither is there in any living Creature other sense, nor in the whole World any other nature and substance simple and uncompound; but a marvellous diffribution there is and congruity of five to five, as it evidently appeareth. When I had thus faid, and made a frop withall, after a little pause between : O what a fault (quoth

1) O Euftrophus, had I like to have committed : for I went within a little of passing over Homer altogether, as if he had not been the first that divided the World into five parts; allotting three of them which are in the middes unto three gods, and the other two which be the extremes (namely, Heaven and Earth, whereof the one is the limit of things beneath, the other the bound of things above) in common and not distributed like the others. But our speech must remember to return again, as Euripides faith, and not difficult and the state of the state fore length there is to be supported a positure and situation of a point or prick, answerable to unity in numbers; and Longitude without breadth is called a line; and the moving of a line into breadth, and the procreation of a Superficies thereby, confifteth of three : afterwards, when there is adjoyned thereto profundity or depth, the augmentation groweth by four, untill it become a perfect folidity. So that to promitted of the content of the C it afterwards destitute of the thing which is greatest and principal. For that which is without a foul, to te therwards determine of the timing which is greated using principal. For that without assumming a few freeh pains, is in manner of an Orphan, unperfect and good for nothing, to long as it is saidnout a foul to the and guide it: but the motion or disposition which putted in the foul, ingenerated by means of the number of five, is it that bringeth perfection and confummation unto Nature. Whereby it appeareth that there is an effence more excellent than the four, inafmuch as a living body endued wish a foul, is of a more noble nature, than that which hath none: but more than fo, the beauty and excellent power of this number five, proceeding yet farther, would not fuffer a body animate to be extended into infinite kindes, but hath given unto us five divers forts of animate and living natures in all. For there be Gode; Dæmons, or Angels , Dami-gods, or Heroes: then after thefe, a fourth kinde, of Men; and talk of all, in the fifth place, is that of brute Beafts and unfeafonable. Furthermore, if you come and the vide the foul according to Nature, the first and obscurest part or pushfance thereof, is the vegetative or mutritive faculty : the feoond is the fenfitive: then the appetitive : after it the irafcible, wherein is engendred anger. Now when it is once come unto that power which discourseth by reason, and brought Nature as it were to perfection, there it resteth in the fife, as in the very pitch and top of all. Since then this number bath to many, and those so great puissances and faculties, the very Generation thereof is beautiful to be confidered; I mean not that whereof we have already heretofore discoursed, when we faid, that composed it was of two and three, but that which is made by the conjunction of the first winciple, with the first square and quadrate number. And what is that principle or beginning of all same bors? even one or Unity, and that first quadrat is Fourt and of these swain as a man would fay, of form and matter) being brought to perfection, is procreated this Quinary or number of five. Now If it be true, as fome do hold, that Unity it felf is quadrat and four-foure, as being that which is the power of it felt, and determineth in it felf, then five being thus compounded of the two first quadrat numbers ought fo much the rather to be effected fo noble and excellent as none can be comparable unto it. And year there is one excellency behinde, that paffeth all those which went before. But I fear me (quotif) left if the fame be untered, it would debale in some fore the honour of our Plato, like as himself faid, the honour and authority of Anaxagoras was depressed and out down by the name of the Moon, who attributed unto himfelf the first invention of the Moone Muminations by the Sun; whereas it was a very ancient opinion long before he was boin. How fay you, hath he not faid thus much in his Dislogue entituded Craylus: New verily, answered Entirophus; but I fee not the like confequence for all that. But you know (quoth I) but in his book entituded, The Sophitter, he fetted thow five most principal beginnings of all things: co wit; That which is: The fame: The other: Monion, the fourth: and Left for the fift. Moreover in his Dialogue Philebus, he bringeth in another kinde of partition and division of thele principles, where he faith: That one is Infinite; another Finite, or the end and of the mixture of thefetwain, is made and accomplished all generation; as for the cause whereby they are miged, he puneth it for the fourth kinde : but loweth to our conjecture the fift-by the means whereof, that which is composed and mixed is redivided, and separate again. And for mine own part, I suppose verily, that these principles be the figures and images (as it were) of those before a to wit of That which is The thing engendred: of Motion, Infinite: of Keft, the End or Finite: of The Same, the Cause that mixeth: of The other, the Cause that doth separate. But say they be divers principles, and not the same yet howsoes ver it be, there are alwaies fill five kindes, and five differences of the faid principles. Some of them before Plate, being of the same opinion, or having heard so much of anoth r, consecrated two E.E. unto the god of this Temple, as a very figne to symbolize that number which comprehendeth all. And peradventure, having heard also, that Good appeareth in five kindes : whereof the first is Mean or Meafure ; the fecond, Symmetry or Proportion ; the third, Understanding ; the fourth, The Sciences, Arts and True Opinions, which are in the foul; the fifth, Pure and Sincere Pleasure, without mixture of any trouble and pain : they staied there, reciting this verse out of Orpheus,

After these discourses passed between us . Yet one brief word more (quoth he) will I fay unto Nicander, and those about him;

For fing I will To men of skill.

The fixth day of the moneth when you lead the Propheteffe Pythia into some Hall named Prytanium, the first casting of lots among you, of three, tendeth to five : for the casteth three ; and you, two : how fay you is it not fo? Yes verily, quoth Nicander : but the cause hereof we dare not reveal and declare unto others. Well then (quoth I, finil ng thereat) untill fuch time as god permitteth us after we are become holy and confecrate, for to know the truth thereof, mean while let that also be added unto the praises which have been alleged in the recommendation of the number Five.

Thus ended the discourse as souching the commendations attributed unto the number of five, by the Arithmeticians and Mathematicians, as far as I can remember or call to mind. And Ammonius (at he was a man who bestowed not the worst and least part of his time in Mathematick Philosophy) took no small pleasure in the hearing of such discourses, and said : Needlesse it is and to no purpose, to stand much upon the precise and exact confutation of that which these young men here have alleged, unless it be that every number will afford you also sufficient matter and argument of praise, if you will but take the pains to look into them : for, to fay nothing of others, a whole day would not be enough to express in words all the vertues and properties of the facred number Siven, dedicated to Apollo. And moreover we shall feem to pronounce against the Sages and Wifemen, that they fight both against common law received, and all antiquity of time; if differzing the number of feven of that preeminence; whereof it is in possession, they should confectate Five unto Apollo, as more meet and beseeming for him. And therefore mine opinion is, that this writing El fignifieth neither number, nor order, nor conjunction, nor any other delective particle; but is anientire falutation of it felf, and a compellation of the God: which together with the very utterance and pronunciation of the word induceth the Speaker to think of the greameff: and power of him, who feetheth to falute and greet every one of us when we come hither, with these words Tries examp, Know thy felf, which fignifieth no leffe, than if he faid Atte, that is to fay, All hail, or god fave you ; and we again to render the like, answer him Eli that is to fay, Thou art; yielding unto him not a falle, but a true appellation and citle, which only and to him alone appertaineth, namely, that he is. For in very truth, and so fpeak as it is, we who are mortal men, have no part at all of being indeed, because that all humane nature being ever in the midft between generation and corruption, giveth but an obscure appearence, a dark shadow, a weak and uncertain opinion of it felf. And if peradventure you bend your mind, and cogitation for to comprehenda fubftance and effence thereof, you shall do as much good as if you would cluch water in your hand with a bent fift; for the more you feem to gripe and preffe together that which of the own nature is fluid and runneth out, somuch the more shall you leefe of that which you will clasp and hold and even so; all things being subject to alteration, and to passe from one change unto another, reason tecking for a real fublifiance is deceived, as not able to apprehend any thing, fublifient in truth and permanent i for that every thing rendeth to a being before it is, or beginneth to die fo foon as it is engendred. For, as Heraclius was wont to fay, a man cannot possibly enter twice into one and the fame River: no more is he able to finde any mortal substance twice in concand the same efface. Such is the suddenness and nelerity of change, that no fooner is it diffipated but it gathereth again anon, or rather indeed not again, nor anon, but at once it both sublisteth and also ceaseth to be, it cometh and goeth together ; in fuch fort, as that which beginneth to breed, never reacheth to the perfection of being, for that in very detd this generation is never accomplished, not resteth as being come to a full end and perfection of being, but continually changeth and moveth from one to another. Even as of humane feed, first there is gathered within the Mothers: Wombe a fruit or masse without form; then an lifent having some form and shape; afterwards being out of the Mothers belly della a facking Babe, Ynon it proves to be a Lad or Boy, within a while a Stripling or Springal, then: a Youth, lafterwards a Man grown, confequently an elderly and ancient person, and last of all a crooked, old Man. so that the former ages and precedent generations be alwaics abolished by the subsequent, and those that follow. But we like ridiculous fools be affraid of one kinde of death, when as we have altrady died fo many deaths, and do nothing daily and hourly but die ftill. For not only fas Heraclitae faith) the death of fire is the life of air; and the end of air, the beginning of water; but much more avidently, we may observe the fameling our felves. The floure of our years dieth and paffeth sway when old age cometh; youth endeth in the floure of luftry and perfect age : childhood determineth in youth minfancy in childhood. Yefterday dieth in this day, and this day will be dead by to morrow : neither continueth any man alwaies one and the same, but we are engendred many, according as the matter glideth, turneth and is driven about one image, mould or pattern common to all figures. For, were it not fo, but that we continued fill the same, how is it that we take delight now in these things, whereas we joyed before in others? how is it that we love and hate, praise and dispraise contrary things? how cometh it to passe that we use divers speeches, fall into different discourses, and are in sundry affections; retain not the same vifage, one countenance, one mind, and one thought? For there is no likelihood at all, that without change a man should entertain other passions; and look who is changed, he continueth not the same; and if he be not the same, he is not at all : but together with changing from the same, he changeth also to be simply, for that continually he is altered from one to another; and by confequence out sense is deceived militaking that which appeareth, for that which is indeed; and all for want of knowledge, what it is to be. But what is it (in truth) to be? Surely to be eternal, that is to fay, which never had beginning in generation, nor shall have end by corruption; and in which, time never worketh any mutation. For a moveable and mutable thing is time, appearing (as it were) in a fliadow with the matter which runneth and floweth continually, never remaining flable, permanent and folid, but may be compared unto a leaking veffel, containing inte (after a fort) generations and corruptions. And to it properly belong thefe termes : Before, and after : Hath been, and shall be : which presently at the very first fight do evidently shew, that time hath no being. For it were a great folly and manifest absurdity to fay, that a thing is, which as yet cometh not into effer or hath already ceafed to be. And as for these words, Prefent, Instant, Now, &c. by which it seemeth that principally we ground and thatth tain the intelligence of Time, reason discovereth the same, and immediately overthrowethin; for incontinently it is thrust out and dispatched, into future, and past ! to that it fareth with us in this cases as with those who would see a thing very far distant; for of necessity the visual beames of his significate fail before they can reach thereto. Now if the same befall to nature which is measured, that unto time which measureth it; there is nothing in it permanent nor subliftent, but all things therein be cither breeding or dying, according as they have reference unto time. And therefore it may not be at lowed to fay of that which is, it hath been, or it shall be: for thefe termes be certain inclinations, pasfages, departures and changes, of that which cannot endure nor continue in being. Whereupon, we are to conclude, that God alone is (and that, not according to any measure of thing, but respective to eternity) immutable and unmovable, not gaged within the compatte of time, nor subject either to inclination or declination any way : before whom nothing ever wasy nor after whom ought shall be nothing future, nothing path, nothing elder, nothing younger; but being one really, by this one Profess or Now, accomplisheth his eternity and being alway. Neither is either any thing, that may truely be faid to be, but he alone, nor of him may be verified, Ho bath been, or shall be, for that he is without beginning and end. In this manner therefore we ought in our worthly and adoration, to falute and invocate him, faying, E I: that is to fay, Thou are some of the ancients used to do, falve him by this title E I. E. No that is to fay, Thou are some of more many. as every one of us, who are a confused heap and masse composed, or rather thrust together of infinite die verfities and differences proceeding from all forts of alterations: but as that which is, ought to be one; fo that which is one, ought to be : for alternative divertity being the difference of that which is, departeth from it, and goeth to the engendring of that which is not. And therefore very cightly aget often ned this god, the first of his names, as also the second and the third? for spellsher is allest, as despinguad disayowing and make, that is to say, plurality and multitude: likewise, sou, which is as much as to say, all One or, alone : thirdly, Phabus, by which name, they called in the old time, All that was clean and person without mixture and pollution. And semblably even at this day, the Theffitians (if I be not diet) ved) fay, that their Priefts upon certain vacant daies, when they keep forth of their Denples and leve as part privatly to themselves, out or junder. Now, that which is one, as affer pure and finderes for postition cometh by occasion that one thing is mingled with another like as Honer spraking in one place of Yvorie having a tincture of red, faid it was polluted ; and the word that the north is prime of Days allo, when they would expresse that their colours be medleier or rained, use the ward someon, these well fay, to be corrupted; and the very mixture they term or ear, that is to fay, Corruption. It behoveth therefore, that the thing which is fincere and incorruptible, should be also one and simple, without all mixture whatfoever. In which regard, they who think that Apollo and the Sun be both one god, are worthy to be made much of and loved for their good conceit and pleafant wit, because they repose the notion of god in that which of all things that they know and defire, they honour and reverence most. And now, so long at we are in this life, as if we dreamed the most beautiful dream that a man could imagine of this god Apollo, let us excite and stir up our minds to passe yet farther and mount higher, for to contemplate and behold that which is above our felves, in adoring principally indeed his effence: but yet honoring withall his image, to wit, the Sun, and that generative vertue, which he hath infused into it, for to produce and bring forth; reprefenting in some fort, by his brightnesse some obscure re-Mances and dark shews of his elemency, benignity, and bleffednesse, as far forth as it is possible for a sensible nature, to shew an intellectual; and for that which is movable, to expresse that which is stable and permanent. Moreover, as couching I wos not what extaftes and leapings forth of himfelf and his own nature, certain strange alterations likewise, as namely, when he casteth fire and withall dismembrethand teareth himself, as they say : as also that he firetcheth, dilateth and spreadeth forth; and contrariwise how he gathereth and draweth in himself here below, into the Earth, the Sea, the Windes, the Stars, and uncouth accidents of Beafts and Plants; they be fuch abfurdities, as are not to be named without impiety. Or elfe if we admit them, he will become worfe than the little Boy whom the Poets feign, playing upon the Sea flore with an heap of fand, which he first raised, and then cast down again and scattered abroad: if (I say) he should continually play at this game like sast and lone and now and framing the World sirst, where before it was not; and then annot deftroying it, so soon as it is made; for contractiwise, how much or how little soever of him is infinited into the World, the same in some fort containeth and consistent the substance thereof, maintaining the corporal nature of it, which otherwise by reason of instringly and weaknesse, estimated a waise to corruption. In my concest therefore, against this opinion principally hash been directly opposed this Mot, and denomination of god, Els, that isto say, Thou art: as giving good testimony in his behalf, that in him there is never any change or mutation. But either to do, or suffer this, as is beforefaid, belongeth to any other god or rather indeed to any other Dzemoa, ordained to have the superintendence of that nature, which is subject both to generation and corruption: as may appear immediately by the significations of their name, which are quite contrary and directly do contradiction to there. For our god here innamed Apolly, the other Plato is as si one would say, Not Many; and Many. The one is clepted Delius that is, clear and evident: the other exidences, that it to say, obscure, blinde, and unseen. Again the former, is named Pababus, which is as much as Shining or resplandent: but the latter Scoius, which is all one with Dark. About him are setted the Muses and Mannyones, that its of sy, Morory: but neer to this are Leibe, that is to say, Oblivion and Silence. Our Apollo, is surnamed Theorius and Phaneus, of Secing and Shewing: but Plato is

mpo allo is

To gods and men most odious, And to them as malicious.

Of idle fleeps that cannot wark:

Of whom Pindarus said not unpleasantly:
Condenni'd of all be was, for that

He never any child begat.

And therefore Euripides to this purpole (pake right well:

Soul-fongs, dirges, libations funeral,
Fair Photous pleafe was, be likes them not at all.

And before him, Stefichorus

Apollo joys in merry fongs, in dances, sports and plaies: But Pluto takes delight in sights, in groanes and plaints alwaies.

And Sophocles Seemeth evidently to attribute unto either of them their Musical instruments, by these verses:

The Pfaltery and pleafant Lute, With doleful mones do not well fuit:

For very late is was, and but the other day to speak of, that the Pipe and Hautboics durst presume to sound, and be heard in matters of mirth and delight: but in former times it drew folk to mourning and forrow, to heavy Funerals and Convoics of the dead, and in such cases and services imployed it was, as were not very honorable, nor jocund and delectable; howfoever after, it came to be intermingled in all occasions one with another. Marry they especially, who confusedly have hudled the worship of ahe gods with the service of Dzemons, brought holos infruments in request and reputation.

But to conclude, it semeth that this Mot E.I., it somewhat contrary unto the precept Trace search.

But to conclude, it fement that this Mor E I, is formewhat contrary unto the precept "pies seaming and yet after a fort to accord and agree therewith. For as the one is a word of devout admiration and reverent worthip directed to God, as external and everlasting: so the other is an advertiscent given unto men mortal, to put them in mind of their frail and weak nature.

AR

Sundry hard Words and obscure Terms, in this Translation of Plutarch, in favour of the unlearned Reader; after the order of the alphabet.

Vlus, A forename among the Romans.

Abyrtace, A dainty kinde of meat, with the Medes and other Barbarous Nations, sharp and quick of taste to provoke and please the appetite, composed of Leeks, Garlick, Cresses, Servy, Pomgranate kirnels, and such like.

Academy, A shady place full of Groves, a mile diflant from Athens, where Plate the Philosopher was born, and wherein he raught. Of it, the Academick Philosophers took their name; whose manner wasto discourse and dispute of all questions, but to determine and resolve of nothing. And for the great concourse of Scholart to that place, our Universities are named Academics.

Ædiles, Certain Magistrates or Officers in Rome: of two forts; Plebeii and Curules. Plebeii, of the Commons only, two in number, more antient than the other; chosen by the people alone, to fecond and affiff the Tribunes of the Commons, as their right hands. This name they took of the charge which they had to maintain Temples and Chapels: albeit they regiftred the Sanctions and Acts of the people, called Phbiscita, and kept the same in their own custody; were Clerks of the Market, and looked to weights and measures, &c. yea, and exhibited the games and plaies named Plebeii. Curules were likewise two, elected out of the order and degree of the Patritii: fo called of the Yvory chair wherein they were allowed to fit, as Officers of greater state; and by vertue whereof, in some cases, and at certain times, they might exercise eivill jurisdiction. It belonged to thefe to fet forth the folemnities, called Ludi Magni or Romani. Overfeers they were of the buildings thorowout the City, aswell publick as private, in manner of the Allynomi in Athens: they had regard to the publick vaults, finks, conveiances, and conduits of the waters that ferved the City, asalfo to the Arcenal,&c. They had power likewise to attach the bodies f great persons: and were charged to see to the Provision of Corn and Victuals . At the first, none but of noble families or Patricians were advanced to this place: but in process of time; Gommoners also attained thereto. More of them, and how in Julius Cefars time there were elected fix Adiles, whereof two were named Cereals. See Alex, ab Alexandro, lib; 43: 64b. 4.

Eginetick, Mna or Mina, Seems to be the antient Coynor Money of Greece: for they were the first that Coyned Money: and of them came requous synair. Gelius Rhodig.

Rolius Modus, In Musick, a certain simple, plain and mild tune, apt to procure sleep.

Equinox, That time of the year, when the dates and nights are of equal length; which hapneth twice in the year, to wit, in March and September.

Eftival, Of the Summer: as the Eftival Solftice or Tropick of the Sun, when he is come neerest to us, and returnes Southward from us.

Aloide or Aloiade, were Othus and Ephialtes, two Gyants, so named of Aloeus the Gyant cheir supposed father; for of his wife Iphimedia, Neptune begat them. It is said, that every moneth they grew nine singers.

Alphabet, The order or rew of Greek letters as they stand; so called of Alpha and Beta, the two first letters: and it answers to our A.B.C.

Alternative, By course or turns, one after another; going and coming, &c.

Amphiliyene:, Were a certain folemn counfel of State in Greece, who held twice in the year a meeting, in the Spring and Autumn, at Thermopyle; being affembled from the 12 flourishing Cities of Greece, there to consult of most important affairs.

Amphitheatre, A spacious shew-place; in form round, and as it were of two Theatres. See Amphora, A measure in Rome of liquors only. It feems to take that name of the two ears it had, of either side one: it contained eight Congios, which are somewhat under as many of our wine Gallons.

Anuets or Anulets, Prefervatives hung about the neck, or therwife worne, against witchcraft, poi-fon, elebiting, ficknesse, or any other evils.

Anarchy, The state of a City or Country without a Ruler, lack of Government.

Andria, A fociety of men, meeting together in fame (aaaaa) publick among the Thebans, like the Phiditia in Lacede-

Annales, Histories, Recorde, or Chronicles containing things done from year to year.

Anniversary, Comming once every year, at a certain time : as the Nativity of Chrift, &cc.

Antardick, opposite to the Arcticke. See

Ardick, Amedicine, properly taken inwardly Antidote, A medicine, properly taken inwardly against a poyson or some pestilent and venimous disease. A Counterpoison or preservative. Antipathy, A repugnance in nature, by reason of contrary affections ; whereby fome cannot abide the smell of Roses, others the fight of a

Antiperistasis, A Cohibition or Restraint on every fide; whereby either cold or heat is made fironger in it felf by restraining the contrary : as the natural heat of our bodies in winter, through the coldnelle of the air compassing it about:likewise, the coldnesse of the middle region of the Air in Summer, by occasion of the heat on both sides, caufing Thunder and Hail, &c.

Antiphony, A noyfe of contrary founds.

Antipedes, Those people who inhabit under and beneath our Hemisphære, and go with their feet full against ours.

Apathy, Impassibility, or voidness of all affections and passions.

Apaturia, A Feast solemnized for the space of four dayes at Athens in the honour of Bacchus. So called of Apate, Deceit : because Xanthius the Bootian was in fingle fight flain deceitfully by Thimseles the Athenian. For the cale goes, that whiles they were in combat, Bacchus appeared behird Xanthius, clad in Goats skin: and when Thimoeles charged his concurrent for comming into the field with an affift ant; as he looked back, he was killed by Thimoeles.

Apology, A Plea for the defence or excuse of any person. Apothegm, A short sententious speech.

Apoplexy, A difease comming suddenly in manner of a ftroak, with an univerfall aftonishment and deprivation of fense and motion, which either caufeth death quickly; or elfe ends in a dead

Archontes, Were chief magistrates at Athens, at first every tenth year; and afterwards yearly chosen by lot, to whom the rule of the common-wealth in their popular state was committed : of whom the first was named Barnads, King : the fecond, Archon, Ruler: the third, Polemarchus: and the other fix The mothele.

Artlick, Northerly; to called of Artles in Greck, which fignifies the Bear, that is those conspicuous feven ftars in the North, named Charlemains wain s near to which is that pole or point of the imaginary axle-tree, about which the heavens turn, which thereupon is named, The pole Arctick: and over against it, underneath our Hemifphære, is the other pole, called Antarctick, in the South part of the world.

Aristocraty, A form of Government, or a State wherein the Nobles and best men are Rulers.
